"There's no need to go deeper into the base," Liu Jiayi replied indifferently. "Our goal is to infiltrate, grab Bai Liu, and get him into the game as quickly as possible. Wasting time avoiding surveillance will only slow us down. Let them record if they want—I don't care."

Muke quickly added, "Doesn't matter to me either."

"…Fuck, but I have a final exam," Mu Sicheng groaned, rubbing his forehead. "If I get arrested, can I take it in jail? I really don't want to retake it…"

Liu Jiayi ignored his complaints and looked at the other two. "Let's go over the plan again. We don't have a map, and we don't know what's inside. To avoid being caught, we'll use a coordinate-jumping system. That means if someone tries to capture you, you enter the game."

“As soon as you enter, you receive a twelve-digit coordinate. When all three of us get inside and meet up, we’ll swap hazard coordinates. Then, we’ll switch out, return to the original coordinates, and rendezvous again. That way, we won’t get separated, and we can trace a movement curve.”

“We’ll each move in three mutually perpendicular directions—think of them as the z-axis, y-axis, and x-axis of a three-dimensional coordinate system. By marking our positions at different points and connecting them, we can reconstruct a rough map of the building.”

Liu Jiayi gestured between them. “Buildings follow patterns. Once we have the general curve of this place, we can piece together its layout. Got it?”

“Got it.” Muke nodded, thinking for a moment. “I have a good memory. I can help reconstruct the whole map using the coordinates.”

Mu Sicheng stood there, face blank.

…The hell is this? He hadn’t touched coordinate systems since high school!

Liu Jiayi narrowed her eyes at him. “You didn’t understand, did you?”

Mu Sicheng sighed, lowering his head. “…No.”

The elevator chimed.

Liu Jiayi turned calmly toward the doors. “It’s fine. Just follow my instructions.”

As the doors slowly slid open, she crouched slightly, readying herself. “Prepare for an attack—there are usually guards stationed outside.”

Water surged into the elevator. Liu Jiayi reacted instantly, climbing onto Mu Sicheng’s shoulders to avoid being submerged. Her brows furrowed as the water sloshed in waves around them.

Two patrolmen peered into the elevator. “Are you with the second detachment? You were called in to capture Heretic 006, right? Remember to put on your breathing masks—the area is being flooded—”

Their words cut off as their gazes landed on Liu Jiayi, a child who clearly didn’t belong here.

“You’re not with the crew—?!”

They moved to raise their communicators. “Report! We have intruders on—”

Before they could finish, Mu Sicheng and Muke yanked them inside, knocking them unconscious in one swift motion.

Mu Sicheng quickly stripped off their uniforms and mask communicators, handing them to Muke, who struggled to change in the rising water. Once dressed, he and Mu Sicheng propped the unconscious patrolmen against the wall inside the elevator, then hit the button for -1.

As the doors closed and the lift ascended, a questioning voice crackled over the communicator. “Hello?! What’s the situation with the intruders?!”

Muke grabbed the communicator Mu Sicheng handed him and responded smoothly, “Two intruders were caught at the elevator entrance. We removed them immediately. They’re being sent to -1 now.”

With that, he switched the device off.

Mu Sicheng stepped out of the elevator with Liu Jiayi still on his back, shaking the water off his hands. He frowned. “What’s with all this water?”

Liu Jiayi pulled off her goggles, her expression cold. “The plan needs to change. Someone is using water to trap Bai Liu.”

She paused. “I played a round with him before—he has an extreme aversion to water. If they’re flooding this place, they’re likely torturing him for information. We need to hurry.”

Mu Sicheng’s face darkened. “How fast?”

Liu Jiayi’s sharp gaze swept over the corridor. “They’ve sealed off this floor and turned it into a watertight chamber, then released water to drown Bai Liu while he’s on the run. But in doing so, they’ve made this entire area resemble a sewer.”

Her eyes flicked to the water swirling around them. “Bai Liu should be near the drainage outlet. We’ll find him faster if we follow the current instead of using the coordinate system.”

“I get it.” Muke nodded. “We track the water flow, right?”

Liu Jiayi nodded. “Exactly.”

“…Wait.” Mu Sicheng squinted at them. “Can you two, just once, say something that makes sense to a guy with a 74 in intelligence?”

Liu Jiayi exhaled. “It means we can find the drainage point by listening to the water’s direction and sound.”

Mu Sicheng still looked doubtful. “But how? It’s not like there’s only one current—”

Liu Jiayi shoved her goggles into his hands. “Hold these.”

He took them, still confused, and before he could say anything else, Liu Jiayi inhaled deeply and dove underwater.

A second later, she surfaced, pointing in one direction. Then she turned, glancing at Mu Sicheng with mild disgust, as if she didn’t want to waste any more time explaining things to an idiot.

“In the water, I can hear the current and tell its direction,” she said. “I can also tell where you’re standing because your body blocks the flow, creating a backcurrent. That makes a distinct sound, which helps me detect obstacles.”

Muke turned to Mu Sicheng. “It’s like how fish sense water currents using the lateral lines on their bodies.”

Liu Jiayi nodded. “More or less.”

“…How the hell can you do that?!” Mu Sicheng gawked at her. “Hey! This is the real world! Are you human or some kind of monster? That’s basically a superpower!”

Liu Jiayi didn’t bother answering. She simply gave him a blank stare, then turned and dove back into the water, moving through it as effortlessly as a fish.

She had this ability for two reasons.

The first was that she had been born blind. Her other senses were naturally sharper than most.

The second…

As a child, her father often threw her into a weir to catch fish with her bare hands. If she failed, she would be beaten. To survive, Liu Jiayi had learned to sense movement through water—to track the tiny vibrations of fish burrowing into the mud.

She had always hated this ability.

But this time was different.

“Whoever decided to flood this place…” Liu Jiayi swept a hand over her face, shaking off the droplets. Her body sank slightly as she floated in the water, her tone calm and ice-cold.

“…While they were busy torturing Bai Liu with water, they also made it easier for me, a blind girl, to track him down.”

"-148, 149, 150—that'll do. Drain."

The door to [1087]'s room closed. The walls on both sides of the corridor loosened, and water spilled through the gaps.

Bai Liu surfaced, coughing and choking on the water.

He fell to his knees, head bowed, his back arching violently as he struggled for air. His white shirt clung to his trembling shoulder blades, soaked through.

His complexion turned an unnatural shade of pale, almost lifeless in the water’s aftermath. His fingertips were bruised from oxygen deprivation, his chest rising and falling erratically. The three-minute-long suffocation had drained him completely.

Soon, Bai Liu's body went limp. His mouth hung open, his eyes unfocused as he collapsed onto his back. His lungs clawed for oxygen, but no matter how hard he gasped, it felt as if the air refused to reach him. He looked like he was going into shock.

"How did it feel to be underwater for three minutes? Still used to it?"

Tang Erda’s voice crackled through the comm in the patrolman’s hand at the end of the corridor. "They say the world record for breath-holding is thirteen minutes. Want to try for it, Bai Liu?"

His voice turned mocking. "Does it bring back any bad memories?"

Then, almost absentmindedly, Tang Erda asked, "Have you thought about how you're going to deal with the Dry Rose Leaf Gas scenario?"

He continued, voice even but razor-sharp: "Death won't scare you. It never has. So I won't threaten you with it. Instead, I'll give you two choices. First—cooperate. Give an honest answer about how to neutralize the Rose Dry Leaf Gas, and I'll give you a sum of money that satisfies you. Do your job, and we won't interfere with you anymore."

His tone darkened. "Second option—I lock you in with this [Devouring Spring]. I'll drain the water every minute and a half to three minutes. You won't die, but you'll be drowning over and over again. You should be familiar with that feeling, right?"

Tang Erda let out a light chuckle, slow and deliberate. His voice dropped.

"After all, the director of your orphanage used to teach you that way. You were such a bad child, weren't you? So strange, so wrong from the start. She only wanted to correct you, guide you back to the right path. That's why she taught you like that."

"It's a pity, though."

Tang Erda sighed as if discussing something mundane. "No matter how harshly she 'taught' you, you never changed. Never reacted. And for someone who delights in tormenting others, Bai Liu, you must know—there's nothing more frustrating than breaking in a child who won't even flinch."

Bai Liu slowly raised his arm to shield his eyes from the glaring white light above him. His breathing grew faint.

Tang Erda pressed on. "So she changed tactics. And eventually, she found the one thing that made you struggle."

A sharp, panicked voice cut through the comm.

"STOP IT!"

Lu Yizhan's voice was raw, desperate, straining to drown out Tang Erda's words. "He's forgotten! Don't make him remember!"

But Tang Erda only raised his voice. Cold. Unrelenting. A thorn burrowing deep into Bai Liu's already dazed, suffocating mind.

Bai Liu flinched. A rare, involuntary reaction. His head ached as if splitting apart.

"Have you really forgotten, Bai Liu?" Tang Erda's voice was laced with something between mockery and something far, far crueler. "No one pushed you into the water. You were the one who kept shoving your own head under."

"Because someone else took the blame for what you did. Someone took the punishment meant for you. The teachers singled him out. And in the end, they drowned him in the orphanage pond."

"You watched him sink."

"You kept dunking your head under the water, trying to pull him out."

Tang Erda's voice dipped lower. "You're not afraid of water, Bai Liu. You're afraid of what you saw in it."

"Do you remember who he was?"

Lu Yizhan fought desperately, thrashing, trying to stop him. His voice cracked in agony. "DON'T TELL HIM!!!"

Tang Erda ignored him. His voice turned eerily calm. "His name was Xie Ta."

"But in this timeline, you forgot him."

"And you mistook him for Lu Yizhan."

"Do you remember now?" Tang Erda's words cut through Bai Liu like a blade. "Do you remember if Xie Ta was beside you…or if he was watching you from beneath the water?"

"Xie Ta really did die for you. So wake up, Bai Liu."

Xie Ta...?

A blinding white light flashed through Bai Liu's mind, cutting through the suffocating darkness.

Memories—shattered, buried, distorted beyond recognition—resurfaced in fragments.

The white light flickered, illuminating long-lost images. Black-and-white, then colored edges, the blurred profile of someone long forgotten.

And then, as Tang Erda's voice anchored him to reality, the broken pieces realigned—frame by frame—like a film reel playing his past.

Memories lie to their owners.

When emotions are too overwhelming to bear, the mind distorts them. Shapes them into something more manageable. Hides the truth, lets its owner continue forward as if nothing happened.

In simpler terms, self-preservation.

Bai Liu's mind had carved the memories into something he could endure. He had rewritten the past, locked it away. But now, that illusion crumbled.

The familiar, unassuming face of Lu Yizhan was swallowed by the white light.

And in its place, another face emerged.

A face with striking, delicate bone structure. Long, slightly wavy hair that draped over his eyes. Lips that were eerily well-defined.

He turned.

From the abyss of forgotten memories, he turned toward Bai Liu.

And he whispered his name.

"Bai Liu, it’s been a long time."

The Bureau of Heresy and Dangerous Treatment

Beautiful children often become targets in private orphanages.

This place doesn't accommodate beauty well.

Yet, despite always being covered in bruises, he rarely seemed to be bullied. It was the bullies who were unlucky.

Bai Liu enjoyed watching this quiet, sharp-edged boy fight back against those who tried to torment him.

A loner. He smelled of strange mushrooms and blood, the backs of his hands always covered in fresh pinpricks—sometimes with blood seeping through, which he wiped away with casual disinterest.

He barely spoke to anyone, and, in turn, no one dared approach the pale, ghostly boy whose complexion grew whiter by the day, like a vampire draining itself dry.

But he didn't seem to mind. He wandered off to places no one else wanted to go, disappearing for entire days at a time.

Bai Liu liked that.

The man sat in the church behind the orphanage, in the first row beneath the statue of God, head bowed over a book, turning the pages one by one. Bai Liu—or rather, Bai Six—sat nearby, chin in his palm, watching with lazy curiosity. Observing both the boy and the book in his hands.

Then, suddenly, the boy turned to him and held up the book. His tone was light:

"Do you want to read it too?"

Bai Liu glanced at the title—The Long, Thin, Ghostly Book of Murder—and smiled.

"Yeah."

Sliding onto the bench beside him, Bai Liu tilted his head. "Do you invite people to read with you like this often?" He nodded toward the book. "And how do you even get stuff like this in here? It's contraband, isn't it? That woman would lose her mind if the director caught us. She'd say it's violent, corrupting."

The boy flipped another page, head still bowed. His hands, even as they turned the paper, bore the same pinpricks. He answered without looking up:

"I asked others, but they screamed and ran the moment they saw what it was about."

"And the book?"

"I got it from outside. I like reading scary things."

Bai Liu smirked. "Why?"

The boy finally looked up, pale eyes narrowing. "Because I think I'm scary too."

Then, he asked, "Do you like it?"

"I do," Bai Liu said easily, lips curling. "I like watching monsters tear apart human players."

From that day forward, the boy would find more horror books, more forbidden games, and share them with Bai Liu.

They hid beneath the church's statues, in the shadowed places ignored by gods, indulging in their forbidden collection. Flipping through grotesque picture books, playing eerie games—while Bai Liu, for the first time, found himself enjoying someone's company.

This one was different from Lu Yizhan, who always let him win. Lu Yizhan would scratch his head and laugh when he lost, saying, Wow, Bai Liu, you're really good.

But this boy? He played to win. No matter the horror game, he killed ruthlessly, leaving Bai Liu trailing behind. And if Bai Liu sulked over a loss, he would—clumsily, awkwardly—pat his shoulder and say, "Come on. You might beat me next time."

Bai Liu would challenge him again, over and over, relishing the repeated defeat. He found it... fun.

They spent their days together, becoming the orphanage's resident freaks.

Then, the book was discovered.

During a routine sweep, a teacher found The Long, Thin, Ghostly Book of Murder and reported it to the director.

Furious, she assembled the entire orphanage, forcing them to stand outside as she demanded to know who had brought such a filthy, sick book into their walls.

Silence. Heads bowed. No one stepped forward.

And so, in front of everyone, she ripped the book apart. Page by page.

Bai Liu stood in the crowd, lips pressed in a tight line, watching as the book he and the boy had pored over countless times was torn to shreds.

No one confessed. No one wanted to be blamed. But everyone pointed fingers at Bai Liu and the strange, pale boy.

When the director interrogated him, Bai Liu denied everything.

But the boy didn't.

He simply stood there, gazing down at the torn fragments on the ground, and asked,

"Are you afraid of this book?"

Then, he lifted his eyes to the director.

"Or are you afraid of me?" His voice was calm, almost curious. "You think I'm a monster, don't you? That I'll bring something terrible upon you?"

The director stiffened. Her eyes flickered toward the pinpricks on his hands. Then she looked away.

And so, the matter was quietly dropped.

The boy, as always, was untouchable.

Not just the director—the teachers feared him too. They recoiled from the blood on him, from the scent of mushrooms clinging to his clothes. Their fear was obvious. And soon, the other children, skilled in reading unspoken things, became afraid as well.

They ostracized him. Beat him. And when they couldn't win, they kept their distance, whispering behind his back. Spinning rumors, stories, nightmares.

They turned him into a monster.

But he didn't care.

After everyone had left, he knelt to pick up the torn pages.

Bai Liu knelt beside him. Together, they gathered the pieces and carried them to the church—their safe zone.

No one went there unless they had to. On certain days, rich people came to the orphanage for baptisms, for strange rituals. Bai Liu avoided them. He didn't like the way they looked at the children—like inspecting goods for sale.

After each ceremony, the boy's pinpricks multiplied. His face grew paler. He looked less human, more like a bloodless marble statue.

Now, beneath the unfeeling gaze of the idol, the two of them sat at the church table, piecing together the book as if it could be restored.

"Do you think people here actually believe in God?" Bai Liu asked suddenly. "Do you think God exists?"

The boy kept his head down, fitting the torn pages together. Then, without looking up, he asked, "Do you?"

Bai Liu shrugged. "No. If God were real, he'd fix this book for me."

The boy remained patient, but Bai Liu, frustrated with the mess, gave up.

"Were you upset when she tore it?" the boy asked.

"No," Bai Liu said quickly.

The boy stared at him. "Do you like this book?"

"I told you, no."

He only nodded. "I know."

For some reason, Bai Liu felt suffocated. "What do you know?"

A month later, he understood.

Beneath the church, an ugly, makeshift doll sat calmly in the first row. It had the rough silhouette of The Long, Thin, Ghostly Figure.

It was made of torn orphanage sheets, covered in patches, a straw-stuffed head—clumsy, pathetic, like a homeless effigy.

And the boy sat inside it. Holding the taped-up book in his hands.

"Do you want to read it together?" he asked, voice unchanged.

Bai Liu sat. Read.

And then, less than a minute in, he collapsed against the table in laughter.

"—your face in that thing is too much—"

The boy adjusted the fabric. "I couldn't find enough bandages. My face should be scary enough."

Bai Liu smirked. "Doubt it." Before the boy could react, Bai Liu reached up and pushed back his hair.

For a second, they stared.

Pale, silver-blue eyes. Colorless lips. The sharp angles of his face reflected in Bai Liu's dark pupils.

Then, at the same time, they looked away.

Bai Liu clenched his hand, his breath unsteady.

The boy, face hidden once more, rapidly flipped through the book as if reading something he wasn't.

"Do I look… horrible?" he asked softly.

Bai Liu exhaled. "Not really."

"Then why is your heart beating so fast?"

Bai Liu stood abruptly, book in hand. "That's enough for today."

The boy reached forward, pressing the mended book into Bai Liu's arms.

"It's fixed," he said quietly. "It's yours."

Bai Liu left without looking back with a tense expression on his face.

Soon after, it was time for the wealthy patrons to arrive at the church and perform their strange rituals.

Normally, the dean would summon Bai Liu to the church a day in advance. On those nights, he wasn't allowed to return to his usual sleeping quarters—he had to stay in the church instead.

Bai Liu tossed and turned, clutching the copy of The Long, Thin, Ghostly Book of Murder he had been given. Eventually, he got up, carefully slipped into his shoes, and headed for the church.

The doors were locked, as always, but Bai Liu had spent enough time in that place to know a few ways to sneak inside. One such entrance was a small broken window, concealed by a curtain.

He climbed through the window, landing quietly inside. In the moonlight, he searched the pews for any sign of another person. Eventually, he found him—hidden behind the statue.

The moment Bai Liu saw him, his face was devoid of emotion.

Xie Ta was curled up in a bathtub, slightly too small for his body, filled with blood. His nearly translucent white face was half-submerged, breath undetectable, his eyelashes dusted with frost. Stitches covered his hands, feet, and forehead, still oozing blood.

"Xie Ta." Bai Liu spoke his name for the first time.

Slowly, Xie Ta stirred in the bathtub. He opened his eyes and saw Bai Liu. It seemed as though he wanted to reach out, but before his fingertips could touch Bai Liu, something in the blood shifted. A thorny vine, thick with mushrooms, slithered out, wrapping around Xie Ta's wrists, ankles, and neck, pulling him back into the bloody baptismal pool.

Bai Liu's voice remained calm. "What are you doing?"

"Baptism," Xie Ta replied. "It's the ritual before the blood is drawn."

"They're taking your blood, aren't they?" Bai Liu continued, just as calm. "They need it to save themselves. And after they've drained you, you're going to die, aren't you?"

“I won’t.” Xie Ta looked at him. “I’m a monster. Monsters don’t die.”

As he spoke, he exhaled a breath of white mist—a testament to how low his body temperature had become.

“So, you’re just sleeping here? Aren’t you cold?” Bai Liu asked.

Xie Ta shook his head, answering honestly, “I can’t feel it.”

But Bai Liu’s warmth carried through the blood, spreading toward Xie Ta. He blinked, slowly. The frost on his lashes melted with each breath Bai Liu exhaled.

Now, he could feel the cold—because Bai Liu was warm.

Then, as if nothing had happened, Bai Liu opened the book Xie Ta had given him and stepped closer. “Want to read it together?”

They lay together in the blood-soaked baptismal font, speaking in a hundred meandering ways beneath the gaze of the statue looming above them.

“Does baptism mean anything?”

“It’s a blessing,” Xie Ta murmured. “God’s blessing for His most beloved, newborn believers.”

“You call this a blessing?”

“…A blessing for them, I suppose.”

“You really believe that? You don’t actually think there’s a God, do you?”

“…Hmm.”

Bai Liu curled up in Xie Ta’s cold embrace and fell into a deep sleep.

When he woke the next morning, he was in his own bed—completely clean, without a trace of blood on him.

Xie Ta returned that afternoon, paler than before. This time, the needle marks reached his face, and the backs of his hands and feet were mottled with bruises from repeated blood draws.

Bai Liu said nothing as he carefully wrapped the still-bleeding stitches with bandages he had stolen from the infirmary.

Xie Ta watched him quietly, then spoke. “Once this bandage comes off, your long, skinny ghostly shadow doll will have a face.”

Bai Liu’s lips pressed into a thin line.

The blood rituals grew more frequent. Xie Ta appeared less and less, and when he did, the scent of blood and mushrooms clung to him so heavily it was suffocating.

The other children avoided him, waving their hands in front of their noses in disgust, as if trying to dispel both the stench and Xie Ta himself.

Perhaps knowing how repulsive he smelled, Xie Ta stopped coming near Bai Liu. He only watched from afar.

When he didn’t want to be seen, it was as if he didn’t exist. No one could find him—not even Bai Liu.

So Bai Liu turned outward. He began making contact with adults, taking on small, illicit jobs—things suitable for a child operating in the grey areas of the world. It made him good money.

And with enough money, with enough preparation, he was sure he could take Xie Ta away—off the investors’ radar, far from the orphanage. It was an immature, naive plan, but still… it was something.

A growing sense of unease settled in Bai Liu’s chest. If Xie Ta didn’t leave soon, there was a very real chance that he never would.

But in the end, Bai Liu was caught.

The child who had betrayed him stood cowering behind the dean, his face a mixture of fear and excitement. He swallowed several times before finally raising a trembling hand to point at Bai Liu, whose expression remained impassive.

“I saw him… doing something weird with an adult! He’s helping grown-ups do bad things! I saw it! They’re paying him!”

The dean’s gaze bore into him, stern and unyielding.

“Did you do this! Bai Liu?!”

Bai Liu did not deny anything. He simply stared indifferently away from the group, his gaze fixed on Xie Ta, who sat in the middle of the crowd, silent.

He didn't explain what he had done—because there was no point.

These people didn’t care about the truth. They never asked, never wanted to know. They had already judged him guilty.

Of course, what he did wasn’t exactly a good thing. That much was true.

But the teachers were just afraid—afraid of him, the weird kid who spent all his time with Xie Ta, who grew more unsettling by the day, who read gory stories, and who always looked at people as if they were animals lined up for slaughter.

So, of course, he was punished.

Yet Bai Liu, rather than feeling regret, found himself coldly analyzing the measures these teachers used to discipline their students—as he had done many times before.

When the teacher grabbed his arm, trying to drag him away, Xie Ta suddenly staggered to his feet, bracing one hand against the back of his chair.

His face and voice were as calm as ever, untouched by time or circumstance.

"I made him do it."

The teachers erupted.

They feared Xie Ta even more than Bai Liu. He was surrounded, yet the space around him remained eerily empty—a cautious one-meter gap creating a vacuum.

The dean’s voice trembled, though she tried to mask it with authority. "Why did you make Bai Liu do such a thing?"

There was never a question of Xie Ta’s innocence. The verdict had been delivered as swiftly and definitively as it had been for Bai Liu.

Because Xie Ta was a monster. And Bai Liu? He was just a bad kid who followed monsters and took their actions for granted.

Xie Ta glanced sideways at Bai Liu, who was being restrained by the teachers. Then, very, very lightly, he smiled.

For a fleeting moment, Bai Liu thought that if not for the strands of hair obscuring them, Xie Ta's silver-blue eyes must have looked soft, beautifully curved.

Xie Ta spoke in the same quiet tone he had used when he first gave Bai Liu a book.

"Because I wanted to contact someone outside and run away with Bai Liu."

"You dare try to escape?!" the dean shrieked, her voice nearly breaking. "Do you have any idea how much trouble that would cause?! We're already in the second round of screening! Those investors won't pay without your blood!"

The children scattered in a panic, whispering fearfully among themselves.

"Blood?! What blood?! You mean all that blood from his pinholes?!"

"He really is a monster, isn't he?"

The dean's hand flew to her mouth as she realized what she had blurted out. A moment later, she turned on Xie Ta, her grip on his slender wrist tightening.

"You've been given everything by this institution, and yet you dare try to run?" Her fear curdled into something cruel, something righteous. "We've been too lenient with you. You need discipline. You need to be cleansed."

She tugged Xie Ta forward. "You will be baptized in the church tonight."

She dragged him away.

Bai Liu fought against the hands holding him back, struggling through the crowd of children and teachers, reaching desperately for Xie Ta.

"Xie Ta!"

Xie Ta turned to look at him. The wind lifted the curls from his forehead, finally revealing those silver-blue eyes—serene and breathtaking, like a lake thawing after a long winter.

Bai Liu froze, staring into them. They were not sad. Just calm. And in them, Bai Liu saw only himself, reflected entirely.

Xie Ta reached out, taking Bai Liu's outstretched hand. Their fingers interlocked.

Cold and warm, the touch of his skin carried the raised pinhole scars along the back of his hand.

"Bai Liu."

Xie Ta's smile was small, barely there, but his grip was firm. "Don't be afraid. I'm a monster. I won't die."

"Let go!"

The dean tore their hands apart.

Bai Liu gritted his teeth, unwilling to let go, but Xie Ta released him first. The moment he did, the connection between them snapped.

Xie Ta shook his head at Bai Liu—a quiet warning not to follow—before turning to walk away with the dean, toward the church.

But Bai Liu had never been an obedient child.

A few minutes later, he slipped through a broken window, slipping behind a curtain and curling himself into a tight ball. He peered out from the shadows, eyes locked onto Xie Ta and the dean standing beneath the statue.

Xie Ta stood barefoot before the altar, dressed in pure white, holding a flickering candle. His head was tilted back, eyes closed, lips moving in slow, measured prayer.

The dean stood beside him, clutching a whip.

When Xie Ta finished his prayer, the abbot stepped forward, his gaze heavy.

"Now for the baptism. But since you dared to think of betraying God, tonight's cleansing must be thorough."

Xie Ta lowered his lashes. "It won't work."

His voice was soft, almost absent. "I am the evil itself that cannot be washed away."

The dean's expression darkened.

She snatched the candle from his hands and shoved him into the baptismal pool.

For the first time, she smiled.

It was the twisted smile of someone who believed she had finally conquered her greatest fear.

"You will not surface until the candle burns out," she said coldly.

Drops of wax dripped into the water, blooming into tiny white flowers. One by one, they floated above Xie Ta, who lay beneath the surface, motionless.

The baptismal font was too small, too tight—less like a place of cleansing and more like a coffin.

And then, something changed.

The statue looming over the font shifted.

The pure white marble took on a distinctly human expression—one of judgment. Accusation.

Why have you misbehaved? it seemed to say. Why did you try to escape the sanctuary of God?

A voice, cold and absolute, resonated through the air.

[You are an evil thing. A fallen god. You cannot leave this place.]

[Tawil, you know the boy was merely caught in your corruption. He is not the disciple you seek.]

Under the water, Xie Ta's fingers twitched.

[No, I do not see him as a disciple.]

The idol's voice hardened.

[Then what is he to you? He has seen your eyes. He is already slipping toward madness.]

[If you do not kill him, he will become a monster just like you. He will destroy the world. You know this. Everything you touch is doomed to corruption.]

Xie Ta’s fingers folded over his chest.

[I took him… because…]

He hesitated.

[I want to read with him forever.]

The voice turned to fury.

Kill him. Kill the boy you have defiled!

[I can’t.]

Xie Ta’s expression was peaceful, unwavering.

[If you must kill someone, kill me. But I will not harm him.]

The idol’s face twisted with rage.

[Even in exile, you dare defy the gods?]

The water around Xie Ta thickened. Grew heavy. Grew cold. Ice laced through his veins, pressing down on him like a thousand spiked chains.

For a brief moment, his lashes fluttered.

And then—nothing.

His grip, once so desperate to hold onto Bai Liu’s warmth, loosened.

Slowly, Xie Ta’s body drifted, lifeless, beneath the water.

"Thank you, Xie Ta?!"

The dean took two panicked steps backward before lurching forward again, pressing trembling fingers to Xie Ta’s nostrils. Her grip on the candle slipped in her shock, and as she stumbled, her foot extinguished the only remaining light in the church.

"It's over..."

She collapsed to the ground in a trance, her hands clawing at her hair as she muttered incredulously, "Isn't he a monster?! After all that blood, he's still alive? He's been baptized so many times without dying —why is he drowning this time?!"

Her breathing turned ragged. "It's only been a few minutes, hasn't it?! The candle hasn't even burned out!" Her eyes widened in terror, her head shaking violently as if denial alone could keep Xie Ta from returning to life. "It can't be. It can't be! It can't be!"

Then a new thought gripped her.

"What am I going to do now that he's dead?!"

The dean broke down, collapsing to her knees before the baptismal font.

She had never imagined that even in death, this child could still instill such mortal fear in her.

Dazed, she stared at Xie Ta's flawless face submerged in the water, whispering, "...If I drown Xie Ta myself, the pack will drain my blood. I need to find another child to take his place."

Hidden behind the curtains, Bai Liu watched the dean's frantic breakdown with an eerie stillness.

There was something unshakable about him, an unwavering patience as he observed.

Xie Ta had told him before—he was a monster. He couldn't die. He had to be playing dead, fooling the foolish dean.

Yes.

Bai Liu could already see it: once the dean left, he would approach the baptismal font. Xie Ta would rise from the water, a rare smile curling his lips. Maybe he'd push back his wet hair, tilting his silvery-blue eyes toward Bai Liu with that deep, unreadable gaze.

Maybe he'd ask why Bai Liu had come.

The mere thought sent Bai Liu's heartbeat quickening.

But the dean—terrified of letting the investors know she had killed Xie Ta—lifted the boy's body from the font, sneaking out the back door of the church under cover of night. She tied stones to his hands and feet before tossing him into a small, barren lake behind the church—one that fed into a river beyond.

After a few circulations, Xie Ta's body would drift from the lake into the river. From the river into the sea.

But Bai Liu would not let him go that far.

Silently trailing behind, Bai Liu made no move, no sound. The dean was already teetering on the edge of madness—if he revealed himself now, she might not hesitate to dispose of another child.

Only when she had fled did Bai Liu finally step forward.

He buried his face in the water, pushing through the bright green duckweed as he dove down to reach Xie Ta's sinking form.

The lake was deep. The duckweed was thick. And Xie Ta was sinking fast.

The black silt, like some ravenous creature, coiled over his body, greedily dragging him into the abyss.

Bai Liu clenched his teeth, resisting the instinct to choke as the filthy lake water poured into his mouth, his nose, his ears. His lungs burned, his vision blurred, but he reached—grasping at Xie Ta's hand buried in the silt.

With his last shred of strength, Bai Liu yanked him free.

His lungs screamed for air. His mind flickered at the edges of consciousness from the lack of oxygen.

But he did not let go.

Breaking the surface, Bai Liu dragged Xie Ta onto the shore, collapsing beside him, gasping. His hands braced against the dirt, his head tipped back toward the vast, starless sky. Water dripped from his face, from his eyelashes, from his clothes. The cicadas cried in the grass around them, a shrill, discordant symphony.

And yet, for some reason, Bai Liu let out a small, breathless laugh.

He turned, nudging Xie Ta's still, unmoving body with his foot.

"How do you know I'd take you away?" His voice was rough, yet teasing. "What if I worked for those adults? What if I earned money just to spend it all on myself?"

He squinted at Xie Ta, a strange, conflicted smile tugging at his lips.

"Aren't you being a little self-centered, Xie Ta?"

Xie Ta's face was pale, his lips tinged with dampness. He remained unresponsive.

Bai Liu sat up, then shifted into a crouch, watching him. Slowly, he reached out, brushing aside the wet strands of hair clinging to Xie Ta's forehead.

This one… was really beautiful.

His fingertips trailed downward, from Xie Ta's long, damp eyelashes, over the bridge of his nose, before finally settling on his lips—lips that were impossibly pale, impossibly cold.

And those silvery-blue eyes…

Eyes that, somehow, had always seemed meant for Bai Liu alone.

"Xie Ta."

His voice was quiet as he leaned down, pressing his ear to Xie Ta's chest. His breath hitched.

No heartbeat.

No breath.

No warmth.

No sign of life at all.

"I mean it," Bai Liu murmured, his voice barely more than a whisper.

He buried his head in Xie Ta's arms, fists clenching so tightly that his knuckles turned white.

The scent of blood was thick—familiar, metallic, laced with the damp musk of lake water. The scent of something perilously close to death.

Bai Liu tightened his grip.

Water dripped from his clothes, from Xie Ta's, their bodies pressed close, dampness merging together.

"I don't think you're playing dead, either," Bai Liu whispered, resting his forehead against Xie Ta's shoulder.

A drop of water slipped from his lashes, disappearing into the fabric of Xie Ta’s shirt.

Xie Ta’s head lolled against Bai Liu’s shoulder, lifeless. His eyes remained open, empty, unblinking.

The only reminder that he was still there… was the cold water trickling from his hair, seeping into Bai Liu’s skin.

Bai Liu breathed out, voice barely more than a hush against the night.

"Didn’t you say you were a monster?"

He tilted his head, pressing his forehead against Xie Ta’s chest, closing his eyes.

"Then come back to life like one."

A pause.

Then, softer—almost broken—

"You're making me feel horrible right now, Xie Ta."

A single drop of water slipped from Xie Ta’s eyelashes. It landed on Bai Liu’s hand—silent, cold, like a tear.

The Bureau of Heresy and Dangerous Treatment

“The Bai Six guy… he’s been getting weirder and weirder lately…” The children whispered fearfully, their heads pressed together.

After the director claimed that Xie Ta had run away from the orphanage, the fear that had once been reserved for him was transferred onto Bai Liu.

The other children eyed Bai Liu warily from across the long dining table. He sat alone at the far end, eating in silence—the same seat that Xie Ta had occupied before. Their gazes flickered between curiosity and dread.

“The new kid—your name is Lu Yizhan, right?” A boy scowled at another, slightly older child. He pointed toward Bai Liu. “That one at the end—Bai Six. You better stay away from him.”

Lu Yizhan turned back with a puzzled expression. “Why? Did he do something?”

“Because he’s a monster!” The boy bared his teeth and curled his fingers into claws, making strange howling noises. “He ate his only friend! And his friend was a monster too—a freak with bleeding pinholes all over him! If you get too close, he’ll eat you next!”

The other children shrank back, giggling nervously, but Lu Yizhan only frowned. He looked toward the end of the table, where Bai Liu sat—thin, quiet, and seemingly ordinary. In fact, he was almost too thin.

Bai Liu looked like he never had enough to eat. His cheeks were sunken, his frame frail. He ate quickly, as though he were starving.

But—Lu Yizhan’s eyes fell on Bai Liu’s plate, where a piece of bread remained untouched. He showed no intention of eating it.

Bai Liu finished his meal without a word, then lifted his head. His gaze met Lu Yizhan’s—calm, unreadable.

Lu Yizhan was the first to look away.

Bai Liu got up from the table, his face expressionless, and quietly slipped out the back of the church, holding the untouched bread.

Lu Yizhan hesitated, then followed. But the moment he reached the church doors, Bai Liu had already disappeared.

What is he doing…?

That evening, Lu Yizhan, the orphanage's newest arrival, was assigned to sleep in the bed that had once belonged to Xie Ta. Just as he was about to drift off, he turned his head—and nearly jumped out of his skin.

Bai Liu stood at the foot of his bed, face blank, holding a futon.

Lu Yizhan clutched his blanket to his chest, his voice wary. "Bai Six… what are you doing?"

The other children in the dormitory screamed in fright, scrambling away.

"Bai Six is gonna eat us! He's gonna eat us!"

Lu Yizhan barely managed to keep his composure. He glanced at Bai Liu, who remained motionless, still holding the bedding.

"…You want to switch beds with me?"

Bai Liu stared at him for a long moment. There were dark circles under his eyes, his expression dazed, as if he hadn't been sleeping at all. Slowly, he nodded.

Lu Yizhan exhaled in relief. So it was just a bed swap.

He didn't particularly care where he slept, so he handed Bai Liu the bed without argument. Before lying down in his new spot, he reminded Bai Liu to switch back in the morning—since the teachers recognized children by their beds. They could change secretly among themselves, but if they were caught, there would be trouble.

After their quiet agreement, Bai Liu began making up his new bed in silence. As Lu Yizhan was settling in, he glanced back—and noticed something odd.

Bai Liu lay curled up on the mattress, his arms wrapped protectively around a long, thin, faceless rag doll.

He didn't seem like the kind of child who would sleep with a doll at his age. But he clearly cherished it. Not only did he leave most of his blanket covering the doll instead of himself, but he also held it tightly, as if shielding it from the cold.

The night was chilly, yet Bai Liu didn't shiver. He simply curled up around the doll and drifted off.

Lu Yizhan's eyes lingered. The doll was crudely made—patched together, seams fraying at the edges. An unfinished thing. Yet Bai Liu clung to it like something irreplaceable.

His sleeping position is… strange.

Bai Liu's body was curled in a way that mirrored the doll's embrace—like two figures pressed tightly together in a narrow, oval-shaped space.

Like they were in a bathtub.

Lu Yizhan found himself staring longer than he intended. Then, shaking his head, he turned away and lay down in Bai Liu's old bed.

This Bai Six is strange.

But… not as bad as the others say.

As the days passed, Lu Yizhan noticed something else: Bai Liu never seemed to eat properly.

On the seventh day, Bai Liu nearly collapsed at the dining table. Lu Yizhan was the first to react, shoving a candy into Bai Liu's hand and forcing him to eat half of his meal. Bai Liu's fingers trembled slightly—he was clearly suffering from low blood sugar.

He's not eating enough.

He always had leftovers, sneaking food away instead of eating it himself. And each night, when he returned to the dormitory, his condition only worsened. He was coming back more exhausted, more drained.

What the hell is he doing?

Lu Yizhan began intentionally sharing his food with Bai Liu. Most of the time, Bai Liu refused coldly.

"I don't need it."

Meanwhile, the orphanage's atmosphere grew increasingly eerie. More and more children disappeared—some running away, others forced to. The place was not as safe as it seemed.

And then, one night, Lu Yizhan noticed something else.

When Bai Liu returned, his body carried the faint scent of blood.

Someone's been drawing his blood.

The night Lu Yizhan planned to escape, he grabbed Bai Liu's wrist before he could disappear again.

He leaned in, voice low. "Listen. This place isn't safe."

Bai Liu didn't react.

Lu Yizhan's grip tightened. "I know of another orphanage—a public one, near the police station. If we go there, they'll protect us."

Still, Bai Liu remained indifferent. "No. I'm not going."

Lu Yizhan's expression twisted with frustration. "Why? Something's really wrong here!"

Bai Liu finally met his gaze. His pupils were unfocused, his tone sluggish.

"I'm waiting for someone to wake up," he murmured. "And when he does… I'll take him with me."

Perhaps it was curiosity, or perhaps Bai Liu's growing weakness that finally gave Lu Yizhan a break from tailing him. After another baptism, Lu Yizhan seized the opportunity and followed Bai Liu into the back of the church—an area he would sneak off to every day.

The back of the church had always been a restricted area within the orphanage. The director strictly forbade the children from going there, claiming it was unsafe—an untamed jungle with a small, undeveloped lake. The terrain was treacherous, with deep mud and hidden dangers where a child could easily drown. To prevent access, the church remained locked throughout the week.

And yet, Bai Liu had found an isolated path leading there.

Lu Yizhan trailed behind, watching as Bai Liu expertly slipped through a broken window behind the side door of the church. Without hesitation, Bai Liu crossed the church interior, exited through the back door, and disappeared into the tall, unruly grass—swallowed whole by the greenery.

Bai Liu moved with practiced ease, nimbly avoiding thorny bushes and jagged rocks. Eventually, he came to a stop beside a small pond, its surface thick with floating weeds.

Lu Yizhan crouched behind the grass, confused. What is Bai Liu doing here? Is he going to swim?

Ordinarily, Bai Liu would have noticed if someone were following him. But days of hunger had left him physically drained, his mind sluggish. His focus was entirely consumed by whatever purpose had led him here, and so he failed to sense the presence lurking nearby.

With his back to Lu Yizhan, Bai Liu undressed unguardedly, revealing a stark white frame marked by protruding ribs. He bent down, carefully setting aside a piece of bread on top of his clean clothing before turning and diving into the pond.

Lu Yizhan remained hidden, eyes fixed on the water.

Now I'll finally find out what he's been doing all this time.

But as the minutes ticked by, Bai Liu did not resurface.

A creeping unease settled over Lu Yizhan. Something was wrong. Without a second thought, he rushed forward, plunging into the murky water fully clothed. Desperately, he searched the depths—until at last, he saw him.

Bai Liu was motionless, his feet ensnared in mud, his hands limp, drifting weightlessly in the water. He was drowning.

Lu Yizhan held his breath and swam toward him, grasping Bai Liu’s shoulder and hauling him up. But there was resistance—Bai Liu was clutching something, struggling to drag it with him.

It was only with Lu Yizhan’s help that Bai Liu finally managed to pull both himself and the mysterious object out of the water.

They collapsed onto the shore, gasping for air.

Bai Liu’s body spasmed as he coughed up water, his breathing shallow and uneven. It took him a long moment to regain his senses before he slowly pushed himself onto his side.

He had nearly drowned. His body was too weak, his blood sugar too low. He shouldn't have been doing anything this physically strenuous.

"What were you thinking?!" Lu Yizhan burst out, still panting. "If you couldn't drag it out all at once, why didn't you come up for air first?! Were you trying to drown yourself?!"

His frustration was met with silence.

Then, as Lu Yizhan turned his attention to what they had dragged ashore, his breath caught in his throat.

Lying beside Bai Liu was a body.

Its face was bare, its ankles bound with rope—ropes that had kept it from sinking.

Lu Yizhan's stomach twisted. His voice rose with disbelief. "You hid a body in this lake? Are you insane?! No one would ever find it here, sure, but—who is this? And why the hell are you dragging him out every day?"

Bai Liu did not respond. He simply knelt beside the corpse, his expression unreadable.

With quiet, deliberate movements, he picked up the untouched piece of bread from his clothes and crumbled it, gently pressing it to the corpse's cold lips.

Lu Yizhan felt a chill run down his spine.

Bai Liu wasn't hiding the body.

He was feeding it.

Silence stretched between them, thick and suffocating, as Bai Liu calmly finished his task.

Only then did he brush the crumbs from his fingers and finally lift his gaze to meet Lu Yizhan's. His voice was light, almost matter-of-fact.

"He's not a corpse," Bai Liu said. "He's a monster. And monsters don't die. He'll wake up eventually, so I can't let him starve."

Lu Yizhan stared at him, expression unreadable. Finally, he exhaled, rubbing a hand down his face.

“You know something, Bai Liu?” he muttered. “You’re starting to seem more like a monster than him.”

His gaze flickered to the corpse—Xie Ta, Bai Liu had called him. The body was already beginning to decompose, the right hand sickly pale and rotting. Bai Liu had been ‘feeding’ him for a long, long time.

“Whether he’s a corpse or a monster,” Lu Yizhan said, his voice tight, “you need to let him go.” He knelt beside Bai Liu, gripping his shoulders firmly. “You can find out who did this. You can get revenge when you’re older. But right now, you can’t bury yourself with him.”

He softened, voice barely above a whisper.

“He’s not breathing, Bai Liu. He has no heartbeat. You don’t know when—if—he’ll wake up.” Lu Yizhan exhaled. “You can’t stay here with him.”

Bai Liu’s fingers curled into the fabric of Xie Ta’s clothes. For a moment, he remained motionless. Then, as if in a trance, he reached for a knife and cut through the ropes binding Xie Ta’s ankles.

The body sank, strands of dark hair fanning out as it slipped beneath the water.

Lu Yizhan felt an odd sense of relief when he saw Bai Liu’s eyelashes tremble—as if two droplets of water had fallen from them.

Then, without warning, Bai Liu took a deep breath—

—And plunged back into the pond.

“Bai Liu!” Lu Yizhan shouted, diving in after him.

Bai Liu swam toward the sinking form, reaching out as the mud and silt swallowed Xie Ta’s face—consuming him like the night itself.

His fingers brushed against the corpse’s hand.

For a fleeting second, Bai Liu swore he felt the fingers tighten around his own—

Then, they slipped away.

Lu Yizhan grabbed Bai Liu, yanking him to the surface just as his lungs began to burn, just as his vision started to blur.

Bai Liu gasped for air, limbs heavy and unresponsive.

Memories flickered behind his eyes. Broken picture books. Dolls held together by stitches. Promises that were never kept. A face hidden forever behind dark hair.

Is this person really coming back?

Did he even exist?

Or had Bai Liu—a boy the world had already deemed 'sick'—simply imagined a monster who had been kind to him?

A voice echoed through his mind.

[Bai Liu, why do you believe in the existence of monsters—but not in the existence of God?]

Because God has never been kind to me.

Bai Liu opened his eyes. His lips parted, releasing a final stream of air.

"Xie Ta," he murmured. "I have to go. Goodbye."

And for the first time, it felt real.

A proper goodbye.

Lu Yizhan's hands tightened on his shoulders, pulling him up.

"We need to change your name," Lu Yizhan said as they lay on the shore, exhausted. "If the orphanage tracks you down, no other place will take you."

Bai Liu was silent for a long time. Then, hoarsely, he murmured—

"I don't want to change my name too much."

Lu Yizhan blinked. "Why?"

Bai Liu turned onto his side, eyes dull as they stared into the water.

"...I don't know. I just feel like—maybe someone will come looking for me under my original name."

The Bureau of Heresy and Dangerous Treatment

The blurred memories. The odd, unclear points of connection. The flooded pond he could never quite recall. The strange, altered name—just a single word different…

And now, as the water recedes, Tang Erda's hiss finally emerges in its entirety from the depths of Bai Liu's submerged memories, buried beneath layers of mud and sand.

A dizzying white light swirls and dissipates before Bai Liu's eyes, shifting into the cold gleam of a metallic ceiling. It feels as though he's been dragged up from the bottom of a deep, frozen lake—his fingers tremble slightly, his chest heaving violently as he coughs and chokes, trying to expel the water that had filled his throat and lungs.

Tang Erda is still pressing him. "Bai Liu, do you remember?"

Bai Liu rolls over, bracing himself against the ground with one hand before staggering to his feet, coughing as he steadies himself against the wall. It's only when his breathing finally evens out that he takes the time to button his shirt, fingers fastening the collar that had been torn open twice by the water.

He lifts his gaze—slowly, deliberately—toward the communicator through which Tang Erda is speaking to him.

"I remember." Bai Liu adjusts his cuffs as he responds, his voice casual, almost careless. Then, with a rhetorical lilt, he adds, "So what? Xie Ta is dead. And now we're the ones making the deal?"

Tang Erda grits his teeth in silence.

This guy… He's been put under psychological pressure three times, and his composure hasn't so much as cracked. He's harder to deal with than any Bai Liu from the other timelines…

And has he really remembered?

"The solution to the dried rose leaf gas—I can certainly hand it over." Bai Liu tilts his head, speaking as if he has the answer at his fingertips, despite the fact that he himself has no clue.

His expression is sincere—too sincere—as he begins to spout nonsense. "But you'll need to give me something in return."

Tang Erda feels an uneasy premonition creeping up his spine.

Then Bai Liu narrows his eyes and smiles. “Didn’t I tell you before? Sell me your soul, and I’ll give you the cure, Captain Tang.”

Expressionless, Tang Erda increases the drainage time on the operating table to [240 seconds].

The team member beside him looks on anxiously. “Captain Tang, four minutes of submersion is too long. What if he’s just a normal person and drowns—”

“I’m in full charge.” Tang Erda shoots him an indifferent sidelong glance, and the team member swallows his protest, falling silent.

Behind them, Lu Yizhan struggles against the two operatives restraining him, shouting, “You haven’t investigated the full story! You can’t just torture Bai Liu like this—he’s innocent!”

Tang Erda doesn’t even turn around. With a dismissive wave, he orders, “Take him to the other room and lock him up. Make sure he doesn’t interrupt us again.”

Lu Yizhan is dragged away.

Tang Erda fixes his gaze on the screen as he picks up his communicator once more. “Bai Liu, this is your last chance. What’s the treatment plan for the dried rose leaf gas?”

Bai Liu smiles at him. “And I’ll say for the last time, Captain Tang—make a deal with me now, and I’ll give you a price for your soul that you’ll find quite satisfactory.”

Tang Erda takes a slow, deep breath, barely keeping his anger in check. Forcing himself to remain calm, he presses on. “Tell me something, Bai Liu. I never understood—why are you so obsessed with bringing these horrific heretics into the real world? Why turn it into a full-fledged horror game? What do you get out of this?”

“You live in this world too. A world where monsters roam freely—how do you survive in it?”

Bai Liu tilts his head, his smile widening into something unsettling. “A world full of horror games and stories…” His voice softens, almost fond. “That’s what makes reunions worthwhile, don’t you think?”

His black eyes gleam, dark and unfathomable, as he lifts his gaze. “I’ve always thought the world we came from was far more terrifying than one filled with monsters.”

Shrugging, he grins lazily. “Maybe I just like monsters more than people. I don’t find them scary.”

Tang Erda clenches his teeth so hard his communicator creaks in his grip. “You know,” he mutters, his voice taut with frustration, “I’ve always thought you were sick. But the more I interact with you, the more I realize—you’re even crazier than I imagined.”

His fingers tighten around the controls, his patience at its limit. Without hesitation, he presses the button. “I hope you’ll give me the same answer in four minutes.”

Behind Bai Liu, the door to [1807] opens once more. The water surges in.

Meanwhile, on the other side of the base.
Liu Jiayi stands motionless in the receding water, her eyes narrowed in concentration.

Even Muke, usually the more composed one, starts to lose patience. “Still no movement?”

Liu Jiayi shakes her head. “The current is flowing in the wrong direction. It’s draining now, not filling. The flow is leading toward the outflow channels. Bai Liu should be somewhere near there.”

“Did you not feel it?” Mu Sicheng, already on edge, is practically vibrating with anxiety. “Shit, if only I had a lateral line to sense water currents!”

But in reality, only Liu Jiayi possesses that ability.

“If this doesn’t work, should we switch back to the previous coordinates?” Muke asks, frowning.

Before he can finish, Liu Jiayi suddenly jerks her head up. Her gaze sharpens. “It’s filling again—this way!”

Without hesitation, she dives, her bare feet kicking off against the floor as she propels herself forward. She moves so fast she leaves only a sleek, fish-like streak in her wake.

Against the powerful current, Liu Jiayi flips and sprints forward, her strokes swift and precise.

Somewhere ahead, she hears the telltale struggle of someone caught in the rushing water—choking, mouth about to open, bubbles rolling toward the surface.

At each corridor and passageway, patrol guards are stationed. Liu Jiayi, undeterred, nudges the corners and twists her body like an agile fish, slipping smoothly past outstretched arms attempting to catch her. Eyes closed, she launches out of the water.

“A patroller,” she murmurs under her breath.

Without another word, she flips midair and vanishes beneath the surface with barely a splash.

The base’s surveillance relies heavily on patrolmen to report intrusions. And with all this water, interference is possible.

Just as one patrolman raises his communicator to report the anomaly, two other men—dressed in patrol uniforms—suddenly rush in from around the corner. Before the patrolman can react, one delivers a swift chokehold, rendering him unconscious. The patrolman, still wearing his breathing mask, drifts limply in the water.

Muke, panting, exchanges a glance with a visibly trembling Mu Sicheng.

“Go!”

---------- --

"It's been over three minutes..." The team watched in horror as Bai Liu remained suspended in the water, his back arched, limbs floating, eyelids closed. "He hasn't breathed in almost ten seconds. Captain Tang, should we continue?"

Countless tiny bubbles floated from Bai Liu’s eyelashes, dissolving into his drifting hair. His face was an eerie shade of blue-white, lips slightly parted—he looked like a drowned corpse.

Tang Erda frowned. He had done this to Bai Liu in other timelines, subjected him to ten cycles of asphyxiation, let his lungs fill with water—yet Bai Liu would still grin at him, lips trembling, and calmly explain the solution to the dried rose leaf gas. A veritable psychopath.

A monster.

Even when Tang Erda got what he wanted through these means, there was no satisfaction, no sense of victory. Only exhaustion.

But this timeline's Bai Liu was different. Too different. In every possible way.

"Three minutes and thirty seconds!" The team member monitoring the screen sounded panicked. "Captain Tang! Drain it!"

Tang Erda stared at Bai Liu's unmoving form, his hesitation lasting only a second before he waved a hand. "Drain."

The team let out a collective breath and pressed the button.

Then the base shook violently.

"Shit—!" The team grabbed the control panel to steady themselves as alarms blared. "What the hell?! What's happening?!"

"Report—!" A breathless officer ran into the control room, face pale. "Captain Tang, all the heretics housed in the base have suddenly started rioting! And—we've identified three intruders!"

"Heresy riots? What does that even mean?" One of the team members looked bewildered.

They had never seen these creatures riot before. Tang Erda had always neutralized threats before they escalated. He knew these heresies better than anyone.

But now, standing among his panicked, unprepared team, a chilling realization hit him.

These men had never truly dealt with heretics.

Simply put, they were incapable of handling this.

Even the elite players Tang Erda had once taken to the championship —the members of his third team—were unequipped for a full-scale heretic outbreak.

They had been raised in a controlled, sanitized environment. They had only learned about humanoid heretics tonight and still doubted Tang Erda's judgment—doubted him, feared him.

They thought he had lost his mind.

They thought exposure to heretics had broken him, that he had drowned his sanity in alcohol.

Even Su Yang felt the same way.

Tang Erda's extreme methods had already alienated the base. They looked at him not as a leader, but as something else. Something dangerous.

They looked at him the way they looked at a heretic.

He had gone from Captain Tang Erda—respected and trusted—to Tang Erda the drunkard, the madman.

The remaining team members trembled.

"Why are the heretics rioting?! Find the cause!"

"I don't know! Some are banging on doors, some have disappeared from surveillance—they're all showing extreme instability!"

Tang Erda braced himself against the monitor panel, eyes locked on Bai Liu's face as the water level drained.

The cause of the riot had to be him.

Bai Liu's soaked shirt billowed in the current, no longer clinging to his frame. A pendant—a gleaming silver coin—drifted from his collar, slowly rising with the water.

The moment Tang Erda saw it, a sickening realization hit him. He fumbled for his pocket, his face darkening.

The reverse cross pendant he had confiscated from Bai Liu burned hot against his palm.

This bastard—

Bai Liu had been stalling. He had deliberately provoked Tang Erda into keeping him submerged. He had used the coin to search for the cross pendant on Tang Erda's person.

He had planned this from the start.

Tang Erda gritted his teeth, jaw locking so tightly it ached.

The evil god's followers had prayed. And in response, the evil god had commanded its contaminated heretics to save its dying believer.

That's why the heretics were rioting.

Tang Erda lunged for the control panel, his hand slamming down to stop the drainage—

But the base convulsed again. He was thrown to the ground. A single team member managed to hold onto the lever, barely keeping their grip.

On the monitor, the waterline kept dropping. It had already reached Bai Liu's head.

"Shut off the drain!" Tang Erda roared, struggling to get up. "Don't let him out of the water!"

The team member hesitated. "What—?!"

Too late.

On-screen, Bai Liu's eyes snapped open.

In Tang Erda's pocket, the reverse cross pendant vibrated.

A deafening series of metallic bangs echoed through the base.

All the doors in the heretic containment cells—every single one—unlocked.

Silence fell over the surveillance room.

Wide-eyed, the team members turned to the screens.

As the water fully drained, Bai Liu went from floating to standing, his breathing still uneven. He leaned against the wall, dripping, weak—but smiling.

He looked up at the camera with deathly pale lips and said,

"Well. Are you willing to reconsider a deal with me now, Captain Tang?"

A second later, every surveillance feed went dark.

The face of the team member who came to report was now bruised, as if Bai Liu had not been drowned but had drowned someone else instead.

At the thought of all the heretics in the base being released, the team member's legs went weak. He could hardly stand and collapsed onto the ground in a daze, looking helplessly at Tang Erda. "Captain Tang, what do we do now?!"

They had been reluctant to trust Tang Erda's judgment about capturing living heretics, but now they had seen Bai Liu overturn everything, releasing every heretic in the base…

It was hard to believe. They still hadn't fully processed what had happened.

"Stand up. Get your guns, put on your suits, seal off the base to prevent the heretics from escaping, and bring them back one by one." Tang Erda pulled the gun from the holster on his back and swept his stern gaze over the stunned team. "What are you waiting for? Inform every unit in the base. Level One alert—now!"

Several team members scrambled to their feet, some rushing to inform others, others grabbing protective suits.

"Level One alert! Level One alert! Over 80 percent of heretics on the loose!"

One team member's hand trembled as he hovered over the red button that would completely seal the base. He looked at Tang Erda, fear filling his eyes. "Captain Tang, do we really have to seal the base completely? If we do, no one from outside can come back in. We'll have no backup. If we can't contain these monsters… we'll die with them in here."

Tang Erda regarded him impassively. "Do you know why the base was designed as a sphere?"

"To… better reflect the lights that protect the base's information?" the team member answered hesitantly.

"Not quite." Tang Erda's voice was cold. "It was built this way so that, in the event of an emergency, it could be completely sealed off and buried underground—ensuring that none of the heretics escape and endanger the outside world."

"When we joined the Dangerous Heresy Disposal Authority, we accepted that we might be buried here with these monsters. Either we die, or the rest of the world dies. Understood?"

The team member's eyes welled with tears. His hands shook violently, but despite that, he managed to raise a trembling salute. "Yes! Understood, Captain!"

Gritting his teeth, he slammed the button.

The massive, white, circular base slowly began to rotate, sealing itself off as it sank beneath the ground. Plumes of dust and smoke billowed into the air, and when they cleared, the base had transformed into a tightly packed, sunken structure—hidden below the surface.

Thanks to Tang Erda's unshaken command, the team quickly found their footing and resumed operations in an orderly manner.

One of the team members, hastily putting on his protective helmet, rushed to keep pace with Tang Erda. His voice was anxious. "Captain Tang, aside from the heretic riot, we've also detected three intruders!"

Tang Erda frowned. "Intruders? The base is only accessible to authorized personnel. How did they get in?"

"That's the thing!" The team member's expression was grim. "They used Captain Su Yang's work pass to gain entry. Captain Su's pass has high-level clearance, but we have no idea how they got their hands on it—"

Tang Erda had been listening emotionlessly, but midway through the report, he suddenly froze.

Slowly, he turned to the reporting officer, his gaze chillingly sharp. "Whose work pass did they use?"

The team member flinched at the terrifying look in Tang Erda's eyes, his voice faltering. "Y-Your lieutenant… Su, Su Yang…"

The night was deep.

A weary Su Yang was sleeping soundly on a double bed, but the pillow beside him was empty.

Tonight, Ji An had chosen to sleep in the nursery. The lingering fear of nearly losing her baby kept her from resting away from it, so she had curled up beside the baby's pram. The night's events had clearly unsettled her—she tossed and turned, her brows furrowed, trapped in uneasy dreams.

Su Yang's phone, which she had placed beside her work pass, kept vibrating next to the cot.

The caller ID flashed: [Captain].

The phone rang. Stopped. Rang again.

Ji An, locked in a nightmare, barely stirred. The ringing grew more frequent, more insistent—but she only knitted her brows tighter, rolled over, and fell deeper into the dream.

Eventually, the ringing stopped.

On the screen, a red notification appeared: [Missed Calls: 21 from Captain].

Tang Erda lowered the phone, his expression murderous.

The team members around him were already unnerved by his demeanor, hesitating before speaking. "C-Captain Su still isn't picking up?"

"Mobile, landline—I even called his lover's number. No answer from any of them." Tang Erda's eyes were bloodshot, raw from barely restrained rage. "……Why the hell is Su Yang's work pass in the hands of that little witch?!"

He had already checked the surveillance. The three intruders—two in team uniforms with masks, their faces obscured—and one unmistakable figure, rising and falling through the water with practiced ease.

Liu Jiayi.

Or, as she was infamously known—the Little Witch.

A lethal member of Bai Liu's team.

Notoriously dangerous in water, she had killed more people in it than she had on land—practically a man-eating shark.

And she had a particular preference for targets: men aged 30 to 45. Especially those with daughters.

Su Yang fit that profile perfectly.

And his work pass was in her possession.

Tang Erda took two deep breaths, trying to calm himself, but it was no use.

Every time he closed his eyes, he saw Su Yang lying in a pool of blood, smiling at him, calling him "Captain."

The vision clawed at his mind, filling him with an unbearable rage. He wanted to put a bullet in his own head just to silence it.

"The surveillance is still down…" One of the team members cautiously turned to their only pillar of stability—Tang Erda. "We've already started the search for the heretics as per your orders. Shall we begin as well, Captain?"

Tang Erda was silent for a moment. Then, he rose, pulling a second gun from his back.

It was an old revolver—exquisite craftsmanship, faded rose engraved into the handle. With a sharp flick of his wrist, he cocked both guns.

His crimson eyes burned as he looked over the group. His voice was hoarse but unwavering.

"If anyone encounters the intruders—or Bai Liu's humanoid heretics—there will be no internment priority."

His grip on the triggers tightened.

"No one will be spared. Kill on sight. I will take full responsibility."

Lu Yizhan had been placed in another room, but not long after he was locked up, the base began to shake. While he was still trying to make sense of the situation, the two team members guarding him were already shoving a protective suit and a gun into his hands.

"You're a cop, right?" One of them asked urgently. "The base is in an emergency. If you can fight, we need your help! Take care of yourself—there are a lot of strange monsters here. If you see one and can't handle it, run! Don't go head-to-head!"

With that, the two were about to rush off when Lu Yizhan grabbed one of them by the arm.

"Wait!" he said, his voice tight. "My friend—Bai Liu—how is he? Is he okay?"

The team member gave him a strange look. "Bai Liu? If you mean the [humanoid heretic] we captured, our captain just issued a [shoot-to-kill] order on him."

Lu Yizhan froze. A beat passed before he snapped back to his senses.

His expression hardened as he pulled on the protective suit and gripped his gun. Looking at the team members seriously, he asked, "If I find Bai Liu before you kill him and prove he's not dangerous—not some monster or heretic like you say—will you call off the execution?"

This time, it was the two team members who hesitated. They exchanged uneasy glances.

"Technically speaking, we don't advocate killing if capture is possible," one of them admitted reluctantly. "But Bai Liu is extremely dangerous. We strongly advise against—"

"I know better than you whether he's dangerous or not." Lu Yizhan cut him off. His voice was calm, but his hands moved with practiced efficiency—loading the magazine, clicking it into place. Then he looked up at them with an easy smile. "I've known him for ten years. I'd say that gives me a better understanding of him than you."

The two team members, who had just witnessed Bai Liu unlocking all the heretics' cells, clearly didn't share Lu Yizhan's confidence. One of them said grimly, "He'll kill you."

Lu Yizhan's smile didn't falter. "Then I'll bet my life that he won't."

---------- --------

Liu Jiayi's group stopped in front of Room 1807. The door was wide open.

Muke cautiously peered inside, scanning the area, then pulled back. "He's not here. The room's empty. Are you sure this is the right place?"

"This is it." Liu Jiayi adjusted her visual goggles, her brow furrowing.

"The water has receded, but something isn’t right. The doors to all these rooms are open—they were closed when we came in. Whatever was locked up in here was dangerous. But now..." She trailed off, eyes narrowing. "Now, they’re gone."

"Wait." Mu Sicheng suddenly removed his breathing mask, crouching down. He sniffed the air a few times, his expression turning serious. Then he waved them over. "I smell Bai Liu."

Muke and Liu Jiayi both blinked at him. "You... what?"

"What does Bai Liu even smell like?" Muke asked skeptically.

Mu Sicheng replied with a completely straight face: "Copper."

Muke: "..."

Liu Jiayi: "Are you seriously cracking jokes right now?"

"Don't look at me like I'm an idiot!" Mu Sicheng snapped, exasperated. "I'm telling you, I can really smell it! Bai Liu was here. Liu Jiayi was right—this is the right place!"

Liu Jiayi frowned in deep thought, her mind racing. "If you really smell Bai Liu, that means I was right. But then... why isn't he here? I doubt they would've let him go so easily. So what's going on?"

No sooner had she spoken than an ear-splitting alarm blared throughout the base.

"Level 1 alert! Level 1 alert! Total lockdown of the base is imminent! Over 80% of the heretics are on the run! Prepare for battle!"

"In cases involving alien invaders and humanoid heretics such as Bai Liu, priority is to eliminate rather than contain!"

Mu Sicheng pointed at himself, eyebrows raised. "Wait—'humanoid heretic intruders'... that's not talking about us, is it?"

"I think it is." Muke's voice was steady, but his eyes flicked warily behind Mu Sicheng. He reached out, gripping Mu Sicheng's right shoulder to keep him from turning. "And I also think now isn't the best time to look behind you."

Mu Sicheng inhaled sharply. He could feel it. "There's something behind me, isn't there?"

A pale, corpse-stained hand, its nails blackened and rotting, rested bonelessly on his shoulder. The hand belonged to a figure dressed in a traditional Ming and Qing dynasty bridal jacket, its face obscured beneath a thick, moldy red veil embroidered with the xi (囍) symbol. The lower half of her face peeked out—her rigid mouth twisted into an eerie, unmoving smile.

None of them had noticed when the bride had appeared. Or how close she had gotten.

"What do I do?" Mu Sicheng's voice was eerily calm.

Liu Jiayi studied the figure before raising an eyebrow. "...I think I know this monster. I've played the game she appears in."

Her tone was almost amused as she explained, "She's called [New Bride]. In the game, she attacks by 'marrying' the groom she chooses... and then drags him into the underworld." She turned to look at Mu Sicheng, whose expression was rapidly crumbling. "In other words, since she's put her hands on your shoulders, she's chosen you."

Mu Sicheng let out a strangled laugh. "But I don't even see her! Can someone please tell her we don't do arranged marriages anymore?!"

Muke caught onto Liu Jiayi's words immediately. "She's from a monster book? That means she has a weakness. What is it?"

Liu Jiayi's tone shifted, turning serious. "First, don't turn your back on her. Second, you'd better hope you're not a man of the right age to be her groom. And third—"

Before she could finish, she leapt onto Mu Sicheng's shoulders, her hands shooting forward to grab hold of the bride's head. Her gaze was fierce.

"—Third, she can't survive without it."

With a swift, forceful motion, Liu Jiayi ripped off the veil. The bride's decayed, rotting face was fully exposed. A piercing, inhuman shriek filled the air as she clawed at her own face in agony.

The veil fluttered to the ground. The bride immediately broke into small, frantic steps, blindly chasing after the discarded red fabric as if drawn to it.

Liu Jiayi didn't waste another second. She grabbed Mu Sicheng and pulled him to his feet.

"Don't look back—RUN!"

---------- --

Tang Erda stepped into the corridor. Directly across from him lay a foul-smelling, tangled mass of what looked like hair—thick, slimy strands clumped together like something pulled from a clogged bathtub drain. Several team members hesitated, visibly trembling as they prepared to move in for containment.

Before they could act, Tang Erda raised a hand, stopping them.

His gaze remained fixed on the writhing mass as he spoke. "Every heretic or monster with active aggression has a weakness. When containing them, it's critical to exploit those innate vulnerabilities."

Taking a slow, measured breath, he stepped forward. "Take this one, for example—heretic number 1402, [Iron Worm Algae]. It looks like a mass of hair, but in reality, it's a swarm of highly reproductive parasites with extreme resilience. The worst thing you can do when approaching it is display any trait that signals you as a viable host."

He glanced back at the team. "Unfortunately for us, the human body is its preferred host. Which means we'll need a diversion."

A team member rushed forward, handing him a small caged Little Bai rat.

Tang Erda took the cage, flipped open the latch, and with practiced precision, grabbed the rat and flung it toward the tangled mass.

The reaction was immediate. The parasites, once motionless, erupted into action, their tentacle-like appendages latching onto the rat. Writhing threads burrowed beneath its skin as the creature convulsed violently, spasming against the ground.

"Feeding time is its only vulnerability—it won't attack another creature while it's consuming its host." Tang Erda's voice was calm, methodical. Wearing thick leather gloves, he swiftly grabbed the infested rat and tossed it into a reinforced glass containment box.

The moment the rat hit the box, it burst into a fine mist of blood. The parasites, now fully engorged, slithered up the glass walls, their elongated bodies twisting like centipedes as they searched for an escape.

The sight sent a visible shudder through the team. None of them wanted to imagine what would happen if these creatures ever got loose.

One of the members steadied himself, took a deep breath, and raised his communicator.

"Report—heretic 1402 successfully contained."

---------- ----

A translucent, crawling creature scuttled silently past Liu Jiayi's back.

Mu Sicheng's nose twitched. Before his brain could even process the scent, the strange yet familiar pungency triggered pure instinct. Without hesitation, he drew the gun he had stripped from a patrolman and fired.

A sharp, lizard-like screech echoed through the corridor. The creature, once colorless, turned into a slimy, ink-black mass, tumbling from the wall before scrambling away with frantic, slithering limbs.

Liu Jiayi turned, slightly surprised—she hadn't heard a thing.

"Transparent Chameleon," Mu Sicheng muttered, rolling his shoulder. "A monster from a level-one game I played. Low defense, but ridiculously high stealth."

He flexed his fingers around the gun, grinning. "Never figured out its weakness, but my attack stat was high enough to brute-force my way through it." He glanced at his weapon, tilting his head. "Guess these monsters still can't resist bullets, in-game or out. Good thing I've played with guns a few times."

Muke had already holstered his gun. He knew how to shoot, but his reflexes weren't nearly as sharp as Mu Sicheng's. His mind was elsewhere—searching for Bai Liu.

"Mu Sicheng, can you smell Bai Liu?" he asked, frowning.

Mu Sicheng clicked his tongue in annoyance. "Normally, yeah. But not here. The air's too cluttered with different smells—too many monsters, too much interference."

Liu Jiayi crossed her arms, her expression thoughtful. "There's no way the base itself released these monsters," she mused. "I don't know how Bai Liu got the power to do all this, but if I had to guess, I'd say it's him."

Her voice turned sharper. "The real question is—why? What's he trying to accomplish by causing all this chaos?"

She turned to Mu Sicheng and Muke. "Our original plan is in shambles. The only thing we can do now is figure out Bai Liu's motives. Once we understand that, we'll know where he's headed."

Her gaze flicked between the two. "You guys are close to Bai Liu, right? Willing to risk your lives for him. So tell me—what do you actually know about him?"

Muke hesitated, then tentatively offered, "Uh... his computer was an Alienware I lost to him in a bet? He seemed to really like that brand..."

Mu Sicheng rubbed his chin in deep contemplation. "He had a discounted hotpot last week. Does that count?"

Liu Jiayi stared at them, deadpan. "...That's not what I meant. Are you two elementary schoolers?!"

So they had followed her here without actually knowing anything.

The realization hit her all at once—Bai Liu had them completely figured out.

He knew their psychological profiles, their motivations, their backgrounds—probably even their damn family trees. If they were trapped in this base, Bai Liu wouldn't need to search for them. He already understood their habits, could predict their thought processes, map out the exact routes they'd take to escape. He could locate them before they even realized they needed to be found.

His mastery over them created an illusion—that they and Bai Liu were close, that they understood him just as well.

But that was a lie.

They knew nothing about Bai Liu.

Or rather, Bai Liu had never let them know what he was thinking.

Who could?

That man was slippery, cunning—a thousand masks hiding a thousand smiles. Everything he did was deliberate, calculated to keep people disoriented, never truly seeing the real him.

Could anyone in this world predict what Bai Liu was thinking?

Could anyone possibly know where he was going or how to find him?

---------- --------

Lu Yizhan walked solemnly down the corridor, moving deeper underground as a tide of people surged past him in the opposite direction.

Someone stopped him. "Hey! Where are you going? That's the most dangerous place in the facility—heretics are sealed down there! Only detachment members are allowed!"

Lu Yizhan didn't respond. He gripped the gun in his hand, brushed past the man without a glance, and continued forward with unwavering determination.

The most dangerous heretics were imprisoned here.

And he knew Bai Liu too well—perhaps even better than Bai Liu knew himself.

Bai Liu was drawn to danger like a moth to flame, compelled by play, by risk. The more uncontrollable and unknown something was, the more it fascinated him.

After years on the force, Lu Yizhan had learned another name for someone like Bai Liu.

A born criminal.

Low empathy. High intelligence. A thirst for thrills and fear. No social identity. A childhood filled with trauma. People like him were statistically far more likely to go astray.

And yet, Lu Yizhan had always trusted Bai Liu.

Bai Liu had promised him—he wouldn't commit crimes so easily. And Lu Yizhan had believed him.

The squad claimed Bai Liu was controlling the heretics, which meant that no matter how dangerous they were, they wouldn't kill him. Because Bai Liu was the one pulling the strings.

Because Bai Liu had been Lu Yizhan's only friend for ten years.

Lu Yizhan walked alone into the depths of the earth, dull light streaking across his face as grotesque, inhuman figures twisted and writhed around him.

The monsters lunged—gnashing teeth, clawing limbs.

But Lu Yizhan didn't flinch. He didn't hide. He didn't run.

He just kept walking.

Silent. Unyielding. Teeth gritted as the tide of creatures surged and then, just as suddenly, receded. He staggered, battered and bleeding, leaning against the wall as he finally emerged from the darkness.

At the end of the corridor, a blinding white light poured in.

Bai Liu stood there, watching him quietly.

"You shouldn't have come, Lu Yizhan." Bai Liu lowered his gaze.

Lu Yizhan exhaled sharply, forcing himself upright. His usual gentle, steady smile returned as he met Bai Liu's eyes. "But you still let me find you." His voice was soft, knowing. "If you really wanted to hide, Bai Liu, I never would've been able to reach you."

He extended a hand toward Bai Liu—just as he always had. "Come out with me."

Bai Liu didn't move. His eyes flicked to Lu Yizhan's bloodied, trembling hand.

Lu Yizhan had always reached out to him like this.

He had given Bai Liu food. A name. A friend.

And despite Bai Liu's cold rejection every time, Lu Yizhan would simply laugh, undeterred, and drag him up from the depths—brutally, unreasonably, never letting go.

"Lu Yizhan." Bai Liu's voice was calm, even. "You should know better than anyone—I do very nasty things."

His gaze lifted, sharp and calculating. "I have power, intelligence, and no particular concern for whether people live or die. If I can profit from it, why shouldn't I?"

Bai Liu's tone was emotionless. "We were never really friends. You're just another person to me."

His expression didn't change. "But you're not him."

Bai Liu's voice was quiet, but firm.

"You're human. Not a monster."

"Humans and monsters can't be friends, Lu Yizhan. You've been forcing this relationship for ten years—don't keep doing it."

He tilted his head slightly. "In a normal story, I'd be the kind of criminal you'd shoot. And you'd be the kind of cop who pulls the trigger." Bai Liu smiled faintly, but it didn't reach his eyes. "I'll let you go this time. But next time you see me, don't reach out your hand. Draw your gun."

Lu Yizhan inhaled slowly. His fingers curled into a fist against the wall, knuckles white. Then, without hesitation, he reached behind him — —and drew his gun.

Bai Liu's expression didn't flicker.

He had expected this.

Lu Yizhan was no fool. He understood what releasing Bai Liu would mean. He knew killing him here was the best option. Even with the gun aimed at him, Bai Liu's heartbeat remained steady. His breathing was calm.

Then—

Lu Yizhan smiled.

He stumbled forward, dragging his injured leg, closing the distance between them. Then, slowly, he placed the gun into Bai Liu's stunned hand.

His own bloodied fingers curled over Bai Liu's, forcing the weapon upward—aiming it at himself.

"I'd never pull a gun on you, Bai Liu." Lu Yizhan's voice was gentle, unwavering.

His face was covered in blood and grime, and yet he still smiled—bright, lopsided, completely out of place in the bleakness of it all.

He looked straight at Bai Liu and flicked the safety off. "If you really want to leave here and start hurting people—then let me be the first one you kill."

His breath was unsteady, but his hands were steady as they pressed the gun to his forehead.

"Because the police can't turn a blind eye to what you're trying to do. But I—" Lu Yizhan let out a shaky laugh. "—I just can't bring myself to shoot you."

He swallowed, voice softening. "And from the looks of things... you're already beyond anything I can stop."

His eyes never wavered.

"So please." Lu Yizhan's voice was almost pleading. "Before you go out and do all those terrible things—kill me first. So I won't have to watch."

He didn't move. Didn't flinch.

At gunpoint, Lu Yizhan smiled that same helpless, familiar smile Bai Liu had seen countless times before.

"But if you don't pull the trigger—if you let me live—then at least, until the end of this cop's life... you're still his friend."

[Because a policeman's friend must not be a bad guy. And if you ever do something bad, Bai Liu, I will arrest you myself.]

[So if I become a bad guy, will you kill me, Lu Yizhan?]

[If you commit a crime worthy of prison, then you go to prison. And if that's not enough—if death is the only way to atone—then I'll fight to the death to stop you before you ever cross that line.]

Bai Liu's grip tightened around the gun.

Lu Yizhan raised both hands in surrender.

And then—

Without the slightest resistance, he calmly closed his eyes.

The Bureau of Heresy and Dangerous Treatment

One second, two seconds—no movement. Lu Yizhan cracks one eye open cautiously. Bai Liu, expressionless, lets the gun slip from his hand.

Bai Liu shoots Lu Yizhan a mildly disgusted look and tosses the gun back to him. “I’m not going to shoot you. Don’t pull these ridiculous stunts again. It’s annoying.”

Just as Lu Yizhan would never turn his gun on Bai Liu, Bai Liu would never harm Lu Yizhan—a mutual understanding ingrained over ten years of trust.

Whether one had the other at gunpoint, neither man's heartbeat nor breath would quicken. They knew—without needing to think about it—that the other would never pull the trigger. The trust was so instinctive, it didn’t even allow for fear.

Lu Yizhan scrambles to catch the gun. “Be careful! You can’t just throw these things around! I put the safety on, but still—”

“If you’re dumb enough to shoot yourself while handling a gun, you deserve it,” Bai Liu says flatly, casting Lu Yizhan a sidelong glance.

Lu Yizhan immediately recognizes that expression. Bai Liu is in a bad mood.

Usually, whenever Lu Yizhan talks him down from whatever scheme he’s concocted—whether by reason, manipulation, or sheer persistence—Bai Liu retreats into a silent sulk. Like a mischievous child whose favorite toy has been confiscated for being too dangerous.

Lu Yizhan knows Bai Liu isn't upset about morality or consequence. He’s upset because he’s not allowed to play his game.

But Lu Yizhan is used to this.

It’s been like this since they were kids—Bai Liu trying to do something reckless, Lu Yizhan stepping in to stop him. Over time, he’s learned how to handle him.

His voice softens, his gestures careful, as though pacifying a petulant child. “How about we go outside first? Or maybe we put all the dangerous things away?”

Bai Liu fixes his gaze on him. “What do I get in return?” He lifts a hand, palm up.

Lu Yizhan glances at Bai Liu’s outstretched hand and instantly understands.

“I’ll treat you to hotpot! A year’s worth! No—two years! You can eat whatever you want, all on me!”

Bai Liu’s expression remains unchanged.

Lu Yizhan sighs. “Three years? Four? Five?—Come on, Bai Liu, I need to save some money to get married! Don’t push it!”

Bai Liu smirks. “I haven’t been human for years… Ten.”

Lu Yizhan: “…”

Tears practically well up in his eyes. “Fine! Ten years! You win!”

This is, without question, the most miserable deal Lu Yizhan has ever made.

After securing Lu Yizhan’s promise, Bai Liu still doesn’t move. He watches him with that same detached expression, utterly unmotivated to follow through.

It’s rare for Bai Liu to feel reluctant after making a deal. But somehow, whenever it’s with Lu Yizhan, a strange, stifling sensation creeps in—like a corporate employee being asked to work overtime without pay.

And right now, Bai Liu is feeling exactly like a disgruntled office worker again.

Lu Yizhan beams at him. “Come on, take back the Avatar! I swear—ten years of hotpot! Isn’t that an amazing deal?”

Bai Liu: “…”

No excitement. No interest.

But after a long moment, he finally pulls the still-vibrating coin from his collar. He holds it in his palm for a second before the tremors die down.

He looks back at Lu Yizhan. “Done.”

Lu Yizhan exhales a deep breath, wiping cold sweat from his forehead.

...This must be what it feels like to babysit a delinquent child who nearly wrecked a priceless museum exhibit (in this case, a world-ending heretic) before the parent managed to drag them away just in time.

His legs feel weak.

He doesn't even want to imagine what would have happened if Bai Liu had actually let loose in this place…

Once he regains his composure, Lu Yizhan glances around, suddenly curious. "How did you even get here?"

Bai Liu leans casually against the wall and gestures toward the room behind him. His gaze lingers on the small, welded-shut window in the door.

"I sensed a trace of Xie Ta's aura here right after the riot."

Lu Yizhan follows his gaze. The door is unnervingly large and tall—more an entrance to a tunnel than a standard doorway.

A metallic plaque labels it: [0001]. Below, a red skull-and-crossbones warning reads:

[EXTRAORDINARY DANGER].

---------- --

The sweaty crew glanced around at the heretics, who had suddenly stopped attacking and rioting, now standing in a daze. These otherwise fierce heretics had come to a complete halt, as if their energy had been drained.

This made the intake much easier.

Tang Erda observed the strange scene, his fingers brushing the reverse cross in his pocket.

Sure enough, the reverse cross no longer pulsed with heat and now lay cold at the bottom of his pocket.

"… Bai Six actually stopped…" Tang Erda furrowed his brow. "He just needs to connect to the reverse cross. If he doesn't stop voluntarily, there's no one who can interrupt his prayer to summon the evil gods and the monsters…”

This ritual to summon the evil gods and drive the monsters away always cost him dearly. If not handled properly, the backlash from the monsters could kill him outright. Yet this time, Bai Six had voluntarily stopped.

This was uncharacteristic of him. The return on investment was far too low. Given his usual style, if he’d spent half his life on such a high-risk, high-consumption ritual, he’d expect to see the base overrun with monsters as a reward.

“Captain!!!” A surprised voice came through the comm. “Surveillance is back online!”

Tang Erda quickly inquired, “Can you see where Bai Six is?”

“I’m checking now! Ah! Got him!” The team member reported rapidly. “Captain Tang, Bai Six is on the lowest level! I’m not sure how he got down there, but he’s in a restricted area—outside the door to Heretic [0001]!”

“Heretic [0001]?” Tang Erda’s voice grew increasingly suspicious. “What’s he doing there?”

“What kind of heresy is in there, Captain Tang?” the team member asked nervously. “Bai Six wouldn’t be trying to release this heretic, would he?”

Tang Erda fell silent for a moment. “I don’t know what’s inside there either.”

The team member sounded shocked. “You don’t know either, Captain Tang?!”

“The file for Heretic [0001] is classified as extra top secret,” Tang Erda explained, leaning against the wall, his eyes distant. “My clearance doesn’t allow me to access it. But for now, we don’t need to worry about Bai Six releasing this heretic. He won’t be able to.”

“The room housing Heretic [0001] doesn’t have a door. It’s a completely airtight hexahedron constructed from various metals and materials from the heretic’s own body. The room was never designed with a door, key, or exit in mind. No one knows what’s inside because no one can get in, and absolutely nothing can get out.”

Tang Erda tilted his head back, recalling something. “There was only one person in the entire base who had access to the files on Heretic [0001]—the leader of the first detachment.”

The team member’s voice grew more confused. “The leader of the first detachment? But Captain Tang, the leader of the first detachment has been dead for years…”

The team member gulped nervously. “And, and didn’t he… didn’t he kill himself?”

“I know.” Tang Erda’s voice remained flat, without emotion. “He destroyed the files on Heretic [0001] before he died, so no one knows what’s inside that room now.”

The team shuddered, murmuring Tang Erda's words in a daze, "No one knows what monsters are in there..."

"I'm going down now. Don't let the rest of the team follow me—it's a restricted area, and it's too dangerous for them to come with me." With that, Tang Erda pulled a plastic-wrapped cigarette from her breast pocket, lit it, and inhaled deeply.

The scarlet smoke flickered in the air, swirling around her as Tang Erda's dark blue eyes glinted with a fierce, aggressive intensity. "Seal the lift before I get to him. No one is to come up."

"If I'm killed by him, seal the lift and never let him leave the base. If Bai Six vanishes into thin air inside the base, surround the address I left for you. The moment he reappears, make sure you kill him—at all costs."

With her orders given, Tang Erda descended deeper into the earth, alone.

Meanwhile, at the other end.

As the monsters were methodically taken in by the team, the strong, strange smell from the monsters cleared from the air, revealing the original coldness of the base.

Mu Sicheng sniffed, frowned, and looked in one direction. "I smell an underwhelming scent."

"Is that Captain Tang, who said he was going to hunt Bai Liu down?" Liu Jiayi instantly understood what Mu Sicheng meant.

"The smell's getting stronger, a very nose-rattling scent of smoke." Mu Sicheng waved it in front of his nose in disgust. "He seems to be heading somewhere."

Liu Jiayi quickly made up her mind. "We'll follow him! He is responsible for pursuing Bai Liu and should know where he is!"

Shortly after Tang Erda went down in the lift, Liu Jiayi's group turned quickly around the corner. They watched Tang Erda descend all the way down to the 10th floor. Mu Sicheng couldn't help but spit out, "Is this thing that deep?"

Liu Jiayi swiped Su Yang's work card twice, but it did not respond.

This made her realize something quickly. "Bai Liu is really down here, and this guy went down to kill him! This lift should have been locked to prevent Bai Liu from coming up."

"Of course, there is another possibility." Liu Jiayi raised Su Yang's work permit in her hand and looked up at Mu Sicheng and Muke. "We've been found out, and this work permit is locked."

Meanwhile, the team member who had been watching the surveillance was urgently reporting to Tang Erda. "Captain Tang! The other three intruder heretics are right behind you! They seem to be trying to follow you down, but we've locked the lift, and they can't get down with their Captain Su badges, so we're calling in patrols to arrest them..."

"No need." Tang Erda's indifferent voice interrupted the team's report. "Unlock the lift and have them swipe Su Yang's work pass to come down."

The team was stunned. "But Captain Tang, they had guns on them and there were three of them..."

Tang Erda, gun in both hands, walked steadily through the darkness, only his eyes glowing with hysteria, on the verge of madness, but his tone was incredibly calm. "With Bai Liu, there are only five monsters, and it's not like I haven't killed them before."

The team member flinched and asked rhetorically, "Five monsters? No, there are only four humanoid heretics. Who is the other one?"

"Don't unlock the lift until I've killed all the monsters, including myself," he said.

The players stood up in shock. "Captain Tang! Captain Tang! What are you talking about!"

"Captain Tang! It's not just heretics down there! There's also a regular cop in the restricted area somehow! Captain Tang!!!"

But the communicator over there was silent.

Mu Sicheng and his group, who were at the door of the lift and trying to figure out what to do, noticed that the lift, which had been locked, slowly rose up again and opened before them of its own accord, as if inviting them.

"Wow." Liu Jiayi raised an eyebrow. "Looks like this Captain Tang is pretty tough, inviting our whole crew down with him. Can be, very confident in his abilities."

She turned to Mu Sicheng and Muke and tilted her head questioningly towards the open lift doors. "So, do you dare to go down? It's most likely him down there waiting to ambush us."

Mu Sicheng didn't say anything. He rubbed his elbow, took his gun in his hand, and led the way into the lift, followed by Muke.

Liu Jiayi was the last to enter the lift. She turned and pressed the -10 button, gathering all expression on her face. "It seems we agree on this point."

The lift door slowly closed and plunged rapidly towards the ground.

---------- --

10th floor, base exclusion zone.

Much of this level of the base is unlit, a deep, bottomless darkness, for the heretics in this place are like creatures from the bottom of the sea.

They are full of unknown dangers, and much of the information in the file, such as weaknesses, is not exact. They are also odd-looking and do not like sunlight—too much bright light makes them restless. Because of this unknown danger, their rooms are tailor-made, and it is very difficult to get out.

But even so, Tang Erda came down and saw several rooms that had been opened.

His back teeth clenched as he alertly bounced around the floor with his gun raised.

This level, because of the almost total darkness, relies on familiarity with the map to move quickly within it.

However, only a few detachment leaders and some reappointed detachment members know the map of this floor, and the lift to the ground floor must be swiped with the permission of the detachment vice-captain or above.

Tang Erda couldn't imagine how Bai Liu managed to come down. Still, in a dark corridor, Bai Liu had managed to find the spooky room of the Heretic [0001] in just a few minutes.

But the man always has a way.

When Bai Liu wants to do something, even if the whole world is against him, he will do it successfully.

But why did he go to this room?

It’s not as if Tang Erda hadn’t explored this room in all the timelines he'd been through, but in every one of them, he hadn't found the answer.

The only one who knew what was in this room was the leader of the first detachment, called [the prophet], one of the founders of this base.

But this captain had tragically gone mad and committed suicide in almost every timeline Tang Erda had appeared in.

Before committing suicide, this captain would destroy the files in this room and leave a message:
"Never open it. It hides the most horrible truth that will drive all who witness it into madness. Let me be the last of its madness, the last string that suspends your sanity and your future."

The captain is called [the prophet] because, like Tang Erda now, he could predict the most dangerous things that would happen. Because of this, the captain had a very high level of authority at the base.

After his death, he left this authority to Tang Erda, who knew nothing at the time.

At the time, Tang Erda was still a regular captain who had not yet gone back in time. But this captain said that only Tang Erda could carry on what he was going to do and could continue to lead the base in removing the dangerous heresy that was about to emerge.

He prophesied that Tang Erda had the power to eradicate the greatest and most dangerous heresies, and that the most horrible heresies were associated with the number six.

And when Tang Erda retraced his steps across the timeline and possessed millions of memories from other timelines, he really did have the ability to "predict" the appearance of extremely dangerous heretics in advance, just as the captain had predicted.

Tang Erda started to be called the "little prophet" by the other players, but Tang Erda knew that he was no "prophet."

He was just a hunter who had gone through it all and nothing had changed, who had incompetently retraced the timeline time and time again.

And the true prophet predicted his arrival, bestowing upon him a right and a responsibility that Tang Erda, a hunter on the verge of madness, simply could not bear.

The Prophet's prophecies had never been wrong, and all the team members at the base were convinced by the Prophet, who had saved them countless times.

Since then, the room had become an invisible room at the base, and no one had tried to explore the secrets of its interior.

Tang Erda, on the other hand, had become the person with the highest authority at the base.

But as time passed, Tang Erda's unstable mental state and the slowly eroding authority of the long-dead legendary captain began to change the players.

They became distrustful of Tang Erda and questioned whether he could really have such a high level of authority, whether he was abusing his power and just doing what he wanted to do.

The capture of the Living Heretic, which Tang Erda had ordered by force, began to send everything spiraling out of control, with the team's suspicions and doubts exploding.

--If even the living can be captured as heretics, has the existence of such authority begun to change from protection to slaughter?

Can this supreme authority really be possessed by a [person] who is full of feelings and desires and who makes all kinds of mistakes?

Only [God] can have this kind of access.

The captain of the first detachment was rumored to be like a god—without selfish desires, never making mistakes, admired by all and loved by all as a god-like captain.

Unfortunately, this [god] went mad in the end and committed suicide.

All the players already had a vague sense that Tang Erda, the successor chosen by [God], was also vaguely on the verge of going mad and committing suicide—like this was the doomed fate of these heretical, near-godlike humans who had seen more of the heresy for real.

The team's silent acquiescence to Tang Erda's suicide to take away all heresy was like acquiescence to a fate he had long been destined for—a fate from the hunters.

[Hunter] is a [Divine Identity Card] in Werewolf Kill, whose destiny is to take away the evil fellow the seer tells him is most likely to be a [Wolf] on the field before his own death.

The hunter takes the silver gun engraved with a rose and heads for his destined end.

The entire base is spherical in shape, and Heretic [0001]'s room is situated at the pole of the sphere, at the deepest, most isolated point of the structure. Because of this unique design, the path leading to Heretic [0001]'s room slopes downward, an ever-deepening descent.

Tang Erda presses forward, descending step by step.

The further he goes, the denser the vapor becomes. A strange, fishy odor fills the air—an unsettling mix of deep-sea fish and seaweed. The stench is not overpowering, but it drifts in and out, persistent and disorienting, evoking the feeling of being submerged underwater. Tang Erda, hardened by countless encounters with heresy, is not affected by the smell; it no longer clouds his mind.

However, for those sensitive to such odors, the scent could cause a drastic mental decline. Mu Sicheng, his pupils constricted and his breath shallow, begins to feel the effects. Liu Jiayi quickly notices the change: "Mu Sicheng?"

"It doesn't smell right," Mu Sicheng mutters, shaking his head as he fights to keep his wits about him. "It reminds me of a level-one game I played, Siren Town. The mermaids there... they had a similar smell." He pauses, his face tightening with concern. "There could be some sort of mermaid-like monster on this floor."

The group is now in reality, where there is no bleach to cleanse their minds from such disorienting sensations, and they must rely on their senses to survive.

Muke pulls a packet of toilet paper from his bag and hands it to Mu Sicheng. "Plug your nostrils for now. Don't inhale too much of this. If your mental state drops, we'll all be in trouble."

Mu Sicheng reaches out to take the paper but then hesitates, his brow furrowing. "Wait... there's something else mixed in this smell," he says, his voice laced with disbelief. "A faint trace of money... It's tangled up in the odor."

Muke's expression sharpens. "Is it Bai Liu's scent? Can you pinpoint where he is?"

Mu Sicheng's hand freezes in mid-air as he looks at Muke, whose eyes are now gleaming with intensity.

Muke is determined, eager. "Can you smell him? Where is he?"

Mu Sicheng, his face unreadable, pulls his hand back and glares at Muke in silence.

The moment is tense. As Mu Sicheng stands frozen, Tang Erda slowly makes his way through the oppressive darkness, methodically dispelling the black mist that clings to him. He holds his hunter's gun tightly, his eyes narrowing as he approaches the door that guards the Heretic [0001]'s chamber. Just ahead, Bai Liu stands, a figure poised in the gloom, silently awaiting his arrival.

"We meet again, Captain Tang," Bai Liu's voice breaks the silence, smooth and controlled. He gives a smile, faint but knowing, as he looks at Tang Erda, who lifts his gun with an unwavering hand. "How about we talk about a new deal I've come up with?"

Bai Liu's words are casual, yet the underlying tension crackles in the air. "I can give you the solution to the dried rose leaf gas, but in exchange, I need you to open this door behind me and let me see what's inside."

Tang Erda's gaze hardens, his blue eyes darkening with a tumult of emotions that swirl violently within him. He remains silent, his grip on the gun tightening as his words come slowly, thick with conviction. "If there hadn't been that explosion, the world wouldn't be choking on dried rose leaf gas. But you... you're more dangerous alive than the gas itself."

Bai Liu raises an eyebrow, his lips curling into a small, amused smile. "So you've decided to kill me and give up on striking a deal?" He tilts his head slightly, unfazed by the threat. "Is that it, Captain? You're willing to let the thousand or so innocent people who've already been tainted by the gas perish, just so you can make this choice?"

Tang Erda's heart pounds in his chest, but he stands resolute, his hand steady on the gun. "If I keep you alive, it only prolongs your ability to harm others. Your survival might spare a thousand, but it endangers everyone else." His eyes meet Bai Liu's with cold clarity. "The most effective option is to sacrifice them and end this—end you."

Bai Liu steps forward, not an inch of fear in his demeanor. His face inches closer to the barrel of Tang Erda's gun, and with a smile that doesn't quite reach his eyes, he says, "That's what I would say. You've finally made a choice that aligns with my values, Captain Tang."

He reaches forward, taking the gun from Tang Erda's hands, his expression challenging. "You've made the right choice. What's the hesitation now?"

Tang Erda's breath hitches, his gaze narrowing. "It's because one of those thousand is named Su Yang, isn't it?"

The mention of Su Yang causes Tang Erda's hand to tremble. His blue eyes, momentarily flickering with the darkness of his emotions, tighten. His grip on the gun tightens, his knuckles turning white, as his breath quickens, heavy with regret and sorrow.

Su Yang coughs intermittently, the smell of perfume lingering around him. He's long been contaminated, but he fights against his inevitable fate. His body, once full of life, now withers. The dried rose leaf gas eats away at him slowly, his bones weakening, his organs failing.

"Captain," Su Yang says weakly, a faint smile on his lips. "There's no need to rush for a solution to the gas problem. This was always the likely end for us. But if I die, at least Ann and I always dreamed of moving to a new house. With the pension, she'll be able to take the kids and live somewhere she likes."

"Captain!" Su Yang calls out, his voice strong despite his condition. He salutes Tang Erda, his eyes clear and unwavering. "Lieutenant Su Yang, 3rd detachment, requesting one last mission. I've been contaminated. Please, let me take your place and lead the investigation into the perfume factory."

Tang Erda's teeth grind together, his body trembling with emotion. His heart aches as Su Yang's words strike him, as they always do. Su Yang, even as he is dying, insists on letting Bai Liu go, believing him to be innocent despite everything.

Tang Erda is torn. He knows that if he allows Bai Liu to walk free, the consequences would be catastrophic. Bai Liu, with his connections to the evil gods and the heretics, would only continue to wreak havoc. The faces of the countless victims flash in Tang Erda's mind—the bloodied faces of those who died because of Bai Liu's cruelty.

"Captain, kill him!" The voices in his head shout. "Kill him and end it all, or the world will fall into the hands of the evil gods!"

But as he prepares to pull the trigger, a figure lunges from behind.

Lu Yizhan, once a mere bystander, now steps forward, his hand grasping Tang Erda's wrist, twisting it inward. The bullet flies off-course, grazing Bai Liu's foot as Lu Yizhan yells in panic, "Dad, Bai Liu, can I call you dad? Please don't aim that gun at yourself next time! If I'm late, I'll have to share a hot pot with you in hell!"

Bai Liu, unfazed, leans against the wall lazily. "I've just learned that from him," he says, glancing at Lu Yizhan with a smirk.

Lu Yizhan, who had once held Bai Liu's gun to his own forehead, is speechless. "Can't you learn something good from me?"

Bai Liu shrugs, unbothered. "Can't. It's not my style."

Tang Erda, momentarily stunned, fails to react in time when Lu Yizhan, an ordinary man, lunges at him from behind. He hadn't expected Lu Yizhan to be here, especially not in such a restricted area. His instincts, trained for combat, told him the figure was an enemy, a monster under Bai Liu's control. His gun instinctively rises.

But then he sees Lu Yizhan, the man he once trained, now struggling to control him. For a split second, Tang Erda almost fires—but with a grimace, he restrains himself.

Lu Yizhan, taking advantage of Tang Erda's hesitation, pulls his hands free and forces them behind his back. He pushes Tang Erda against the wall.

Tang Erda growls in frustration. "I'm your superior! Let go of me!"

Lu Yizhan, pinned to the wall by Tang Erda's weight, pleads, his voice dripping with sarcasm. "Sir, just don't move your gun! Why can't we sit down and have hot pot? Why does it always have to be bloodshed? I swear my friend may not be a good person, but he's not worth the death penalty!"

Bai Liu, casually stepping up, adds with mock innocence, "Yes, sir, I'm just a small businessman. I promise the maximum transaction is under $10,000. No need to go to such extremes with me, right?"

The Bureau of Heresy and Dangerous Treatment

Tang Erda, so furious that he was on the brink of fainting, shouted, "Lu Yizhan, let go of me! You have no idea what a dangerous monster Bai Liu is!"

Lu Yizhan suddenly became serious. "I guarantee on my life that Bai Liu has never committed a crime or done anything illegal."

Tang Erda's eyes reddened. "So far, then. Don't you understand? Bai Liu is the type of person born to commit crimes!"

"If you give him the slightest chance, he will definitely commit an irreparable crime. You're a police officer; don't you know how to deal with people like him when you meet them?!"

"...Suppress crime, govern behavior, and observe motives," Lu Yizhan replied after a short silence.

"Control and observation can be removed," Tang Erda breathed heavily, his voice cold. "At the Bureau of Heresy, we only have one way to deal with dangerous and uncontrollable heretics — snuff them out."

As he spoke, Tang Erda's arm broke free from Lu Yizhan's grip as he loosened his hold. Tang Erda twisted his hand around Lu Yizhan's arm, pulling it downward. He let go in pain, and he swiftly turned the attack, catching his neck with his elbow.

Lu Yizhan struggled, holding onto Tang Erda's hand, kicking at him in the corridor and flipping him over while his gun was at his waist.

Tang Erda's gun flew from his hand, the bullet missing its target. It struck the metal jamb of the corridor, creating a sharp noise as it ricocheted, and Lu Yizhan let out a heart-wrenching roar, yelling, "Bai Liu! Get down!!!"

The bullet grazed Bai Liu's ear before smashing into the door behind him [0001], which fell softly to the ground without a sound.

Tang Erda's eyes took on a bloodthirsty gleam. "Do you even understand what you must save?!"

Lu Yizhan involuntarily released his grip on Tang Erda's hands as he struggled to breathe. Tang Erda's right foot hooked around his right arm, which was still wrapped around him, and he drove his knee into the back of his head.

Lu Yizhan crashed to the ground, pinned by Tang Erda's knee against his spine. He felt his teeth loosen from the impact.

Tang Erda had been holding back his strength until now. This time, Lu Yizhan had no energy to fight back.

His mouth filled with blood as his jarred teeth bled onto the floor, staining his face.

Bai Liu was blocked in the corridor. Tang Erda raised his gun toward him again. Bai Liu, unmoving, held the coin to his chest, eyeing Lu Yizhan who was under Tang Erda’s control.

Though Bai Liu had promised Lu Yizhan not to use the monsters lightly, the situation was far from simple.

However, every time he used them, Bai Liu felt his strength drain away, as though his life force was being siphoned off, weakening him rapidly. He had no idea what would happen if he used them again.

Lu Yizhan saw Bai Liu’s subtle gesture of holding the coin and could not help but shout, "Bai Liu! Don’t use that! Don’t summon those monsters again!"

Tang Erda acted quickly, throwing his hand at the approaching monster-like figure. But the figure swiftly moved, intercepting his motion.

The dark figure was struck in the face and let out a curse before quickly retreating into the shadows.

"?!"

Lu Yizhan, lying on the ground, screamed in horror. "I thought I told you not to summon those monsters!"

Bai Liu shrugged innocently. "I didn’t. Not yet. These [monsters] came out on their own."

Mu Sicheng stepped out from the shadows, wiping blood from his face with his thumb and glaring at Bai Liu. "Who are you calling a monster?!"

He held a gun, aimed directly at Tang Erda.

Unfazed, Tang Erda responded, "It's you, Mu Sicheng the thief."

Tang Erda immediately recognized the hook move, a signature move of the [Capuchin Thief] under Bai Liu's team. He had once been caught in a chase where his gun was stolen by an opponent using that very technique.

The thief had then spun the gun around his finger and used it to take down all the team members who were pursuing him with Tang Erda.

From the shadows, another figure emerged, holding a gun: Muke. Liu Jiayi stood next to him, looking emotionless as she glanced at Tang Erda.

Trader Muke, little witch Liu Jiayi, and Capuchin Thief Mu Sicheng... Tang Erda surveyed the room slowly, recognizing all of them as old acquaintances.

— Only one core player was missing, and Bai Liu's [Wandering Circus] was complete.

In five years, these people would be molded by Bai Liu into the most ruthless players — the monsters Tang Erda knew so well.

A thief who could hook a gun in a single glance, the little witch who ranked fourth on the King's list, and Muke, who had amassed a fortune even as his team hid behind him.

Then there was the deadliest player, the [clown shooter], who had slaughtered his entire team in a league match. He was the son of an arms smuggler, a wanted criminal with ties to every major terrorist organization.

And, of course, the same [clown sniper] who, in the beginning of this timeline, had teamed up with Bai Liu to kill Su Yang with a silver bullet.

But for now, nothing was happening.

These monsters, who would later wreak havoc and commit atrocities, were still fledglings — far from the point where their actions would haunt them with the weight of their sins. Tang Erda could still stop it all with one shot. The future he had fought to avoid could be stopped before it began.

Tang Erda's unfocused eyes moved from Liu Jiayi, soaked and dirty, to Mu Sicheng, whose bloodied face was contorted with pain as he gripped his gun. He then shifted to Muke, whose face was taut with tension as he aimed at him with deadly accuracy.

Finally, Tang Erda looked at Bai Liu, standing in front of the Heresy [0001] door.

None of them were what Tang Erda remembered. They were too weak, too thin, as though his memories of them fighting each other had been mere illusions to comfort himself. But that illusion shattered the moment he saw Bai Liu.

Only Bai Liu remained unchanged, standing exactly as Tang Erda remembered him from every timeline — in his plain, cheap white shirt and trousers, with a slim build and those dark, lifeless eyes.

Bai Liu calmly gazed down at Tang Erda, his eyes as dark as an abyss, watching him like an impotent hunter. It felt surreal.

Tang Erda had countless memories, but he couldn't recall how many timelines he had traversed. His mind was filled with so much pain that he was losing track of most events.

But Bai Liu's black eyes, always present, haunted him relentlessly.

Bai Liu was like an invincible, indestructible god of evil, eternally present at the end of every story, gazing at Tang Erda with that same smile, as though at his mercy. "You see," he seemed to say, "no matter how much you struggle, you will never get the result you desire. You can't save the person you want to save."

The memories of those who had died over and over again reached out, grabbing Tang Erda's wrists and ankles, trying to drag him into the abyss and hell. They screamed in despair, "Captain! Kill him! Avenge us!"

These memories flooded every part of Tang Erda's brain, eventually blending into a grey-black, indistinguishable haze of hatred. It was no longer just Tang Erda's hatred, but the collective wrath of all the lost souls.

It felt like many of the dead were living in his head, whispering in his ear, "Captain, why haven't you avenged us? Have you forgotten about us?"

This unrelenting anger peaked the moment Tang Erda saw Bai Liu in each timeline.

It was as though the spirits of resentment possessed him at that very moment, screaming at Bai Liu in fury, "Why did you do that?!"

"To commit such heinous acts against innocent people, to watch them suffer because of you—doesn't that pain you?!"

These were the words Tang Erda had spoken when he first captured Bai Liu and confronted him.

Back then, he was nowhere near as calm as he was now. Back then, the only thought on his mind was to shoot Bai Liu sitting in the interrogation room.

It had taken nearly two detachments of dead men to bring this man to base, and even then, some members of the [Wandering Circus] had taken a few team members alive.

Every second of Bai Liu's interrogation was broadcast to the survivors, who watched the torturous confessions of their captured comrades.

Those who had been taken alive suffered worse than death. As they endured their torment, videos were sent to the phones and computers of every survivor.

Anyone who watched those videos would never feel lucky to have survived — whether they had returned to base or not.

The clown's face appeared in the video, a square or plum symbol painted on his face, with a giant teardrop smeared under his right eye. His lips were outlined in exaggerated red, smiling cheerfully as he held the hair of one of his tortured team members.

He said, "If you want your team member back, take our boss in exchange."

The face of that player was one Tang Erda would never forget.

His uniform was already soaked in blood, his entire body trembling in unconscious spasms. The ID badge on his chest, also stained with blood, faintly showed the word "Su," with the rest of the text obscured by dark red patches.

The Joker held the team member by his hair, dragging him, though his unfocused, vacant eyes were still fixed on the camera.

As if suddenly remembering something, the clown grabbed the man's hair and sneered at his dying face, the eyelids drooping as he tilted his head towards the camera. "Ah, I almost forgot to introduce this fine fellow," he grinned. "This is the deputy leader of the third detachment, Su Yang."

With great effort, Su Yang lifted his scarred, filthy face. Blood dripped from the gash on his forehead, sliding in patches over his eye, down his jaw, and splattering onto the floor.

It was as though the Joker's movements had torn open his wounds anew, the pain briefly reviving what little consciousness Su Yang had left. His gaze sluggishly locked onto the camera, his voice dry and strained. "Captain, it must be... calm... don't follow their pace... go."

Tang Erda could barely think as he stood frozen, watching the video of Su Yang's torment, the white light flashing in an eerie haze, thick with blood.

He told himself he had to stay calm, that he couldn't be swayed by his emotions. He needed to act justly, to avoid lynching a prisoner without evidence. Su Yang was speaking to him from that tortured state, urging him to hold his ground, to keep the last line between man and monster intact.

There was no difference between the law enforcement officer who lost control and began abusing a prisoner, and the Joker who tormented his own team.

Tang Erda wanted to kill Bai Six, who sat across from him, leisurely smiling.

But Su Yang's bloodstained words wrapped around him like an invisible bandage, holding him firmly in place. He could only stare at Bai Six, his eyes burning with fury and helplessness, and hiss, "You—this manipulative, vicious man—are the one behind all of this."

Sweat beaded on Tang Erda's forehead as he glared at Bai Six. "You've got enough money. Enough wealth to last several lifetimes. Why do you keep doing this? Hurting people, all for profit? You're smuggling evil into the world!"

Bai Six smirked and casually leaned back in his chair, propping his elbows on the armrests and interlocking his fingers in front of him, his silver handcuffs jingling faintly.

He tilted his head, eyeing Tang Erda with amusement as he repeated his words, “Why do I smuggle evil into the world?”

Then Bai Six stood, bracing himself on the table, his eyes locking onto Tang Erda with a force that felt suffocating. A coin and a pendant—a reverse cross—hung from his shirt, swaying in front of Tang Erda’s eyes.

Tang Erda instinctively put his hands behind his back, uneasy under Bai Six’s gaze.

Bai Six’s voice was slow, almost gentle as he looked down at the officer. "Officer, why would I smuggle evil into the world? Because there are people on this earth who are more than willing to buy it from me."

“I don’t do things without a profit. But overall, I’m just one link in the supply chain of evil. The problem isn’t with me—the smuggler. The real question is, why are people so eager to buy this ‘evil’? They’re the ones you should really be going after. Without them, there would be no need for people like me."

Tang Erda’s chest tightened as he watched Bai Six, his eyes burning with anger.

Bai Six slowly lowered himself back into his chair, eyes glinting with an almost playful malice. "Why don’t you go after those people, officer? Isn’t that the real issue?"

“You’re upset because there are so many of them, aren’t you? So many that they make up more than half of the population you're supposedly trying to protect. I get it.”

Bai Six’s voice took on a mockingly philosophical tone. "When cigarettes first became popular, they faced a lot of opposition, from the government and the public alike. But no matter how high the taxes or how much the health risks were preached, cigarettes still became one of the most widely consumed substances in the world, contributing massively to the tax revenue of countless countries."

Bai Six's eyes flicked to Tang Erda’s chest, where half of a cigarette case peeked out from his breast pocket.

Tang Erda subconsciously gripped the cigarette case as Bai Six’s gaze lingered.

"You see," Bai Six chuckled, spreading his hands, "you're obsessed with this stuff too. Sir, don't you think you're being a little hypocritical? You can't resist cigarettes, but you're asking the public to resist the 'dried rose leaf gas'? There's no real difference between the two. They're both mildly addictive, dangerous substances that people willingly consume."

"These are nothing alike!" Tang Erda snapped back. "Don't try to twist my words, Bai Six! I can quit smoking, but these things... they'll kill you! They'll wither you away!"

Bai Six burst into laughter, his voice rich and unbothered. He watched Tang Erda with a calm, mocking expression. "When cigarettes first became popular, didn't people swear they'd never be able to quit? Have you ever met someone who really managed to quit them?"

"Isn't your claim that you can quit smoking just a delusion? You're using that excuse to justify your addiction. Tell me—would you be able to quit if your cigarettes were tainted with that dried rose leaf gas? Wouldn't the thought of your health deteriorating make you frustrated? Wouldn't you hate yourself for letting it take control of you?"

Bai Six leaned in, his eyes fixed on Tang Erda with a knowing smile.

Tang Erda could only stare back, speechless, as the manipulation seeped into every word Bai Six uttered.

Bai Six slowly withdrew his gaze and spoke unhurriedly, "So, based on the idea that you can't quit, as long as the supply keeps flowing, this stuff is no different from cigarettes. It's refreshing, boosts productivity for everyone, and provides cheap, easy pleasure."

"Do you really think anyone would reject something like this? No. Profitable capitalists will automatically promote it, using it to boost employee productivity, and eventually, it will have the same status as coffee."

Tang Erda's breath hitched in his throat.

Bai Six looked at him with pity. "As soon as this kind of thing spreads, the people who have gotten used to it will start to make automatic, reasonable excuses for its existence—just like cigarettes. There are many countries where cannabis is legal, where Christmas gifts are cannabis, and people use this evil substance, given by the devil, to celebrate the birth of God."

"They may have once thought it was wrong, but now, they feel free to enjoy it. They think they're superior to us and even begin to sympathize with us, as I'm sure you've seen, Officer Tang."

"Even if you slap a warning label on the dried rose leaf gas—'smell and die'—they'll just peel it off and revel in the fragrance of the rose."

Tang Erda glanced at the red warning label on his cigarette packet—Smoking is bad for your health—his eyes wide.

"It's not me you need to stop," Bai Six whispered softly. "It's these self-serving humans. I've warned them about the roses, yet they still volunteer to become puppets of evil and wither for it. How can you blame me for that, Sergeant?"

"Captain Tang!" The door to the interrogation room slammed open, and a team member glared at the languid Bai Six. His eyes then fell on Tang Erda's face, his tone sharp. "Something's wrong. Come out and take a look..."

As Tang Erda stepped out of the interrogation room, his team members bowed their heads in unison, as if in silent mourning. Some had red eyes, gritted teeth.

"What's going on?" Tang Erda forced himself to stay calm. "Did the other side send a new video?"

A team member gave a bitter laugh. "No, it's worse than that. Captain Tang, our capture of the producer behind the Rose Dried Leaf Gas has been exposed online. Now... we're being boycotted by many people starting new topics."

"Boycotted?" Tang Erda asked, his voice calm but growing concerned.

"Being boycotted means..." the team member took a deep breath, his eyes reddening. "They don't want us arresting the producers of the dried rose leaf gas. They want to legalize it. Many people know full well the dangers of the stuff, but more and more are becoming addicted to its aroma..."

"They think the producers are reasonable and shouldn't be captured so brutally. They believe this stuff isn't as harmful as we say. On the contrary, it brings great benefits..."

The team member continued, numb, "People who work can finish their tasks faster after using it. Students can easily get better grades in exams. Women become self-disciplined and beautiful. Men become fit. The elderly even find relief from certain diseases. There's no reason to boycott something like this, even if there are aftereffects. They still think we're... we're..."

Tang Erda fixed him with an emotionless stare. "Think we're what?"

"Think we're stopping the general public from enjoying something that only the privileged class can access... we're... lapdogs." The team member gritted his teeth. "Many people who the public thought were rich are making a big deal of posting videos of themselves using the perfume online. And after the internet police delete them, people still spread it privately. We can't stop it."

"And these people are pushing the narrative that we'll call off the production of the perfume at any moment..."

Tang Erda closed his eyes. "Did we send out a statement explaining that many of those people they think are rich are actually the purchasers and marketers of this perfume, and that this is likely a publicity stunt to encourage impulse spending by the general public?"

"Yes," the team member said bitterly. "But no one believes us."

"There's another important reason we can't stop it now," the team member continued. "The people already contaminated with this stuff, fearing we'll shut down the factory, are spraying it in public, forcing others to be contaminated. Once people are exposed to it, their judgment deteriorates, and they fall into an irrational obsession. They start joining the boycott against us..."

"Captain, some of the contaminated crew are staging a sit-in in front of the government, demanding we be banned as a department..."

"Captain, they're still sending videos! What do we do?!"

"Captain, the already contaminated crew are starting to wilt. Does Bai Six really know what to do with this stuff?!"

"Captain..."

"Captain..."

Tang Erda's disoriented gaze drifted over the anxious, frightened, and resentful faces of his team members. He then fixed his eyes on the cloudy expression in the small window of the interrogation room.

Through the glass, Bai Six turned his head, his dark eyes absorbing the light. He gazed at Tang Erda, smiling, and mouthed words to him.

"Captain Tang, Rose... does it smell good?"

An ear-piercing, unmistakable scream drilled into his eardrums as a team member stumbled forward, clutching his computer. "Captain! The clowns have started killing people!!!"

Tang Erda felt as if his hands were forced onto the computer screen, almost instinctively clicking on the video that had been sent to him. The Joker's comically oiled face filled the screen, his exaggerated smile wide as he aimed a gun at the limp, bloodied figure on the floor. He made a mechanical announcement, like the start of a game.

"Stampede Crew Trivia, Ready—Go!"

"Bang!" A shot hit the palm of the man's right hand, causing him to tilt his head back, crying out in hoarse pain.

"Bang!" The left ankle.

"Bang!" The right hand.

"Bang!" The left hand.

"Bang!" The calf.

With each shot, the man shuddered, struggling to control his pain, trying not to cry out. He didn't want his reaction to shake the others in the game.

But halfway through, nearly all the team members turned away, eyes red. Only Tang Erda remained transfixed on the screen, as if possessed, unable to look away.

The Joker adjusted his aim twice, then pointed the final shot at the man's head.

He stepped on the back of the beaten man, lifted his head by the hair, and positioned his face to the screen, showing his vacant eyes. Su Yang, the once neat, reliable lieutenant of the third detachment, was now so filthy he would normally have washed up before going to the hospital.

But now, he would never have that chance.

The only word visible on his work card was [Su], stained with blood dripping from his face.

"From now on," the Joker laughed playfully, "If you don't release Bai Six, I'll kill one of your team members every hour. Starting with him." He aimed his gun at Su Yang's head.

Su Yang blinked slowly, his dry lips moving with difficulty, his breath so shallow it was barely perceptible. "Never... be... carried away by him. Captain... save... those... contaminated..."

"BANG---!!!"

Blood splattered in front of Tang Erda's eyes.

The Bureau of Heresy and Dangerous Treatment

The cacophony of background noise fades for less than a second, transforming into a low rumble in Tang Erda's ears.

None of the players spoke.

The silence didn't last long. Soon, a team member approached hesitantly, holding up another computer, tears in his eyes. "Captain, they've sent pictures of the next dead team member."

Tang Erda shakily stood on the back of his chair, his head bowed for a long time, silent. When he finally raised his head, his eyes devoid of any light, he looked at the team gathered around him and softly asked, "Bai Six, afraid of water, right?"

It seemed that from that moment on, a part of Tang Erda's body—along with Su Yang's brutal death—collapsed completely under the weight of the clown's manic laughter.

All memories began and ended with Bai Six's calm eyes, like a stagnant lake covered in floating weeds, without wind or waves.

This time was no different.

Tang Erda, kneeling over Lu Yizhan, staggered to his feet. His dark blue eyes were devoid of light as he raised his hand and aimed his gun at Bai Liu.

Just as the clown had laughed and raised his gun at the innocent Su Yang, Tang Erda numbly raised his gun at the innocent Bai Liu.

The righteous hunter had been tainted by the color of wanderlust through countless retrospections, finally embodying one of the wandering circus members he had always despised.

Mu Sicheng and Muke, their guns pointed at Tang Erda, moved closer cautiously. Mu Sicheng's gun was nearly at Tang Erda's head, but Tang Erda kept his gun trained on Bai Liu, which puzzled Mu Sicheng. "What's this, Captain Tang? Before you shoot Bai Liu, we'll blow your head into a puddle of popcorn."

Muke calmly advised, "You'd better put the gun down."

Lu Yizhan, who had just been knocked to the ground by Tang Erda, waved his sore wrist and got up. Liu Jiayi jumped past him, nimbly reaching Bai Liu's side. She looked him over, checking that he was okay, before turning to the confrontation on the other side of the corridor. The four older men were locked in a standoff.

If it were normal, Liu Jiayi would have suggested killing Tang Erda and proceeding with the game, but now her gaze fell on Lu Yizhan, who had stumbled to his feet. Lu Yizhan was an onlooker who hadn't entered the game, and with him present, entering the game wasn't an option.

If they had killed Tang Erda, Liu Jiayi knew they would be left with an innocent, terrified Lu Yizhan, who would likely end up reporting them to the authorities.

Liu Jiayi thought about how Lu Yizhan would probably be shocked, confused, and then educated on the situation. When they were being guarded, the young officer was annoyingly inquisitive—like Liu Jiayi's recently retired mother, who had fifty menopauses at the same time, making Liu Jiayi's skin crawl.

She felt an odd discomfort and a tingling sensation at the thought, and instinctively stepped behind Bai Liu, adjusting the large goggles on her face to hide better.

Bai Liu glanced at her subtle move, catching her avoiding Lu Yizhan. Lu Yizhan glanced at him briefly before averting his gaze.

— Certainly, they were all people ruined by Lu Yizhan's presence.

Lu Yizhan stood up and immediately addressed the three men confronting him with guns. He positioned himself in front of the gun that Tang Erda had raised, aimed at Bai Liu. With a clear, firm gaze, he held the guns that Mu Sicheng and Muke aimed at Tang Erda with both hands. Sighing, he was ready to start speaking.

"How bad is it to fight and kill? Can't we just sit down, have hot pot, and talk? Why does everything have to be solved with guns? Look at this narrow space, metal walls everywhere. Bullets could ricochet and cause more trouble for us than for the enemy. This proves a point—bullets meant for others always come back to you. Why suffer?"

Mu Sicheng, stunned, asked, "Who are you?"

Muke tried to retract his gun but couldn't. "What...?"

Behind them, Liu Jiayi and Bai Liu exchanged a look. Liu Jiayi rubbed her arms, feeling a familiar chill.

Tang Erda suddenly interrupted Lu Yizhan's rambling with a quiet comment: "You're right. Bullets meant for others always come back to you."

As he spoke, he slowly raised his elbow, swung it back at ninety degrees, and with a cold expression, he turned the gun around, aiming it at himself. The brilliant silver glowing rose revolver was aimed at his own head.

Tang Erda flicked the safety off with his thumb, speaking softly, "I understand this better than anyone."

[System Alert: Player Tang Erda's mental value is zero in reality; he is fully monsterized and can now unlock his access to reality-based games.]

[System Alert: Player Tang Erda uses the Monsterization skill to unlock the Monster Book: Fading Rose Hunter form, enabling the use of the Personal Skill (Russian Roulette).]

[Russian Roulette: The revolver contains six bullets, three of which will kill the user, and three that will kill the enemy. The hunter raises his suicide rose, and when the trigger is pulled, it's a gamble—will he kill himself first, or the enemy? Is it certain to use the skill?]

[... loading...]

[Skill Target: Bai Liu]

[System Alert: The roulette wheel is spinning, gambling is about to begin...]

The revolver by his temple began to twist, the sound of the loaded bullet spinning in the chamber was so familiar to Tang Erda that it sent a wave of panic through Lu Yizhan, who feared Tang Erda was about to pull the trigger on himself. Even Mu Sicheng and Muke were unsure how to react, their guns still pointed at him.

Liu Jiayi, however, sensed something was wrong. She frowned and stepped forward, standing in front of Bai Liu. Wang Shun's words echoed in her mind:

[Rose Hunter is a marksman whose target is nearly impossible to spot, but once targeted, the opponent dies with deadly precision...]

Liu Jiayi's gaze fixed on the silver revolver in Tang Erda's hand—this was a skill weapon!

Why does Tang Erda get to use a skill weapon in reality? It didn't make sense!

But whether it made sense or not, Liu Jiayi couldn't hesitate any longer.

"Muke! Mu Sicheng! Shoot him!" she shouted. "His gun is wrong!"

Tang Erda chuckled abruptly, his laugh blending with Liu Jiayi's shout into a chilling symphony. His deep blue, nearly black eyes locked onto Bai Liu behind Lu Yizhan, his tone light. "You know, Bai Six, I've never lost at this game of chance. I've never lost. It's the only game I can beat you at."

"Because you're so unlucky that every time I shoot a bullet, it's always the one that kills you."

This was a skill developed by the hunter chosen by the gods to hunt sinful "werewolves," and now, as a soon-to-be monster, Tang Erda had perfected it.

Lu Yizhan's pupils contracted as he watched Tang Erda pull the trigger.

The silver bullet spiraled out of the chamber, passing through Tang Erda's skull in slow motion. Tang Erda was struck into the wall by the impact, but the bullet continued, miraculously grazing the metal wall and flying toward Bai Liu with sparks flying.

Liu Jiayi moved faster than the eye could follow, climbing up Bai Liu's body. Before he could react, she covered his head with her hands, arching her back to leave a gap, allowing the bullet to hit her instead.

The bullet struck her waist like a cannonball, and she grunted as her body shifted with the force. The impact sent blood pouring from the wound, instantly staining Bai Liu's shirt red.

Liu Jiayi gripped Bai Liu's shirt as the bullet struck, but her hands loosened as she fell into his arms, blood beginning to flow from her mouth.

With a laborious effort, Liu Jiayi grabbed Bai Liu's collar, leaving a bright red handprint on it. She choked and whispered, "Get... go..."

Bai Liu looked down at her, his tone calm. "Get rid of Lu Yizhan, take you into the game. I know."

Liu Jiayi closed her eyes, curling up in his arms as her breath grew shallow. Blood seeped through his fingers as he pressed against her wound, her voice fading. "The rest... yourself... go on, I'm... not awake..."

Tang Erda was thrown against the wall by the force of the bullets. He shook his head and tried to stand but failed multiple times, as if his ability had taken a toll on him.

[System Alert: (Russian Roulette) has entered cooldown. You can use it again in 10 minutes. Player Tang Erda is losing strength…]

The veins on Tang Erda's arms throbbed as he struggled to his feet, unsteady but determined. Without hesitation, he raised his other real-world gun and aimed at Bai Liu, intent on shooting.

Muke had heard Liu Jiayi's warning and immediately moved to fire at Tang Erda, but his gun was blocked by Lu Yizhan. Lu Yizhan looked confused but still hadn't let go of Mu Sicheng and Muke's weapons. Muke was aware of Bai Liu's connection to Lu Yizhan—he couldn't just shoot him.

Mu Sicheng hadn't fully processed the situation, but the moment he saw Liu Jiayi, bloody and weak in Bai Liu's arms, his fury ignited. He kicked Lu Yizhan aside, snapping, "Who the hell are you?! Let go of me!"

Lu Yizhan hit the ground. At the same time, he caught hold of Tang Erda, who was slipping, and backhanded the gun Tang Erda had aimed at Bai Liu.

Mu Sicheng was on the verge of losing control, but Muke had already steadied himself, pressing the barrel of his gun to Tang Erda's head.

Bai Liu clutched Liu Jiayi's fading, cold body and gave the order: "Take Lu Yizhan. I need to enter the game—now."

Lu Yizhan, still on the ground, blinked in confusion. "Enter the game? What are you talking about?"

The moment Bai Liu issued the command, Muke and Mu Sicheng reacted instinctively, answering in unison: "Yes."

Muke forced the dazed and shocked Lu Yizhan forward with a gun to his head, while Mu Sicheng kept Tang Erda at bay.

Bai Liu lifted Liu Jiayi, whose chest rose and fell faintly. The moment Lu Yizhan vanished, ensuring there were no more onlookers, Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi disappeared before the door of [Heretic 0001].

Immediately afterward, Mu Sicheng and Tang Erda, still locked in a standoff, also vanished.

Muke dragged Lu Yizhan into the darkness.

Lu Yizhan kept glancing back, searching for Bai Liu. He knew he had just done something that had slowed Bai Liu down. Muke, gun pressed against his back, forced him toward the elevator. Once inside, he pushed the "close door" button and stepped back out.

As the doors shut, Lu Yizhan and the rose-patterned gun he had seized from Muke vanished.

At the same time, the team monitoring the situation outside [Heretic 0001]'s room saw their surveillance screens flicker. When the feed stabilized, everyone was gone. Only a pool of unknown blood remained in front of the door—along with Lu Yizhan, staggering out of the elevator, wounded and unsteady.

Recalling the orders Tang Erda had left before his disappearance, the team raised their communicators with grave expressions.

"Attention! Heretics 0006, 0601, 0004, and an unidentified humanoid heretic have vanished into the base's lower levels, as Captain Tang predicted. Inform all members outside the base—prepare to surround the last recorded coordinates."

"Possible coordinates for Humanoid Heretic 0006: a rental flat off Welcome Road..."

"Possible coordinates for Humanoid Heretic 0601: the Love Welfare Home in the city and Caojiagou in Bingzhou..."

"Possible coordinates for Humanoid Heretic 0004: the Mirror University dormitory building..."

"Possible coordinates for the unidentified humanoid heretic: the cottage area of Fragrant Hill..."

"And lastly, their final known location," the team member's voice dropped to a hushed tone, "the lowest level of the base—outside the door of [Heretic 0001]. Once containment is secured, the detachment members permitted in the restricted area will stand by with weapons drawn."

“All units will be on standby at these coordinates. Shoot the humanoid heretics on sight.” The team member’s voice hardened. “After tonight, I trust we all understand just how dangerous these humanoid heretics are. Captain Tang wasn’t wrong—they are an extreme threat.”

Silence filled the base as its members surveyed the wreckage left behind. The aftermath of the heretics’ escape lay before them—injured soldiers on stretchers, debris scattered across the floor, and the bloodstained ground where the heretics had fought their way out.

In the surveillance room, a team member stared at the crimson smear on the screen. His fists clenched as he spoke into his communicator, his voice weighted with resolve.

“If there’s any liability in this chase, we take full responsibility—along with the leader of the third detachment.”

“These dangerous humanoid heretics must never be allowed to manipulate monsters and unleash them on the world.”

---------- -----

[System Alert: Welcome back to the game, Bai Liu]

Bai Liu's sudden appearance in the game lobby, carrying a bleeding Liu Jiayi, instantly captured the attention of every player. Both he and Liu Jiayi were already hot topics in the game, but now, the situation had exploded into something even bigger.

Within ten seconds, the in-game forums were flooded with discussions —Bai Liu’s first reappearance since making the King’s List, and the shocking sight of the Little Witch gravely injured.

His disappearance had been so quiet last time that the major guilds and the Scavenger’s Guild had been searching for him relentlessly. Now, his return was so dramatic that no one dared approach him—at least, not while he was clearly in no mood for distractions. But that didn’t stop a large crowd from following, eager to witness what would happen next.

Bai Liu, however, ignored all of it. He carried the weakening Liu Jiayi straight toward the game’s entrance.

Liu Jiayi’s personal skill, [Poison or Antidote], was offensive in nature, meaning it couldn’t be used inside the game lobby. To heal her, they had to enter a game.

As Bai Liu walked, he spoke quickly to Liu Jiayi. “One, Level 2 games operate on a life-value-based mortality system, which severely restricts your skills. If we enter one like last time and your cooldown gets extended to six hours, it’ll be terrible for your injuries. You’ve been in Level 3 games before—are they just as restrictive?”

Liu Jiayi clutched her bleeding abdomen, her voice weak. “There’s no… restriction…”

Bai Liu made his decision instantly. “Then we’re going into a Level 3 game.”

“But Level 3 games… only allow a limited number of players to pass,” Liu Jiayi forced out. Her face grew paler as blood continued to flow, and she gripped Bai Liu’s sleeve tightly. “You can’t just go in alone… You’ll die…”

“We’ll deal with that later. Your condition comes first. I’ll handle the rest.” Bai Liu’s voice was firm as he reached the game login.

His eyes swept across the game selection screen, finally landing on a game in the corner—one that no one had entered yet.

Its interface displayed a fluorescent-colored rose inside a long, semi-circular glass vessel. The rose was wilting.

Bai Liu clicked on it, and the introduction appeared.

[Game Copy Name: The Rose Factory]
[Level: Level 3 (Games with a player mortality rate between 80% and 90%)]
[Mode: Multiplayer (0/6)]

"Only a true perfumer can uncover the secrets hidden within the pistil and extract more fragrance from a withering bloom."

[The human heart weighs 250g. Do you know how much a rose weighs?]

Bai Liu’s eyes narrowed. Once again, a game had appeared that directly correlated with a recent event in his life.

This wasn’t a coincidence.

It was becoming clear that these games weren’t randomly generated, but followed some set of rules—rules Bai Liu had yet to decipher.

This familiar sensation, as if the system had been waiting for him, made his skin crawl. He had felt this before, back when [Love Welfare Home] had appeared, pulling him in like it had always been meant for him.

The unsettling feeling of being manipulated had been haunting him ever since he first entered the game—or perhaps even before that. He could sense it, but he couldn't pinpoint exactly where it originated.

And judging by the [Oracle] Tawil had given him in advance, the one orchestrating Bai Liu's life and fate was someone known to Tawil—or rather, Tawil himself was just another piece in this larger game.

But Bai Liu had never been one to avoid the unknown. He preferred to face things head-on.

Without hesitation, he logged into the game, cradling Liu Jiayi's fading body in his arms.

[The game "Rose Factory" has registered two players. Four more players are needed to start.]

Meanwhile, Mu Sicheng and Muke, who had been chasing Bai Liu, suddenly heard a system notification.

[System Alert: Your favorite player, Bai Liu, has logged into a game~ Go watch him now~]
[System Alert: You have bookmarked small TV player Liu Jiayi...]

Mu Sicheng and Muke exchanged dark looks.

Mu Sicheng was the first to speak, frustration clear in his voice. "Bai Liu went in alone… and with an injured Liu Jiayi. What game is he in?!"

"What the hell is he thinking?! Couldn't he have waited for me?!" Mu Sicheng growled, scanning the screen filled with different games. "How the hell am I supposed to find him now?!"

Muke, though visibly tense, forced himself to remain calm. "He didn't wait for us… which means he didn't need us." He spoke through gritted teeth. "If Bai Liu thought we were necessary, he would have waited. The fact that he went in alone means only one thing—"

Muke's hands clenched into fists, his expression bitter. "He believes we're useless in the game he's entering."

He inhaled sharply, pushing his emotions aside to continue his analysis. “Liu Jiayi’s skills were blocked in the last round because the game used a life-value mortality system. If Bai Liu is trying to save her, he would have picked a game where her skills aren’t restricted. Are there any games like that?”

Mu Sicheng fell silent, fists tightening before he finally exhaled. “Yes. Level 3 games.”

The Rose Factory

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

“Fuck!” Mu Sicheng cursed, so frustrated he wanted to punch the air. “I can’t even guarantee I’d make it out of a Level 3 game alive! How the fuck does Bai Liu—a low-level panel player—have the balls to walk straight in?!”

Muke took a few steadying breaths before turning to Mu Sicheng, who was far more experienced than him. “So what do we do, then? How can we help Bai Liu now?”

Mu Sicheng was silent for a moment before finally responding. “The only thing we can do is stay out of the game, keep our people from going in, and let Bai Liu call on our skills freely.” His voice was flat, almost resigned. “That’s all we’re worth to him—for now.”

He let out a bitter laugh, looking down at his own palm before clenching it tightly. “I told him before that selling my soul for a hundred points was too cheap, that I was getting a bad deal… but I never thought that after just one game, I’d already be useless to him.” His grip tightened. “In the end, he really did overspend those hundred points.”

A familiar, suffocating feeling crept up Mu Sicheng’s spine—the same powerlessness Liu Huai must have felt, forced into someone else’s hands, unable to fight back, forced to die in front of him.

It was always the same.

He was always watching, helpless, as someone who could actually make him feel something was held hostage by fate, dragged toward inevitable danger and death.

First, the man who started it all. Then Liu Huai.

And now Bai Liu.

Bai Liu, who thought he could do so much—yet always came up just short.

Mu Sicheng clenched his fists harder, forcing the feeling down before it could consume him.

But Muke found something before he did.

Staring down at the roaring activity in the game forums, Muke's head suddenly snapped up. His eyes burned with a sharp, almost dangerous light.

"There's something else we can do."

Mu Sicheng turned to him. "What?"

Muke's expression was determined. "The guild. Bai Liu's guild. The Scavenger's Guild he took over in the last round."

Mu Sicheng blinked.

"He talked to me about some management ideas," Muke continued, his mind moving quickly now that he had something to grasp onto. It steadied him, made him sharp and rational again. "The Scavenger's Guild has lost a lot of its strongest players. The ones left are just those who still want to cling to Bai Liu. But they're not entirely useless. I need information on all of them. Then, I can figure out how to make them the most useful to Bai Liu."

He laid out his thoughts one by one, analyzing the next steps they could take.

Mu Sicheng listened, his frustration slowly giving way to focus.

Had Tang Erda been there to witness it, he would have been stunned. Just ten minutes ago, he had dismissed the [Wandering Circus] as nothing more than an immature, directionless group. But the moment Bai Liu entered the Level 3 game with an injured Liu Jiayi, it had already begun to evolve—quickly shaping into the embryonic team he had encountered in other parallel timelines.

Muke, a thief desperate for strength, had started taking on the role of a guild leader, a stage manager.

And the little witch, the one who shielded Bai Liu with her own body…

Everything seemed to be falling into place, as if following a script laid out long before they even realized it.

The only uncertain variable left—the only thing that could still change the course of fate—was the hunter himself, caught deep in the abyss.

---------- ---------- --

Tang Erda stepped into the game and immediately redeemed a bottle of psycho-bleach. He took a deep swig, breaking free from the near-death haze that made him want to kill either someone else or himself. Leaning against the entrance to the central hall, he closed his eyes to rest, not rushing after Bai Liu just yet.

He had already caught up with Bai Liu in the central hall once—and failed to kill him. Now, all he could do was wait for Bai Liu to enter the game.

It was a dangerous place for him, but Tang Erda knew Bai Liu wouldn't hesitate for long.

Because Liu Jiayi was wounded.

Unsurprisingly, the system notification came soon after:

[System Alert: Your favorite player, Bai Liu, has logged into the game~ Please go and watch~]

At the sound of the beep, Tang Erda didn't hesitate. He turned on his heel and headed straight for the game's login portal.

As he walked toward the boarding gate, his cold gaze swept over the senior guilds that had tried to recruit him for this year's league.

They had all received the same straightforward message from him:

He wanted to kill Bai Liu.

Any guild willing to help him corner Bai Liu would get Tang Erda on their team—for free.

It was an offer too tempting to ignore.

The infamous [Rose Hunter], a player rumored to have reached S-rank long ago but who had always kept his stats hidden, was suddenly willing to join a team. This was a game-changing announcement that could completely reshape the direction of the league.

The moment Tang Erda's message was sent out, several high-ranking guilds exploded into heated discussions.

Of course, with his strength, Tang Erda didn't need a team to go after Bai Liu.

But there was one problem—Bai Liu knew how to run.

If Bai Liu kept clearing low-level games quickly, jumping between them using the pass mechanics, evading pursuit with sheer speed, then catching him would be nearly impossible.

If no one helped fill the player slots in those games to block Bai Liu from entering, then all Tang Erda and any other hunters would be left doing was chasing his ghost across the screen while the audience marveled at how fast Bai Liu cleared games.

Tang Erda knew this because he had already been played like this—once, in another timeline.

Bai Liu was born for these horror games. No one could outmatch him inside one.

Tang Erda understood this better than anyone.

If that weren't the case, Bai Liu would have died a thousand times over by now. He wouldn't have had to resort to [Russian Roulette], a desperation skill, just to barely kill Bai Liu once.

That was the skill Tang Erda had used to win his league match against [Wandering Circus]—because he had killed Bai Liu.

Of course, Bai Liu hadn't truly died. His popularity had granted him a death exemption for the league match.

But that didn't matter.

The moment Bai Liu went down, every member of the Circus stopped playing to ensure his safety, effectively forfeiting the match.

Even though Tang Erda was the last man standing in the ring, the entire Circus team had surrendered without hesitation.

To Bai Liu's trained mad dogs, his life meant far more than any league victory.

Perhaps only Bai Liu, that lunatic himself, would place money and winning above his own survival.

Tang Erda reached the game portal just as his system panel lit up with a response.

The King's Guild was the first to reply.

[System Alert: Player Tang Erda, you have a guild notification from (Queen of Hearts)~]

He tapped the fire-sealed envelope on his screen. A message appeared:

[Reply from the Queen of Hearts:
Dear Lord Hunter, I, too, am tracking Bai Liu—after all, he did abduct our lovely little witch.
Of course, if you'd like to join our team afterward, the King's Guild would be honored. But if not, we won't force you. In the matter of Bai Liu, I believe we can have a mutually pleasant and short-lived cooperation~]

Tang Erda's eyes darkened.

Hearts.

An incredible woman.

In all the timelines he had seen, aside from Liu Jiayi, Hearts was the only woman who had ever been directly entangled with Bai Liu.

Her willingness to cooperate now was almost amusing.

Because in most timelines, the Queen of Hearts had never been so friendly to him.

Different identities. Different circumstances. Different choices. That was the nature of parallel timelines.

Just as no two leaves are exactly alike, no two versions of the same person would make all the same choices. Even the smallest divergence in a moment could send a life down a completely different path.

Except for Bai Liu.

Bai Liu was a counterexample to this theory—a bug.

No matter the timeline, no matter the circumstances, whenever Bai Liu reached a major turning point that would shape his future, he always made the same decision.

The one that would earn him the most money.

No matter how much the details differed between timelines, Bai Liu would always become a heretical smuggler.

Tang Erda had once heard a Bai Liu from another timeline laugh as he told him,

"Most ways to get rich quickly in this world rely on one thing—tickling people's desires, making them want to spend."

"But tell me, Captain Tang—what excites the human heart more than the sale of evil itself?"

And Bai Liu had proven it to him, over and over again, across countless timelines.

Bai Liu's pursuit of wealth was as steady as a fixed coordinate—never shifting, never swaying. And because of that, his future was always the same.

That was unnatural.

No one could be that consistent.

A normal person's future fluctuated. Like Hearts—who, in one timeline, was rumored to be Bai Liu's mistress. In another, his smuggling partner. In another, an ally of the Bureau of Heresy trying to kill him. And in some, she had nothing to do with him at all.

That was normal.

A person's future was never infinite—it wavered within a set range, determined by their background, circumstances, and choices.

And Hearts was proof of that.

In most timelines, she crossed paths with Bai Liu. But whether she worked with him, fought against him, or ignored him entirely depended on the choices she made in each one.

Unlike Bai Liu.

Unlike the man whose path to wealth was so absolute, so eerily fixed, that it defied the natural laws of time itself.

Chapter End Notes

Little Spoiler ....

Bai Liu used 100 points to buy Mu Sicheng's soul, which is one of the highest price he has ever paid

At first, Tang Erda contacted Hearts because he suspected that, in this timeline, she might have a connection to Bai Liu. He intended to use her to gather clues about him. Tang Erda had just been to the orphanage to confirm the death of the other [Bai Liu], but he was still reeling from the shock. What he hadn't expected was that Hearts had no ties to Bai Liu in this timeline.

After all, who would have thought that Bai Liu would enter the game so late, only to blaze through three games at eight times the usual speed? He took a fledgling team and rapidly built it into a force capable of challenging veteran guilds.

If this continued…

Tang Erda gritted his teeth and replied to Hearts: [Yes. Have your people block the other games. I'll go after him myself.]

Hearts: [Do you know which game he's in?]

Tang Erda: [Level 3.]

Liu Jiayi was injured. To avoid limiting her abilities with a life-card mortality Level 2 game, Bai Liu would have entered a Level 3 game to ensure her survival. He always looked after his players.

Hearts responded quickly: [If you're sure Bai Liu is in a Level 3 game, I have three high-level guild players with decent attack power. They've practiced Level 3 games and serve as backups for our team. They'll join you in surrounding Bai Liu—he's not easy to deal with. See you at the game login.]

A 10-20% clearance rate for Level 3 games… and she just handed him three guild members to use.

Hearts was just as ruthless as in other timelines.

She didn't see her guild members' lives as real lives. Or rather, in this game, no one's life was real. The members themselves probably didn't even see their own lives that way. As long as they could be resurrected, their existences were nothing more than lines of data carrying a soul.

---------- --

Hearts arrived without a glance, draped in burgundy waves, a rose-colored hat perched atop her head. She wore a short, open-shouldered blazer with a matching wrap skirt and a pair of peach-hearted, spike heels—elegant, predatory, and unmistakable.

Behind her, hundreds of King's Guild members followed in perfect formation, clad in black, white, and red uniforms emblazoned with playing card suits—hearts, diamonds, clubs. They moved with calculated precision, their presence consuming the game registration area.

As they reached the large selection screen, they split off seamlessly. Each member filtered through the available games, selecting only those they were sure to clear based on their level, stats, and skills. Without hesitation, they entered the games, vanishing one by one behind Hearts.

Not a single sound was out of place. No hesitation. No missteps. Their practiced efficiency was so honed that they could determine their odds of success with nothing more than a glance at the game interface.

The moment they began logging in, a system notification rang out:

[System Alert: The player you have bookmarked... is now logged into the game~ Please go and watch~]

By the time Hearts reached Tang Erda, most of her entourage had already disappeared into their respective games.

At the same time, the hundred public games displayed on the massive screen—each previously marked [Waiting...] in green—flipped, one by one, to red [Full] indicators. The transition was almost instantaneous, as if an invisible hand had turned the pages of a book.

Within moments, the entire public game selection was full.

Ordinary players froze, confusion flashing across their faces as the screen turned entirely red. A hushed murmur spread among them. Those who recognized the group stood in stunned silence, before instinctively stepping aside.

Some of the more seasoned players, however, couldn’t resist whispering.

“Holy shit?! What the hell?! These are the King's Guild's reserve players, right? Shouldn't they be training in the game pool? Why are they here?"

"This is insane… It's like they're sieging someone. And Hearts is leading them personally? This isn't normal."

"There's still two months before the tournament starts. Why would they be here instead of training? Did some regular player piss them off?"

"No, no, look at those reserve players' stats—some of them are reaching S- rank!"

"King's Guild has been training monsters, I swear. Everyone used to think Puppet Master only got into the team because of his skill synergy with Little Witch. That his stats were too weak to qualify. But now? He got wiped out by a newcomer…"

"Wait, does this mean they're here to deal with Spades? Are Hearts and Spades finally having their long-awaited lovers' quarrel?"

"Wake up. Spades is training in the play pool. He's not even here."

The public game selection screen glowed red—except for one remaining game at the top right corner. A single game still marked [Waiting...], its interface displaying the image of a falling rose.

Because Tang Erda stood guard in front of it, Hearts had left it untouched.

She approached him, lifting the brim of her hat slightly, her ruby-red lips curving into a knowing smile. Her gaze followed his, landing on the interface with the fading rose.

Unbothered by the commotion she'd caused, she spoke softly:

"Mr. Hunter, are you sure this is the game? Or did you simply get carried away?"

A reference to Tang Erda's skill name—[Faded Rose Hunter].

A shiver ran down his spine.

Hearts was an uncomfortable presence at the best of times. But when Tang Erda met her gaze, something within her expression twisted.

Her jawline shifted—soft, delicate features giving way to the sharper, more angular bone structure of a man. The color of her eyes faded from dark red to a familiar shade of light brown. Her hair shrank, strands curling into a short, neatly kept style. Her outfit warped, the flowing dress morphing into the crisp uniform of the Bureau of Heresy.

Tang Erda turned away sharply.

—She was starting to look like Su Yang.

His voice was cold when he spoke. "If this is your idea of cooperation, then our deal ends here."

Hearts chuckled lightly, withdrawing her skill, returning to her original form as if nothing had happened. "Mr. Hunter, so afraid of being seen as sentimental? How unfortunate. I thought it was rather sweet."

Tang Erda shot her a glare. "It's none of your business what he was to me. Stop using your skills to pry into my head. We're here to talk about Bai Liu."

Hearts merely smiled, tilting her head playfully. "Fair enough. I overstepped. My curiosity got the better of me."

Despite her shifting face, despite the games she played, there was something unmistakably constant about Hearts. An aura, a presence—one that was unmistakable no matter what face she wore.

And yet, those who looked at her could never quite separate her from their own illusions.

That was the nature of her ability.

Hearts took on the appearance of the person closest to her target's heart, using their own emotions to confuse and control them. A weaponized mirage. A hunter wearing the skin of prey.

Tang Erda had first uncovered Xie Ta's existence because of this very skill.

In one of the timelines where Hearts had worked alongside the Bureau of Heresy, she had told him something chilling—

The first time Bai Six saw her, her face had immediately taken the form of Xie Ta.

From that moment on, Bai Six had pursued her relentlessly, as though under a spell. He invited her into his team, an unprecedented move for a man who never took in players without long-term value. The entire [Wandering Circus] had resisted the decision.

But Bai Six's choices were never up for negotiation.

Hearts infiltrated the core of his team under orders from the Bureau. She watched as Bai Six, normally so calculating, treated her like a mistress he couldn't resist, as though he had abandoned reason for obsession.

Yet, when they met in secret, Bai Six never seemed enthralled. He would sit in the dark, beneath the waterlogged ruins of the guild building, watching her face with a quiet intensity.

He would hand her a tattered book—The Book of Killings by Long, Skinny Ghosts—its pages torn and fragile. A relic of something long lost.

And then he would instruct her to read.

Nothing more.

She would ask him, "Is this face on me someone important to you, Mr. Bai?"

Bai Six, slouched in his chair, eyes half-lidded, would answer without emotion:

"I don't know. I don't remember."

She had pressed further. "Then why let me join your team? You only take in players with long-term value."

Bai Six had closed his eyes. "Because the moment I saw this face, I wanted to possess it completely."

And that, apparently, had been enough.

Hearts had spent countless encounters trying to kill him. Sneaking up on him. Trapping him. Yet, Bai Six never retaliated.

He never killed her.

Because every time he saw her face, it wasn't her he was looking at.

And every time she called his name with that face, his breath would hitch—just for a moment.

Hearts never gave up.

And Bai Six never let her go.

He only ever whispered one instruction: "Keep reading. And don’t ever let me hear you call my name with his face again."

The Rose Factory

Thinking about what would happen between Bai Six and Hearts after the events of the other timelines, Tang Erda gives Hearts a look of indescribable complexity and sympathy.

But he quickly reins in his unnecessary emotions and succinctly answers the question Hearts had asked him earlier.

"I think it's this third-level game," he says. "A new game that no one has entered yet."

Bai Six has always enjoyed new games, especially when there's an opponent to challenge. His greatest advantage is in unfamiliar settings, where he can push his skills to the maximum.

"The Rose Factory?" Hearts lifts her gaze, a faint smile lingering on her lips. "It sounds like a very romantic game—and an oddly fitting match for your skill set, Mr. Hunter. I'm sure you'll have no trouble eliminating the newcomer who stole my little witch in this game."

Her gaze grows obscure as she looks at Tang Erda. "Mr. Hunter, I will do everything I can to help you. I believe you can already sense my sincerity. But my only request is that no harm comes to the little witch, inside or outside of the game."

Tang Erda falls eerily silent for a second. Liu Jiayi had helped Bai Six take his shot, and now it was a matter of life or death.

Hearts wisely averts her gaze from Tang Erda's face, not probing his silence too deeply. Instead, she casually remarks, "I heard my little witch had a gunshot wound when she entered the game. I hope that doesn't happen again, Mr. Hunter."

She smiles with dignified grace. "She is the child I raised. She is very important to me. Any harm to her would be a failure on my part—a disappointment to the happy future I promised her. I don't want to see her pay the price for trusting the wrong person."

"I don't want her to be led astray by anyone else. So you can do whatever you want with the adults who try to mislead her."

Tang Erda feels a familiar sense of unease.

...Hearts. This woman's extreme protectiveness is... very troubling.

Liu Jiayi is now in her guild, and despite the fact that she has, quite literally, defected, Hearts doesn't seem to care at all.

With the league about to start, it's clear that Hearts needs Liu Jiayi as a player. All she truly requires is Liu Jiayi's safe return, and she has made it clear that she will overlook everything else—as long as that condition is met.

If he harms Liu Jiayi, Hearts will find a way to retaliate. She will use her abilities to track him down—and she's already showing signs of doing so.

"These three are all reserve members of our guild's combat team." Hearts sidesteps, revealing the three players who had been standing behind her. "They've trained alongside the little witch and know her skills and attack patterns well enough to keep her under control without hurting her."

Hearts lifts the brim of her hat. Her pupils are the same light brown as Su Yang's. Her face, charming as it is, holds a softness that Tang Erda recognizes well. Even her voice bears a slight resemblance to Su Yang's.

"Mr. Hunter, I'm entrusting everything to you." She leans forward slightly. Her eyes become more and more like Su Yang's, and her voice takes on a strangely masculine quality.

Then, standing on tiptoe, she whispers intimately into Tang Erda's ear, "My witch—I'm counting on you to bring her back."

"Captain."

The word is spoken with a tone that teeters between a lie and a wavering smile. It snaps Tang Erda back to his senses.

Hearts had already turned and walked away. All she left behind was the sight of her retreating back—elegant, feminine—and her laughter, a teasing murmur: "Mr. Hunter is so wary of me... it's not as if I can see the whole of that face in your heart..."

Tang Erda's face darkens for a moment. He says nothing to the guild members who had brought him in. After carefully warning them to watch out for Bai Six's penchant for slipping money into people's hands—and instructing them not to engage in any monetary dealings with him—the four of them enter the game together.

[The game 'Rose Factory' has gathered all players. The game will start soon...]

As the game begins, Bai Liu's eyes snap open. A small, dark TV screen in the multiplayer area flickers to life with a loud electrical hum, displaying his blood-stained face. Almost immediately, five more screens around him light up.

For a brief moment, silence reigns.

Then, as recognition sets in, the audience erupts. A frantic rush of spectators swarms toward Bai Liu's small TV.

"Holy crap!!! Jumping straight into a level 3 game? He's ranking up a level with every game!"

"I just saw Hearts gathering her players... it can't be him, can it...?"

"Haven't you checked the forums yet? Bai Liu entered this game carrying a wounded Little Witch! Hearts is definitely out to get him for hurting her! The King's Guild's entire team this year is built around her skill set!"

"I see a lot of King's Guild prep players here, but last time, Bai Liu won against the Scavengers. Maybe he'll pull it off again!"

Wang Shun watches grimly as the player on the screen next to Bai Liu's is revealed—The Rose Hunter.

In terms of sheer combat prowess, the Hunter alone is more dangerous than all three reserve guild members combined.

But the ordinary players watching have no idea. The Hunter has been a recluse for years, and with his stats hidden, they remain oblivious to the true extent of his strength. Instead, they eagerly anticipate another thrilling match, convinced that Bai Liu—having miraculously won against overwhelming odds before—can do it again.

Wang Shun, however, has seen the Rose Hunter in action.

There's a reason guilds still pay exorbitant prices to hire hunters for the league—because that man has never lost a single match. His skill is a force of nature, almost godlike in its precision.

Two years ago, the player base was different. Back then, everyone who had witnessed the Rose Hunter knew exactly what was coming.

The moment his bullet fired, the crowd had already been cheering—because his victory was inevitable.

Bai Liu won't survive a match against the Hunter in the league.

But in the game, there's still a slim chance.

Because of the in-game shop system, Bai Liu can use a large number of points to interfere with or counter the Hunter's attacks. It's his only viable path forward.

...Assuming he has enough points to pull it off.

Wang Shun frowns, standing in front of Bai Liu's small TV, about to recharge it—when suddenly, Hearts walks into the viewing area with a group of people.

The crowd instinctively parts, making space at the front of Bai Liu's TV for her arrival.

Wang Shun stiffens, quickly adjusting his appearance. He pulls his hood further down, withdrawing to the back of the crowd—but he doesn't leave. He keeps watching, his expression dark as Hearts tilts her head, resting her chin in her palm as she gazes at Bai Liu's TV with unsettling interest.

Something about her demeanor unsettles him. It's familiar.

Hearts turns and smiles.

"Forgive me for interrupting," she says, her tone polite. "But from this moment forward, Bai Liu is officially the number one enemy of the King's Guild. We forbid anyone from liking or donating points to his game. I trust you will all understand."

She waves a hand.

Immediately, the King's Guild members fall into formation, creating a human barrier around Bai Liu's TV.

Wang Shun clenches his jaw.

This is bad.

If Bai Liu falls into the No Name Zone, he's as good as dead.

He needs reinforcements—fast.

And there's only one guild president he can think of who might be interested in this situation.

The richest guild in the game.

The Fifth Guild.

The League of Gamblers.

But before he can reach them, Bai Liu has to survive the Hunter first.

---------- ----------

Meanwhile, the Temple of Lalaye.

A small island rises from the sea—or perhaps it would be more accurate to call it a fragment of a vast, ancient ruin, long submerged and now returned to the surface.

Slanted grey-white stone pillars, both pristine and stained with filth, lean against the deep blue water. Beneath the shifting waves, fish dart between the decayed vines that cling to dark green steps, nibbling at the rot.

Atop the shrine's magnificent stone steps, a man clad in a black hood and a mask engraved with a spiral cross sat motionless for an eternity —until he moved.

The sudden shift startled the fine layer of grey dust settled on his old cloak and sent a seabird fluttering away from its perch on his shoulder. Slowly, he removed the bird's abandoned nest and placed it carefully onto the dust-covered stone table before him.

The tiny bird hopped from its nest and pecked absently at his fingertips before turning its attention to a single card lying face-down on the table. Tilting its head, the bird regarded the idols encircling the stone surface with its small, inquisitive eyes.

Eight grotesque idols loomed around the masked figure. Though their upper halves bore human forms, their lower halves twisted into a nightmarish amalgamation of tentacles, thick fish tails, mottled bird feathers, and parasitic plant growths.

Their sacred eyes remained closed, and despite being mere statues, they exuded an oppressive aura of inviolability. A strange, ancient sheen pulsed over their time-worn surfaces, making them almost unbearable to behold. To stare too long upon their hideous lower halves was to risk madness—to feel an overwhelming, irrepressible urge to surrender one's soul to these ancient gods and offer up one's own life in tribute.

The only solace lay in the fact that these gods still slept. The misfortune was that they seemed poised to awaken at any moment.

The idols rested upon a massive stone platform, and the masked man sitting among them had begun to succumb to the same fate. His lower half was turning to stone, his toes entwined with coiled snails, moss, and tangled roots of strange, grass-green plants.

At the center of this gathering lay an immense, weathered stone table, its surface pitted and scarred by time. Once engraved upon it was the image of a monstrous octopus, its tentacles stretching outward—a symbol eerily identical to that of the Bureau of Dangerous Heresies.

Opposite the masked man sat another figure, also hooded, yet far more composed. His robe was immaculate, his posture relaxed. His face remained hidden in the shadows of his solid black hood, but his neck—pale to the point of translucency—was faintly visible. A bony hand emerged from his sleeve, reaching for the damp, face-down card on the table.

"Prophet." His voice carried a faint amusement. "This is the fourth night of our little game of werewolf killing. Whose fate will you divine tonight?"

The seer remained silent. The only response was the ceaseless crash of waves against the shrine's ruined walls.

The hooded man chuckled, his fingers idly tapping the cards already turned over. "Would you like me to review our game so far?"

His hand traced across the table, tapping deliberately on a card—the Siren King, its eyes closed.

"On the first night, you verified nothing, and I devolved a mermaid. A peaceful night. No one died."

"On the second night, you examined a thief. I placed a mirror. Under your guidance, the werewolves slaughtered a guilty puppeteer and a villager burdened by sin—two [Sinwalkers] fell to your cause. A victory for you."

"On the third night, you placed a [Witch] and [Cupid] on the board, while I played a [Blood Lich]. That night, you orchestrated a masterful pairing—your [Cupid], Liu Huai, linked the [Werewolf] and the [Witch]. The werewolf culled two [Sinwalkers] in their frenzy, but [Cupid], an innocent, was caught in the bloodshed. A draw."

The man's fingers ghosted over the deck before settling on a single card—The Joker. A figure of wild mirth grinned up from the illustration, a reverse cross drawn beneath its right eye—the very same symbol etched onto the back of this man's robe.

At last, his fingers came to rest upon another card—The Hunter, entwined in curling rose vines. A breeze lifted the edge of his black cloak as he lifted his gaze toward the Prophet.

"This is the last of your god cards to be tested," he mused. "Will you divine him tonight?"

The seer, his lower half consumed by petrification, remained still for a long moment before answering in a quiet voice:

"I will examine him. I ask—" He exhaled, "—is he a man, a god, or a monster?"

The hooded man smiled wryly. "This hunter was once on the cusp of godhood… then, as your chosen hunter, he became a man. Now, he teeters on the brink of monstrosity, caught in an unending cycle of reincarnation."

He leaned forward, voice low and teasing. "Are you certain you wish to devolve this card, Prophet? If the hunter or the werewolf takes another life, you lose. And tomorrow night, only you and the God Zhang card remain—if all gods are tainted, the werewolves claim victory."

The Prophet closed his eyes. "Yes."

The hooded man let out a soft chuckle. "Then I'll place a rose."

He flipped over a slender cardboard card before him and whispered, "I rather like the scent. I think it suits your fallen hunter. It carries the air of something that is dying…"

His voice dropped to a murmur. "—like the scent of a monster."

On the upturned card was an image of a single rose, sealed within a long cylindrical glass vessel. Its petals drooped, on the verge of fading.

The Rose Factory

Tang Erda opens his eyes within the game.

The sky is a deep, inky night, and as he moves further into the field of roses, an abrupt sight disrupts the rustic scenery—a modern, out-of-place factory looms in the background of the rural town.

At the entrance stands a massive brass still, its surface dulled with time. Beside it, a white lacquered wooden sign swings slightly in the breeze, bearing the words [Dried Leaf Rose Factory] in both English and Chinese.

Tang Erda's breath catches as his gaze instinctively shifts to the factory's rooftop. It is empty—except for a few fresh roses climbing the metal framework like beanstalks, their petals unfurling in the moonlight. The thick, intoxicating scent of their nectar drifts down, a maddeningly sweet perfume.

This is the same rooftop where Bai Liu once stood, looking down at him and asking, "Rose, does it smell good?"

In all the timelines, Tang Erda has never seen this tertiary game before.

He knew there had to be a game somewhere in the system that held the solution to the Dried Leaf Rose Gas, yet no matter how many times he frantically refreshed the game list, he could never access it.

It was as if something—someone—was blocking him from it, teasing him with its existence. He had long since abandoned hope of ever encountering a game related to the Dried Leaf Rose Gas.

But this time, after falling into complete despair, he had somehow—accidentally—chased Bai Liu straight into it.

[System Alert: Player Tang Erda has discovered the factory entrance and triggered the game's main quest.]
"You will need to work hard in the factory and prove yourself as a top perfumer. Once you become a perfumer, you can challenge the current factory manager and take their place.
[The game ends when a new factory manager is born. The player who becomes the factory manager wins.]
[Now, please enter the factory and begin your first shift!]

Meanwhile, behind the factory, Bai Liu crouches in the shadows, looking profoundly miserable. Liu Jiayi, seated beside him, takes slow sips of an antidote. Her complexion is significantly better now, the bleeding from her gunshot wounds having finally stopped.

As she finishes reviewing her main quest, Liu Jiayi glances at Bai Liu's deeply unenthusiastic expression and mutters under her breath, "...I told you not to enter a third-tier game so recklessly. It was hard enough dragging you out last time, and now you've walked right into another death trap."

Bai Liu glares at her. "It's not because of you. It's because of the mission."

Liu Jiayi frowns. "What's wrong with it? The mortality rate in third-tier games is high because of the limited number of winners. I warned you before we came in..." She trails off, her brows furrowing in thought. "Third-tier games usually have an 80-90% mortality rate. There are six players in this game, so only one can win. That's normal. But there's always a loophole to exploit."

She taps her fingers against the brass still. "The problem is that this game locks the winning condition to becoming the factory manager. And since there's only one perfume factory here, it means there's only one available win condition. It's a tricky setup, but it makes sense for a third-tier game..."

Bai Liu remains silent, his eyes wandering, his entire posture radiating reluctance. "...Another part-time job," he finally mutters. "Even in death games, I have to work like a corporate drone. I don't like being exploited."

Liu Jiayi: "..."

This is why you became a slacker, isn't it?!

Expressionlessly, Liu Jiayi climbs onto the decorative brass still and smacks Bai Liu on the back of the head.

"Enough whining! Focus!" she snaps. "Your chaser—what's-his-name, Captain Tang—definitely followed you into the game. He's a strong fighter, and if you don't figure out how to clear this level fast, he'll tear you apart before you get the chance!"

Bai Liu doesn't move.

Liu Jiayi: "..."

She grabs him by the head and yanks him out of his slump, growling, "Don't play dead to avoid working! You brought me into this game, so you're responsible for getting me out! Be a grown man, Bai Liu!"

Bai Liu slowly peeks out from under his hood and looks at her, utterly lifeless. "...Do we get paid for this job?"

Liu Jiayi: "Of course not, what the hell are you thinking?"

Bai Liu: "Oh."

Without hesitation, he buries his head back into the wall.

Muffled: "Then I'm out. I just got tricked into a very bad ten-year deal, and now you're telling me I have to work for free? I need to recoup my losses. I refuse."

He looks exactly like an elderly miser who just found out his entire inheritance was left to an ungrateful child before he even had the chance to die. Clearly, he still hasn't gotten over Lu Yizhan's ten-year hot pot contract.

Liu Jiayi plants her foot on Bai Liu's shoulder and drags him out of his hiding spot, scolding, "Men can't just say they won't work! Get up and work!"

But when nothing brings Bai Liu back to life, she finally resorts to her ultimate weapon.

"...Fine. I'll pay you. A hundred dollars an hour. Deal?"

Bai Liu, still buried in the wall, whips his head around instantly.

Eyes shining, he holds out his hand. "Deal. Pay first. Then I work."

Liu Jiayi: "..."

Damn it. He was waiting for her to make this offer all along.

Is this man so stingy that he's shaking down an eight-year-old?!

Liu Jiayi curses internally, but outwardly, she maintains a calm facade, hands over the money, and watches as Bai Liu immediately dusts himself off, straightens his clothes, and transforms back into a fully functional worker.

"Alright," he announces. "Let's check out the factory's operations first."

"Wait!" Liu Jiayi grabs Bai Liu by the sleeve, exasperated. "Are you even listening?!" She lowers her voice. "Captain Tang is in the game. If you waltz into the factory to get the quest from the NPCs, you might run into him—and if you do, he'll kill you on sight!"

Bai Liu simply takes her hand, his expression unreadable.

"He wouldn't have killed me the moment I entered this game."

Liu Jiayi blinks. "Why not?"

Bai Liu's gaze darkens. "...Because this game—The Rose Factory—was built for Tang Erda and me."

His voice is light but carries an eerie certainty.

"Somewhere in this game lies the secret to curing Dried Leaf Rose Gas—just like the Idol Monster Book from The Love Orphanage held the key to curing Blood Lingzhi Poisoning."

"And Tang Erda... he thinks I have the answer."

Bai Liu's lips curl into a smirk. "As long as this game holds the antidote he desperately needs, he won't dare to kill me. Not until we clear it. Not until he gets what he came for."

A slow, amused chuckle escapes him.

"After all..." Bai Liu murmurs, leading Liu Jiayi by the hand through the rose fields, past the brass stills, and toward the open iron doors of the factory.

"My life... should never be worth more than that lieutenant of his, Su."

Above them, a wooden plaque swings slightly in the night breeze, its faded letters barely visible beneath layers of time:

[Welcome to the Rose Factory.]

Bai Liu took Liu Jiayi's hand and led her inside. They entered a vast, open-air work yard, where freshly picked roses lay scattered across the ground. Someone was crouched on the earth, separating the stems and petals from the piles of roses, carefully sorting them into categories.

On either side of the yard stood large, operational copper furnaces, billowing a constant stream of hot, white steam. Workers stirred the mixed rose petals inside these furnaces with steel shovels, creating an image of bustling productivity. However, something felt off about the workers' appearance, and the timing was strange, for it was clearly late at night.

The workers, clad in black protective suits with elastic bandages tightening around their wrists and collars, white numbing gloves, black rubber boots, and sandy bucket hats, resembled virus-processing researchers or beekeepers in a hazardous laboratory more than people handling roses.

The workers stopped as soon as Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi entered.

One of the staff handed them identical sets of protective clothing, as if they had been custom-made for them. Their voices were dry and hoarse as they looked directly at the two uninvited guests, a mix of hatred and caution in their gaze. "You must wear this protective clothing when entering," they said sternly, "and don't let your scent contaminate the roses. Do you understand? Your smell cannot taint the roses' fragrance."

Up close, Bai Liu could see that beneath the black veil, the worker who had handed him the gear — or rather, the person who could no longer be called human — had a deep, jagged crack running through his face. From the crack, a black, decaying sliver of flesh curved outward, resembling a rose blooming along the grain beneath his eyes.

In the worker's eyes, Bai Liu saw the image of a fading, deep red rose with blackened edges — much like the one on his face.

Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi exchanged a glance before silently accepting the full protective clothing handed to them by the workers. They put it on and followed the workers deeper into the factory.

As they walked, the worker turned to introduce Bai Liu to the three different workshops within the factory. However, Bai Liu's attention was clearly drawn elsewhere.

The worker's face, concealed beneath the protective suit, rustled as he moved, producing the sound of leaves falling. The faint smell of rotting flesh, blood, and dampness lingered in the air, but the worker seemed unconcerned, continuing to explain the factory's layout and rules.

"There are three workshops within the perfume factory," he said. "The first is the concoction and distillation workshop for the petals you just saw, then there's the purified essential oil workshop we're in now, and finally, the core perfumery workshop, which you're not yet qualified to enter. Only perfumers can work there…"

"We recruit four types of workers here," the worker continued. "Flower pickers, the lowest level of workers, pick roses in season. Newcomers start here, and those who excel move to the petal processing workshop. Processors who perform well are promoted to the purification workshop and become full factory workers, only at which point you can start learning perfumery..."

"The worker with the best learning ability and talent for perfumery becomes a perfumer — that's a great honor," the worker added, almost wistfully. "But it's too early for you to be thinking about that..."

While listening to the worker drone on about the factory, Bai Liu observed his surroundings before asking, "So, what does it take to become the director of this factory?"

The worker stopped mid-sentence at the mention of the factory director.

Turning sharply, the worker's face, stripped of blood and flesh, revealed sharp cheekbones beneath the black veil. In a low, eerie voice, he responded, "The factory director isn't something you can be promoted to. The director holds the core technology of the factory's perfume and the methods of cultivating dried leaf roses. These cannot be passed on. If you want to become the director, wait until you have those."

Bai Liu, unfazed, asked another question, "How many directors have there been?"

"Eight," the worker replied.

Bai Liu nodded thoughtfully. "And how did they change hands?"

The worker's face stiffened, realizing the direction of Bai Liu's question. He paused unnervingly before answering, "When the last factory director disappeared, the next one, who possessed the perfume recipe and rose cultivation methods, automatically took over."

Bai Liu stayed silent, piecing together the implications. This seemed to be a system of rotation born out of rebellion. The last director's disappearance couldn't have been simple, and the new director was far from innocent. The perfume recipe and rose cultivation methods were akin to an heirloom seal—whoever held them could take control.

As they continued deeper into the factory, the space gradually expanded. Aluminium cooling tubes were embedded in the walls, water flowing swiftly inside them. A line of distillation and drying apparatus lay on the concrete floor. The casings of these machines were stained a pale pink, almost resembling rose petals, glistening in the dim light. Metal shouldn't be this corrosive, yet here it was, tarnished by the roses.

Despite being in protective suits, the strong scent of roses filled the air. Through the glass pipes of various installations, droplets of rose-colored oil slowly flowed, dripping into beakers the size of a fist.

"We are the only factory in the world that can produce [Dry Leaf Rose Gas] perfume," the worker boasted, his tone oddly proud. "Our perfume is shipped globally. Everyone's crazy about it—they can't live without it. But it wasn't easy to get here."

He gestured to the left. "On the wall, you can see the history of our factory, as documented in local newspapers."

Bai Liu's gaze shifted to the left, where a wall was covered with old newspapers. The glass window displayed several trophies and golden awards, such as [Best Perfume of 202X] and [Top 10 Companies of the Year].

"Ten years ago, when dry leaf rose gas was still banned, our factory nearly shut down," the worker continued. "But then a huge explosion nearly destroyed the factory and sent the scent of dry leaf gas into a nearby city. Overnight, millions of people became addicted to the perfume. A good perfume can be that powerful. It brought the factory back from the brink and made it the top player in the industry!"

"The perfume is now in high demand worldwide, more valuable than gold!" the worker concluded, as if proud of the factory's success.

Bai Liu's eyes scanned the wall of newspapers, and his attention was suddenly drawn to a familiar face. He stopped abruptly in front of one of the yellowed clippings.

The headline caught his eye:

"[139 workers were injured and 17 police officers who came to investigate fell unconscious after smelling gas at a perfume-processing chemical plant on the outskirts of Mirror City due to a leak caused by inadequate protective measures]."

Bai Liu's eyes fell on the black-and-white photo beneath the headline, where two familiar faces were pictured—both in uniform, lying on stretchers, delirious and seemingly on the verge of being carried to an ambulance. The photo appeared to have been taken right after the perfume factory's gas leak.

Liu Jiayi also recognized one of the men. Her eyes widened as she stepped forward, standing on tiptoe to get a closer look at the unconscious policeman. After staring at the photo for a long time, she accessed the system panel.

[System Alert: Does player Liu Jiayi wish to spend six hundred points to enable the small TV mute space? The words spoken by you and players within one meter of you will be muted before being broadcast to the small TV the audience is watching.]

[System Alert: Transaction completed; players can now speak freely!]

Liu Jiayi turned to Bai Liu, her voice tight. "Isn't that Lu Yizhan, the policeman from...?"

Bai Liu shrugged nonchalantly. "The other one's name is Su Yang."

He glanced at the date on the newspaper. It was the day after they entered the game.

It was now clear: this Rose Factory game mirrored a world that had not yet entered reality. The game's entry was triggered by the explosion.

The game began more than a decade after the explosion, marking the present time.

The explosion that triggered the game's arrival in reality—the one that made dried rose leaf gas popular worldwide—happened the day after Bai Liu entered the game.

Bai Liu examined the time reported for the explosion: around 4:15 AM. It was nearly the same time he entered the game, no more than ten minutes off.

This meant that either Tang Erda or Bai Liu would have to survive the game, and once they did, they would witness the aftermath: Lu Yizhan or Su Yang, affected by the explosion and contaminated with dried rose leaf gas, slowly withering away.

Even if the game offered props to save the contaminated population, they were likely limited, like the [Blood Lingzhi] Bai Liu received last time, which saved six children.

As Bai Liu understood, the game had been arranged so that after clearing the Rose Factory, they would be forced out, and it would be difficult to re-enter and collect the props again.

Thus, if they obtained the prop to save the contaminated people, it might only help the existing thousand or so victims. But if the contamination spread further, there might not be enough props to save everyone.

From what Bai Liu knew of Lu Yizhan and Su Yang, both were deeply committed to justice. They would never use a life-saving prop for themselves if the general public hadn't been fully rescued.

This was precisely what the man behind the curtain wanted to see—Bai Liu and Tang Erda, helpless as their closest friends withered away, forced to watch the tragedy unfold. Perhaps they would even fight or sacrifice themselves, only to be seen as villains by those they tried to save.

What a perfect arrangement.

Bai Liu remembered hearing that Su Yang had visited the perfume-making factory the day after the explosion.

And tonight, Lu Yizhan, the fool, would have willingly joined the Third Squad to investigate Bai Liu's involvement with the dried rose leaf gas—perfect for the one behind the curtain, who orchestrated this entire game.

The stakes had been tipped in reality, the players trapped within the game, while the unseen spectators observed from the shadows, watching the drama they had meticulously planned.

The show was about to begin. Bai Liu could almost hear someone whispering in his ear, frantic and delighted.

Liu Jiayi also noticed that something was wrong. She looked up at Bai Liu, who was holding his hand, frowned, and asked in a low voice, "I have the small TV space muted, so even the audience can't hear what we're saying. What's going on? This feels off, like too many coincidences... it seems like..."

"Someone set up this game for me and Tang Erda to enter, didn't they?" Bai Liu spoke indifferently.

Bai Liu's gaze remained fixed on the wall of newspapers in the glass window. "Don't you think the last game was also designed to bring you and me together? A game that had already been played once shouldn't have occurred again. But by coincidence, your orphanage was cut off from all investment and was at its breaking point. The orphanage director had to leverage the last of you—the only children left—and brought the matter to me."

"By coincidence, Liu Huai owed me a debt when I met him in 'Last Train to Burst,' and then he chased me into Caring Home because of the circumstances. The game was designed to separate you from him and place me on his side."

Bai Liu stared motionlessly at Lu Yizhan's pained, black-and-white face in the newspaper, his tone unwavering.

"Even in the second round, Mu Sicheng happened to meet Liu Huai. Liu Huai was a link between you and me, and he was also placed in the game as your psychological weakness, which I would naturally exploit. The conflict between us intensified, and you would choose to kill me, forcing me to kill you in return."

"I generally don't believe there are so many deliberate coincidences in the world." Bai Liu lowered his eyes, withdrawing his gaze from the wall of newspapers.

Liu Jiayi murmured, "... It's almost as if someone deliberately created all these coincidences, exposing our weaknesses for you to exploit, and then made us kill each other..."

"But I didn't kill you, and you didn't kill me, so this game, orchestrated by the people behind us, reached a stalemate." Bai Liu spoke in a light tone. "So now, to further stoke my rivalry with you, they've targeted my weaknesses in this game."

"Your friend Lu Yizhan is involved as well," Liu Jiayi quickly responded. "You'll definitely speed up the pass for this, but only one player can be the factory manager to clear this game. So, you'll be in more competition with Captain Tang."

"True." Bai Liu's attitude remained calm. "But the chips the other side has dealt are likely to drive Tang Erda completely mad. The seventeen members of the team involved in the explosion just now—each from the third detachment—were in trouble when Su Yang led the team to inspect that factory."

"Tang Erda has a hard time maintaining his sanity in situations like this."

Bai Liu fell silent for a second, not speaking to Liu Jiayi, but in a more complicated situation—one in an alternate timeline—Tang Erda witnesses the rose-colored explosion that ultimately pulls the world down.

This leads Tang Erda to kill Bai Liu, the potential culprit of the explosion, in order to prevent the tragic ending from repeating.

Everything fits together as if a trap were created to ensnare both Bai Liu and Tang Erda. The only way out of this trap is to kill each other. Just as Tang Erda's only escape is to kill Bai Liu.

The man behind all of this has used Su Yang's death to push Tang Erda into a state of uncontrollable madness, transforming him into a boundaryless monster hunter. Now, this man is doing it again—using Lu Yizhan's death to induce Bai Liu to abandon the principles and boundaries that Lu Yizhan had built for him. Again and again, he is pushing Bai Liu to kill the innocent with his own hands, to become the mad and sober monster that Tang Erda is.

This man is forcing Bai Liu to become the "Bai Six."

The workers continued walking down an extremely deep and oppressive corridor. An office appeared before Bai Liu. Inside was a classically furnished room. Behind a walnut desk sat a steward, sipping rose tea and wearing glasses.

The stewards were not in protective clothing but wore well-tailored suits, clearly belonging to a higher class than the workers who had brought Bai Liu and the others here.

The steward looked up, surveying Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi, a slow-blooming rose in the center of his eyes.

The rose in the steward's eyes was fresh and delicate, clearly more alive than the dying rose in the workers' eyes. Along with it came the subtle scent of roses, which Bai Liu could smell even through his protective clothing. This steward was like a fresh, lightly scented rosebud.

"You are the new workers?" The steward put down his cup of tea and looked at Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi with a slight air of superiority. "You've come to the most famous rose factory in the world, where we prepare the world's finest perfume. I hope you take your work seriously."

With that, the steward took two contracts from a drawer under the desk, raised his chin, and pushed them across to Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi.

"This is our employment contract. Sign it, get your work badges, and you can start."

Bai Liu picked up the contract, flipped through it quickly, then set it down and looked at the steward with a meaningful glance. "No working hours? Three free meals a day and a place to stay? A salary based on the perfume Rose Dried Leaf Gas? No actual money?"

"Do you have a problem with that?" The steward sneered at Bai Liu. "Only the top companies in the world now pay employees with dried rose leaf gas as a salary. Ordinary people who can't afford it are dying to get into our factory just for the perfume."

"Go outside, and you can trade the perfume for anything—food, houses, jewelry, gold, even beautiful men and women, or the flesh of any rare animal. The whole world is going mad for dried rose leaf gas."

The steward sipped his tea slowly, the roses in his eyes growing even more brilliant, his smile tinged with a wry smugness. "Without perfume, people wither. Money is just a pile of scrap paper that ceased to be currency long ago."

"Rose is the one."

Bai Liu fell silent for a moment, then quickly bent down to sign the contract. Liu Jiayi did the same without a word. The worker who had led them here hesitated before leaving, looking eagerly at the bottom of the cup of rose tea the steward had drained.

The steward habitually poured himself another cup of tea, a drop falling to the floor. The worker who had led Liu and Bai to the steward instantly dropped to his knees, bowing like a dog, greedily and feverishly sticking his chapped tongue out from under his protective clothing to lick the soon-to-evaporate drop of tea.

As he licked the tea, the worker's black, cracked tongue—like a dry field nourished by rain—transformed from a cracked, petal-like shape into a normal, light pink tongue.

The steward kicked the worker away in disgust. "Be careful not to let the stench of your body contaminate the scent of roses in my office."

The worker crouched down, nodding gratefully and joyfully, "Thank you, Steward, for this drop of tea! It's the best rose tea I've ever tasted! It's made from the dried rose flowers after the dried leaf gas has been extracted!"

The worker pressed himself to the floor, his tongue licking the ground, taking a deep breath. "It tastes so... wonderful!"

Realizing he wouldn't be getting any extra reward for staying, the worker stood up and looked at the teacup, bowing deeply. "Steward, I'll take the two new flower-pickers to work now."

With a scowl, the worker waved at Bai Liu with great impatience. "Follow me!"

Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi followed the worker, heads down, walking briskly all the way outside the factory.

The flower fields were mysterious and delicate at night. Blue luminescent insects dotted the budding flowers. The breeze swept between the petals, making the roses undulate and crash like waves in the night, accompanied by a subtle scraping sound. The crimson wet earth reflected a blood-tinged hue in the moonlight.

The worker looked at them. "This is where you'll be working—the fields we use to cultivate dried leaf roses. There are 16,000 acres in total. Each worker is responsible for one of the fields. The roses in this field are yours to pick."

"Late at night is when the dried leaf roses bloom fully. These roses are sensitive to daylight, so you need to pick as many as possible before the first light of sunrise and gather their petals. Only the dried wild roses at night can produce the purest fragrance. The dried leaf roses lose their scent after dawn."

The worker led Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi to the edge of the flower field, pointing to several small, simple tents along the flower field's aisle. "See those tents? The factory doesn’t provide dormitories for you lowly flower-pickers, so you’ll live in these tents in the flower fields."

The narrow ridge between the fields was lined with dirty cloth tents, varying in size, each allowing up to three people to stay. The tents were made of grey-blue canvas—sturdy, resistant, but stained with splashes of blood and handprints.

It was unclear whether it was real blood or if the workers had just wiped mud off their bodies and onto the tents.

The Rose Factory

"After we gather, we'll meet you at the tent before dawn to get the roses."

"Remember, don't let the picked petals be stolen by the stragglers around the fields who covet the dried leaf roses." The worker warned them sternly, "If they do, not only will you not get a drop of perfume, but you'll be fired from the factory, and you'll end up like those stragglers! Do you understand?"

With that, the worker handed Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi two linen pockets for the flowers, a pair of heavy cotton gloves for picking, to prevent the smell of roses from contaminating their hands, a pair of long tweezers to pick up the fallen buds, and a specific wage form.

The worker handed Bai Liu his pay slip and said smugly, "You won't be working for long before you're fired and turned into stragglers. Our factory has a high turnover rate, and those like me who get promoted to processors are one in a hundred flower pickers who can pick six kilos of roses an hour."

"You probably won't even get a sixth of what I have, and this will probably be your last night at the factory. So enjoy the scent of the original dried leaves and roses; you're not missing out. Our Flower Field tent is the most expensive hotel room in the world, and many people are waiting for their gold. Many have to wait for a reservation to stay the night."

"It's just your luck..." the worker muttered indignantly as he quickly walked away. "Last year, the dried leaf roses weren't producing well; too many withered, and this year it's hard to recruit people who don't have a tendency for severe blight and won't steal roses from the fields. It's hard to find ordinary people who don't have a tendency to steal roses from the fields, and with the May Rose Festival coming up again, it's the flowering season when there's a shortage of people before it's your turn to recruit new people like you..."

"...Think my batch, but only recruit 985211 graduate degree or above, published more than three dried leaf rose research papers with a sci impact factor of 1.0 or more..."

Bai Liu, who graduated from a low-ranking university after spending all his time playing games as a student, muttered: "..."

Liu Jiayi, a second-grade student with disabilities (enrolled), looked up at Bai Liu silently: "Can you pick roses?"

-- From what the worker said, it was clear that picking the dried leaf rose was a skilled job.

"No, I haven't picked any roses," Bai Liu replied dryly. But he quickly tied the sack next to his belt, smoothed his white shirt sleeves, tied up his trouser legs, and put on the thick cotton gloves, instantly transforming from a city white-collar worker to a country boy, looking ready to work at any moment.

He looked at Liu Jiayi with a questioning expression, [why do you look so skilled?] Bai Liu took the tweezers and explained naturally, "I used to cut pigweed when I was a kid, and although it's a different crop from roses, I think the harvesting technique is similar."

Liu Jiayi: "..."

"Don't treat roses like pigweed!!!"

Bai Liu knelt on one knee and helped Liu Jiayi pull up her sleeves and tighten her trouser legs, then tucked her gloves underneath and gave her a barely fitting pair. As he did so, he calmly explained to Liu Jiayi, "Don't worry about anything happening for now."

Liu Jiayi had actually figured it out but hadn't yet understood why.

"If the man behind the curtain wanted you to fight Tang Erda, he would've unleashed Tang Erda, a powerful beast that could kill you, to end you quickly." Liu Jiayi placed her hands on Bai Liu's shoulders and lifted her feet for him to fix her shoes and socks. Despite her young face, her expression was deep, beyond her years. "But he deliberately separated you from Tang Erda as a form of protection. Why?"

"Because he didn't design this game stage so that I could be killed." Bai Liu stood up, clapping his hands as he lowered his eyes. "Rather, he gave me the ability to catch weaknesses and kill my opponent."

Liu Jiayi was stunned. "It's like the last game, where you first got Liu Huai's soul and then came after me, right? It's quite possible that Tang Erda has been sent to other flower fields this round, and it will take until—"

"—until he thinks I'm capable of killing Tang Erda before we face off,"

Bai Liu added lightly to Liu Jiayi's words, a faint smile on his face that seemed to amuse him. "After all, a feeding scene where a simple beast kills a human is nowhere near as entertaining as a colosseum where two fully grown, raging beasts fight each other."

"Of course, there's another reason he did it, but I think you've already guessed it." Bai Liu looked over at Liu Jiayi.

Liu Jiayi's face went cold as she slowly spoke, a chill running up her spine. "Because the audience also likes to see such developments the most. He can profit from the system if it's related to it. Such a small TV direction is the easiest to get charge points and likes, and our various gains from the audience are taken by the system in part..."

"Even if we die, all our earnings, including our souls, will be taken by the system..."

"They are just random animals... that the people behind the scenes have put out there for people to play with and watch for their amusement..."

"So don't worry about our life and death for now. The people behind the curtain won't let me die easily." Bai Liu pulled the payroll form out of his pocket, sighing as he showed it to Liu Jiayi. "I can't believe it's really a part-time job..."

The pay scale clearly listed the weight of the roses picked and the corresponding wages.

Reference data: one dried leaf rose (not dried) weighs approximately 2g.

Forty kilograms of dried leaf roses (with branches intact) can be exchanged for a bottle of low-grade dried leaf rose gas perfume of 30% to 40% concentration, 35ml.

(Note: A bottle of low-grade perfume with a concentration of 30 to 40 percent will last on the body for 4 hours.)

[System Alert: Player unlocks side quests]

[Side Quest: Player collects 40kg of roses tonight]

[A successful mission will result in the player redeeming the first bottle of Rose Dried Leaf Gas, a low-level perfume that can be used to alleviate contamination, taking the first step towards promotion as a processor! Failure of the mission results in being laid off and exiled to the periphery, becoming an exile.]

Bai Liu did some mental math to calculate 2g per rose, so 40kg of roses would be...

"...20,000 roses..." Liu Jiayi looked up from her payslip at Bai Liu in disbelief. "You want us to pick 20,000 dried leaf roses before they give us a bottle of low-grade perfume that lasts for 4 hours? Are they treating us like animals?"

Bai Liu gave Liu Jiayi a normal glance. "Congratulations, kid, you've learned the true meaning of working early."

"That's what I said to my boss when I was paid every month," Bai Liu paused. "Then I got fired from my supervisor. But I wasn't really interested in doing something that was extremely cost-effective, and after I just learned the benefits of not working part-time as a freelancer (meaning earning money in horror games), I didn't think I'd have to start working part-time in horror games too, for less money than I had before..."

Bai Liu is beginning to lose his way, visibly.

Liu Jiayi: "..."

OK, seems like he's gotten to his breaking point...

However, Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi were able to carry the sacks down to the flower fields with their hands and feet.

The flower fields were densely fenced with lush roses, and the rows of rose bushes created a narrow aisle about a man's width, in which Bai Liu moved slowly, using tweezers to pick roses from either side.

Bai Liu tried to move quickly, but the bottom of the rose field was wet, soft, and sticky, like stepping into a swamp. It was difficult to move in the smooth plastic-like boots.

The weird thing was that almost every rose here, in full bloom, was exactly the same size, color, and number of petals, as if someone had pinched a rose and then copied and pasted all the roses in the entire field.

Bai Liu held the rose by the roots with a pair of tweezers and lifted it upwards. He looked at the freshly picked dried leaf rose from a distance — a very unique species of rose that Bai Liu had not seen in reality, at least.

The petals were a dark red, almost blackish-purple from the roots, fading to a manly rose towards the edges and a lighter pink on the outermost side. Unlike the dull green oval leaves of the common rose, the heart-shaped leaves and thorns on the stem of the dried-leaf rose turned yellow at maturity and faded as soon as they were picked — this was where the rose got its name.

At the moment of ripening, all the stems and leaves that had nourished the dried leaf rose dried up, leaving only the full, fragrant buds behind — just like humans who are addicted to its concentrated fragrance but aren't fed constantly.

It is a very aggressive rose, both in its growth and in the perfume it prepares.

Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi walked deep and shallow through the flower fields. After almost an hour, they both stopped in unison and made their way to the edge of the field.

Liu Jiayi wiped the sweat from her forehead, exhaled, and handed Bai Liu the sack full of roses she had just picked at her waist. Then, she sat limply on the ground, gulping down a stamina supplement.

It was almost April/May in the game, and the nights weren’t very cool anymore. Staying in a place like the flower field, where the plants were overgrown with humidity, created a stifling heat that climbed up your neck and down your spine, especially when they were also moving deep and shallow in a swampy flower field picking flowers. It was definitely physical work.

Not to mention children like Liu Jiayi and adults like Bai Liu, whose shirts were soaked with sweat. Half-crouching, they caught their breath and wiped the sweat dripping down their right cheeks. Then they looked down and did a simple count of the flowers in the sacks of the two men he had opened.

"Less than 1,300," Bai Liu said, lifting the sack and shaking it. "At 2g per flower, the two of us working together for an hour with no rest at all would have picked less than three kilos."

Liu Jiayi, who was resting with her hands propped behind her, sat up as soon as she heard Bai Liu's estimate. "Does that mean we'd have to work for fifteen hours without sleep just to get a bottle of low-grade perfume?"

She had played many Tier 3 games, but this was the first time someone had actually asked her to do hard work. Liu Jiayi had been a rare healer, praised by the whole group, and mostly handled intellectual tasks or high-level combat skills. In other words, she was a support character.

"I didn't expect to be thrown into such a hardcore netherworld worker situation the first time I played with Bai Liu."

Liu Jiayi slumped back, staring blankly at the night sky. "When will this ever end? I'm going to have to work until I become the factory manager! How long is this going to last?"

"When I was working, I asked myself the same thing every day," Bai Liu said quietly. "But then I realized that there's only one end to working: death, or worse, being laid off."

Liu Jiayi: "..."

Bai Liu, how much of a shadow has life as a corporate worker and being laid off really left on you...

Liu Jiayi sat up silently, sighing ruefully. "How are we going to get out of this now? We can't get the perfume. It's supposed to be a key item, and if we don't get it, we're going to hit a roadblock."

"I don't think we need to continue," Bai Liu removed his black veil mask and slowly, a delicate rosebud began to stretch its green branches in his right eye. "We've already been contaminated during the rose picking."

Liu Jiayi was stunned. She quickly removed her linen gloves and looked at her hands. Her eyes were too grey to determine if roses were blooming in them, so she couldn't use this to tell if she was contaminated.

But there was another way to confirm.

After removing her gloves, Liu Jiayi held her breath at what she saw.

The backs of her hands and fingertips were clearly marked, as if black shards from broken rocks were spreading across her wrists, joining into the shape of petals within her palms.

"I thought it wouldn't happen until we used the perfume for the first time," Liu Jiayi pursed her lips. "We wore masks the entire time we were picking and never made direct contact with the roses. We didn't smell the strong aroma, except when we were in the factory. None of us were contaminated when we left the factory, so we must have gotten contaminated in the flower fields, but the fragrance there wasn't as strong as inside the factory."

Liu Jiayi put her gloves back on, covering the cracks that were still growing on her flesh, and looked up at Bai Liu. "But why? Shouldn't the contamination spread through smell?"

"From what we've both seen, it seems it may not be spread by smell," Bai Liu replied.

The rosebud in his right eye grew silently, black lines running along his eye socket while his left eye remained unaffected.

Liu Jiayi frowned, staring at Bai Liu's eyes. "It's strange. Your left eye is fine, but your right eye is full of roses. Does that mean you're half-contaminated along the vector line? But both of my hands are already wilting."

Bai Liu lowered his gaze slightly, half-obscuring the rosebud in his right eye. He said softly, "I don't know. Let's wait and see."

— [Do not feast your right eye on desire.]

That's what Tawil had told him, also warning him to watch out for the roses.

Bai Liu's gaze fell on the large, lush roses in the field.

These roses were quietly beautiful, gently swaying in the pure white moonlight, as if to make them easier to pick. They didn't even have the usual thorns on their branches, appearing delicate and elegant, without a hint of aggression.

It seemed that, aside from being an ingredient for extracting that compulsive perfume, this rose was so harmless that it was almost intoxicating. It seemed like the least likely thing to actively harm the player in this scenario.

Indeed, they had just spent a lot of time picking roses, and these didn’t trigger the monster book or attack them.

Bai Liu re-donned his sand-stained black mask and turned to look out at the rose field under the night sky. "At this rate of contamination, we probably won’t last fifteen hours before we start to wilt."

"It’s not just wilting; we’re being alienated." Liu Jiayi opened her panel, where her spirit and life values were dropping, with the spirit value dropping much faster than the life value.

Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi looked at each other in silence, both simultaneously pulling out a bottle of psycho-bleach, preparing it for use.

[System Reminder: In this game, mental bleach is not effective in restoring mental values.]

In the game "Rose Factory," only the Rose Dried Leaf Gas perfume could restore mental value. Without it, the player couldn’t complete the task within the given time. If they couldn’t obtain the perfume, they would begin to suffer from fragrance addiction as their mental value dropped, eventually turning into a monster with no reasoning ability.

Liu Jiayi looked at Bai Liu with a stony face. "The spirit value is stuck."

The rose in Bai Liu's eye trembled and stretched its first petals. The cracks around his eyes deepened, but his tone remained light. "The perfume is indeed a crucial item."

The other end of the flower field.

Tang Erda sat half-crouched on a mound, his mask discarded. Both of his eyes were filled with spreading roses, and his face was beginning to take on the cracked texture of grey earth, petal by petal snaking across his skin.

At first, Tang Erda thought the mask would slow down his contamination, but realizing it did nothing to block the scent of the dried leaf roses, he simply threw it away to increase the speed of his picking.

He propped his hands on his knees, tilted his head back, and downed a bottle of stamina restorer. Wiping his mouth, he looked over at the bulging sack at his feet.

It looked like a lot, but it was only eight kilos of roses, which already filled up the sack.

If he wanted to reload, he'd have to go to the small tent to unload, because the workers only counted the weight of roses picked overnight the following day. The stuffed sacks could only be unloaded at one designated spot.

A worker told Tang Erda the unloading point was the small tent in the middle of the field and warned him to watch out for stragglers who might come at night to steal the roses.

"The roses in the tent aren't always safe," the worker said with a disgusted look. "There are always greedy, lowly people who'll go mad stealing them."

But Tang Erda, an experienced player of Level 3 games, had a strategy for dealing with this: a considerable stock of props.

As a player who had traveled through many timelines, Tang Erda's prop inventory was unmatched by most. The only exception was the Killer Sequence, which also boasted an obsessive amount of props.

With this stockpile, Tang Erda could defeat most lower-tier guilds in the game. Many high-level guilds were willing to pay him to join their teams, not only because he was a great fighter, but also because of his impressive prop inventory.

Tang Erda dumped the roses into the small tent, then bent down and walked out, dropping a Rubik's Cube behind him. A watery barrier rose from the ground, forming a tetrahedron at the top of the tent.

[System Alert: Player Tang Erda used a prop (Magic Space). The space is now under the player's control, and only those allowed by the player can enter or exit freely.]

After setting up the prop, Tang Erda left without looking back. Although the prop hadn't trapped Bai Liu in reality, Tang Erda was sure that no ordinary monsters in Level 3 games would be able to figure out how to enter or escape.

It's not that Tang Erda hadn't tried to find Bai Liu since entering the game, but with a map covering 16,000 acres of lush flower fields and countless small tents scattered around, it wasn't easy to find a player skilled at hiding and using game mechanics to escape—especially someone like Bai Liu, who was always good at using his opponents' weaknesses against them.

After all, he hadn't even met up with the other three players from the King's Guild yet. The map was so large, and with its design, it was easy to get lost.

Especially if your mental value was dropping fast and there was no way to recover, wandering through this map felt like walking through a dizzying red kaleidoscope while drunk on ninety-six-degree vodka—nauseous, disoriented, and unable to find any sense of direction.

Tang Erda had encountered similar games before, and wandering in them was dangerous. Once you strayed into monster territory, it was very difficult to find your way back, and there was a good chance the player would go mad from endlessly getting lost before they ever returned.

Clearly, this was a game that focused on mental value attacks.

Tang Erda knew he couldn't match Bai Liu when it came to finding people, so he decided to focus on completing the task and then wait until Bai Liu also finished and entered the factory.

It was always easier to find someone in the factory than in the flower fields.

Tang Erda had no doubt that Bai Liu would complete the game beautifully. He probably had more confidence in Bai Liu's success than Bai Liu himself, especially in a game like "The Rose Factory," which was tied to the real-world Rose Gas.

Tang Erda looked at his palm, cracked to the bone with no trace of blood, as his sea-blue eyes swelled with pale rose petals. The petals spread for a second time, the end of the first petal turning deep red.

[System Alert: Player Tang Erda, your spirit level has dropped to 89...]

The Rose Factory

Tang Erda took a deep breath, stood up with his sack, and started picking roses again—quickly and neatly. Though he still looked a little unskilled and clumsy, the roses in the sack were growing fast, at least faster than Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi working together. It seemed much faster.

After all, he was a strong man skilled in physical work, and there was a clear difference between a child like Liu Jiayi and a social animal like Bai Liu, who sat in front of a computer all day long, working the grueling 996 schedule.

However, when Tang Erda's sack was half full of dried leaf roses, a sudden rustling from the surrounding flower field caught his attention —like some animal creeping on the soil, its limbs quickly pawing the ground, or perhaps more than that, moving towards him.

The sound of fine, slimy, dense knuckles sinking into the dirt and pulling out made Tang Erda turn his head in alarm. A silver revolver appeared in his hand, seemingly out of thin air, and he instinctively gripped it, raising it.

Tang Erda moved cautiously toward the source of the odd noise, thumbing the chamber slightly to cock the cartridge and aiming the gun at the churning rose bush.

The lush flowers shook and trembled, and something hidden in the earth came closer and closer to Tang Erda, releasing a strong smell reminiscent of long-decomposed dead leaves.

The shuddering continued, growing nearer and nearer, until it came to a halt about half a meter from Tang Erda.

He moved carefully, his body in a half-crouch. His unarmed hand parted to shield the flowering branches from whatever creature was near, while the hand holding the gun stayed steadily aimed at the last tremor.

The creature seemed to realize Tang Erda was aiming his weapon at it. It remained silent for a moment, but eventually, the scent of the flower petals in his sack overcame it, and a hissing humanoid monster burst out of the mud.

Its body was covered in soft scarlet mud, still dripping, and only a vague outline of a humanoid form could be made out. The flesh of its body had spread out in flaps, like a leaf branching out and blackening as it decayed. Its bones resembled plant stems, and the blackened flesh split away from the bones, withered and yellow like dried leaves.

With each step, the creature's dangling "blades" trembled. The mud finally dripped off its face, revealing a rough idea of its true nature—its eyes were sunken and blackened, and the flesh on the right side of its face had almost completely withered away, leaving only bone. Strangely, dense, white, fleshy spines of bone writhed on its cheekbones, as if they were about to grow at any moment.

The monster lifted its eyes, which were on the verge of falling out, revealing a pair of roses, their petals withered and dying. It opened its mouth, which had rotted to the nostrils and the beds of its teeth, and uttered an eerie, hoarse sound with its white teeth: "I want perfume!!! Give me perfume!!!"

The fleshy spines writhing on its bones instantly elongated into long, flesh-colored tentacles, with air holes, which stabbed towards Tang Erda. Areas of its body that had no flesh, only bone, were quickly filled with thick, writhing tentacles.

Tang Erda waited for the monster to strike first. Only after it attacked would he be able to trigger the Monster Book.

[System Alert: Congratulations to player Tang Erda for triggering the Monster Book]

[The Rose Factory Monster Book Refresh - Dried Leaf Addicts (1/3)]

[Monster Name: Dried Leaf Addict (Drifter)]

[Characteristics: The lowly stragglers gradually wither away after being denied access to low concentrations of perfume. Before withering away completely, these stragglers fall into madness from perfume addiction, a madness that makes them believe they can do anything...]

[The daring lowlife addicts have come to the flower fields producing dried leaf roses to steal them, seeking the last pleasure before they wither and die. Unfortunately, they cannot touch the roses in the fields, so they can only steal the ones that have already been picked by flower pickers.]

[Weakness: ????? (to be explored)]

[Attack: Stealing Roses (A+), attacking flower pickers with tentacles to steal the fruits of their labor.]

The creature's tentacles were long, and their sweeping movements forced Tang Erda to retreat several steps. He did not strike immediately.

According to the factory worker who had brought him here, there had to be more than one monster like these stragglers in Hanada. Tang Erda was prepared to bait this monster into attacking a few more times to get a feel for its full range of attacks.

He was agile enough that dodging a level A+ monster wouldn't be difficult, but that thought lasted only a second.

When the creature reached out to attack, Tang Erda saw the tentacle brush just two centimeters in front of his eye—its root-like appearance marked with scars, as if something had fallen off.

It soon became clear what the scars were—marks from joints left on the bones after the flesh and blood "blades" had dried and fallen off. These marks were also present on the tentacles that had grown from the bones.

—This mark matched the one left on the rhizomes of dried-leaf roses after the leaves had withered and fallen from the ripe ones Tang Erda had just picked.

Tang Erda grimaced, realizing what was happening. He immediately pulled out his gun and shot the creature in front of him.

The monster hissed and collapsed, but it was too late. More rose bushes shook.

Tang Erda stepped back onto a soft, fleshy, writhing patch of earth. He looked down to see countless root-like tentacles twisting around his feet, like a pack of mating pythons, spreading from his soles all the way to every corner of the flower field, which was beginning to undulate.

In the vast rose fields, shadowy stragglers emerged from the mud. Their faces and bodies were covered with tentacles, pushing them deeper into the earth. These twisted tentacles connected to the roots and leaves of the roses in the fields, making the flowers grow even more beautiful under the moonlight.

These [stragglers], parasites of the dried leaf roses, lived in the soil of the roses.

They remained hidden in the earth, languishing, their rose-soaked eyeballs peering out at night, salivating, waiting for the full flowers with fading leaves to be picked by flower pickers.

In the end, even their bones became parasitized by these rose roots, and their bodies were covered with scars from the dried leaves that had fallen off.

The flower fields turned from soft crimson mud to a swamp of rotting flesh and blood. The slippery red mud on the surface was a heap of [leaves] fallen from the stragglers and trampled on, but the strong fragrance of the roses overpowered the stench.

The tentacled stragglers, their eyes framed with roses, approached Tang Erda step by step as if pulled by invisible strings. His ankles became entangled in the tentacles that emerged from the ground.

A human face emerged from the earth near Tang Erda’s feet, nearly two-thirds decayed, covered in tentacles. Tentacles emerged from its open mouth, wrapping around Tang Erda's ankles, pulling him into the ground.

It slurred and gurgled with tentacles in its mouth.

"Give me the perfume!!!"

"Give me roses!"

The unearthly sound, like a chorus, echoed from all directions. The moon shone brightly on the crimson ground as Tang Erda gritted his teeth and shot at the tentacles on his ankles. The moment they broke off, a second petal of the rose bloomed in his eyes.

[System Alert: Player Tang Erda's spirit level has dropped to 78. Please use perfume to restore your spirit level as soon as possible to prevent being alienated.]

In the distance, under the pure white moonlight, Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi were lying exhausted on the shore at the other end of the endless flower field.

They lay motionless, staring up at the sky, their chests still heaving from the intense physical exertion, resembling two corpses just carried there.

"I've been resting for five minutes; I should get up and pick flowers," Liu Jiayi said.

"Do you think taking a five-minute break and a ten-minute break will have any impact on our inability to finish the job?" Bai Liu asked calmly, rhetorically.

Liu Jiayi fell silent for a moment. "…Doesn't seem like it."

After all, they had only collected six kilograms so far, and it seemed unlikely they would complete the task of picking 40kg of roses before dawn.

Bai Liu shrugged. "Then we can rest a little longer."

Liu Jiayi: "..."

What is this half-hearted mentality all about?!

"You're in a very depressed state of mind this time, Bai Liu," Liu Jiayi said, sitting up and looking at the motionless Bai Liu. She hugged her chest and glanced down at the salty fish lying next to her. "You're usually operating at your limit to pass the game. I don't believe you don't have ideas in your head to break the game."

Bai Liu looked up at Liu Jiayi with slanted eyes. "I don't believe you don't have any ideas either. So the reason we both aren't acting now is the same."

Liu Jiayi fell into delicate silence for a long time.

Bai Liu turned his head back to the sky and continued, "The first reason is that it's impossible for us to obtain 40kg of roses through regular labor. Without a way to get through this, our labor is unrewarding, uneconomical, and will only speed up our contamination."

"After tallying the results of our first hour of work, we can already conclude this approach won't work. There's no point in continuing this pointless labor."

Liu Jiayi didn’t say anything, but she thought the same. Otherwise, she wouldn’t have gone ashore to count the flowers with Bai Liu as soon as the hour was up.

"And the game has given us a clue," Bai Liu said flatly. "You don't need to work hard to gain a productive promotion. In fact, working hard is the stupidest route to advancement."

"In the real world, the most direct way to rise is usually to plunder the fruits of someone else's labor."

"So, when we can't get paid for our direct labor, we have only one option: to rob other flower-pickers of their petals."

"But the problem is, these flower-pickers seem to be NPCs right now, and offending most of them at the start of a game is not a smart move. It's like in the workplace—blatantly stealing someone’s hard-earned fruits will only make things difficult for you down the line."

Bai Liu sat up, brushing the mud off his body, and glanced sideways at Liu Jiayi. "From this perspective, we need to choose a more reasonable method of plundering."

"Stragglers," Liu Jiayi said, her gaze fixed on Bai Liu as she quickly responded.

Bai Liu stood up, pulling Liu Jiayi to her feet. He patted the dust from her body. "Yes, stragglers are the best opportunity for plunder."

"Stragglers could be monsters or NPCs in this game. According to the processor who brought us here, this group of stragglers steals rose petals. We don’t need to confront the other flower-pickers directly; we just need to grab the roses the stragglers steal."

"But only if—" Bai Liu smiled, the kind of businesslike and almost hypocritical smile that suggested he was about to reveal something more. He patted Liu Jiayi’s shoulder. "Our little witch can perfectly snuff out these stragglers and snatch the roses from them."

Liu Jiayi stared at him, the corners of her mouth twitching. "You planned this from the beginning, didn’t you?"

But then she frowned, concerned. "But this plan is risky, you’re putting yourself in danger."

Liu Jiayi had considered this solution too, but she hadn't been sure about the level of the monsters in this Level 3 game and whether she could defeat them. She certainly hadn't expected Bai Liu, a player whose original rank was F and who barely rose to C, to be able to fight a Level 3 monster.

Maybe it was also because of her personality—Liu Jiayi was too used to taking on everything by herself.

She instinctively envisioned herself as the one protecting Bai Liu—attacking and guarding, poison and antidote. That was the role of a witch, and it was why Liu Jiayi had become one.

But Liu Jiayi hesitated. She wasn't sure if she could protect her companion perfectly. She would be the main attacker, leaving Bai Liu vulnerable in an unprotected vacuum, which was dangerous in a Level 3 game with a 90% mortality rate.

But Bai Liu neutralized her hesitation.

He smiled. "Of course it's dangerous, but you're clearly the bigger threat. This is the most cost-effective path, and we have no reason to hesitate."

He dropped his hand and casually wiped the mud stuck under Liu Jiayi's right eye with his thumb, interrupting her attempt to speak. "You just need to do what you do best. Don't worry about me. I'll be there to match your attack. If we fail, we'll likely die together. But if we succeed, we'll win together. In this game, it's not cost-effective for both of us to survive if only one of us makes it out—because we have a bigger victory to win together."

Bai Liu looked directly at Liu Jiayi with his rose-colored eyes. "Do you understand what I mean? I'll stand with you in the line of attack to cover you. We're in this together."

Liu Jiayi was slightly stunned, then opened his hand to brush away the mud. She looked away, took a deep breath. "Got it. So, what do we do now?"

"Wait," Bai Liu replied, his eyes scanning the distance. "We wait for these rose-stealing stragglers to 'ripen.' Instead of picking roses, we'll pick the stragglers."

Liu Jiayi asked, "When do you think these stragglers will be 'ripe'?"

"By the time they come to attack us, the two flower-pickers with the lowest crop, I think the stragglers will be nearly ripe." Bai Liu glanced at the sacks of rose petals he had carelessly placed on the ground. "Normally, robbery goes from high to low. By the time the stragglers come after us, they'll have already raided all the other flower-pickers with higher harvests. Even if some raids were unsuccessful, I think there's at least 80kg of rose petals here."

"So, until then, we'd better prepare for the stragglers to attack." Liu Jiayi spoke, but she didn't sit down. She stayed a little further from the flower fields.

They had been resting at some distance from the flower fields, but the moment Liu Jiayi stepped back, Bai Liu followed suit, stepping further away from the flowers.

Liu Jiayi's senses were sharper than his. She must have heard something when she stepped back.

Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi were the kind of people who didn't need to say anything explicitly. They acted in sync—like when they went to the shore to count the flowers or stopped working when they found the harvest too small, as they were now, moving away from the fields.

At this hour, the stragglers should have started attacking the flower-pickers. But as far as they could see, the fields were calm and quiet. Apart from the glowing dots and the workers, no strange people or monsters had appeared.

This counterintuitive sight could only mean two things:

The first was that the stragglers hadn't started attacking the flower-pickers yet.

The second was that the stragglers hadn't come from above the flower fields—they had come from below.

So, Liu Jiayi and Bai Liu, staying off the ground, considered the possibility that something might be going on underneath the surface. They observed that the scene above ground was unnaturally calm, which made them suspect something could be happening below.

The flower field in front of them began to undulate slowly, turning into waves of red in the moonlight. The air filled with the sound of what seemed to be an unmoving, pattering vine.

Liu Jiayi alertly placed her hands behind her back, the black poison held in a glass bottle taking shape in her palms.

[System Alert: Does player Liu Jiayi want to use the skill (Poison)?]

[System Alert: Yes... poison is being generated in bulk. Skill cooldown is 1 hour. Player Liu Jiayi's stamina is dropping significantly...]

Liu Jiayi removed eight bottles of poison from behind her, holding each bottle by the neck between her fingers.

Each vial was full, and deep black smoke poured from them, enveloping her. Her orange worker's suit was swept away by the smoke and replaced with a long black robe that covered her completely.

"Bai Liu, my poison skill is on cooldown. It will be an hour before I can use it again." Liu Jiayi approached Bai Liu, facing the flower field back-to-back with him. Her tone was serious. "I also have a potential S-overdraft skill called Poison Fountain."

Liu Jiayi opened her system panel and turned slightly to show Bai Liu the explanation of the skill.

[System Description: Personal Skill (Poison Fountain) - Deals indiscriminate slow damage to all players within range. After using this skill, player Liu Jiayi's stamina tank will be depleted, causing severe stiffness and immobility.]

"The only two skills I can use for the main attack are these," Liu Jiayi said, her face grave as she looked at the wave of roses slowly moving toward them. "Monsters in a Level 3 game are usually above A+. I can handle a small number of monsters at this level, but if it's a group attack this size, my burst speed attack can't sweep them all at once."

"I'll be stuck in a wheel stand and have to rely on blood-back to hold out. But my skills are on cooldown, and spirit bleach is ineffective. It's unrealistic to expect to find these monsters' weaknesses to restrain them now that the city is under siege." Liu Jiayi looked up at Bai Liu. "The chances of winning are too low. Are we still fighting?"

As a backline healer, Liu Jiayi's main criterion for a mission was survival and a chance to live.

But Bai Liu's judgment was different. He was decisive. "Fight. We can try if there's a chance of winning. You just take the main attack; I have an idea."

Liu Jiayi didn't have time to ask what Bai Liu had in mind. In a game like this, the situation could change rapidly. Without any relevant information, one could only develop a countermeasure based on real-time circumstances, combining players' skills and reserves—that's what tactics were all about.

In a situation like this, where the monsters had already started attacking, Liu Jiayi had no choice but to trust Bai Liu's command and tactical expertise.

Although Hearts intended to train Liu Jiayi to be the next generation of tactical masters, the games she had played so far had been with at least five S-ranked reserve players. She had never played a Level 3 game with a C-ranked player like Bai Liu, let alone an A-ranked support player like herself.

Liu Jiayi would never have attempted a head-to-head in such a game. The odds were too low, and it would have been too easy to be defeated, violating her tactical aesthetics.

But now, it wasn't she who was in control—it was Bai Liu.

Bai Liu's tactical aesthetic was summed up in one word—gambling.

No matter how low the odds were, if there was a non-zero chance of winning and a high return, he would take the chance.

Without delay, Bai Liu drew a snow-white bone whip from his back. His eyes, filled with affection, looked out over the field of roses that was beginning to surge.

The Rose Factory

Out of the writhing rose bushes, shadowy and dim, one shifting straggler after another emerges. Their bare bones, hollow eyes, and rotting lips are full of writhing, flesh-colored tentacles, like vine stalks. These tentacles drag them down into the mud to join the roots of the swaying roses, like a swarm of unidentified swamp squid, their hands pulling the tentacles through the mud toward the shore, where Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi stand.

Lush tentacles, like fishing bowls full of worm bait, spill over the edge of the ridge. A thin ponytail-like tentacle bursts out of the earth, twisting and wrapping around Bai Liu's ankle, trying to pull him toward the mud.

Bai Liu's sharp eyes fling out a fishbone, whipping the twisting tentacle with precision.

Liu Jiayi, on her side, uses poisonous fumes to corrupt a tentacle attempting to wrap around her waist.

After being attacked by the monsters, both Liu Jiayi and Bai Liu activate their monster books.

Bai Liu flips through the book, reading up on the straggler's characteristics. He then calmly gives the order, "Liu Jiayi, use the poison mist for a group attack, the largest you can. I'll clean up the ones the attack misses."

"It's a cluster of A+ monsters," Liu Jiayi says grimly, her gaze scanning the surroundings. The poison fumes form a protective circle around her and Bai Liu to keep the tentacles at bay. "They don't come out one by one—they fight together. Seemingly individual, but connected by underground tentacles, they form a symbiotic bunch of roses."

With no way to recover their mental energy, fighting these monsters, which can't be fully killed, becomes an exercise in attrition. It's clear they can't outmatch these cluster-growing monsters, so it's only a matter of time before they lose.

However, Liu Jiayi doesn't question Bai Liu's decision. She simply carries it out.

Taking a deep breath, Liu Jiayi asks, "Okay, what do I need to focus on for the main attack?"

Bai Liu flicks a monster that had climbed ashore back into the field with a whip, then looks sideways at Liu Jiayi. "Stall for time. Your skill cooldown is an hour. We need to last for an hour, and during that time, control your poison usage."

"How much control?" Liu Jiayi asks.

Bai Liu raises his eyes to the overwhelming mass of stragglers and speaks softly, "Control it so you can stall all these stragglers coming in from the scent for an hour or more. Once your skills finish their cooldown, I'll try to contain them in a small space and trigger an explosive skill to maximize your poison attack."

Liu Jiayi is momentarily stunned, but quickly understands Bai Liu's plan. Her face changes several times before settling into a subtle, relieved expression. "Of course."

"For A+ monsters, my poison is indeed harmless," she adds.

As the writhing tentacles toss and turn in the pool of roses, Bai Liu stands at the edge, using the ridge as his last line of defense. He pins the sack of roses to his waist as bait while he uses his whip to fan the climbing stragglers and tentacles back into a fixed area—luring and slapping as much as he can to drive the stragglers into place.

Liu Jiayi keeps Bai Liu protected, and aside from draining his stamina quickly with the whip, Bai Liu is barely caught by the stragglers or the tentacles. However, his constant use of stamina restorers makes cold sweat bead on his forehead. Despite the effort, his exhaustion shows, and the roses in his eyes grow more delicate, while the black cracks on his face deepen.

Both Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi are unable to resist the large line of A+ monsters for an hour. With skills on cooldown, neither of them has the ability to kill the relentless stream of monsters. Bai Liu's whip merely drives the monsters down, doing no real damage.

But Bai Liu's goal isn't to fight the A+ monsters directly. He's simply driving them down and preventing them from climbing back up.

It's a simple game of 'duck rush,' one that Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi can play to its limits, lasting an hour without Bai Liu making a mistake and perfectly sweeping up any missed monsters.

However, this also creates a pile of ghastly stragglers beneath the ridge—not just those Bai Liu had driven down, but others that had followed.

Dense tentacles tumble through the velvety red mud like boiling water or the lint of small intestines digesting food. Human faces, broken and decaying bones, and limbs flow and howl through the rolling red waves of mud. The roses sway unscathed, untouched, as if the stragglers are deliberately protecting the roses that have yet to be picked.

Some distance away from the flower fields, away from the roses' rich scent, the stench of these piled-up stragglers and the tentacles growing from them is overwhelming. Countless tentacles grab the mud along the shore, attempting to reach land.

Against this high density of tentacles, Bai Liu's whip moves in rapid, white streaks.

With a bottle of advanced stamina restorer from the Mu Sicheng panel in his mouth, he swallows it to replenish his strength while continuing to swing his whip at the massive influx of monsters.

This pure, high-precision mechanical movement has been going on for nearly forty minutes.

Sweat slides down Bai Liu's hair, dripping onto his drenched work jacket, which now looks as though he's been pulled from the water.

Liu Jiayi's poison is also running low. She has a higher panel than Bai Liu, but an hour of such high-precision intensity, with skills protecting herself and Bai Liu, has her gritting her teeth.

Despite their hard work, the audience in front of the screen—specifically, the players from the King's Guild—are unimpressed.

Most of those watching, brought here by Hearts to block Bai Liu's small TV, are grassroots and mid-level players, a group who've risen through the ranks by tearing each other apart.

With Hearts already hostile, and the entire venue belonging to the King's Guild, their scorn for Bai Liu's display is evident.

Some of the King's Guild players sneer at Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi's "feeble" and "pointless" resistance.

"Trying to stall in a third-level game? Is he afraid he'll be late for the drop? He only got on the King's list last time because of the heat the witch gave him," one comments.

"This game is supposed to be about hunting monsters for roses. Looking at the monster setting analysis, the other four have already started hunting. Only Bai Liu's group has made no progress," a spectator says, pointing at the small TV next to Bai Liu. "That small TV is some sort of hunter. I haven't seen it, but I heard it's the reinforcements our queen got. Looks quite strong, already started a massive counter-kill."

The small TV next to Bai Liu is Tang Erda's, showing him with blood splattered on the right side of his face. His ethereal blue eyes glow like ghosts amidst a sea of bright red mud and flowers. His right hand grips a silver revolver, its engraved rose now saturated with blood, turning it into a deep red "Rose of Dried Leaves."

Tang Erda is surrounded by writhing tentacles and dead stragglers. Silver gun casings litter the ground around him.

Under the full moon, the dark blue-eyed hunter grips his gun tightly, firing it with brutal precision to kill any monster attempting to steal the roses he guards. His blood-stained figure exudes a sense of madness, like a werewolf in waiting.

After another round of shooting, Tang Erda grimaces, blood dripping down his arms and clothes. He kicks away the tentacles clinging to his feet, quickly biting down on a bandage to treat a wound on his palm. He hadn't treated the other wounds, but this one would make his palm slippery and affect his grip on the gun.

Once the wound is treated, Tang Erda coolly reloads his revolvers.

The bodies of dead stragglers have piled up around him, almost overwhelming him. The roses they stole fall as they die, and the clumps of corpses tumble downward like curling willows.

The viewers on Tang Erda's small TV can only watch in awe, their view obscured by the constant stream of rewards popping up on the system:

[System Alert: Congratulations to player Tang Erda for killing a monster drifter who stole 1.5kg of dried leaf roses, now added to your loot.]

[System Alert: Congratulations to player Tang Erda for killing a monster drifter who stole 11kg of dried leaf roses ...]

As Tang Erda lifts his blood-stained, emotionless eyes toward the small TV and pulls the trigger, the audience in front of the TV steps back instinctively. Though they know it's Tang Erda attacking the in-game monsters, the overwhelming intensity of his presence makes them uneasy.

Tang Erda carries an undeniable visceral force and creepy aggression that makes the audience swallow nervously, whispering among themselves:

"Who is this guy?! From the first shot to the last, nearly every one had a bonus screen pop up. Each shot killed an A+ monster, with a flat attack skill value of 6000. No apparent cooldown. How come I've never heard of this player?!"

"A man can wipe out a swarm of monsters in a Tier 3 game with raw power... that's the strength of a top-tier player... It's horrifying. Is the King's Guild hiding such cards this year?!"

The Rose Factory

"If this man is really a player from the King's Guild League team, his skills and combat ability are impressive. With his performance in this single combat, I predict he's likely to secure a spot in the top five this year."

"Who the hell is he? I've scoured the entire video library and haven't found anything on him. How could he be so ridiculously strong without a name? The player has set his panel to be visible only to himself, and now I'm scratching my head wondering what his panel level really is!"

A man in a tall hat, a neatly tailored suit, and several large sparkling diamond rings on his fingers, yet strangely wearing a layer of white gloves underneath, stood at the end of the crowd. He was looking up at Tang Erda's small TV, which was propped up on a black lacquered wooden cane of civilization.

The man's fingers, holding the oval-shaped tip of his civilizing staff, tapped thoughtfully before he curled his lips into a smile. "There are a lot of dark horses this year," he muttered.

He casually pulled half of a white scarf from his chest, but it kept coming out in a steady stream, one after another, as if by magic. Each section featured different designs and pencil drawings of players' heads, with the last one depicting Spades.

If Wang Shun were here, he would immediately recognize this low-profile, enigmatic spectator — the man he had been looking for, the one he believed could break Bai Liu's siege of the King's Guild: Charles, president of the fifth guild, the Gamblers' Club.

Charles is known as the "Magician at the Table." He has a unique habit of identifying promising players, funding their development, and helping them grow into strong contenders who can shine in the league.

At the same time, Charles places sky-high bets on his chosen "dark horses" during the league, depending on their stunning performances to win him large amounts of points as an investor behind the scenes.

In short, Charles enjoys gambling on his dark horses, recording each year's winning player on his magical prop (like a silk scarf).

For example, this year, Charles is pulling out scarf after scarf from his breast pocket, each featuring pencil drawings of players who could be potential winners in the league.

The Spades drawing on the last scarf represents last year's league champions.

Spades was a newcomer to the league last year. Charles selected Spades as his dark horse, and thanks to Spades' stunning performance, Charles made a fortune on every league bet involving Spades.

However, this year, the odds on Spades are so low that hardly anyone is betting on him to lose; everyone is betting on his victory, meaning the potential payout will be minimal.

For a gambler like Charles, who thrives on high-risk, high-reward bets, a low-odds bet like Spades doesn't excite him. He wants a true dark horse, full of potential and uncertainty, one that can give him a massive return.

So, after the league started, Charles set out to find a new, promising dark horse.

Just like the big guilds, the Gamblers' Club has its own information network, known only to insiders. Charles was one of those who knew how to make the most of it.

He rummaged through his suit pocket for a moment before pulling out a bright rose-red silk scarf, exhaling with a smile, "Found it."

The front of the scarf featured a pencil drawing of Tang Erda. He looked younger and cooler than he does now, though the drawing depicted him in rough shape, wearing a bloodstained Authority uniform, with a bruised face and a vacant, disheveled look. Despite that, his eyes seemed to contain a kind of floating hate and despair.

The painting showed Tang Erda holding a small golden trophy under his right breast, with a laurel branch symbolizing victory painted on either side.

The back of the silk scarf contained strange hieroglyphs that no player from Puchong would understand. Charles squinted at them for a moment, glanced at Tang Erda's little TV, and smiled knowingly.

"No wonder he looks familiar. It's you, the Faded Rose Hunter," Charles muttered, lowering his hat and grinning. "A time traveler, former champion from another world line. Let's see how the fools who witnessed your victory cheered for you, the savior they thought could lead them out of the game..."

Charles slid his fingers down the silk scarf and read the support slogan for Tang Erda: "- The legendary hunter who saves the people by slaying monsters with a hundred shots, the steel fist without ears, the sharpshooter, Tang Erda." (A reference to Uncle Li, a marksman from the Qing Dynasty.)

Charles laughed more deeply as he read the slogan: "[If I win, I'll end this game and protect every innocent person, so you can successfully leave.]"

"How naive," Charles said, absently crumpling the rose-colored scarf with Tang Erda's image and making it disappear. "But how many players in this game are truly innocent?"

"Players whose aims and methods are in conflict often end up mad, even if they win," he mused.

In short, Tang Erda was not the right dark horse for him. Charles preferred more pragmatic players, who understood what they were doing and what they could gain from it.

The magician flicked his hand, and as the scarf fluttered out of his fingers, it transformed into a bouquet of roses that exploded in his palm with a bang.

Charles casually handed the bouquet to a woman in the crowd who had been cheering for Tang Erda. She had been startled by the sudden 'bang' and looked confused as she accepted the bouquet. Charles offered a half-curtsy smile, "Apologies for the interruption. This player's little TV looks better with this bouquet of roses. For you, madam."

Before the woman could react, the strange magician vanished, leaving her staring down at the wilting roses in her arms.

As she pondered the peculiar encounter, her attention was soon caught by something even more exciting. She held her breath, anxiously watching Tang Erda's little TV as calculations were made.

[System Alert: Player  (name blocked because the player chose not to disclose)]

[10,107 new people liked player *'s TV, 0 new people favorited player *'s TV (the player banned viewers from favoriting his TV), 7003 people charged 10,102 points for player ****].

[18,020 new viewers are watching player *'s TV show. Congratulations to the player for receiving 10,000 likes in one minute! 10,000 points! The audience loves you!]

[Congratulations to player * for securing a promotion spot and entering the core promotion zone on the central screen. Viewership is rising rapidly...]

"Promoted! Level 3 game opening tour promotion! Open the door!"

"Holy shit, who is this person? So strong and mysterious! Name and panel are hidden, and no one can even favorite..."

Back to Bai Liu's small TV.

Unlike Tang Erda's promotion, where cheers erupted, Bai Liu's situation was more grim.

Not only was Liu Jiayi struggling, but it looked like she was stalling until her skills were replenished, just surviving without showing any courage to fight back.

There was no audience to speak of, just a group of people hoping for Bai Liu to die early.

"What a waste of the witch's powers. Why is she chasing after him..."

"Didn't he say he's a control player? He must be controlling the witch, but with her abilities, playing like this is such a waste. The guild didn't go to all this trouble for the witch to waste her power! Why isn't he protecting her?! If you're a man, stand in front of her!"

The group of mid-level guild players in the front row were so anxious they could barely contain themselves, wanting to take Bai Liu's place.

Unlike the grassroots players who were sour on Bai Liu, many of the King's Guild's mid-level members had risen through the ranks with Liu Jiayi's healing support.

Liu Jiayi was a strong player with great intuition, and Hearts often didn't care much for the lives of guild players, pushing a large group through brutal game mechanics. This left the advanced players to filter out mid-level ones, and many members feared Hearts' ruthless president more than they revered him.

Liu Jiayi was particularly valuable in this harsh practice. She controlled the group’s progression and ensured everyone’s survival while pushing through the game.

For many mid-level players who weren’t so strong, Liu Jiayi was their lifeline, and they felt deeply grateful toward her.

When the Little Witch's age was unknown, they treated her like a goddess. Once she became well-known, they fought to be her brother or her father.

When they saw the Little Witch running away with Bai Liu, it was like their little sister (or daughter) had been abducted, and they harbored a deep grudge against him. They wanted to kill Bai Liu on the spot and bring the witch back.

Now, though, the Little Witch was diligently protecting Bai Liu, pushing herself to the limit without complaint. Despite their animosity toward Bai Liu, many of them quietly watched the Little Witch’s TV, secretly liking and charging points for her safety.

The Rose Factory

[Added 0 likes for Bai Liu's TV, Added 0 favorites for Bai Liu's TV, No one is charging for player Bai Liu]

[0 new viewers are watching Bai Liu's mini-TV. The difference between this and the last game video is too big. Player Bai Liu will be dropped from the (Multiplayer Zone) to the (Graveyard Bounce Zone). Please play carefully!]

It was only a matter of time before Bai Liu's promotion status dropped. With the King's Guild guarding the small TVs and keeping a tight rein on them, his fall to the [No Name Zone] seemed inevitable.

Hearts stood in front of Bai Liu's small TV, her eyes misting over the pale, sweaty face of Bai Liu, as if she were admiring a painting of death in a gallery—yet with a faint regret, as though lamenting the death of the person in the painting, or perhaps even regretting that she was the one who caused it.

She lifted the brim of her wide hat, turned to the members behind her, and with a remorseful look in her eyes, gave an even harsher order. "Go to the Nova Fall Zone (alias the Graveyard Bounce Zone) and continue to surround Bai Liu. Make sure he doesn't pull out of the group until he enters the No Name Zone."

Meanwhile, Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi inside the small TV were also in trouble.

If the stragglers couldn't be eliminated, the poison used to protect the two would deplete rapidly. Eight vials of poison, even under Liu Jiayi's careful control, were now running low.

The fields of flowers were piled high with parasitic stragglers and multiplying tentacles, roaring, flowing, and boiling like waves in an all-consuming sea, raising a wall of tentacles at the edge of the ridge. It seemed unthinkable to drive back all these monsters with only Liu Jiayi's poison and Bai Liu's whip.

But both managed to do it.

Liu Jiayi's face was pale; the high consumption of her skill had left her almost unsteady on her feet as she gripped the nearly empty bottle of poison, gasping for breath.

As the tentacles twisted and turned, Liu Jiayi, her head bowed and gasping, pulled the bottle tighter in front of her. A web of poisonous fumes fell, severing the tentacles within the web. The poisoned tentacles “cut” by the fumes fell away, their fractures blurred by the poison.

Liu Jiayi shook slightly, the taste of blood rushing up her throat, but she swallowed it back through clenched teeth. The poison bottle in her hand was nearly empty.

A tentacle, slipping through the net, came from behind, its sharp head about to pierce Liu Jiayi’s chest. In an instant, a whip—white as lightning—lashed out, snapping the tentacle that was about to touch her face, and with a second crack, Bai Liu swept back the other tentacles that were ready to attack.

Bai Liu’s face was paler than Liu Jiayi’s, nearly the same color as the bone-white whip in his hand, and his hand trembled faintly.

"Your skill cooldown is almost over, isn't it?" Bai Liu squinted at Liu Jiayi, who was half-crouched on the ground behind him.

Liu Jiayi reluctantly tilted her head and looked at him. "…Less than a minute to go."

"Then just hold out for the last wave of these stragglers," Bai Liu said, looking up at the wall of stragglers, growing more grotesque by the second. "Then we can start reaping the rewards."

The broken tentacles instantly regenerated, arching and mixing with the dense mass of tentacles in the flower field to attack Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi.

But Bai Liu didn’t even lift his whip, his eyes calmly watching the tentacles and shattered bodies of stragglers twisting and intertwining into a massive wall, hissing as they poured down like a tidal wave about to engulf a shore tourist.

A spinning Rubik’s Cube suddenly appeared in Bai Liu’s hand.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu uses a prop (Magic Space). The space is limited to the field of flowers directly opposite. The prop has reached its maximum space width, and the time limit for use is only 5 minutes. Any stragglers who enter the space are forbidden from leaving.]

[System Alert: Space Construction Complete.]

The next second, the "waves" of tentacles collided with an invisible transparent wall with a resonating "buzz," slowly falling back into the flower field. The resentful eyes of the stragglers greedily focused on the roses on the ground.

The stragglers were trapped in a four-sided invisible cage, writhing and struggling inside. They crawled all over the walls like a room full of human-faced snakes, seemingly on the verge of breaking through and attacking Bai Liu, who stood nearby.

But these stragglers might never get that chance.

Behind Bai Liu, Liu Jiayi, having consumed a stamina restorer, slowly stood up. The "stragglers" they had so carefully stacked were finally ripe for harvesting.

She glanced at Bai Liu, waved her hand, signaling him to move away.

[System Warning: Does player Liu Jiayi use her personal skill (Poison Geyser), which deals indiscriminate slow damage to all players within range? After using this skill, player Liu Jiayi's stamina slot will be empty.]

[OK.]

A thick, curling black smoke spread out from Liu Jiayi's cuffs, swirling into the limited flower field of the [Magic Space], filling the space instantly. The tentacles slid helplessly off the transparent walls.

A minute later, the last tentacle fell to the ground along with a pale Liu Jiayi.

Before Liu Jiayi could sit down, Bai Liu picked her up steadily, holding her against the aftermath of her skill's depletion. Though she didn't want to lean on him, she had no choice but to rest her head on his shoulder and close her eyes to catch her breath.

Of course, Bai Liu was now unsteady on his own feet, so it wasn't long before he too collapsed, exhausted.

Liu Jiayi, sitting back down again, asked, "…So why did you just pick me up again?"

Bai Liu stroked Liu Jiayi's damp fringe and smiled. "I've seen other parents encourage their kids to do well. I thought I'd learn from them. You were really cool, little witch."

Liu Jiayi, lying on Bai Liu's chest, was silent for two seconds before looking away. "…I'm number one in Nova."

She muttered quietly, "Isn't that par for the course?"

As the black mist in the [Magic Space] cleared, roses continued to bloom from the bodies of the corrupted dead stragglers. Meanwhile, Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi's system alert screens kept ringing.

[System Alert: Congratulations to player Liu Jiayi for killing a monster drifter and stealing 1.5kg of dried leaf roses, which are now your loot.]

[System Alert: Congratulations to player Bai Liu for using props to trap and kill a monster straggler who stole 0.3kg of dried leaf roses…]

[System Alert: …]

The ground, once covered with stragglers, was now littered with scattered dried leaves and roses. Bai Liu sat up slowly, with Liu Jiayi on top of him, looking at the loot on the ground and smiling.

"Not bad, it's still a bumper crop. The night wasn't in vain."

The King's Guild audience watching Bai Liu's small TV in the game lobby stared in awe at the system reward screen that kept popping up on Bai Liu's face.

They had previously mocked him for not knowing how to use such a powerful card as the Witch, but now they realized that he didn't just use it, he maximized the AOE effect as a healing card!

Previously, the little witch was seen as just [the only healing player in the game], but now they were shocked by her powerful [poison] attack.

In Bai Liu's hands, using the [Magic Space] prop, Liu Jiayi's A-rank panel combined with Bai Liu's C-rank panel, managed to survive a wave of A+ level monsters in a level 3 game.

It was a miracle.

But Bai Liu did it.

This was the same rookie who had almost been killed by an A+ monster just two games ago! His growth rate was nothing short of terrifying!

The man who had been sneering at Bai Liu for relying on the witch's popularity in the King's leaderboard now muttered, his face twisted in disbelief, "…Our guild's witch... is that powerful? She can resist the soldier line of a third-level game at once?"

Another man echoed him, his expression equally stunned, "…I remember there's no…"

"It's tactics," a more knowledgeable mid-tier player analyzed thoughtfully, though his expression wasn't as confident as before. "Bai Liu's tactics maximized the witch's offensive utility, using the whip to herd the monsters, then trapping them, while stalling the cooldowns with the witch's poison. In the end, Bai Liu cleared them with a burst skill."

The player who analyzed it couldn't help but feel suffocated by his realization. "We've never even tried to tap into the witch's attack skills before, but Bai Liu used his strong field control weapon, the Fishbone Whip, to set everything up. He got enough stragglers to explode rewards, then cleared the monsters and prepared for the next wave…"

Bai Liu developed the perfect tactic for this mission.

There were also some unconvinced grassroots players whispering and grumbling.

"Tsk, what tactics... I could have played this game if I had his weapons and the witch match!"

"Yeah, isn't that just stacking monsters, placing props, and then letting the witch clear them? That's a nifty tactic? An insult to tactics, if you ask me!"

"It's not just that. You guys are over-simplifying things." Another higher-level mid-tier player sighed. "Bai Liu's tactics are actually pretty standard. Do you guys remember Mu Sicheng? The rising star player who was targeted by our guild's Zhang Gui?"

Several other players paused as they recalled this senior King's Guild player, who had been brutally counter-killed by Bai Liu. Their original desire to dismiss Bai Liu subtly faded, and their voices softened: "… yeah, I remember. What's the big deal?"

"Mu Sicheng never stood a chance against Zhang Gui. On several occasions, he was almost controlled by him. But after Bai Liu took control of Mu Sicheng, when he was only playing for the second time.

Do you remember how Zhang Gui ended up?"

The King's Guild member analyzing Bai Liu for the others took a deep breath, pausing for a moment of silence before continuing. "After Mu Sicheng was being controlled by Bai Liu, he managed to counter-kill Zhang Gui, who was burned alive in the mirror."

"Before Mu Sicheng met Bai Liu, could you have imagined that Mu Sicheng would be able to kill Zhang Gui?" The man looked steadily at the others. "No one could have imagined this, could they? You all thought Mu Sicheng was a fish on Zhang Gui's plate, and that it was only a matter of time before he was caught."

Everyone stopped talking, and an eerie silence fell over the players who had just criticized Bai Liu.

They slowly looked up at Bai Liu's small TV and suddenly felt a genuine sense of dread and unease. Yes, Bai Liu had used Mu Sicheng —who was no match for Zhang Gui—to overwhelmingly kill Zhang Gui instead.

…If they remembered correctly, the game wasn't even halfway through when Zhang Gui was already defenseless against Bai Liu…

—Bai Liu is only a newcomer, his panel is only C-rank, his intelligence value isn't the highest, and not to mention the dead Zhang Gui. Even the little witch he's working with now is stronger than Bai Liu.

How is it that this guy can so easily take control of the field and outsmart the weak?

The man who had been analyzing Bai Liu also followed the crowd's gaze to Bai Liu's small TV and felt an inexplicable fear rising within him. "This is what makes Bai Liu's tactics so scary."

"Bai Liu doesn't have the best cards, nor does he use the most unconventional tactics. But he works with the cards in his hand at an incredibly high success rate, like his flawless partnership with Mu Sicheng in the Burst Last Train. And in this game, Bai Liu's clean sweep after the witch closed the net—Bai Liu accounted for every tactical part that could have gone off-plan, but wasn't even on our radar, and executed them perfectly..."

The man sighed, his expression complex. "…obviously just their first cooperation, but this newcomer already acts as if he's worked with these people a million times, bringing out the best in everyone. It feels like the moment this guy with exceptional ability formulates his tactics, he's already seen all the players' endings—what an amazing combination of game strengths…"

"Bai Liu's tactics have never gone wrong. He has never made a mistake himself and is 100% confident that his cards will never fail under his hand. With this kind of insane confidence, the rookie gambles with a killing power that we can't even imagine."

…And if this newcomer enters the league, if he has five good cards in his hand to use and develops corresponding tactics on his enemy...

The man couldn't help but shiver at the thought. His gaze toward Bai Liu's small TV hardened. "Let's go. The Queen said we must block Bai Liu here and push him into the [No Name Zone]. Otherwise, if this guy enters the league next year, our guild team will have endless trouble afterwards."

The picture of Bai Liu on the small TV suddenly went out.

Bai Liu followed the system's instructions and dropped into the [Graveyard Bounce Zone].

The Rose Factory

In-game.

Liu Jiayi's skills have finally been reset.

Liu Jiayi's skills are unique in that they do not depend on how much stamina is used in the previous round to determine their availability in the next round.

However, for most players, the use of personal skills is severely limited when their stamina is empty. For example, if Mu Sicheng's skill "Thief's Monkey Claw" is depleted, Mu Sicheng can only continue to use the skill with his natural stamina unless he can restore it using potions.

Liu Jiayi's skills are not restricted by this, except for the explosive skill [Poison Fountain], which is classified as a [Mage class] skill and can be used again once the cooldown finishes.

So, after the skill finished its cooldown, Liu Jiayi created eight more bottles of poison that she couldn't move herself and handed them to Bai Liu, who was resting on the ground to regain his strength.

With the poison in hand, Bai Liu went around the area to check for any remaining stragglers still alive in the [Magic Space]. If there were any, he poured a little poison on them to finish them off.

After checking all the stragglers, Bai Liu opened the [Magic Space] and quickly collected the roses—because not far away, stragglers and tentacles began to appear again.

After briefly calculating that the rewards he and Liu Jiayi had earned, as seen on the system panel, added up to more than eighty kilograms, Bai Liu decided to put Liu Jiayi on his back and start running toward the tent.

Liu Jiayi slumped onto Bai Liu's back, her hands clenching his shoulders, her tone hoarse and calm. "I just remembered something. You took the [Magic Space] prop from me, and I thought you'd lost it. If you had it with you this whole time—"

"Then why didn't you just use it on us from the start and keep us safe for an hour until my skill cooldown was over, so we wouldn't have had to fight so hard..."

Liu Jiayi shifted slightly, her face expressionless as she gripped both of Bai Liu's shoulders with trembling hands. Her voice ghostly, she asked rhetorically, "The [Magic Space] prop needs to be used with maximum spatial breadth, and it has a time limit for use within a day."

"...Bai Liu, you're not going to tell me that you made me last against monsters for an hour just so we could use the full spatial breadth of [Magic Space] and clear the most monsters at once for the most roses, are you...?"

Bai Liu: "."

Liu Jiayi was so resentful she was nearly spitting blood. "Bai Liu, you used me again! You , you , give me ! You could  be  a little stingier!"

[System warmly reminds underage players not to use foul language—small TV will block inappropriate content!]

The stragglers chased after Bai Liu, and bedore the tentacles wrapped around his ankles, Bai Liu rolled into the tent in the middle of the flower field and zipped it up quickly.

The tentacles thrashed against the fabric of the tent, and the zipper slowly moved upward, as though the stragglers could burrow it in with their tentacles and drag the exhausted players out at any moment.

Bai Liu took out the spinning Rubik's Cube with a calm expression.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu uses a prop (Magic Space), designated space (tent), with restrictions in place (no creatures other than the player and Liu Jiayi are allowed to enter).]

[System Tip: Due to previous overuse of the maximum breadth of the prop (Magic Space), the time limit for using Magic Space has been reduced and can only be used in the tent for about 3 hours.]

The spinning cube in Bai Liu's hand became significantly narrower after a few revolutions, transforming into a square, quadrilateral, tent-like shape.

Liu Jiayi, who had just been scolding Bai Liu, suddenly felt embarrassed.

Her eyes fell on the tetrahedral cube in Bai Liu's hand, which had become much smaller. She had thought Bai Liu was choosing to confront the monsters head-on for one-time benefits, but she hadn't expected that he'd done so to ensure they could both stay safely in the [Magic Space] until dawn.

Bai Liu had obviously calculated the timing... Perhaps she shouldn't have speculated so poorly about his intentions—she'd gone a bit too far with the scolding.

Liu Jiayi wasn't the type to dwell on things; she looked at Bai Liu and immediately apologized. "I'm sorry, I scolded you too much. I didn't know you kept the prop to make sure we'd be safe."

Bai Liu gave her a strange look. "No, I saved the prop so you could take on the most monsters at once."

Liu Jiayi: "..."

Bai Liu explained seriously, "I reserved the time limit for using this prop so that if I didn't collect enough roses at once, I could still use the prop to lift your stamina tank's negative status, allowing you to continue using your skills to trap more monsters. This way, we could earn more roses. Even though we've already earned eighty kilograms, the prop fits the overall strategy of the game, and it's more than enough..."

Liu Jiayi: "..."

Bai Liu seemed lost in thought as he looked at the exhausted Liu Jiayi with what seemed like great regret. He let out a long sigh. "But you still don't look well. You're clearly drained, and after all your strength is exhausted, it's... not good..."

Liu Jiayi suddenly smiled, a sweet smile that even showed two dimples. She held up two bottles of magic potion to Bai Liu and looked at him cutely, "Brother Bai Liu, if you say another word, I will really get angry."

Looking at the black mist of poison swirling around his neck, Bai Liu quickly changed the subject. "Liu Jiayi, you've had a hard night! Would you like to sleep now?"

Liu Jiayi: "..."

Damn, it's so tempting to swear.

Bai Liu brought Liu Jiayi into the tent to rest for a reason.

After three hours, if it's still light out and the tentacle monsters are still around, they'll have to go out again for a tug-of-war. Liu Jiayi's skill cooldown will allow her to create more poison, and she can recover some stamina while resting, so they can last until dawn with the poison they've accumulated.

Inside the tent, there's only a dirty and greasy cot, half the size of an adult, with a stained woolen blanket along the edge.

Bai Liu placed Liu Jiayi on the cot and curled up on the modest blanket, casually padding it with a woolen blanket, then fell asleep.

The right side of his face still bore the blood from the tentacle's eruption, but he closed his eyes in exhaustion before he could wipe it off and fell asleep.

Unable to recover his spirit level, Bai Liu took on the role of sweeping up and protecting Liu Jiayi, the main attacker. This caused him to lose a significant amount of spirit due to the constant tentacles and stragglers. The low spirit level worsened his physical exhaustion, as if he were working overtime in an intense, sleepless state, unable to afford any mistakes. This made Bai Liu's fatigue double.

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu's Spirit Level has dropped to 61, please restore your Spirit Level quickly!]

The black cracks on his face were partially sunken, and his skin seemed like it was about to peel off.

He glanced at Liu Jiayi, curled up on the cot, then looked down to confirm that the time limit for Magic Space hadn't expired—there was almost an hour left.

Then he slept for almost two hours.

The stragglers outside the tent seemed to have disappeared by dawn, and the sounds that woke Bai Liu didn't come from outside the tent but from inside.

Bai Liu's eyes slowly dropped to the bottom of the bed where Liu Jiayi was sleeping—a pattering sound, like something slowly crawling, grew louder from beneath the bed.

Liu Jiayi, still asleep, seemed to be disturbed by the noise and rolled over with a frown.

Bai Liu crouched beside Liu Jiayi's bed, holding the whip and looking down.

When he used [Magic Space], he had explicitly designated the tent as a space for only himself and Liu Jiayi, with no other creatures allowed. The sound coming from beneath the bed meant whatever was there wasn't a living creature or was powerful enough to break the [Transcendent] category prop's barrier.

Bai Liu cautiously held the whip to his chest and swept his gaze under the bed. It was a mess: a broken pencil, used toilet paper balls, a torn sack, and a beautifully moulded right-hand die.

There was no sign of anything living under the bed. It looked like a normal, dirty bed that hadn't been cleaned properly.

It seemed the sound he heard might have been a hallucination; after all, his mental values were low enough to be close to the threshold of hallucination.

But Bai Liu didn't withdraw his gaze. He stared motionlessly at the bottom of the bed, or rather at the hand model that resembled a toy.

Bai Liu recognized the perfect model of the right hand, sculpted from a gold model. It was the right hand he had once held tightly in a death grip and had willingly let go of.

This was Xie Ta's right hand.

Bai Liu looks at the hand. He dives into the darkness of the bed and tries to reach the snow-white sculpted hand. But the moment he is about to touch it, a rose-like vine bursts out from under the bed, making the same pattering and crawling sound Bai Liu had just heard.

The vine wraps around the hand before Bai Liu's eyes, seemingly dragging it into the ground. Bai Liu stretches his body forward and throws his whip to open the vine, but the vine has already contracted and wrapped itself around the hand.

The cold, broken right hand curls up in Bai Liu's palm, as if to shake him back. Then it turns into scattered rose petals in Bai Liu's hand, and the vines slowly dive into the ground and disappear.

The scattered petals of the severed hand burst into a phosphorescent light-blue flame and dissipate into ashes and smoke before Bai Liu's eyes.

There is nothing under the dimly lit bed—only a hazy reflection of everything in Bai Liu's empty, dark reflection of Rose's eyes, a hallucination that he isn't sure ever happened.

Bai Liu hadn't touched a real object. The broken hand he thought he had clasped was just a shadow.

Bai Liu feels nothing but a coldness that seems to linger on his closed fingers.

Liu Jiayi was awakened by Bai Liu's movement. She rubs her eyes sleepily, sitting up, dazedly reaching for the goggles she had placed on the side of her pillow and putting them on.

Liu Jiayi is instantly sober, and her voice changes slightly. "What are you doing, Bai Liu?"

Bai Liu slowly retreats from under the bed. After propping himself up on the edge and shaking his head to meet Liu Jiayi's gaze, Liu Jiayi is stunned.

Bai Liu looks, for once, in a rare kind of ecstasy, as if something had compelled him to take his soul away in a floating trance. The rose in his eyes sways and blooms with a fourth petal. The black crack under his right eye deepens, the piece of flesh beneath his right eye peels away, with a shaky quality.

"...Bai Liu," Liu Jiayi's voice is inexplicably dry. "Pull up your panel and show me your current spirit level."

Bai Liu is quiet for a moment before he seems to realize what Liu Jiayi is saying to him. He obediently lowers his head, fishing out the coin on his chest, half-smiling as he pulls up the system panel and leans over to show it to Liu Jiayi, a very inviting, burned rose scent scattering over his shoulder.

The fragrance puts Liu Jiayi into a trance for a moment before she quickly opens the panel to purchase two breathing masks, putting them on both Bai Liu and herself before her mind starts to wander.

But it's still a little late.

[System Alert: Player Liu Jiayi has smelled a high concentration of primal rose incense, and as the player is now intolerant to that concentration, she enters a (stunned) debuff effect. Her spirit level drops to 63, and she is about to see a hallucination.]

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu has smelled a high concentration of the original rose fragrance. As the player is now intolerant to this concentration, he has entered a (stunned) debuff effect and his spirit level has dropped to 46!]

Liu Jiayi's eyes are spinning, and she falls back onto the cot, covering her mask and breathing hard, while Bai Liu falls backwards onto the floor, his faint breath painting a mist of water on his mask.

A strong, regal, torturous aroma—so strong that one cannot move but only let it torment them—runs through their brains, making them gag. Liu Jiayi coughs violently several times. Bai Liu's eyes twist and spin.

He's plunged into a sort of rosy, underwater, suffocating darkness—as if an unseen broken right hand had calmly strangled his throat.

Bai Liu's eyelids droop slowly.

"Get up! Get up now!" A vicious, impatient voice, accompanied by "slap, slap, slap" sounds, yells. "How fucking late it is, and you're still sleeping! Do you know how much a night in this tent costs before and after the May Rose Festival?"

"If we weren't short of people, we wouldn't let you lowlifes in as flower pickers!"

With the scolding, Bai Liu, half asleep, feels his arms being grabbed and pulled straight up from the ground. His mind is dizzy and swollen, as though he's worked all night for a week, been dragged to a social gathering by colleagues, poured ten bottles of vodka, and then dragged up after just an hour of sleep to continue working late.

--Bai Liu could die suddenly on the spot and fall into a long sleep with just one breath.

Bai Liu shakes one side of his numb, tingling head, propping himself up against the back of a chair with his hand to steady his uncoordinated body. He takes several deep breaths before he can overlap the swaying, spinning scene before him.

It's the same old, shabby little tent, but much brighter—after all, it's already light outside.

Bai Liu looks over at Liu Jiayi, who has crawled out of bed. After lifting Liu Jiayi out of the bed, the processor turns to them and yells, "Where are the roses? Where are the roses you were told to pick all night? You're getting high without doing anything! Two useless bitches!"

With that, the factory worker brings up his foot in a burst of anger and kicks Liu Jiayi in the back, who is still walking staggeringly.

The kick narrowly misses Lui Jiayi.

Bai Liu gives a respectful nod to the processor and points to the bulging sacks behind him, the roses covered by blankets. Bai Liu looks calm and collected, not at all like he had been unsteady just ten seconds before.

"All the roses we picked last night are here," Bai Liu raises his eyes. "83.7 kg in total."

The processor changes his expression several times before finally retracing his steps and walking behind Bai Liu to check the roses. After making sure that Bai Liu's weight is correct, the processor turns his head with a look of fear and resentment in his eyes and stares at Bai Liu for a moment before saying, "You've barely done your job."

"Don't be complacent! Even if all of you newcomers complete your tasks, it's still early days before you can be promoted to processors and eliminate us hard-working veterans!"

He had already reached the tent when, without warning, he turned around and gave Bai Liu a vicious kick, curling his mouth with malice.

"Double your task tonight! You have to pick 80 kg of roses each. If you can't do that, then wait to be laid off and exiled!"

The kick lands on Bai Liu's shoulder. Bai Liu, still under the stun debuff, is "weak" and has little resistance, so he's kicked backward with such force that he falls a distance and hits the chair he had just used as an armrest.

With a grimace, the processor walks away with the roses Bai Liu had picked, tossing two small glass bottles of pale pink perfume, which Liu Jiayi is quick enough to catch before they hit the ground.

[System Alert: Congratulations to Player Bai Liu for completing the (Picking 40 kg) Rose side quest and receiving the reward (Low Level Rose Dried Leaf Gas Perfume) in one bottle.]

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has triggered a new quest. Please pick 80 kg of roses tonight. Upon success, you will receive a reward (two bottles of low-level dried rose leaf gas perfume) and main quest progress (processor's promotion qualification).]

Liu Jiayi twists and turns towards Bai Liu, who is sitting on the floor, and pulls out the perfume, spraying it right in Bai Liu's face.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu's (Stun) debuff is lifted, and his spirit level has increased to 81.]

The cracked opening on Bai Liu's face visibly heals, returning to a shallow depression, but the rose in his eye seems to be nourished in some way, shaking its branches and spreading its petals outward—a change that, at first glance, isn't enough to make Liu Jiayi stop spraying her hand with perfume.

She hesitates for a moment before gritting her teeth and spraying herself in the face a few times as well to release her [Stunned] status.

Liu Jiayi leans back in her chair, half-deflated, and waves her hand from side to side in front of Bai Liu's face to catch his eye. Her tone is wan. "Hey, are you awake yet? You met something under the bed last night that nearly killed us both."

The smell of cheap perfume makes Bai Liu choke and cough uncomfortably as he comes to his senses. He tilts his heavy head back in his chair and looks up at Liu Jiayi, his eyes still a little sleepy. Bai Liu gives an articulate account of what he had seen and what happened last night.

"Something got into our tent while [Magic Space] was in effect?" Liu Jiayi's brow tightens the more she listens. "That's unlikely."

Bai Liu gives her an enquiring look.

Liu Jiayi turns over and looks down squarely at Bai Liu as she continues to explain. "I know what you mean. In a new level 3 game, there could indeed be monsters that can break through the boundaries of [Magic Space]. But think about it, Bai Liu. If it really was this kind of monster last night, we were sort of attacked, right? Dis it trigger the monster book?"

"And if this monster, strong enough to break through [Magic Space], did get into our tent—" Liu Jiayi clasps her hands to her chest and raises her eyebrows in a good-natured way, "—why didn't it kill both of us? It didn't kill both of us, so that it could drill into your tent, under my bed, in the middle of the night just to shake your hand and show you the roses it turned into?"

"There's some truth in what you say," Bai Liu speaks nonchalantly. "But what if it's intention wasn't to attack and hurt? So it didn't appear as its entity last night, and that's why it didn't trigger the monster book, and all I saw was a figment of what it was trying to present to me?"

Liu Jiayi subconsciously tries to retort. "There are no monsters whose ultimate intention towards the player is not to attack and damage. There is no such..."

Bai Liu looks at her quietly.

Liu Jiayi's words abruptly stop as she remembers something. Her expression turns gloomy. "...The godly wandering NPC of the 'Love Welfare Home'... What is your relationship with him?"

It's true that she had never seen a monster before that wasn't designed to harm the player, but the last copy of the god-ranked NPC had saved Bai Liu by offering to give blood when he could have been killed.

This is the first and only time Liu Jiayi has seen a monster save a player in all the times she has played the game.

"...Why does that matter?" Bai Liu's eyes jerk and begin to drift subtly around the top of the tent.

He tries to find a precise and straightforward definition of his relationship with Xie Ta, but it's indescribably weird and difficult for Bai Liu.

If Bai Liu could have told Liu Jiayi with a clear conscience that Xie Ta and he were innocent friends before he entered the game, he would have been able to say so.

...But now that the word "friend" is on his lips, Bai Liu inexplicably thinks of Tawil's unadulterated, slightly confused eyes and the cold, reverent kisses that had fallen on his lips and forehead time and time again.

And the greasy opening line of Bai Liu to Xie Ta after their reunion in 'Siren' – [What do I want... maybe you can give me a kiss?]

Bai Liu: "..."

Liu Jiayi asks this question, expecting to get something like [This monster is a player who was alienated after I acquired his soul], but Bai Liu's strange reaction causes a bunch of question marks to pop up in her head.

Bai Liu's tone is cool: "We were friends before, and then when we reunited, I wasn't quite in my right mind (low mental value), so I did something to him that crossed the line and we had something that shouldn't happen between friends (meaning a smooch)."

"But then, after I got sober personally, I still wanted to be friends with him again. Although I don't know how he feels about it, in my case, we're still friends—that's probably how he and I are at the moment."

Bai Liu sums up what happened between him and Xie Ta in a nutshell.

Liu Jiayi says slowly, "Huh?"

What kind of scum talk is this? What have you done to a NPC, Bai Liu!

The Rose Factory

During the day, the roses in the field were closed, their petals tightly curled into unbloomed buds. The moist soil had dried, and the field appeared calm and harmless. However, after some experimentation, Bai Liu discovered that their spirit levels dropped faster when near the field than when anywhere else.

They had only two bottles of low-grade perfume, and to keep their spirits up, the perfume might not last through the night if they stayed near the flower fields. So, Bai Liu made the decisive choice to stay away from the flower fields—or, more precisely, from the entire polluted area, the perfume factory.

With two bottles of perfume that lasted four hours each, they would make it through the night. Staying in a more contaminated area wasn't a wise choice.

Bai Liu decided to investigate the area around the factory to understand what was happening on the lot where it stood.

"What you can think of, others can think of too," Liu Jiayi, holding Bai Liu's hand, said with a grimace. "If we go out like this, we'll run into other players easily. Aren't you supposed to figure out how to get 80kg of roses for each of us tonight? I barely managed to gather 80kg last night, and doubling that to 160kg is out of the question."

Bai Liu remained calm. "Didn't you hear the processor say this morning that all the new flower pickers finished last night?"

"There are six players in this game, and they start as new flower pickers. If all the flower pickers have completed their tasks, it means the other four players, aside from us, are also capable of picking 40kg of roses in one night."

Bai Liu smiled. "Four people picking 40kg in one night—that's exactly the 160kg we need."

"..." Liu Jiayi rubbed her arm, which had goosebumps from Bai Liu's smile. "What do you plan to do?"

"First, we investigate the area around this factory," Bai Liu said, his eyes darkening. "Every monster in this game has an origin and a cause. Stragglers are transformed from people, and since I can make deals with people, I thought..."

"You want to make a deal with these stragglers?" Liu Jiayi frowned. "Many of the monsters in the game are tainted, mentally broken humans who've gone insane. How do you make a deal with creatures like that? They don't even have the sanity to understand you."

Bai Liu lowered his gaze to Liu Jiayi. "What if they can regain their sanity for a short time?"

Liu Jiayi was taken aback and reflexively retorted, "Impossible."

The alienation of monsters in the game is irreversible; that's a game [rule]. Once a monster's spirit value drops to zero, it freezes and turns grey. It can't be restored with [spirit bleach].

A monster will always remain a monster, unable to turn back into a human.

But soon, Liu Jiayi noticed something unusual—the [mental bleach] in this game was already frozen!

It wasn't just for the monsters, but for them too. The perfume wasn't limited to [drifters]. This meant that if the perfume could work on [drifters], causing them to regain their sanity, the monsters might also be temporarily brought back to a normal state. This could stop them from attacking, much like how a [mermaid statue] halts its movement when stared at.

"Perfume might be the weakness of this group of stragglers," Liu Jiayi said, looking up at Bai Liu. "When did you come up with that idea? That the game's [perfume] could serve as a [mental bleach] for monsters?"

"Before I entered the game," Bai Liu replied.

"Before entering the game?!" Liu Jiayi was puzzled.

Bai Liu tossed the bottle of perfume in his hand, his eyes following its arc, and smiled. "Someone told me before I entered the game that even using this perfume on a staff member who had gone mad would restore their sanity. No matter how insane they were before, once they sprayed the perfume, they returned to their normal selves, as if nothing had happened."

"I thought... this is like a reversed version of spiritual bleach."

Bai Liu lowered his eyes, idly playing with the two perfume bottles in his hands. "It can restore and enhance one's state, pulling them back from madness. And considering the game's setting, for players, if they don't use [mental bleach], their spirit values will drop, causing them to go insane."

"For players, [spiritual bleach] is [Rose Perfume]. We're all 'addicted' to it—surviving and working for the game to earn [Flower Picker] status. If we can't earn points, [Rangers] get [laid off] and sent to the [Unknown District]. Meanwhile, advanced players who earn it get promoted."

Bai Liu looked at Liu Jiayi. "Don't these mechanisms seem familiar?"

Liu Jiayi shuddered as she understood Bai Liu's implication. "The game is one big [rose factory]."

-- If the game is a factory that exploits players, who is the [factory manager] extracting everything from them?

Bai Liu's eyes grew dark as they approached the edge of the flower field.

Beyond the beautiful fields of flowers was not a pleasant, fragrant town, but a desolate and dilapidated suburb. Curling discarded newspapers and long-abandoned factories stretched for dozens of meters, creating a stark contrast between the vibrant flower fields and the bleak surroundings.

Bai Liu walked up to the door of an empty factory, with a job advert that was ten years old. But it seemed the factory had no need for new recruits—the tin-skinned roller shutter door was painted with the word [dismantle], the paint peeling at the edges, showing clear signs of age.

Liu Jiayi crouched down to examine the scattered pieces of newspaper on the ground.

[Rose Perfume Introduced?! New Addictive Substance, Banned Nationwide, Sparks Public Protests!]

-- "This stuff should be banned. How come coffee and cigarettes aren't? This is a serious infringement of our freedom to consume!"
(Mr. Wang, the convenience store owner leading the protest, allegedly stocks a lot of rose perfume in his shop, making hundreds of thousands of dollars in profit this year.)

[Factory Explosion, Perfume Spreads, Protests Win, Dried Rose Leaf Gas Sells Worldwide!]

[Rose Perfumed Gas Lifts People's Spirits: Students Learn More Efficiently, Employees Work Better... Factory Expands by 7.2% This Year...]

[Rose Gas Sees Third Price Increase This Year, Causing Protests Worldwide—It's a Necessity That's Becoming a Burden for Most People, Especially Those Earning Less Than 100,000 Per Year...]

[Global Governments Unite to Protest Sky-High Perfume Prices, Sanction Rose Dry Leaf Gas Factories... Demand Closure or Face Forceful Action...]

Bai Liu crouched down next to Liu Jiayi, eyeing the newspapers.

Even Liu Jiayi, who wasn't the softest person, felt a chill from the shocking black-and-white photos.

The chaotic crowds, bloodied roads, and the eerie images of people hanging lifeless from bridges were chilling.

"This kind of thing destroys the ecology," Bai Liu muttered, picking up a photo with the caption, [Desperate, Wilted Exiles Hang from a Bridge, Rose Factory Indifferent—Won't Sell Perfume at Reduced Prices].

[Rose Perfume, once promoted for free with promises of low prices, has now soared to unaffordable heights...]

"They give it to you for free during promotions, then raise the price once you're hooked, cornering the market until you can't survive without it—and now, you have to pay an even higher price just to stay alive. You become a slave to the rose."

"It's a classic exploitation scheme, but when applied to an addictive item that leads to death, it becomes a crime that consumes everything. In these apocalyptic times, even money loses its meaning."

"I don't like this stuff," Bai Liu said, "It erases the very meaning of what I'm after."

He uncrossed his fingers as the cold wind swept past, taking the old newspaper fragments from his hands.

Is this the future Tang Erda sees, where there is no escape except drowning?

Watching Su Yang and her team members become obsessed with roses, with no way to save them except to watch them wither or retreat into the next cycle...

After a few more instances like this, it's no wonder this man is losing his mind.

Liu Jiayi snapped out of her thoughts as she stepped in front of Bai Liu —[stragglers] were hiding in the factory, ready to attack.

"Perfume! He smells of perfume!"
A shrill, maniacal scream came from the shifting shadows, and all the figures lunged toward Bai Liu.

"I'm surprised there are so many stragglers here," Liu Jiayi said, pulling her weapon taut. "Do you think we have enough perfume?"

"Not sure," Bai Liu replied calmly. "But isn't that why you're here?"

Liu Jiayi: "..."

Liu Jiayi cursed under her breath, "Shit!!!"

The mass of stragglers, their tentacles slithering like snakes from the ground, swept the scattered newspapers into the air, sending them flying in the dark, dusty sky.

One of the photos showed a flower-picker with a torn face shell smiling in agony :

[Despite working overtime every day without rest, not a regular employee, picking 40kg of dried rose leaves just to get one bottle of low-grade perfume... It's the happiest thing in the world to work in a rose factory.]

[We're changing the world, saving others.]

[If we work hard, we might lower the price of perfume and save more lives!]

-- Said a dying flower-picker.
(At the time of this report, the flower-picker was fired for breaching Rose Factory regulations by leaking details of his work to the public.)

The Rose Factory

The sky darkens.

Liu Jiayi and Bai Liu, battered and bruised, lay by the flower field. They had been back for a while, recuperating after a daytime battle with the stragglers that nearly drained their stamina.

But they had managed to make it back.

Upon his return, Bai Liu noticed two new, larger sacks of linen by the flower field. The processor had come and left them, to be filled with roses picked from this evening.

Liu Jiayi, still lying next to Bai Liu and catching her breath, spoke up. "I've got about an hour or two to recover my stamina. Do we wait, or do we head to the fields to pick roses and attract the stragglers?"

"Your plan to use the other four requires a lot of stragglers, doesn't it?" Liu Jiayi sat up, propping herself up with her hands, twisting her shoulders and shaking her hands to warm up.

She glanced at Bai Liu, who sat beside her. "I think it's a risky option, but you're not changing it, are you?"

Bai Liu rolled his eyes at her. "No."

Liu Jiayi sighed deeply, her expression like that of a worried old lady fretting over the future of her lazy, laid-off son. She turned to Bai Liu, propping her forehead on her hand.

"I sometimes wish you, an adult in your twenties, would make better choices than always betting on winnable fights. Why not take a more sensible approach like some other players?"

She sighed again. "But it's still too early to expect much from you. You're a C-rank player. You can rely on me now, but later, you'll have to rely on yourself."

Bai Liu stayed silent.

"So, what now?" Liu Jiayi asked. "Your plan is to use the stragglers to draw the other four players, right? But how are you going to attract the stragglers if we don't pick roses?"

Bai Liu slowly pulled a bottle of perfume from his pocket.

Liu Jiayi stared at the bottle for a moment before turning her gaze to Bai Liu's face, expressionless. "This is our last bottle of perfume. If you waste it as bait, I swear I'll kill you."

Bai Liu didn't respond.

He cautiously twisted open the cap of the perfume bottle.

Liu Jiayi held it up, giving him a sweet smile. "I'm not joking, Brother Bai Liu. This is something I earned from my first job. Don't waste it on me — you've already used one bottle today."

Bai Liu didn't reply.

Liu Jiayi crossed her arms, visibly angry. "You're really something... though, I suppose you've made a mess of things today."

Thinking back to the events of the day, Bai Liu's eyes wandered. "But perfume is the fastest way to attract stragglers..."

Liu Jiayi snapped. "If you knew you'd use the last one at night, you shouldn't have wasted the others during the day! Please, cherish the fruits of our labor! Stop trying to take shortcuts!"

Bai Liu knelt down with his hands on his thighs, apologizing quickly. "Sorry. I got so focused on maximizing the perfume's value that I didn't consider our survival rate. My bad."

Liu Jiayi, still angry, pointed at him. "You're a child! Don't keep doing this! Survival should be your priority! How will you ever survive in a game where survival is the key to victory?"

She scolded him like a nurse reprimanding a tactician who was too focused on strategy and points.

"I'll consider survival rates next time," Bai Liu said, nodding and pretending to take her words seriously. He quickly changed the subject. "But for tonight, to get the most dried leaf roses, let's just do it. I'm using the perfume."

Bai Liu's hand was already on the bottle.

Liu Jiayi didn't even respond.

The night grew darker.

Tang Erda stood alert, holding his gun, eyes scanning the area, ready to hunt. His sack lay discarded to the side, containing only a few dried leaf roses—far less than he'd hoped for.

After learning the game's rules, he realized the rose-picking task wasn't about gathering roses; it was about stealing the fruits of others' labor by luring stragglers.

Since he had gathered 40 kg of roses the previous night, he could have collected more, but tonight's 80 kg was too much. Tang Erda abandoned the task and decided to spend the night hunting stragglers instead.

But something was off. Last night, a large number of stragglers had attacked him, but tonight—Tang Erda walked along the ridge and saw nothing but the few that had attacked earlier in the day.

He frowned, eyeing the sack he'd discarded. Had he not picked enough roses tonight? Was the bait not as effective as it had been last night?

By this time, the presence of dried leaf roses should have attracted at least a few stragglers. No experienced player would move recklessly in such a mentally contaminated map, but the situation was unusual. Without stragglers, Tang Erda wouldn't be able to complete his mission.

With no other choice, he decided to take the initiative and search for the stragglers himself.

The flower field was eerily silent as Tang Erda walked along the ridge in a particular direction. There, he saw other flower-pickers—like him—moving silently to gather the roses. The workers were wrapped in black veils, their movements quick and mechanical. As Tang Erda watched, he noticed something strange. Some workers seemed to be withering before his eyes, their hands reduced to white bones, yet they continued to pick.

The fear on their faces wasn't from their own deterioration, but from the possibility of losing their jobs—because in this world, not having a job was worse than death.

Tang Erda's heart hardened as he turned away from the grim sight. He had seen this before so many times that it no longer stirred anger, but cold indifference.

It seemed that once the dried leaf rose gas became widespread, it would be impossible to change the world. Those deceived by it would gladly offer their life savings and labor, still convinced it was worth it.

A full moon shone overhead, casting its pale glow across the field. The flower field was divided into two distinct worlds by the moonlight—outside, a dark and empty landscape; inside, a beautiful, oil-painted scene of roses and workers, all bathed in the soft light.

The flowers, the workers, the scent—all seemed to tell a story of paradise, one that the media would soon glorify, painting the rose factory as a symbol of beauty and rarity.

To the citizens watching, this scene was a lie, a sedative to mask the truth. The high price of perfume became acceptable because it was easier to blame the rose factory than face the truth of their own inability to afford it.

The rose was a false salvation—a message pushed by the media, convincing people to buy into the illusion.

Tang Erda's hand tightened around his gun as he watched.

Suddenly, a shadow flickered across the field. Tang Erda's eyes narrowed.

A swarm of stragglers, moving in unison, approached something in the field—a bottle of perfume placed carefully in the center. The stragglers, attracted by the sweet smell, couldn't reach the perfume. It was as if an invisible barrier kept them at bay.

It was a trap.

Without hesitation, Tang Erda drew his gun and aimed at the bottle, but as he did, he felt a strange, suffocating pressure. The air around him seemed to freeze, restricting his movements.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu extends (Magic Space) to trap player Tang Erda.]

The Rose Factory

In just a second, a white bone whip materialized from nowhere, shattering the perfume bottle with a sharp "pop."

The perfume seeped into the ground, leaving only a faint pink fragrance to fill the night air. The pure scent of roses drove the stragglers into a frenzy, causing them to swarm into the space.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has changed the rules for entering and exiting the Magic Space. The rule has been updated from "No stragglers allowed" to "No players allowed out, stragglers allowed in and out freely."]

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu changes the shape of the Magic Space from an irregular rectangle to a 6-square-meter hexahedron, ensuring that player Tang Erda can move freely within it.]

The stragglers opened their scarlet, greedy eyes, extending their tentacles toward the perfume-soaked Tang Erda, one by one entering the [Magic Space].

The narrow stacks that had bound Tang Erda widened with a swoosh, his jammer's draw flowing seamlessly as his gaze remained fixed on the group of stragglers lunging toward him. He flicked the hammer of his revolver.

A crisp "click" echoed from the chamber, followed by six consecutive shots: "Bang, bang, bang, bang, bang, bang."

The revolver discharged six rapid bursts of fire, each bullet hitting its mark with deadly precision, cutting down the stragglers an instant before they could reach the trapped hunter.

As the roses fell from the withered stragglers, their twisted faces wore mad, contented smiles. They had finally smelled the roses they had dreamed of before dying.

Before Tang Erda stood the masses of fallen stragglers, yet no matter how many he killed, more would emerge from the ground.

He gritted his teeth, pushing back the steady stream of stragglers drawn by the scent. His deep blue eyes glowed a fiery red.

— Bai Liu, this guy is always one step ahead!

Bai Liu had carefully set this trap to lure in other players chasing the stragglers for their quest. He had then trapped Tang Erda in the Magic Space while hiding in the shadows, relying on the others to eliminate the stragglers for him.

Bai Liu planned to let the players exhaust themselves all night, then swoop in to collect the roses the stragglers had left behind, finishing the job they had done.

As for those who failed the task and lost the fruits of their labor—either they'd be exiled or forced to keep working while Bai Liu breezed past, rapidly climbing the ranks on their efforts.

Tang Erda's teeth clenched as his revolver fired faster, mowing down the stragglers. He was surrounded by roses falling from their lifeless bodies—but even so, there was no time to use his [Suicide Bullet] skill.

Tang Erda wanted to strike back at Bai Liu with a [Suicide Bullet] or at least force the man hiding behind the scenes to show himself. However, with the constant stream of stragglers flooding in, it was impossible to find an opening to use such a powerful burst skill, especially since [Suicide Bullet] had a ten-minute cooldown.

Bai Liu had planned it perfectly, never giving Tang Erda a chance to retaliate.

"Mr. Hunter?" One of the three members of the King's Guild, who had entered with Tang Erda, was trailing behind the wave of stragglers. He came out to look for them, as few stragglers were left near the Rose Field.

The man eyed Tang Erda, who was barely moving, still fighting off stragglers in the middle of the flower field. He took a step toward him. "You're...?"

Tang Erda snapped his head around and barked, "Stay back!!!"

But it was too late.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu extends the Magic Space, trapping player Qi Yifang.]

Trapped in an invisible glass cage, Qi Yifang blinked at the stragglers advancing toward him and then at Tang Erda, holding his forehead. Realization dawned, and he finally understood why Tang Erda had warned him to stay back.

Forced to pull out his weather gauge, Qi Yifang couldn't help but laugh. Bai Liu had set up a one-on-four trap.

No wonder the Queen was struggling with him.

"What a shot, tsk tsk." Liu Jiayi, holding a telescope, watched the scene with great interest. Under her breath, she sighed dramatically. "Bai Liu, you're too much. You've got all four of them working for you without lifting a finger."

Bai Liu, having retreated after breaking the perfume with his whip, was now hiding behind the factory with Liu Jiayi. He too had a telescope, watching the scene unfold.

Through the lens, they could see the four players from opposite sides of the fence working tirelessly for Bai Liu. What a touching sight it was!

Unfortunately, the people involved didn’t share the same sentiment.

The roses piled up, but Tang Erda, despite his immense effort, couldn't pick them up as the stragglers kept coming. Yet, Tang Erda remained composed. His shots were precise, taking down one straggler after another. He was surrounded by the most roses, consciously piling them around himself, his cold eyes scanning the fields for Bai Liu.

It seemed Bai Liu was waiting for an opportunity to show himself and pick up the roses.

"Eh!" Liu Jiayi nudged Bai Liu and pointed at Tang Erda through the binoculars. "I didn’t expect Captain Tang to be this strong."

"Not bad for an opponent you’ve unfortunately recruited," Liu Jiayi praised.

Bai Liu: "..."

Liu Jiayi continued watching Tang Erda through the binoculars, then lowered them, her tone turning serious. "This man’s gun skills are even harder to deal with than I thought. I’ve been watching him—aside from a brief moment to reload, I haven’t seen any noticeable skill cooldowns."

"His quick reloading and high attack value—judging by the fact he can kill an A+ monster with one shot—his attack value must be at least five thousand."

Liu Jiayi looked at Bai Liu. "You've got them all trapped in a small area now, but this Tang guy is a long-range attacker, and his shot accuracy is flawless. He'll be able to target you whenever you show yourself. He's probably just waiting for you to show up and pick up the roses."

"Have you figured out how you're going to do that yet?" Liu Jiayi raised an eyebrow. "Are you still going with that plan from this morning? It could easily flop."

"It doesn't matter if it flops. Nothing will happen to us," Bai Liu replied with a smirk, holding up his binoculars. "After all, I'm not the one picking up the roses."

Liu Jiayi sighed from the bottom of her heart. "Yes, you really are a master at undermining others."

As Liu Jiayi observed, Tang Erda was indeed waiting for Bai Liu to appear so he could pick up the roses.

At first, Tang Erda had been frustrated after being trapped, but he soon calmed down. The [Magic Space] wasn't just limiting their movement—it was also restricting Bai Liu's ability to move and access the loot. The roses from the slain stragglers were concentrated around Tang Erda, and with the space so confined, Bai Liu would have to come to him if he wanted to collect the loot.

So Tang Erda simply needed to be patient, waiting for his prey to appear. After all, patience was the hallmark of a hunter.

Tang Erda and Bai Liu had chased each other through so many worlds. Patience was something Tang Erda had mastered, especially when it came to Bai Liu.

But time passed—an hour, two hours, three hours...

The first rays of dawn broke the sky, but Bai Liu still hadn't shown up.

The other three members of the King's Guild, exhausted after hours of fighting, were starting to falter. Only Tang Erda maintained his accuracy and efficiency, while the others began to slip.

The gaps left by their mistakes were swiftly filled by Tang Erda.

Qi Yifang, panting and wide-eyed, observed the mysterious hunter they had come in with. He had thought they were supposed to protect this unknown player, given the Guild's reputation and the unknown player's seemingly low profile.

In the game, players who were strong yet obscure were a rare sight.

But this man...

"Bang bang!"

Qi Yifang watched in slow motion as a silver bullet whizzed past him, hitting a lunging straggler behind him, clearing a hole in his defense. Another bullet grazed the shoulder of a teammate, taking down a straggler from behind, relieving the pressure on the tired player.

Qi Yifang turned his astonished gaze toward Tang Erda, who was reloading with precision.

Tang Erda never looked away from the battlefield, his eyes fixed on the pile of stragglers, swiftly switching magazines before raising his revolver again.

Qi Yifang was dumbfounded.

This man's combat prowess was terrifying!

While he dominated the battlefield, he also provided silent support for his teammates, covering their defenses and protecting them seamlessly.

This man was a one-man army—a [gun] and a [shield] in one.

And all at a league-level ability!

If the King's Guild had someone like this on their team, along with the little witch who could both attack and heal...

Qi Yifang swallowed nervously as he watched Tang Erda, who was still attacking with flawless precision.

This was undoubtedly the strongest King's Guild team configuration ever.

In his mind, he already envisioned their victory, standing on the podium with the Queen of Hearts in his arms, a wicked smile on his face.

Another player frowned as he approached Qi Yifang, interrupting his thoughts.

This was the player who had just been saved by Tang Erda after struggling to withstand an attack. Now, his voice trembled with fear as he spoke: “Brother Qi, something doesn’t feel right…”

Qi Yifang, the strongest member of the King’s trio and likely to be in the King’s core team, was more accustomed to receiving reports from the other two players than from Tang Erda, who was quiet, distant, and unnervingly strong.

Turning away from Tang Erda, Qi Yifang looked at the player and asked, “What’s wrong? What’s happening?”

The player’s face was grim as he replied, “Brother Qi, don’t you think… that the roses around us are slowly disappearing?”

Qi Yifang froze at his words. The back of Tang Erda’s attack faltered for half a second, and he briefly paused while withdrawing his gun.

Both men looked around, but the roses showed no visible signs of fading.

However, something felt off.

After three hours of attacking stragglers, the roses should have been increasing, not disappearing!

Qi Yifang’s expression shifted. “Could someone be stealing the roses? Has Bai Liu arrived?”

They were patiently battling these frenzied monsters, waiting for Bai Liu to come and steal the exploding roses!

“Impossible,” Tang Erda replied immediately, his voice firm. “I haven’t seen anyone else approach. Only the stragglers are coming near, attracted by the perfume.”

But as soon as he finished speaking, Tang Erda’s expression darkened. He had been vigilantly watching the surroundings, and if Bai Liu had really appeared, he would have noticed.

So, who was stealing the roses?

In the distance, Bai Liu raised his binoculars, a smile tugging at the corners of his mouth. A mountain of dried-leaf roses had accumulated around him, still growing as people—stragglers—transported or stole roses.

The stragglers, though ragged, appeared clear-headed and were silently assisting in the rose theft. They were the same group that had attacked Bai Liu at the abandoned factory earlier.

The stragglers had quietly blended into the chaos of the attacking monsters, carefully picking the roses from the edges of the [Magic Space], making sure not to draw attention or get too close to Tang Erda's line of fire.

While the others were distracted by the attacking monsters, the more conscious stragglers managed to transfer a significant amount of dried-leaf roses to Bai Liu's side.

Bai Liu had once considered using stragglers from the flower fields to help him steal from other flower pickers. After his interactions with the stragglers at the factory, Bai Liu realized that those who spent too much time in the flower fields were hopelessly addicted to the perfume.

Even in higher concentrations, the perfume only temporarily subdued them but couldn't bring them back to their senses.

The stragglers who haunted the night had fully merged with the dried-leaf roses, losing their humanity and becoming full-fledged monsters, which was why they were listed in The Rose Factory's monster book.

But Bai Liu had realized something important: stragglers who hadn't fallen too deep into addiction could still regain their sanity. If he could keep them away from the perfume, they could be restored. This was crucial, as the game wouldn't include pointless rules.

One of the stragglers, now clearer-headed, approached Bai Liu with gratitude.

"Mr. Bai Liu, we've gathered 160kg of dried-leaf roses. Should we collect more?" he asked, his face still marked by the wilting effects of the perfume, but his eyes far more lucid.

Bai Liu nodded. Meanwhile, Liu Jiayi, who had been healing some injured stragglers, looked on. The injured were mostly minor wounds, easily treated with Liu Jiayi's antidote.

The healed stragglers were visibly moved—no one had treated them like human beings in a long time. In the factory, they were outcasts.

The straggler who had spoken to Bai Liu hesitated, then looked up at him, his face a mix of awe and uncertainty.

"I'm… I'm grateful for the perfume you gave us during the day. It helped us regain our sanity, even for a brief moment, so we could talk to you like human beings again," he said. "Please, I must ask, is it true you'll make the perfume available to all the exiles?"

Bai Liu smiled, not missing a beat. "Of course it's true," he replied, setting his binoculars down. "If you're willing to work with me and support me in becoming the factory manager, I promise that all stragglers will stop falling into madness and can live normal lives."

He gestured for them to follow him. "Tomorrow, I'll continue distributing the perfume I've earned. Just meet me at the usual place."

His words were met with silence, then a flurry of quiet murmurs as the stragglers looked at him with disbelief.

"Of course," Bai Liu added with a smile, "There's one more thing I need you to do: gather all the stragglers around tomorrow and bring them to me. I'll help them regain their sanity as well, and together we'll work towards a better future."

The leader of the stragglers, eyes glistening with emotion, wiped his hands on his tattered clothes before carefully shaking Bai Liu's hand.

"We believe in you!" he choked out, voice shaking with emotion. "We'd do anything for someone like you—someone who has selflessly rescued us. We'd give our lives if necessary!"

Bai Liu smiled softly, exuding an almost holy aura. "No need to thank me. We're working together—that's just what I do."

Tears welled in the straggler's eyes as he gripped Bai Liu's hand. "No… no, you gave us your precious perfume. You worked so hard for it, and now you've given it all to help us. You're truly a good person!"

Liu Jiayi quietly observed the scene, her gaze shifting from the 160kg of roses being carried by the stragglers to the distant four players still trapped in the [Magic Space], fighting fiercely.

Her eyes then fell on Bai Liu, who was smiling contentedly but had done nothing himself throughout the night.

“It’s not too hard,” Bai Liu remarked with a casual wave. “It’s like working for the capitalists. They suck the life out of you, and there’s no time to enjoy it. So, I might as well use the perfume I’ve earned for a good cause.”

The stragglers were moved beyond words. “Mr. Bai Liu, you’re a great man!” they cried.

Liu Jiayi couldn’t help but think, “Bai Liu is truly frightening.”

The next morning, as the roses in the flower fields began to close their petals, the waves of attacking stragglers ceased. The invisible barrier vanished, and Qi Yifang, exhausted, collapsed onto the ground after the last straggler was taken down by Tang Erda.

His muscles and mind were drained, and even the best restorative couldn’t relieve the intense fatigue. Even someone as trained as Qi Yifang struggled to keep up with the non-stop battle.

The other two players were equally exhausted, lying limply in the mud.

Only Tang Erda, after collecting some roses and securing them in sacks, remained standing. With a cold, stoic expression, he said, “I’ll take these. The rest are for you. The workers who helped count my roses are waiting for me in the field.”

Without another word, he turned and walked away.

Qi Yifang watched him go, stunned. He reached out, unsure of what to say. Should he thank the powerful hunter who had protected them all night? But Tang Erda’s cold departure made it clear that his thanks were unnecessary.

It seemed that the mysterious hunter’s protection was driven purely by a sense of duty toward his teammates.

One of the players next to Qi Yifang began counting the roses. Halfway through, he looked up, confused. “Brother Qi, we didn’t collect 80kg of roses each last night, did we?”

Qi Yifang sat up, rubbing his temples. “No, I counted earlier, and it was still a long way off. What’s wrong? Did that hunter take a lot of roses?”

“Well, yes,” the player said, trailing off. “He probably took the roses that completed the job.”

Qi Yifang thought for a moment, realizing that the three of them had likely collected less than 80kg in total, and some roses had gone missing.

“Wait,” he said, a sudden realization dawning on him. “That hunter left enough roses for each of us to reach 80kg?”

The player nodded. “Yes, exactly.”

Qi Yifang was stunned. “How many monsters did he fight alone to gather this much?”

Only after the three men left Bai Liu’s flower field did Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi emerge from the shadows.

Though they had stayed away from the flower fields to avoid contaminating their minds with the perfume, they had not used any themselves. Now, both were feeling the effects.

But this soon became irrelevant.

The processors who came to settle the bill were shocked by the amount of roses Bai Liu had brought.

After weighing the pile multiple times in disbelief, the processor turned to Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi with a suspicious gaze.

“200kg of dried-leaf roses?” the processor asked incredulously. “You gathered this in just one night?”

Bai Liu spoke sincerely, "We have an exceptionally high level of labor coordination; one person can accomplish the work of a hundred kg."

Liu Jiayi nodded eagerly, "Yes, yes!"

Though the processor wasn't convinced and clearly reluctant, the two hundred kilograms of roses sat right in front of the tent, making it undeniable.

The processor shot them a hateful glare, threw four bottles of low-grade rose perfume their way, grabbed the heavy sack of roses, and gestured for them to follow.

"You've been promoted to processor," the processor said coldly. "Competition in this line of work is fierce. If you don't perform well, you could easily be demoted back to a lowly flower picker. Now, follow me and learn how to become a proper processor."

[System Alert: Congratulations to player Bai Liu for exceeding the side quest's requirements.]

[Mission Reward: Player Bai Liu receives 4 bottles of low-level perfume and gains progress in the main mission (promoted to Processor).]

Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi exchanged a glance and followed the processor, returning once again to the rose factory where they had been working day and night.

This was the second time Bai Liu had stepped into the piazza outside the Rose Factory.

The rose petals collected on the piazza were sorted and dried on thick plastic sheets. Processors in tight protective clothing moved back and forth, while several large pots were set up to dry the petals.

"The processors are responsible for collecting freshly picked dried-leaf roses from the lower-level flower pickers," one of them explained.

The processors led Bai Liu inside without a glance, continuing to explain as they walked. "Once collected, the roses are washed and dried here in the piazza and on the roof. After the leaves and stems are removed, the fresh petals are dried under both daylight and moonlight for twelve hours before moving on to the next step."

The processor pointed to the cauldrons in the corner where workers were pouring petals into them.

"Once the petals have dried sufficiently, they are tossed or further dried in these pots until they turn a light pink, like the inner lips of a young girl. At that point, the dried-leaf roses are ready for pre-processing, and you will need to deliver them to the official factory workers for the next stage."

The processors led them down the same long corridor they had walked through before, but this time, instead of going straight, they turned right as they passed the exhibition hall. The narrow corridor stretched ahead.

To the left and right of the hall were serially numbered rooms, reminiscent of prison cells, with a staircase at the end leading upward.

"This is the processors' dormitory," the processor said, gesturing toward the rooms. "You won't be staying in tents anymore. Our dormitories are on three floors, one room per eight people. You can use the stairs to go up. The factory workers' rooms are above, two people per room, and on the top floor, we have the perfumers' rooms. They're single units—spacious and bright. But the factory workers and perfumers' floors are off-limits to lowly processors like us."

"The top floor is for the perfumers' rooms," Bai Liu asked, "So where is the factory manager's room?"

The processor paused at the question, seeming taken aback, and snapped angrily, "The factory manager's room is somewhere you won't be going!"

Bai Liu looked at the processor innocently. "But I need to know where it is, right? So I don't accidentally wander in. What if I break into the factory manager's room by mistake?"

The processor's face tightened slightly, but he sneered, "The factory manager's room isn't somewhere you can wander into just by chance."

"Alright, then," Bai Liu continued, "I'll move on to the next thing. What's upstairs?"

The processor's tone softened. "Up ahead, to the right, is the infirmary. Staff can call in sick there, but if you're lazy, you'll have to come back and work as soon as you're healed."

"Now, let's talk about processor salaries." The processor turned to look at Bai Liu. "As processors, you're now considered half-time employees of the Rose Factory, and you'll receive a base salary of three bottles of low-grade perfume per day as long as you complete your basic tasks."

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. "What are the basic tasks?"

"You'll each need to process 240 kilograms of dried-leaf roses per day for the factory workers," the processor explained.

Liu Jiayi slowly looked up, her voice strained. "Did you just say 240 kilograms?"

The processor sneered, "Yes, 240 kilograms. Your job includes sifting, drying, and processing those roses. It's the most basic task, and if you don't finish it, you won't receive your base salary and will be replaced by upgraded flower pickers after three days."

"For new processors, working all night is the norm to finish the job, and you'll find the dormitories to be a luxury."

The processor gave Bai Liu a false pat on the shoulder. "Oh, and here's something you probably don't need to know, but I'll tell you anyway. The May Rose Festival is coming up, and processors have been given an incentive to work in the factory. For every additional 60 kilograms of roses processed beyond the basic task, you'll get a bottle of medium-grade rose perfume."

"Do a good job," the processor mocked, "Don't keep wandering around thinking about the factory manager. If you don't finish your tasks, you'll be left behind in three days."

"With your current work badges, you can levy roses from the flower pickers. Take as much as you can handle, but remember, the roses you pick won't stay fresh for more than half a day. Any wasted roses will be deducted from your pay. Over there is where you can collect your processor uniforms. Change and get to work."

The processors showed Bai Liu where to change and then quickly turned away, with Rose in tow, heading back to the open-air factory.

[System Prompt: Trigger a side quest - Get a bottle of medium-grade

Rose Dried Leaf Gas perfume.]

Liu Jiayi stood in silence for a moment before speaking. "240 kilograms for daily tasks and 60 kilograms for bonus tasks. That's a total of 300 kilograms of dried-leaf roses to process. Even if we work non-stop for 24 hours, that's still 12.5 kilograms per hour…"

"No," Bai Liu interjected, "It's more than that. Since the drying process takes a full day and night after collection, we won't even be able to start on the first day. And according to what the processor said, if we don't finish the basic tasks in three days, we'll be replaced. So in the next two days, we'll need to process 360 kilograms. And if we also add the bonus tasks…"

Bai Liu shrugged calmly. "Well, it's just normal overtime for us working stiffs. I can live with that."

Liu Jiayi sighed. "..."

Liu Jiayi was starting to dread entering society too soon.

Bai Liu and his team went to collect their uniforms. Normally, they would have gone to the flower fields to collect roses as instructed, but Bai Liu was relieved to leave Liu Jiayi alone to handle 720 kilograms of roses. Waving his hand, he said he had to go.

Liu Jiayi, speechless, called after him, "I can't handle that much alone. You'd better come back soon."

"I know," Bai Liu replied with a grin, lowering his eyes to the four bottles of perfume he was holding. "I'm just going to get some help, aren't I?"

As Bai Liu turned to leave, Liu Jiayi called out to him, "Wait!"

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow and turned back.

[System Alert: Player Liu Jiayi spent 200 points to activate the (Small TV Mute) service.]

Liu Jiayi glanced around to make sure no one was near, then stepped closer to Bai Liu and whispered, "I told you about the four players you lured in last night, three of whom were senior members of the King's Guild, right?"

Bai Liu nodded.

"I think it's that hunter working with the King's Guild," Liu Jiayi said, her frown deepening. "The hunter's target is obviously you, and I think the King's Guild is working with him because their target is me."

Liu Jiayi paused for a moment, her lips pressed together before speaking again. "Hearts… The Queen has high expectations of me. She's training me to be a tactician for this mission. If I betray the guild, it would have a huge impact on the King's Guild's standing in this league…"

"By you blatantly bringing me into the game, the group is probably coming for you. With how the Queen works, she's bound to think that if I kill you, I'll return to the King's Guild…"

Liu Jiayi tugged at the oversized protective suit she was wearing, her fingers nervously twisting behind her back. She looked away and muttered a quick apology, "Sorry, I know this is troubling for you."

There was a reason Liu Jiayi said this. If Bai Liu had simply saved her and let her heal her injuries, she could have been thrown into the Level 3 game to pass and come out on her own.

This would have kept Bai Liu from becoming a target for the Hearts Guild and allowed Liu Jiayi to heal quickly and escape. It would have been the best solution, though admittedly without much conscience.

But doing that would have left Liu Jiayi alone to face the King's Guild. The King's Guild wouldn't harm her, but they would try to restrict her freedom and keep her trapped in the guild for the tournament.

Hearts' brainwashing skills were effective, and with all their mental manipulation techniques, it wouldn't be hard for them to control Liu Jiayi's loyalty to the King's Guild.

Liu Jiayi feared falling under the Queen's spell again and becoming the same confused, doubting person she once was.

Bai Liu, however, had entered this situation alongside her, clearly to protect her and take on the King's Guild directly, using himself as a diversion.

Liu Jiayi wasn't foolish. She knew Bai Liu was asking for trouble to help her, and that's why she offered her apology.

--Although she had once saved Bai Liu's life by taking a bullet for him, it was only a way to return the favor.

Little Bai Liu saved her once at the orphanage, and Bai Liu had saved her from death at the church.

Now, it was her turn to owe him. Liu Jiayi was somewhat regretful, knowing her debt to Bai Liu wasn’t going to be settled anytime soon.

After her quiet apology, she quickly glanced up to gauge Bai Liu’s reaction. When he calmly said, "Is that really how you're going to apologize?"

Liu Jiayi: "..."

The Rose Factory

Liu Jiayi expressionlessly lifts the poison.

Bai Liu glances at the steaming glass bottle in her hand and quickly changes his tone: "It was a whisper, but I heard it clearly, a thunderous apology—just like I expected from Liu Jiayi's little friend."

Liu Jiayi holds her forehead in frustration. "You don't give me the benefit of the doubt, then go off and do something dangerous. I'm asking you this because I need to know—do you have a solution?"

Bai Liu, who rarely talks to his teammates about his plans, appears pleasant but is a dictatorial leader when it comes to executing his strategies. He only expects others to follow without questioning his decisions because his plans are fixed. There's little reason to share them, after all.

The truth is, this "sick-brained king" is always the one on the frontlines, carrying out his dangerous schemes.

"When you come up with a plan, talk to your teammates," Liu Jiayi, a reserve tactician with advanced league training, sighs in frustration. "If there are unexpected changes, I can assist with maneuvering."

Bai Liu watches Liu Jiayi quietly as she speaks, waiting for her to finish.

Liu Jiayi meets his gaze. "I understand why you didn't share your plan with the others. It's because your plans are so extreme, so finely tuned, that there's no room for error. Telling anyone wouldn't change anything."

"You're great at the game, Bai Liu. You win every gamble, but you're playing a different kind of match now."

"In the league, your approach is a failure."

Liu Jiayi continues, "You're not playing against a fixed game—you're up against five highly coordinated players. Teams bring far more unpredictability than a game ever could."

"Don't underestimate your opponents," she urges. "And don't underestimate your teammates."

Liu Jiayi steps closer, her fist clenched. "Tell me about your plans."

Bai Liu stands still for a moment, then stares at Liu Jiayi, who refuses to look away.

Liu Jiayi is right—Bai Liu has grown accustomed to making decisions alone, giving orders instead of collaborating. Most of his previous teammates, like Mu Sicheng, weren't sharp enough to keep up with him. Others, like Muke, were dependent on him and had a psychological barrier. Neither could truly contribute to the planning phase, and following Bai Liu's lead could either bring riches or disaster.

But Liu Jiayi is different. She's the first teammate who's capable of effective counter-strategizing, and her analytical mind is just as sharp as Bai Liu's.

Liu Jiayi's tactical knowledge, experience, and maturity surpass even Bai Liu's in some areas. She's not like the players he's worked with before.

In the last round, Liu Jiayi even played against two league-level players despite his emotional vulnerability and triggered the main storyline to save Bai Liu. He was the first to find Bai Liu after the match and the first to realize something was off when Tang Erda took a bullet for him.

Bai Liu couldn't deny it—Liu Jiayi was a teammate worth having a serious conversation with. His advice was practical, grounded, and effective.

To Bai Liu's surprise, Liu Jiayi's words have an effect. He squats down to meet her eye level, admitting his mistake. "You're right. I should've shared the plan with you."

Liu Jiayi blinks, taken aback.

Sitting cross-legged on the ground to lower his height, Bai Liu accesses his panel and explains his plan openly. "Here's the strategy... Their main goal is to kill me in order to capture you. If that's the case, we can do this..."

Liu Jiayi listens intently before cutting in. "No. You'll be used as bait. You can't fish for five people alone; it's too risky. If anything goes wrong, you're as good as dead."

Bai Liu considers her advice. "Is there a way to reduce the risk?"

Liu Jiayi pauses, then browses her system panel. After a moment, she pulls out a Hearts Ace playing card. "This is a skill card given to me by the Queen. It can protect me and can only be used once in the game."

She hands it to Bai Liu. "Based on your plan, I think this could help reduce the risk."

Bai Liu examines the card, then looks back at Liu Jiayi. "You're asking me to make both of us bait, huh?" He grins, taking the card between his fingers. "I trust your ability to escape as bait. This gives me a great tactical idea."

"Is there someone on the team you're particularly close to?" Bai Liu asks, casually stuffing the card into his pocket and standing up.

Liu Jiayi thinks for a moment. "Yes. Qi Yifang. I've saved him more than once."

Bai Liu's eyes brighten. "Ah, I remember hearing about Qi Yifang. He has a unique skill set that could be useful in the processor segment."

He turns, walking ahead, then suddenly stops and looks back at Liu Jiayi, his expression full of gentle curiosity. "Really? Can you tell me more about him?"

Liu Jiayi smiles inwardly, knowing that Bai Liu's delight signals another "recruitment" for his schemes.

I'm sorry, Qi Yifang -- Liu Jiayi silently apologises in her heart.

Qi Yifang sneezes, rubs his nose, and continues struggling with his black protective suit, hopping on one foot to put on his boots.

The other two King's Guild players are changing clothes, their faces full of concern.

They haven't played many level 3 games, though they've watched plenty of videos to prepare. This is their first time encountering such strange game rules.

240kg of dried leaf roses—this is no game, it's a job!

"Brother Qi, it's really hard for us to continue at this pace," one of the King's Guild players says. "All three of us are stuck at 720kg of dried leaf roses per day now. With sifting, drying, and concocting, we don't have enough time."

After dressing, Qi Yifang pats his thick protective suit, which feels a little uncomfortable. He recalls the main steps of the work process he saw earlier in the piazza.

...sifting out stalks, drying, drying, and concocting...

After briefly running through the steps in his head, Qi Yifang remains calm. He casually pats the two worried players on the shoulder, giving them a thumbs-up and a confident smile.

"I don't know how to pick roses, but I can handle the processes of drying the roses!"

The two King's Guild players exchange a quick glance, and suddenly the realization hits them.

Right!

Qi Yifang's skills are perfect for this!

He's a [weather observer]!

Tang Erda tightened the collar of his suit, exposing one ankle beneath. He moved uncomfortably, the zipper on the collar and waist too tight, and the suit itself slightly too small for him.

The factory worker who had brought him here scratched his head, looking a bit flustered. "This is the largest size of protective clothing. Wait here; I'll go see if there's an extra-large one available for you."

"You're too tall..." The factory worker's gaze subtly shifted to the tight arms of the suit, the fabric pulling against Tang Erda's muscles. "And over-muscled..."

Great workout for the new processor...

Tang Erda ignored the factory worker's lingering gaze. He politely removed his protective clothing and handed it back to him. "Please."

"But it's good to be muscular," the factory worker remarked with a smile. "After all, being a processor is physically demanding. Do a good job, and when you move up from processor to factory worker, you'll be a full-time employee and won’t be easily let go."

As the factory worker turned to leave, Tang Erda, who had been quiet up to this point, suddenly spoke up. "May I ask, do the processors all work together?"

The factory worker paused, thinking. "Not really. The open square in the factory where the dried leaf roses are handled is divided into four sections—southeast, northwest, and so on. The drying area is large enough to dry them near the flower fields, but they have to be guarded there to prevent theft. It’s better to dry them inside the factory."

"But if you’re a new processor, you won’t be able to grab a spot inside the factory," the factory worker continued, shaking his head. "The veteran processors will push you out, so you’ll only be able to dry them outside."

"Is there a place where all the processors work together?" Tang Erda asked.

The factory worker thought for a moment. "Yes, there is. After drying, everything is weighed centrally at the entrance on the north side of the factory."

"Oh, and one more thing," the factory worker added, returning with Tang Erda's clothes. "Be careful with the weather while drying the roses. If it rains, you’ll be in trouble. Any leaves that don’t fully dry will get moldy, and if the roses get moldy, the factory will punish the processors for wasting them."

The Rose Factory

Beside a field of roses, hundreds of kilograms of roses were gathered and stacked on a hill, facing the field. Qi Yifang stood before the roses, pulling out a directional marker that swung gently with the wind. He raised it toward the hill of roses, closed his eyes, and took a deep breath.

"… Air relative humidity: 78%, temperature: 26°C, cloudy to overcast, wind shifting from north at force one, light breeze..."

Qi Yifang's eyes snapped open. He adjusted the wooden directional marker with his thumb, his voice calm and steady: "Now, let's move on to today's daytime weather forecast."

[System Alert: Player Qi Yifang uses the skill (Weather Broadcast)]

[Skill Usage Range: A localized circular area with a radius of ten meters]

[Technique Effect: Predicts the weather in a local area and controls wind direction, wind speed, sunlight, rain, and possible weather changes within a designated area.]

[Note: This skill will drain a certain amount of stamina and mental strength. Are you sure you want to use it?]

[Confirm: OK]

The wooden directional marker in Qi Yifang's hand began to swing rapidly as the system processed the command, and his stamina and mental strength bars on his personal panel started to deplete.

Qi Yifang exhaled deeply and began broadcasting in a deep voice.

"… Light tornadoes with local winds for object weighting around 2g throughout the day, followed by twelve hours of sunshine, light winds overnight, cloudy to clear skies..."

The weathervane in his hand shifted from swaying side to side to spinning steadily as his words continued.

A cold, swirling wind suddenly formed, stopping at a small area beside the field. It began to swirl around the mound of roses, which weighed about 2g. The gentle rotation of the wind lifted the lighter impurities, blowing them away, while the heavier debris remained undisturbed on the ground.

This magical tornado, calibrated to specific weight parameters, acted like a high-tech centrifuge, perfectly separating the roses from the rest of the debris.

In just ten minutes, what would have taken all day and night to sift through was cleaned, tidied up, and neatly stacked in a crumpled heap.

Qi Yifang retracted the weathervane, surveying the pile of dried leaf roses in front of him. He brushed off the scattered grass and debris from his clothes, turned with a satisfied smile, and looked at the two men beside him.

"It’s all taken care of. We can move on to the second session by tomorrow morning."

Rose Factory Piazza

A long queue had formed around a fully automatic mesh sieving apparatus.

This machine was a rare modern piece of equipment in a rose factory, where the roses were simply poured in for a few minutes of sifting, resulting in clean, dried leaf roses after sorting.

However, since the Rose Factory prided itself on its handcrafted, anti-industrial perfume brand, such machines were few and far between, and the old processors treated them like their own personal privilege.

Qi Yifang's group was about to queue up to use the apparatus, but they were quickly chased away by the older processors. The processors scolded them for being lazy, accusing them of trying to take shortcuts by using the machinery so soon after their promotion, and for not doing their jobs properly.

Although Qi Yifang and his companions weren’t intimidated by the processors, they understood the importance of not offending the NPCs in the game. They had a way of handling the work—namely, Qi Yifang's skills.

Using a skill that drained mental energy in a game where such energy could not be replenished wasn't ideal, but Qi Yifang didn't want to escalate things. Their main objective was to save the little witch, so, in the end, he chose to hold his breath and move on with his companions.

But things took a turn when Tang Erda stepped into the queue.

The old processors, noticing he was a new recruit, immediately began muttering impatiently.

"Why are you newcomers so clueless?! Ah?! Trying to steal our instruments already! Do your job!" one of them barked.

"That's right. You just started, and already you're trying to use machinery to be lazy. If you don't learn the ropes, you'll be demoted. We're just trying to help you out," another processor sneered.

Tang Erda silently scanned the processors who were glaring at him. He didn't say a word, but his tall, muscular frame and the snug, fitted protective suit made it clear that he wasn't someone to be messed with.

The processors fell quiet, muttering under their breath but too intimidated to speak openly.

Just as Tang Erda was nearing the front of the line, an older processor cut in front of him, throwing him a provocative look. He clapped his hands and signaled for someone behind Tang Erda to also cut in.

It was clear that this processor was trying to prevent Tang Erda from using the apparatus, treating him as a newcomer who didn't deserve it.

Wouldn't the new recruits be more productive if they could use the instruments? But if the old processors didn't squeeze out the newcomers, it would be harder for them to climb the ranks to factory workers.

The Rose Factory had a high turnover rate among its workers, and the old processors knew that in order to advance, they needed to push the new recruits out of the way, using unspoken rules to squeeze out the newcomers' potential, ensuring their own promotions.

This was an accepted practice, even if it meant effectively ruining the newcomers' chances and forcing them into early demotion.

Qi Yifang, caught in the same predicament, saw no other option but to leave. They hadn't fully figured out the dynamics of this third-tier game yet, and provoking a large group of NPCs was not a good idea.

But Tang Erda wasn't afraid of offending the NPCs.

He was strong enough to take on the challenges of a Level 3 game, and if this situation led to him attracting hate from the processors, it would be the processors who would turn into monsters, not him.

Tang Erda shifted the sack of roses to his left hand, and with a cool, indifferent motion, a silver gun materialized in his right hand.

The heavy gun spun around his index finger before being lifted and aimed at the back of the older processor's head.

"I don't mind killing people before I start work," Tang Erda said calmly, his tone cold. "My previous job was to eliminate those who went bad. Do you think you're bad enough now?"

The older processor, who had been smug just moments ago, froze. His face drained of color, and with a nervous gulp, he stepped aside.

Tang Erda walked past him, pouring the roses into the sieving apparatus with no further words. He sifted the roses, filled the sack with the sorted flowers, tucked the gun behind his waist, and threw the sack over his shoulder. Without a word, he walked away.

The processors, who had just tried to give Tang Erda a hard time, quickly cleared a path for him, scowling in silence.

"What the hell is wrong with this new batch of processors?!" the processor who had been held at gunpoint muttered after making sure Tang Erda was out of sight. "They're either stealing our instruments or somehow finishing their work in no time. Two of them haven't even started sifting yet!"

"It's almost noon, and they've disappeared. If we don't start drying soon, we won't have enough roses to meet the required weight when we weigh them tomorrow." The processor gloated. "These two newcomers will probably be demoted straight to flower pickers."

Inside the Abandoned Factory

Bai Liu stood on a rusted shipping container, surrounded by a group of stragglers who had recently regained their senses.

The stragglers, still disoriented from their awakening by Bai Liu's perfume, sat obediently on the grimy floor, their eyes lifted toward him as if he were a savior— the last flicker of hope in their despair.

"I'm sure you all know Mr. Bai Liu," said a straggler standing next to Bai Liu on the container. This was the same man who had led them the previous night. He stood a half-step behind Bai Liu with deep respect, his eyes gleaming as he introduced him to the others. "The rose perfume you all received was earned by Mr. Bai Liu working in the factory. He distributed it to us for free!"

These words stirred a brief murmur among the stragglers, which quickly settled when the speaker pressed his hands down, signaling for calm.

"Alright, alright, please, no excitement just yet. Mr. Bai Liu has more good news for us." The straggler excitedly stepped back and gestured for Bai Liu to speak. "Now, please, Bai Liu, say a few words to us!"

Bai Liu stepped forward, his voice calm yet clear. The stragglers fell silent, their attention fixed on him. His voice resonated in the empty, decaying factory, undisturbed by the dilapidation around them.

"I want to help you from the bottom of my heart," Bai Liu began, pulling out a fresh bottle of perfume from his pocket. His expression was serene, his tone sincere. "But as it stands, I am only a lowly processor in the factory, earning my wages like everyone else, paid regularly each day."

"I can currently earn up to three bottles of low-grade perfume a day. A single bottle lasts up to four hours, but with that amount, I can't afford to keep all of you awake for long. At this rate, I won't be able to help you for much longer."

His words caused the stragglers' faces to fall. Their hope dimmed.

But no one voiced anger or disappointment. After all, Bai Liu had been their divine-like figure, offering them a glimmer of humanity, however fleeting. It had been so long since they had felt human that they struggled to remember what it even meant. Their bones itched from the growing tentacles beneath their skin, their minds clouded by the perfume. They hadn't felt truly human in ages, and yet, here was Bai Liu, offering them a reprieve, if only for a short time.

"But if you are willing to help me," Bai Liu continued, his voice steady, "I can help you for much longer."

The stragglers, who had lowered their heads in despair, raised them now in cautious hope.

Bai Liu spoke deliberately, "There's a limit to what I can do alone, but if you help me work in the factory and produce more perfume, I promise that every bottle we produce will be used to help more of our kind. Together, we can awaken even more stragglers. We can bring them into our ranks until I become the factory manager."

The stragglers listened intently, their eyes bright with longing.

"The day I become factory manager," Bai Liu said firmly, "I promise that every bottle of rose perfume produced will be free—forever."

His words were a sweet temptation.

The stragglers couldn't suppress their nervous excitement. But there was also a lingering doubt in their eyes. They had been promised such things before. In the past, manufacturers had lured them with promises of free perfume, only to later sell it at exorbitant prices.

Bai Liu's offer was a double-edged sword—a promise they had heard many times before, but one they had no choice but to entertain. They had no other options. They could either believe in Bai Liu's words, or resign themselves to the slow agony of their existence.

Finally, one woman—half-decayed, her body withered—raised a trembling, bony hand. She spoke softly, "Mr. Bai Liu... would you really make a good factory manager?"

In her arms, she cradled a baby, its feet withered, its body on the brink of death. The baby's black, slithery eyes were as decayed as hers, its small form at odds with the roses growing from its eyes, so out of place for its age.

Her voice cracked as she asked, tears brimming in her eyes, "If you become factory manager... will you truly be someone who helps us? Will you help my child?"

Bai Liu's answer was blunt, his gaze unwavering. "No. There's a good chance I won't be. I'm only saying this now to get you to work for me, just like the last factory manager who promoted the rose perfume."

The stragglers froze, shocked by his brutal honesty.

Some of them stood, their fists clenched, rage flickering in their eyes. The faint hope they had clung to evaporated, replaced by anger and a sense of betrayal. Others lowered their heads, their hearts resigned.

The young mother, her tears streaming, covered her face and sobbed, murmuring her child's name.

Yet, no one attacked Bai Liu.

Even though he had openly admitted his deception, he was still their last hope—their only chance to escape the nightmare of rose perfume. As long as they could briefly escape the addiction that gnawed at their bones, they had no choice but to follow him, even deeper into the hell he promised to save them from.

Bai Liu scanned the stragglers below, noting the mix of emotions on their faces.

He had just given them the truth—the truth they might not want to hear—but it was still the truth. He had offered them no illusions, no empty promises. Yet, in their desperate state, they would continue to believe. For as long as the perfume existed, the vicious cycle would continue. Hope would always be fragile, and faith would be their prison.

"I'm not a good person," Bai Liu said flatly, his gaze unwavering. "No one who becomes factory manager will be. But if I become the manager, I promise you this—I will find a way to make the rose perfume disappear, to end your suffering."

His voice was calm, but there was steel in his words. "Help me become the factory manager, and I will help you end this curse. This is a deal of equals. Will you do it?"

Slowly, the stragglers' expressions changed. Doubt still lingered, but a flicker of hope began to rekindle.

The young mother, her voice trembling with emotion, stood and raised her child, asking in disbelief, "Mr. Bai Liu... do you truly have a way to end our suffering? To end my child's curse?"

Bai Liu smiled. A faint rose petal bloomed in his right eye, the sixth one, as he replied, "If I can't do it, I'll wither too."

"I've given you most of the perfume I've received. You can watch me closely. If I don't find a way to relieve us, I'll be the first to wither. Will you trust me?"

The silence that followed was thick with tension.

Finally, the young mother collapsed into sobs, her body shaking as she hugged her child. "Thank you... thank you!!!"

The stragglers, with renewed hope, looked at Bai Liu with a mixture of awe and determination. They raised him up, throwing him into the air, the rose in their eyes burning faintly yet resolutely. The faint light of hope flickered in their hearts, stronger than before.

The Rose Factory

Beside a Field of Roses

Liu Jiayi, exhausted and panting from the pile of dried leaf roses she had collected, sat on the ground, sipping a refreshing drink.

There's no way to store this pile of rubbish roses in a space prop. It has to be carried by hand!

It took her three hours to gather enough dried leaf roses for a total of seven hundred and twenty kilograms. After their two-day task to dispose of 480kg, they still had 240kg left, enough to exchange for four bottles of medium-grade perfume.

Liu Jiayi checked the payroll. The Intermediate Rose perfume, with a fragrance strength of 50-80% and a lasting power of 12 hours, triples the duration of its scent.

If they can collect that much mid-level perfume, it'll help more stragglers regain their senses and join them.

But only if they can manage to process all these roses.

Wiping her mouth after drinking the restorative, Liu Jiayi stood up, turning to face the stragglers behind her.

Bai Liu stood in front of them, the stragglers cowering behind him, subtly bowing and nodding toward Liu Jiayi.

Despite her youthful appearance, there was a natural awe for Liu Jiayi, who worked at the Rose Factory.

"These are the stragglers I found who know more about the work of the processors." Bai Liu stepped aside to reveal the group behind him. "Some were once processors at the Rose Factory but were sidelined and laid off."

At Bai Liu's signal, the stragglers, initially hesitant, gained the courage to step forward. They crouched down and began sorting the roses on the ground.

They worked quickly and efficiently, quickly falling into a steady rhythm. They were skilled, their actions almost mechanical as they sorted and flattened the roses into drying patches.

These seasoned workers were far more capable than novices like Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi, who were unaccustomed to the work. Their efficiency, however, made up for the lack of experience. Some of the processors sifted as quickly as the machinery.

Liu Jiayi had initially planned to join the stragglers in sorting the roses but quickly realized her dirty hands would only make them uncomfortable. She stepped back.

Bai Liu, on the other hand, lazily stayed away from the roses, watching the scene unfold without joining in.

Liu Jiayi saw him and didn't tease him for being lazy. Instead, she felt a twinge of mixed emotions and sighed softly.

Bai Liu, having shared most of his perfume with the civilians, needed to avoid the roses to prevent his spirit level from dropping too quickly. In a game where perfume was the primary means of restoring one's spirit, he was taking a significant risk by staying away from the roses.

But Bai Liu didn’t seem particularly bothered by it.

Once the roses were sorted, the stragglers took Bai Liu to a hidden spot where they usually dried the roses. There, they carefully laid them out, nodded to Bai Liu to signal they would return the next day if needed, and left.

Spending too much time with the roses would cause the perfume to dissipate faster.

“It takes twelve hours of daylight drying and twelve hours of nighttime drying,” Liu Jiayi said, glancing at the time. “We won’t finish drying until noon tomorrow, which will give us some time before the others’ weighing.”

“But I’m sure they’ll wait for you,” she added, turning to Bai Liu. “So, what will you do then?”

“Let them catch me,” Bai Liu smiled. “But they won't be bothered to kill me.”

---------- ----

The Next Day

By noon, the north entrance to the rose fields became the main point of activity.

Qi Yifang, already having been weighed, stood by the weighing point with his arms crossed. Tang Erda leaned casually against the entrance, his sack in hand, his dark circles suggesting he had stayed up all night, though his spirits were high.

Tang Erda's batch of dried leaf roses was still being weighed, but the processor handling them looked visibly strained.

To minimize errors, the roses were weighed in 5kg batches. A pile of dried leaf roses had already accumulated at the processor's feet.

"715kg, 720kg, 735kg…" the processor took a deep breath and looked at Tang Erda. "Are you sure you want to weigh that much at once? If you can't properly dry them and some turn moldy, you'll be fined!"

Tang Erda handed over the last sack nonchalantly. "It won't go to waste. Weigh it."

Qi Yifang watched with a mix of complexity and sadness. The three of them, using their skills, had only managed to gather 100kg more than Tang Erda.

What exactly does this man do in real life? Is he a professional rose breeder? Why is he so familiar with this process?

After Tang Erda finished weighing his roses, the processor moved on to the next batch, quickly handling the drying process.

As Liu Jiayi had predicted, Qi Yifang and Tang Erda stayed on the sidelines despite having finished their weighing early.

They stood, staring at the rose field, clearly waiting for Bai Liu, who hadn't yet arrived to be weighed.

The sun was now at its peak, casting a bright and oppressive heat across the fields. Most processors had already been weighed and gone to work.

The processor in charge of weighing was preparing to pack up when a group of people, small and large, appeared on the horizon, dragging a sack placed on a trolley.

The heat of the midday sun distorted their figures on the ground, making them appear and disappear, yet they still caught everyone's attention.

Qi Yifang uncrossed his arms and took the directional sign in his hand, his expression serious.

Tang Erda stood up straight, snapping out of his seemingly relaxed posture, his gaze sharpening. His right hand moved toward his trousers, and a revolver appeared in his grip, loaded and ready.

Before the group could approach, Tang Erda raised his pistol, and Qi Yifang's weathervane began to turn.

But soon, both men were caught off guard.

Although two people arrived at the weighing point, one of them was Liu Jiayi, and the other was just an ordinary drifter.

The drifter, who seemed to have been hired by Liu Jiayi to carry the roses with perfume, nodded to her gratefully after she sprayed his face with perfume before quickly leaving.

"Where's Bai Liu?" Tang Erda raised his gun toward Liu Jiayi, his voice cold. "Why didn't he come to the weigh-in?"

Liu Jiayi acted as though she hadn't noticed the gun pointed at her. After handing the trolley with dried roses to the processor, she turned to Tang Erda with a confused expression and innocent tone. "What Bai Liu? I didn't enter the game with him. I haven't seen him. These roses I picked and dried myself—they're all going under my name. What's he got to do with it?"

Tang Erda's brow furrowed, but he didn't lower the gun.

Something's not right. If Bai Liu hadn't been with Liu Jiayi, then he wouldn't be able to register his roses for drying. Without this, he wouldn't be able to enter the workflow or turn in his roses for processing.

Failure to register ingredients was a serious offense for a processor. If Bai Liu didn't show up today, he'd be demoted to a flower picker and would miss the chance to turn in his dried roses in two days.

Qi Yifang, who had been ready to join the fight, had no reaction to the gun pointed at Liu Jiayi. But when he snapped back to reality, he almost slipped out of position.

That's not what we agreed on, hunter! I thought we weren't supposed to rough up the little witch!

That's my former goddess… now daughter… the one who saved my life!

Qi Yifang stepped forward, raising his hands in a gesture to de-escalate. He looked straight at Tang Erda's gun. "Mr. Hunter, our enemy is Bai Liu now. First, let's unite. The little witch is only eight years old. It seems she was tricked by Bai Liu."

With cold sweat dripping from his forehead, Qi Yifang carefully moved Tang Erda's gun away, but Tang Erda merely shot him a sharp glance. With a flick of his wrist, the gun moved past Qi Yifang and aimed straight at Liu Jiayi.

"I didn't promise not to hurt Liu Jiayi outside the game either," Tang Erda said, his eyes cold and his gaze fixed. The dark blue of his eyes was like a pool of blood, chilling to the bone. "I only promised to join you in killing Bai Liu."

The Rose Factory

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

What Tang Erda wanted from the King's Guild was simple: he wanted them to "fill" the remaining gap in the game and prevent Bai Liu from escaping, which the King's Guild had already done before entering the game. However, once inside the game, the goals of the King's Guild diverged from his own.

The issue with the Little Witch was where a clear disagreement arose. It was likely the reason Hearts insisted on inserting people into the game alongside Tang Erda—people who could see that the Little Witch's injuries were tied to him. These individuals were sent in by Hearts with a greater purpose than simply killing Bai Liu. They were assigned to protect the Little Witch under Tang Erda's command.

This explains why Tang Erda did not take the initiative to act alongside Qi Yifang from the start.

We can work together toward a common goal for a brief time, but there's no need for lasting unity. Eventually, alliances born from different purposes will fall apart.

Qi Yifang, gripping Tang Erda's arm with one hand, and Tang Erda, with his dark eyes, locked in a silent confrontation. Cold sweat beaded at the tips of their noses and down their backs, while the two other men surrounded Tang Erda nervously. Despite the tension, Tang Erda remained emotionless, his gun raised.

Qi Yifang gritted his teeth, fully understanding why Tang Erda hadn't dropped his gun in this three-person standoff.

Because they couldn't defeat him. It was a clear display of superior strength—Tang Erda only needed three shots to bring them all down. His gun skills were fast and precise, and his hand-to-hand combat was formidable.

Qi Yifang's right arm clenched around Tang Erda's, his entire body weight hanging from it, attempting to force his hand down, but Tang Erda's right hand remained steady, supporting his weight as if she were a monster, keeping his gun aimed at Liu Jiayi.

The processor next to them looked on, nearly dumbfounded.

Liu Jiayi took a step forward, but Tang Erda's arm, with Qi Yifang on it, followed her with a measured step, the gun still aimed at her. Yet Liu Jiayi didn't panic. Instead, she calmly addressed the bewildered processor. "Could you please weigh the rose quickly?"

"... Oh, yes," the processor stammered, his mind in a daze as he hastily took measurements, still unsettled and fearful.

Liu Jiayi turned her head, the cold muzzle of the gun now barely a centimeter from her brow, a distance that would surely have killed her with a single shot.

But in the game, even a shot to the head could be survivable, as long as her life wasn't entirely erased by the bullet. The Little Witch had the power to revive as long as she could access the antidote.

Liu Jiayi raised her head, pulling off her black hood to reveal a delicate, obedient girl's face. She wore oversized, transparent goggles, through which sunlight refracted into a dark, intricate film of black light, intertwining with the silvery gleam from the gun barrel in front of her eyes.

Liu Jiayi looked at Tang Erda, her smile sudden and eerie. She quickly reached out and grabbed Tang Erda's gun, her slender finger pressing the trigger.

As Tang Erda stood there, stunned, Liu Jiayi's expression remained composed, her fingers pressing down with swift resolve.

At the same time, a completely different, terrified shriek escaped her, "... Don't shoot me! Don't—!"

"Bang!"

The muzzle flared, the muffled sound of the bullet hitting flesh rang out, and the silver bullet pierced Liu Jiayi's skull, spilling a line of bright red blood onto the ground as she collapsed, her body slowly crumpling to the floor.

As Liu Jiayi fell behind Qi Yihang, the movements around them slowed, as if frozen in time within their small three-person enclosure.

Tang Erda watched in disbelief as Liu Jiayi hit the ground, blood spilling out around her.

Qi Yihang, who had been facing away from Liu Jiayi, froze as he heard the shot. His pupils constricted as he spun around, sweat flying off his jaw.

Liu Jiayi's goggles slipped off, and her lifeless, gray eyes stared vacantly, a bloodshot wound between her brows. Blood pooled at her lips, which had parted slightly in shock before death overtook her.

She was near death, unable to use her skills or defend herself, with no one left to save her but herself.

The Little Witch, who had saved his life countless times... was not protected by him and was struck by Tang Erda's bullet.

She would likely die in front of him.

Qi Yifang's pupils widened, his breath quickening as cold sweat dripped from his chin. His expression became one of numb disbelief, as if his soul had temporarily left his body, only to be pulled back by a sharp pain in his temple.

[System Warning: Qi Yifang's spirit level has faltered! Please recover quickly!]

His breath came in shallow, ragged gasps, but he forced himself to regain control.

Slowly, Qi Yifang turned his head to face Tang Erda. His grip on the wheel tightened, the motion so rapid it was almost a blur, with only the faintest trace of the wind vane visible.

Two deep breaths steadied him as he gripped the wheel with a vice-like hold.

Calm down, Qi Yifang. You can't beat him! Unless you're willing to fight to the death and lower your spirit level to the point of explosion, you have no chance against this hunter. Right now, you're leading the group—don't lose control! The Little Witch's debt can wait; avenge her later... Make sure to avenge her!

But right now, the priority is survival. Don't let emotions cloud your judgment—protect the Little Witch's retreat!

Liu Jiayi, lying on the ground, gave a small, triumphant smile as Qi Yifang struggled to regain composure.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu uses Player Muke's Personal Panel to activate Player Muke's skill (Flashing Strike).]

A blurred figure, nearly torn apart by speed, suddenly appeared between Qi Yifang and a disoriented Tang Erda.

Bai Liu, armed with a whip in one hand and a dagger in the other, leapt between them, forcing Tang Erda to draw his gun and shoot as he reacted instinctively.

Bai Liu struck with his whip, aiming for Tang Erda's face. Tang Erda, fast and skilled, dodged with a quick side-step, but Bai Liu was already moving, slamming his fist down toward him.

Tang Erda's left fist collided with Bai Liu's face in a swift, decisive blow, but Bai Liu spun and dropped to one knee on Qi Yifang's shoulder to avoid the punch, his movements fluid and precise.

Tang Erda's fist followed, nearly landing on Bai Liu's nose, but Bai Liu ducked, bending backward, pulling Qi Yifang with him in the process.

In the chaos, Liu Jiayi, who had feigned death behind Qi Yifang, sprang to her feet, kicking Tang Erda's gun from her hand in one swift motion.

With Qi Yifang still pinned under Bai Liu, Liu Jiayi, bloodied but determined, glared at the two members of the King's Guild and shouted, "What are you waiting for? Attack before he gets his gun back!"

Tang Erda's gun shattered into particles as it was kicked away. He pulled his hand from under Qi Yifang's arm with a steely expression, the gun reforming in his grasp.

But it was just enough time for the others to gather their strength, preparing to trap Tang Erda for a brief moment.

The scariest part of Tang Erda's ability was his speed. If they didn't eliminate him completely, they would only be stalling for time before he killed them all.

And that was exactly what Bai Liu wanted.

Bai Liu raised his dagger, and Tang Erda quickly responded, preparing to counter. But Bai Liu, with a smile, turned and backhandedly stabbed the dagger into Qi Yifang's shoulder.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu attacked Player Qi Yifang with (Flash Attack), reducing Qi Yifang's Spirit Level by 27 points.]

[System Warning: Qi Yifang's Spirit Level has dropped to 13 points, entering Berserk Phase!]

[Player Qi Yifang’s Panel (Berserk Status)]

[Spiritual Value: 40 → 13]

[Strength: 1339 → 1873]

[Agility: 1795 → 2010]

[Attack: 2700 → 6100]

[Resistance: 1840 → 2100]

[Defensive Power: Increased, total attributes over 10,000. Rated as S Player, Qi Yifang's level increased to Brass S.]

[Congratulations, Player Qi Yifang! Your potential panel value has reached S level, unlocking the Brass pseudo-god rating! Collect faith points to ascend to godhood!]

Qi Yifang’s pupils contracted to the size of pinpricks, and his hand shook violently, spinning the steering wheel so fast that it became a blur, moving like a fan oscillating from the force.

He stared at Tang Erda, his expression vacant, the wind swirling around him, a subtle breeze ripping at his trousers.

[System Alert: Player Qi Yifang activates personal skill “Monster Book: Announcer of Extreme Weather.”]

Chapter End Notes

Liu Jiayi literally shot herself in the head

The Rose Factory

Qi Yifang shakily raised his directional indicator, muttering under his breath:

"…Extraordinary gale force winds with gusts of 14 or more, clearing to very heavy rainfall exceeding 100mm… A hurricane is imminent in the area. Red Weather Warning."

The constantly spinning black weathervane suddenly turned bright red and locked in place, pointing directly at Tang Erda.

For a brief moment, there was silence. Then, the rain and wind converged into a violent gale so powerful it could have lifted everyone into the sky.

Liu Jiayi, the lightest of the group, and Qi Yifang, still dazed and unsteady, were the first to be swept up. Bai Liu followed, managing to balance himself midair. Tang Erda entered after him, with two members of the King's Guild being the last to be caught in the storm.

Nearby, a processing clerk weighing roses was so startled by the sudden tempest that he rolled into the factory along with the scattered flowers. To his shock, the storm—seemingly powerful enough to engulf the entire rose factory—remained contained at the entrance, spanning only about ten meters in front and behind, without spreading any further.

The contrast between the storm's confined chaos and the outside world was jarring.

Beyond the factory, the sky was clear and cloudless. But directly above the Northgate factory, the heavens had turned black with churning storm clouds, streaked with flashes of lightning.

The spinning hurricane devoured everything within its reach, forming an opaque, towering vortex—an enormous gray cylinder stretching into the sky. Objects and people alike were tossed within it, swirling as if trapped inside a high-speed washing machine.

The moment Tang Erda was pulled into the storm, he understood why Bai Liu had chosen to attack Qi Yifang instead of him.

Because attacking him wasn't worth the effort.

Bai Liu knew that without a surefire way to kill Tang Erda outright, any attack would be ineffective and futile.

If they had allowed Tang Erda—a high-damage, fast-attacking combatant—even a moment to get his hands on a weapon, he would have turned the battle into a massacre. With a gun in his grasp, the odds of the entire team being wiped out would be significantly higher than a mutual loss.

So Bai Liu switched tactics. Instead of confronting Tang Erda head-on, he used Qi Yifang's skill to neutralize him.

Even for a sharpshooter like Tang Erda, aiming in a "washing machine barrel" of high-speed spinning bodies was nearly impossible.

The hurricane was so intense he could barely keep his eyes open, let alone focus on a target. His vision was severely impaired by the man-made storm, rendering his marksmanship useless.

Firing blindly in such conditions was a gamble—one that could even result in him shooting himself.

But Bai Liu was different.

Spreading his arms and legs, he leaned back into the wind. His shirt, neatly tucked into his suit trousers, flared as the gusts whipped past him. A few drops of blood slid down his goggles, staining the crisp white fabric before he carelessly flicked them away.

Over his eyes, he wore a large, black pair of goggles—ones still stained with blood.

They had just been removed from Liu Jiayi's face.

This was Liu Jiayi's visualization prop—【Blizzard Goggles】.

【System Alert: (Blizzard Goggles) – Ensures clear vision in extreme weather conditions such as blizzards. Expires upon damage.】

【System Prompt: Activate (Extreme Weather) infrared mode to locate teammates?】

Bai Liu adjusted the goggles.

【Confirm.】

Instantly, the chaotic storm transformed before his eyes.

What had been a blur of wind and movement became clear: four distinct heat signatures, glowing red against the swirling gray, as if someone had thrown strips of crimson cloth into a washing machine.

A smile tugged at Bai Liu's lips.

The King's Guild had really been good to Liu Jiayi.

These 【Blizzard Goggles】 had originally belonged to Qi Yifang, a reward from a Level 3 game where Liu Jiayi had saved his life. After learning about her vision problems, Qi Yifang had handed them over to her without hesitation, a gesture of gratitude.

At first, Liu Jiayi had politely refused. But Qi Yifang insisted, so she stored them in her inventory, only retrieving them now because she needed them to help Bai Liu.

It just so happened to be the perfect fit for this game.

Liu Jiayi had mixed feelings about the situation. Bai Liu, however, ever pragmatic, simply took full advantage of it.

And then there was Hearts.

Among all things, Hearts had been incredibly generous to Liu Jiayi.

Few people in the entire game would go so far as to embed their skills into a playing card just to give someone a life-saving tool.

Hearts had not only shared her personal skill with Liu Jiayi but had gone through extensive trouble to encrypt the card. Even if someone else got their hands on it, they wouldn't be able to discern its true function.

Even Bai Liu—who had direct access to Liu Jiayi's panel—had been unable to figure it out.

In every sense, Hearts had shielded Liu Jiayi completely.

No other player in the game received such treatment.

Liu Jiayi had complicated emotions about this, but in the end, she told Bai Liu how to use the card—and what Hearts' skill actually was.

Bai Liu turned the glossy Hearts card between his fingers, his gaze locking onto Qi Yifang, who was spinning uncontrollably in the hurricane. The conversation with Liu Jiayi echoed in his mind.

With a quiet sigh, Liu Jiayi had handed him the card.

"This card contains the Empress' skill," she explained. "It allows you to temporarily transform into the person the target most desires or fears, with a certain level of compulsion. It also nullifies all detection props —meaning that once you take on someone's appearance, no one will be able to distinguish you from the original."

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow.

"A skill like this… would be perfect for begging for mercy, turning the tables, or scamming someone at the brink of death. Hearts really knew what she was doing."

Liu Jiayi was silent for a moment before muttering, "The Queen has indeed been very kind to me."

Except, of course, for that one time…

But in every other way, Hearts had been flawless in her treatment of Liu Jiayi.

She had trained her, nurtured her, taught her strategy, and showed her how to survive—both in the game and in real life.

At a time when Liu Jiayi's abilities were still developing, when whispers of doubt echoed within the King's Guild, Hearts had funneled nearly all of the guild's resources into her.

The towering woman had even personally taken Liu Jiayi out of the game, patiently teaching her with kindness. Later, she had elevated Liu Jiayi to the team's core tactician, even tolerating her quirks—like refusing to restore her eyesight immediately.

Everything Liu Jiayi had become was because of Hearts' unreserved care.

If kindness could be quantified, then before meeting Bai Liu, Liu Jiayi could confidently say that Hearts had been the best person in her life —even more than Liu Huai.

That was why she had once wanted to live in the game.

Hearts' unconditional kindness had given her a sense of belonging in a world that was otherwise cold and cruel.

To Liu Jiayi, Hearts was more than just a leader.

She was family.

And yet, it was also Hearts who had taken away the only family she had ever known.

Liu Jiayi took a deep breath, then handed Bai Liu the card.

"Qi Yifang… If he sees me die, his reaction combined with your mental attack will create the perfect opening."

She looked up at Bai Liu.

"In that moment, if you're close enough… you can become another me."

Bai Liu's grip tightened on the bone whip.

The storm howled around him as he locked onto his target.

The Rose Factory

The twisting grey whirlwind, tinged with black, churned violently, the poisonous mist swirling around it obscuring the vision of those trapped inside.

Silver bullets grazed Bai Liu's ears as he sprinted through the black whirlwind, the Hearts A deck clenched between his teeth. He reached for the whip and pulled himself toward Qi Yifang, who hovered at the other end.

Qi Yifang, dazed and disoriented by the little witch's poisonous fog, flailed helplessly in the powerful winds he had summoned, his limbs limp like a ragdoll.

But Qi Yifang wouldn't die—Liu Jiayi had no intention of killing her teammates. They were all S-rank players, well-protected and resilient enough to withstand her poisonous mist attack.

Still, paralysis was inevitable under the effects of the poison.

Bai Liu followed the whip's length and grasped Qi Yifang's ankle. The red heart on the playing card between his lips began to spin eerily as Bai Liu maneuvered himself, turning Qi Yifang—who had been lying flat in the wind—upright to face him.

Qi Yifang, his gaze unfocused, stared at Bai Liu in a trance. The red heart in the center of the Hearts card spun faster.

Bai Liu pressed his lips to Qi Yifang's, feeding him the antidote.

Qi Yifang swallowed with a few choking coughs, the wind whipping around them. Though the antidote neutralized the poison, his low spirit level and the lingering effects of intoxication left him disoriented. His eyes reddened with emotion as he whispered weakly, sorrow lacing his voice:

"..... Sorry, Little Witch ....."

—I couldn't protect you. I let you come to my rescue.

—I came to take you back to the guild, but it didn't work out. You've found a better home .....

As the peach-colored heart on the card spun, a human figure emerged.

Bai Liu's limbs shrank and thinned. His hair, once reaching just below his ears, lengthened down to the nape of his neck. His clothes morphed into a dark, gauzy, hooded shirt. His once-calm black eyes dulled to an opaque grey, like poorly made frosted glass.

Bai Liu had transformed into Liu Jiayi.

The grey-black haze of poison cleared from Qi Yifang's face as the antidote took effect, and he slowly closed his eyes.

As his consciousness faded, the eerie, spinning hurricane dissipated. Those caught within it plummeted to the ground as the winds gradually ceased.

Tang Erda, who had been affected by the poison, swayed but managed to steady himself. He raised his gun, scanning the battlefield for Bai Liu's shadow.

Qi Yifang, upon landing, immediately threw up.

Although he was no longer poisoned, his condition was inexplicably worse than the others.

But that was to be expected—Qi Yifang was "windy."

Yes, despite being a skilled wind user, Qi Yifang suffered from severe motion sickness.

Just a few high-speed revolutions in his own whirlwind were enough to make him vomit bile.

This was why, despite his impressive skills and high stats, Qi Yifang remained in the King's Guild reserve team rather than being a full-fledged member—he couldn't fully utilize his abilities.

Not far from where they had landed, two figures sat draped in black robes. Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi.

Tang Erda, still on high alert, strode toward them. He reached down, warily pulling apart the wide hoods of the robes.

Two identical, thin, young faces peeked out from beneath the fabric, both gazing up at him blankly.

Qi Yifang stared, stunned, at the two Liu Jiayis before him.

Tang Erda's grip on his gun tightened. His expression darkened.

Trapped.

He should have known.

Back in the whirlwind, he had hesitated—hesitated because of the ten-minute cooldown on his burst skill. He should have just used [Suicide Bullet] and taken Bai Liu out.

Tang Erda understood Bai Liu's strategy.

This bastard knew Tang Erda wouldn't kill him outright—not while they were in the Rose Factory. Tang Erda needed Bai Liu to tell him how to counter the dried leaf rose.

Bai Liu had the answer. He had a way to clear the game and obtain the key item needed to stop the rose.

That made him indispensable.

Tang Erda's objective wasn't to kill Bai Liu in the game, only to restrain him. Liu Jiayi, too, was not a target—his gun had only been aimed at her to draw Bai Liu out.

But Liu Jiayi had acted first, making Tang Erda look like the aggressor. Now, with Bai Liu's calculated moves, Tang Erda had been forced into a losing position.

Now, Bai Liu had become Liu Jiayi.

And without knowing which one was real, Tang Erda—labeled as a Hunter—was in a dangerous predicament. If he shot the real Liu Jiayi, the three King's Guild members would fight to stop him.

Bai Liu had scattered their formations, reshuffling their roles with this whirlwind deception. The three King's Guild players had been maneuvered into Bai Liu's camp.

It was no longer Bai Liu versus the four of them.

Now, it was Tang Erda against five.

Tang Erda, still pale from the effects of the poison, clenched his gun so tightly that his knuckles turned white.

The situation was spiraling beyond control. A one-on-five battle wasn't unwinnable—he could kill them all if he fought to the death.

But he didn't want to.

He was after Bai Liu to save people. Killing three innocent players from the King's Guild, who had been manipulated by Bai Liu, went against that goal.

He didn't want to work with them, but he hadn't intended to drag them into this mess either. He'd wanted to keep them out of this dangerous game with Bai Liu.

Yet, ironically, his actions had pushed them straight into Bai Liu's hands.

Tang Erda hated it.

But he was used to it.

Ever since realizing he was a hunter cursed by fate, a harbinger of misfortune, he had distanced himself from people, resigning himself to the company of monsters.

Tang Erda raised his head, his sharp, wolf-like gaze locking onto the two identical Liu Jiayis. His expression was one of a predator, intense and unreadable.

He had once been an alpha—a leader who led his pack into battle, unquestioned and unyielding, always the strongest warrior on the field.

But Bai Liu had stripped him of that.

Forced him to abandon his identity.

Turned him against his own team.

Forced him to forsake even his humanity—all for the sake of defeating Bai Liu.

Now, he was just a dying wolf, trying to do one last thing for his pack before his time ran out.

Between him and the two Liu Jiayis, Qi Yifang and the other two King's Guild members stood their ground.

Despite their confusion over the identical Liu Jiayis, they knew one thing for sure: the real Liu Jiayi was among them.

And they had to protect her.

Tang Erda's near-fatal shot at Liu Jiayi had left them shaken. Their guild had sent them to retrieve the Little Witch, and instead, she had nearly been killed.

They stood firmly in front of her, wary of Tang Erda, ready to defend her if he so much as lifted his gun.

From behind their protective stances, the two "Liu Jiayis" exchanged a subtle, knowing smile.

This hunter, though lacking intelligence, was indeed a good man.

And good men were the kind of people Bai Liu loved to toy with the most.

Because good men—bound by morals and principles—always left just enough room for someone like Bai Liu to exploit.

After Tang Erda somehow managed to turn away and put a safe distance between them, Qi Yifang was perfumed by his companion to restore his spirit level. Gasping for breath, he collapsed onto the ground alongside the other two men.

Qi Yifang gulped down his stamina restorer, still shaken. He had genuinely thought Tang Erda was going to shoot all five of them.

The shivering, weighing processors, who had been huddled together for some time, only dared to emerge once the storm had passed, their pockets holding the precious roses.

Qi Yifang glanced at the two identical Liu Jiayis standing before him, his face tightening in confusion. With difficulty and caution, he asked, "There are only 360kg of roses—just enough for one person to remain as a processor. So… which one of you picked the roses?"

The weigher's words drew the attention of the entire group. Everyone turned to the two Liu Jiayis, even Tang Erda, who was some distance away, raising his eyes to observe.

Liu Jiayi had arrived with exactly 360kg of dried leaf roses, while Bai Liu had appeared in a flash—empty-handed. There were only enough roses for one person to continue working as a processor. If Bai Liu couldn't produce the required amount, then one of the two Liu Jiayis would have to be demoted to a flower picker.

Qi Yifang and the three King's Guild members had no intention of letting Liu Jiayi be demoted. They scrutinized the two identical figures, trying to determine which one was an imposter.

First, they used detection props, but quickly realized that Bai Liu had disguised himself as Liu Jiayi using an ability that was difficult to counter. Most detection props couldn't differentiate between the two.

Qi Yifang frowned. Aside from the Queen’s skill, he had never heard of a disguise so advanced that it could evade all detection tools.

What these rich kids didn’t know was that the Queen had been so partial to her little witch that she had gifted her a skill base of her own.

Few people in the guild knew that Liu Jiayi possessed the Empress of Hearts' playing cards ability.

But the three men quickly calmed down. After all, they had worked with the little witch enough times to recognize her.

Qi Yifang had even sparred with Liu Jiayi in a practice match when she was still a reserve member. And while Bai Liu might look exactly like her, they were confident that, through subtle gestures, behaviors, and habits, they could tell who was truly the same.

It wouldn’t be so easy for Bai Liu to fool people who knew Liu Jiayi well.

Tang Erda thought the same thing. Though he wasn’t very familiar with Liu Jiayi, he knew Bai Liu inside and out.

The moment one of the "Liu Jiayis" revealed Bai Liu's habitual mannerisms or speech patterns, Tang Erda would be able to tell immediately.

But then, their expressions froze.

The two Liu Jiayis stood up at the exact same speed, their heads tilting at identical angles. They both turned to dust off their trousers, straightened their collars, and adjusted their wrist cuffs in perfect synchronization.

These actions didn’t resemble Liu Jiayi’s usual behavior at all. Instead, they were the refined, deliberate movements of a grown man in his twenties—someone meticulous about his appearance, who regularly wore suits and carried himself with precision.

The King's Guild members had been correct in their assumption: Bai Liu wasn't particularly good at mimicking a little girl. He hadn't known Liu Jiayi for long, and it would have been difficult for him to replicate all her mannerisms convincingly.

However, Liu Jiayi—who had been groomed by the Queen of Hearts as her successor, who was already a master of deception and performance, and who was at the prime age for learning—had no trouble mimicking Bai Liu's movements.

And this clever little girl could imitate him seamlessly.

In other words, they were now in the trickiest situation possible.

It wasn't a case of two Liu Jiayis.

It was two Bai Lius wearing Liu Jiayi's face.

They had no way of telling who was who.

The Rose Factory

The processor in charge of weighing the roses was dumbfounded by the uncanny similarity of the two Liu Jiayis' movements.

"So this... is the dried leaf rose for one of you..." he said, holding up the sack, breathless with uncertainty.

The two Liu Jiayis exchanged a glance, as if they had come to a prior agreement, and simultaneously pointed to the calm Liu Jiayi on the right. "Give her the rose."

The processor's gaze shifted to the Liu Jiayi on the left. "If it's hers, then you'll be demoted to flower-picker."

Liu Jiayi, on the left, nodded as if she had been expecting this. "So I start picking flowers tonight? The reward is still the same, right? Forty kilograms of dried leaf roses for one bottle of low-grade rose perfume?"

The weighing processor was growing more and more confused by the scene unfolding before him. But he was only following the rules, so he answered honestly. "Yes... Later, you'll come with me to collect the flower-picker's uniform and tools."

"As for you," he said, turning to the Liu Jiayi on the right and handing her the weighed sack, "that's 360 kilograms. Take it to the factory for the next step in processing."

The two Liu Jiayis seamlessly fell into their respective roles—one following the processors to collect her flower-picker's uniform, the other carrying the sack of dried leaf roses to the piazza.

But Qi Yifang and his group were frozen, watching one Liu Jiayi head toward the factory while the other walked toward the flower fields.

One of the King's Guild players turned to Qi Yifang, his head spinning. "Brother Qi, which one of these little witches are we supposed to follow?"

They all knew that one of them was the real Liu Jiayi and the other was Bai Liu. But the real question was—without knowing who was who—who should they follow?

Qi Yifang frowned at the two parting figures, while Liu Jiayi remained eerily composed.

Tang Erda's gaze flickered between them.

Liu Jiayi had never been the mastermind of Bai Liu's plans—she was only an executor, a mediator. Her choices weren't what mattered. It was Bai Liu who always decided which path to take.

For once, everyone in the group shared the same thought: Which path would Bai Liu choose?

Tang Erda contemplated. If Bai Liu was true to form—ruthlessly pragmatic, controlling, unwilling to entrust main objectives to others—then he would handle the most critical task himself.

His eyes locked onto the Liu Jiayi struggling to haul the heavy sack of dried leaf roses into the factory. That one was likely Bai Liu.

But then something caught his attention.

His gaze shifted to the other Liu Jiayi, the one recently demoted to flower-picker, walking toward the flower fields. There was something unnervingly familiar about that posture.

Tang Erda narrowed his eyes.

If Bai Liu had managed to steal an enormous quantity of roses last night under far worse conditions, how had he ended up with only 360 kilograms today—just barely enough for one person to continue working as a processor?

And if the purpose of the two Liu Jiayis was to confuse him and the King's Guild, wouldn't it have been more effective to keep them together? That way, their group's protection would be more concentrated, making it even harder to tell them apart.

Bai Liu never made unnecessary arrangements. So what was the point of this Liu Jiayi, who had seemingly abandoned the main objective and accepted demotion to flower-picker?

…But the main goal of the game was to become the factory manager, and the bonus rewards for Rose Factory would only be available after completing the main storyline.

After careful deliberation, Tang Erda tightened his grip on his gun and followed the Liu Jiayi who had entered the factory.

Qi Yifang repeatedly glanced between the two, struggling to grasp Bai Liu's strategy. Seeing that Tang Erda had already chosen to follow one of them into the processing plant, he made a swift decision.

"Split up," Qi Yifang commanded, taking a deep breath. He turned to the Liu Jiayi who had become a flower-picker. "I'll follow this little flower-picker witch. The rest of you follow the other one. If anything happens, contact me immediately."

His voice grew serious, eyes dark with something unreadable. "We all owe our lives to the little witch. Make sure you protect her."

Then, after a pause, he added, almost to himself, "She's fought so hard to protect someone else... If you can, please—protect the other her too."

The other two members of the King's Guild exchanged puzzled glances, but they understood what Qi Yifang meant.

"We all owe her that."

With that, Qi Yifang shoved his own roses into the arms of the others and, without hesitation, turned to follow the flower-picker Liu Jiayi.

Game Hall, Graveyard Bounce Area.

The members of the King's Guild crowded around Bai Liu's fallen TV screen, their faces stiff with anger and resentment, all directed toward the little witch who now filled the screen—teasing and toying with Qi Yifang as if she had never been on their side.

But then something changed.

Their expressions froze.

When Liu Jiayi pulled out the Hearts Ace playing card and handed it to Bai Liu, the room was engulfed in stunned silence.

What they couldn't believe wasn't just that the Queen had trusted Liu Jiayi so much.

What was truly shocking was that Liu Jiayi—despite being favored so heavily by the Queen—had betrayed her.

Revealing the Queen's skills so openly, handing Bai Liu the very foundation of Hearts' abilities… It was as if she had given him direct insight into the Queen's desires, her vulnerabilities.

"Emperess, Emperess," a nearby player said cautiously, "the little witch… she muted the TV. Aside from Bai Liu, she didn't want anyone else to hear. Maybe… maybe it was just a moment of rebellion. Please, don't be angry with her…"

His voice faltered at the end, fear creeping in, but he still forced himself to finish. "Please… forgive her."

They all knew that what Liu Jiayi had done was an undeniable betrayal.

But they still didn't want the Queen to be truly angry.

Because if she was, the little witch wouldn't survive.

And Liu Jiayi had saved them before.

If she came back, she would save many more.

She wasn't a good child.

But she was good to them. And that was enough.

For them—the weaker, underdeveloped players in this brutal guild—the little witch was their only saving grace.

Even if she had betrayed them, they didn't want her to die.

But Hearts didn't seem angry.

Her expression was as calm as a still lake in autumn, her gaze lingering on the small TV, a hint of boredom in her posture as though she had been standing too long.

Onscreen, Liu Jiayi tilted her head, puffed out her chest at Bai Liu, and demanded, "I want to be part of your plan."

The sight reminded Hearts of the first time she had met this little girl.

Defensive, wary, unnervingly intelligent for her age. Suspicion and hostility had been written all over her face, a child standing on the thin line between self-redemption and self-destruction. Holding both poison and antidote in her tiny hands.

Hearts had loved this thorn-covered girl.

She had seen too much of herself in Liu Jiayi's pain.

So she had reached out and pulled her into her embrace.

Liu Huai had never been the right brother for this child.

If Liu Jiayi was ever going to break free from her unstable mental state, if she was going to become a true pillar of strength, she needed something more—a family she could trust.

A brother who would never betray her.

A brother who would love her unconditionally.

A brother who would die for her.

Hearts' eyes flicked to the screen where Qi Yifang was now chasing after Liu Jiayi, the flower-picker.

Little Witch, she thought. You have the brother you always wanted. The ones I chose for you. If you follow Bai Liu… you'll have to sacrifice them to escape.

Can you do that?

The Rose Factory

Bai Liu's small TV rankings continued to drop under the relentless scrutiny of the King's Guild.

[Added 0 likes for Bai Liu's TV. Added 0 favorites for Bai Liu's TV. No one is charging for player Bai Liu.]

[0 new viewers are watching Bai Liu's mini-TV. The system is extremely disappointed with the lack of interest in player Bai Liu. You have lost your right to bounce in the grave. Please let player Bai Liu rest in peace.]

[Player Bai Liu's TV is about to drop from the Graveyard Bounce Zone to the Black House Zone. Please play carefully!]

If the Graveyard Zone was the game's cold house, then the Black House Zone was its prison.

Only players who were extremely inactive or openly resisted the game were exiled by the system.

For example, if a player failed to enter a game on their own within seven days, the system would automatically assign them a high-difficulty game, and their small TV would be sent to the Blackout Zone.

In short, the Blackout Zone was a punitive promotional area. While the Graveyard Bounce Zone still had a normal audience, the spectators in the Blackout Zone were essentially passive viewers who would never like or charge a player's TV.

In fact, there wasn't even an option to like or favorite small TVs in the Black House Zone.

The TVs were locked inside a rigid, prison-like shelf. The [Collect] and [Like] options were grayed out, leaving only the option to [Charge] available.

In other words, players exiled to the Black Room could only be released if they received enough charge points—hence the saying among players:
"Those in prison can only be ransomed."

If the ransom was insufficient, the system would "rip off" the player's TV entirely, banishing them to the game's ultimate grave—the No Name Zone.

This was a mere step away from total erasure.

Hearts led the other members of the King's Guild into the hut area.

Bai Liu's small TV was placed in the most prominent position on the prison-like shelf, right next to a glaring red message:

[You can leave the Black House Zone after reaching 100,000 charge points.]

But in this situation, forget 100,000 points—there wasn't a single spectator willing to charge even one point for Bai Liu. The King's Guild occupied the entire Blackout Zone, scaring off even those who might have watched out of curiosity.

With no charges at all, Bai Liu would soon be condemned to the No Name Zone.

Hearts watched Bai Liu on the small screen with an air of unperturbed amusement, her eyes half-lidded in what seemed like contemplation—or perhaps indifference.

The fact that the Little Witch had shown her cards to Bai Liu hadn't disturbed the high and mighty queen in the slightest. She continued to observe Bai Liu's small TV with deliberate patience, waiting for the moment when the screen would turn to static—when he would die.

A circle of guild members stood around the small TV, their expressions ranging from serious to worried.

At this moment—when Bai Liu was about to fall for good—even those who resented him, envied him, or outright hated him maintained a solemn silence.

It was a basic show of respect for the Little Witch, who had fought to protect Bai Liu with everything she had—and for the player who was once poised to accomplish great things.

They all stood in silence, looking up at Bai Liu's small TV, waiting for the system's final announcement.

[System Alert: Since no one has charged up to 100,000 points after Bai Liu's TV entered the Black House Zone, the system has made the following ruling on Bai Liu's TV.]

[Player Bai Liu has shown no seriousness in playing the game. He has not taken action since entering the Rose Factory, has failed to attract an audience, and has achieved an incredible record of 0 likes, 0 favorites, and 0 charge points. Even after entering the Black House Zone, he has not managed to break past 0, rendering all previous promotional efforts meaningless…]

[…Therefore, the system has determined that Player Bai Liu is no longer suitable to remain active on Little TV and will now be removed —]

Just as the system was about to announce the final ruling, a sudden commotion erupted at the edge of Bai Liu's TV.

A blur of movement—too fast to track—broke through the King's Guild defenses, forcing its way into the viewing area of Bai Liu's TV.

At the same moment, the numbers on Bai Liu's small TV jumped.

The charge data changed from a stark red 0 to 14,000.

[System Alert: An advanced player has charged 14,789 points to player Bai Liu's small TV! The ruling is interrupted! Player Bai Liu's TV is reserved.]

Mu Sicheng, his face drenched in sweat, wiped his jaw with the back of his hand. His glowing eyes remained fixed on Bai Liu's small TV as he exhaled sharply, a grin spreading across his face.

"Got it."

[System Alert: Player Mu Sicheng has emptied his points wallet and charged player Bai Liu's small TV.]

A moment later, another figure rushed through the opening Mu Sicheng had torn in the King's Guild's defense.

Muke arrived, breathless, his nose and lashes glistening with sweat. He bent over, hands braced on his knees, panting heavily. His cheeks were flushed, his body trembling with exhaustion.

[System Alert: Player Muke has emptied his points wallet and charged player Bai Liu's small TV.]

Bai Liu's TV counter jumped again—from 14,000 to 16,000.

Though they had barely made it in, their sudden intrusion had clearly rattled the King's Guild.

Someone sneered.

"Two people? Seriously? You think just the two of you can challenge the King's Guild?"

Mu Sicheng wiped the sweat from his face, his lips curling into a cocky smirk. His eyes glinted with mockery.

"Who said there were only two of us?"

Muke straightened his posture, his demeanor shifting into something poised and diplomatic. He smiled politely.

"As I've recently learned about guild diplomacy… Queen Hearts, we have come to greet you on behalf of our entire guild."

More and more figures emerged behind them.

Their expressions were tense, hesitant. They didn't seem to be particularly strong players—certainly not in terms of panel levels or game quality.

These were bottom-tier players. The kind no one wanted.

Under normal circumstances, they wouldn't have dared to face the elite members of the King's Guild, let alone challenge them outright.

And yet, despite their fear, they didn't retreat.

Instead, they slowly gathered behind Muke and Mu Sicheng, forming an unsteady but growing force—like loose grains of sand piling up, shifting, and threatening to become a landslide.

One of the King's Guild members grimaced and whispered to Queen Hearts.

"…These should be the remaining low-level players from the Scavenger Zombie Guild—the ones Bai Liu picked up last game. The high-level players already ran away, leaving only this bunch of useless nobodies who are too afraid to run…"

"…It's no big deal, they'll be easy to deal with—"

Hearts turned to look at Muke, her gaze cold and unreadable.

"No big deal?" she echoed, voice dangerously soft.

"Didn't you tell me this guild had already been taken care of? That you had informed them the King's Guild would take them in after Bai Liu's death? That they wouldn't oppose our move to intercept him?"

She narrowed her eyes at Muke, who remained standing there, smiling.

"So tell me—"

"Why, then, are they gathering against us?"

Half a dimensional clock ago in the game (equivalent to half an hour in real time).

Scavenging Guild.

Unlike the King's Guild, which had the luxury of buying an entire building for its headquarters, the Scavenging Guild operated out of a humble, low-rent room.

For just 60 points per day, players could stay in this cheap lodging for a night. The small TVs in these budget rooms allowed free access to VIP videos, making them a popular choice for players looking to study game footage and clearance strategies while saving points.

The guild relied on these off-the-beaten-path, low-cost houses as its base and used the promise of free, cheap housing as a gimmick to attract budget-conscious players.

The guild's founders, the Miao father and son, had been notoriously stingy, keeping the lion's share of the guild's earnings for themselves instead of reinvesting in their members or improving the guild's infrastructure.

After their deaths, many capable players fled, leaving behind a dwindling membership of even lower quality.

Finding the Scavengers' Guild's base took some effort on Muke and Mu Sicheng's part. But when they arrived, it was already too late— the King's Guild had beaten them to it.

The remaining players of the Scavenging Guild had gone through a rapid emotional shift. They had barely finished mourning the absurdity of their situation—[Our guild president just took office and doesn't even know what the hell is going on, and now we're about to get sniped by the King's Guild?!]—when they were suddenly hit with an unexpected windfall—[Oh my god, we can just join the King's Guild instead! How is this even real?]

So, when Muke and Mu Sicheng arrived, introducing themselves as Bai Liu's representatives, they were met with awkward resistance. The guild members were reluctant, their attitudes vague but dismissive, carrying an unspoken contempt for Bai Liu as their so-called new president. In other words, they had no intention of going along with Muke and Mu Sicheng.

This vague rejection quickly escalated into outright confrontation as Mu Sicheng, never one to hold back, slammed his hand on the table and started demanding answers.

Of course, violent clashes in the game didn't allow for actual physical fighting, so the whole scene was reduced to a chaotic mess of people pushing at each other and throwing insults.

At first glance, it seemed like Mu Sicheng was single-handedly taking on an army, swearing louder and pressing harder than anyone else, his aggressive stance making it seem like both a monkey and a general had been let loose in the crowd.

But everything ground to an abrupt halt when Muke climbed onto the table with a megaphone.

In the middle of the brawl, he had somehow pulled a plastic megaphone from somewhere in the dingy room. He stomped up to the highest table, commanding everyone's attention.

As the guild members stopped to gawk at the young master standing above them, Muke cleared his throat, turned on the megaphone with an air of practiced authority, and prepared to speak.

Unfortunately, what he didn't know—having never used one of these cheap plastic megaphones before—was that they usually had a built-in pre-recorded message that played upon activation.

Muke took a deep breath and began, "Listen to me, all of you. Today, we have come to you for something very important. Bai Liu has sent us as his representatives to secure a better future for all of us, for—"

A piercing, robotic voice from the megaphone cut him off.

"—Recycled old TVs, old game managers, old Ma Baoli runners, old judge's scales!"

Muke: "....."

Mu Sicheng, in the middle of throwing a punch: "....."

Everyone else: "....."

Muke stood frozen, gripping the megaphone like a lifeline, as if holding onto the last minute of his dignity. The broken speaker let out a final, pitiful croak before falling silent.

When the awkward hush settled, Muke, his ears burning with embarrassment, pretended as if nothing had happened. He cleared his throat and picked up where he had left off, though his voice had lost much of its former strength.

"—Bai Liu asked us to come to you, to help you build a better guild."

The Scavenging Guild players below collectively turned their gaze to the broken megaphone in Muke's hand, pausing just long enough to let the moment sink in. Then, as if on cue, their eyes shifted back to Muke's face.

Though no one spoke, Muke could read the sentiment clearly in their expressions: That's it?

Muke: "……"

The entire room fell into an uneasy silence, as if someone had hit a pause button.

Mu Sicheng stood at the hall's entrance, blocking the only exit. No one in the room had the strength to take him down and escape. But at the same time, these players weren't easily swayed. Even if they were trapped here, they wouldn't give up the opportunity to join the King's Guild just because Muke asked them to.

If they had survived in this game for so long, it wasn't because they were strong—it was because they knew how to avoid danger.

Muke took a deep breath and raised the megaphone again. The sharp whine of the PA system echoed through the cramped, low-rent building before his clear voice followed.

"We won't stop anyone from joining the King's Guild. If you want to go, you can go. But I want to speak to those of you who don't want to be exploited anymore—who don't want to be trapped in this cycle of abuse but have no better way out."

He looked out at the players.

“If you’re tired of being at the bottom of a guild, of being used and discarded, of living in fear because no matter how hard you struggle, you’re always just another pawn—another piece of fodder with no dignity and no real power—then listen to me. Because Bai Liu has given you a choice.”

Muke’s gaze was unwavering. “Once I’m done speaking, you’ll be free to leave, no matter what you decide.”

The players below still looked skeptical, but a flicker of curiosity had sparked in their expressions.

Logically, they knew that the kind of future Muke was offering couldn’t exist in this game. It was an impossible dream.

But still.

People who had lost everything would cling to even the smallest shred of hope.

Most players couldn’t survive in this game without joining a guild. That was a brutal reality.

In extreme conditions, like in this game, individuals had a much lower survival rate than groups. It was like being stranded in the snow—those who huddled together had a better chance of living than those who tried to go it alone.

Even if being in a guild meant being used, sacrificed, or trampled on, it was still something. At least they could survive, even if they had to swallow their pride to do it.

And so, at first, the crowd had pressed toward the exit where Mu Sicheng stood. But now, slowly, they were shifting back toward Muke.

Their expressions remained wary, disbelieving, but their bodies betrayed them. They were no longer fleeing. They were gathering.

These players had been living in low-cost housing for so long that they had the same tired, beaten-down look as those who had spent decades in poverty in the real world—unkempt, gaunt, and hollow-eyed.

When they relaxed, their faces lost all expression, like people who had been ground down until there was nothing left.

As they crowded together beneath the table where Muke stood, looking up at him with those vacant, empty stares, he was struck by the eerie resemblance to a refugee camp.

In a game where appearances could be changed at will, players who looked like this were the lowest of the low—people who had no energy to care about their own image.

People whose only priority was survival.

Muke stood over them, more than a meter above, surveying the desperate faces that turned up toward him.

And for a moment, he had a strange sense of déjà vu.

He saw the same flickering, fragile hope in their eyes that had once lived in his own.

The same silent, aching cry for help.

Then, someone finally spoke.

“You said… the new president, Bai Liu, has given us another choice,” a player stepped forward hesitantly, tilting his head to look up at Muke. “What is it?”

Muke took a steadying breath.

“It’s a deal,” he said. “Bai Liu will make a deal with you. And in exchange, he will help you develop your abilities so that you can clear games on your own and support yourselves.”

A ripple of confusion passed through the players.

Muke continued.

“As a group, you’ll pay him a fixed salary every month—divided equally among you. After that, whatever points and items you earn in the game will belong entirely to you. Bai Liu won’t take a single cent beyond his agreed-upon salary. He won’t demand outrageous commissions like other guilds.”

The players’ eyes widened.

“No commission?!”

“He won’t take our items?”

“He’s going to train us?!”

“Yes,” Muke affirmed, his voice strong. “Bai Liu doesn’t want to be an untouchable leader ruling over you. He won’t control or exploit you. He’ll help you, train you, so that you can become strong enough to survive on your own. And then, in exchange, you’ll pay him for his management services—just like a real-world talent agency.”

Muke let a small smile cross his lips.

“Your new president isn’t interested in being your ruler,” he said. “He told me himself—if you agree to work with him, then you are the ones hiring him. That makes you the bosses. The guild will belong to you. And that means you’ll have the most power in it.”

“He will delegate his authority to all of you. The guild will operate as a collective.”

The players broke into an uproar.

They had never heard of such an idea before.

A guild that wasn’t built to exploit them? A guild where they held the power?

It sounded like a trap.

It sounded like a dream.

But they couldn’t stop listening.

Muke could see it—the hesitation, the fear. They wanted to believe, but they had been lied to before.

Finally, someone asked, voice unsteady, “How… how is President Bai going to delegate his power?”

“If you all agree to cooperate,” Muke said, activating his game panel, “I’ll show you the documents Bai Liu signed before entering the game.”

A contract appeared on the panel: The 78 Explanatory Regulations for the Transfer of the Management Rights of the Scavenger Guild.

Thousands of copies, already signed by Bai Liu.

The only thing missing was their signatures.

The room fell deathly silent.

Players leaned forward, squinting at the fine print, desperate to read every word.

Muke knelt on the table, lowering the system panel so that they could see clearly.

In this game, everything could be faked—names, appearances, items, skills.

But there was one thing that could never be forged.

A contract, stamped and certified by the system.

“It’s real!!!” someone shouted.

The silence shattered into chaos.

Muke barely managed to calm the players down before one of them, hands clenched in nervous excitement, stammered out, “We—we’d love to work with President Bai! But… what exactly does he want from us in return?”

A hush fell once more.

Muke smiled.

“President Bai,” he said, voice light, “wants your souls.”

The Rose Factory

Bai Liu is still in the game. Although these people have signed the contract, they must wait for Bai Liu to return before they can trade their souls. In other words, Bai Liu is dismantling the Scavenger Guild first and only then allowing them to collect their promised rewards before any transactions take place.

As he watched the guild members eagerly signing contracts with Muke, Mu Sicheng, standing on the sidelines, frowned. Something felt off. A familiar, nagging feeling of being screwed over crept up his spine…

But he couldn't quite put his finger on why.

At first glance, it seemed like these players were getting the better deal. After all, they had gained control of the guild without handing over their souls yet—essentially acquiring power with no upfront cost. Who wouldn’t take such an offer? It was a no-risk, high-reward deal.

And yet, the mere idea of Bai Liu being taken advantage of set off alarm bells in Mu Sicheng’s head.

After Muke finished distributing the contracts, Mu Sicheng sidled up to him and muttered, "What the hell are you up to? Bai Liu isn’t the type to hand over goods first and collect payment later."

Bai Liu’s business model had always been simple: payment up front, no refunds. If you got scammed, that was your problem.

Muke kept his usual polite, reserved smile, tilting his head back slightly to put some distance between himself and Mu Sicheng. With a calm glance, he asked nonchalantly, "What do you think is the most valuable thing in this pathetic excuse for a guild?"

Mu Sicheng blinked, thrown off by the question.

The most valuable thing in the guild?

Normally, a guild’s worth would come from high-tier items in its inventory, top-secret information in its database, large amounts of saved-up guild points, or an organized collection of game strategies to help players clear dungeons efficiently.

But none of those things existed in this Scavenger Guild.

Any valuable items or points had long been hoarded by Miao Feichi and his father—only for Bai Liu to strip them clean during the last round of games.

As for dungeon strategies? Bai Liu never played the same difficulty level twice. He jumped straight into increasingly insane challenges, making any information stored in the guild database completely useless to him.

A terrible realization dawned on Mu Sicheng as his gaze shifted to the ordinary players around them, laughing and signing contracts without a care in the world.

There was nothing left in this guild. Bai Liu had already hollowed it out into a worthless shell. And the only valuable assets remaining… were the players themselves.

Bai Liu had just sold these players an empty husk and made them believe they now owned something worthwhile.

But what came next was the real trick: these desperate, lower-tier players would work themselves to the bone to develop and grow this shell of a guild, pouring resources into it. Whether or not their souls were eventually traded to Bai Liu, he had already won.

Because what he had just sold them… was nothing. A bomb filled with air—loud and flashy, but ultimately hollow.

And these people, oblivious to the truth, would throw everything they had into stuffing that air bomb with value, only to hand it back to Bai Liu with gratitude.

He had wrung out every last ounce of productivity from these bottom-feeders.

Was this even human?! This was outright fraud!

Mu Sicheng clenched his fists, struggling to contain his outrage, but finally turned to Muke and hissed, “This is too cruel!”

Mu Sicheng had played solo for years, scraping by as a casual player. He understood what it was like to struggle in this brutal game. And now, looking at these desperate people, he couldn’t help but empathize.

Once upon a time, he could’ve been one of them.

Forced to join a guild. Forced to be squeezed dry. Forced into a situation where his only value was what others could take from him.

"If we didn't do this, they'd be dead soon anyway."

Muke's voice was cool and composed, betraying none of the weight of the conversation. He adjusted his glasses, his expression unreadable as he cast a sidelong glance at Mu Sicheng.

"What do you think is really trapping them?"

Mu Sicheng faltered.

"My father's factory was full of people like them," Muke continued evenly. "People who worked themselves to the brink of death, yet refused to leave. Some couldn't afford to, while others were simply afraid—afraid they wouldn't survive on their own."

"They would sabotage new machines and block modernization, desperately clinging to outdated methods, believing that if they held back progress, they wouldn't be replaced."

"But when the inevitable happened—when factories evolved, when machines became more efficient, when economic downturns hit—the ones who refused to move forward were the first to be discarded."

Muke's eyes flickered with something unreadable before he finally looked away. "But you know what happened when every employee was given a share of the factory's profits? When they were made to believe they owned something?"

Mu Sicheng swallowed. "What?"

"They worked themselves to death to build it up and keep themselves —and each other—alive."

Muke's voice was soft, almost distant. "Not a single worker was laid off. Not until the very end."

Mu Sicheng turned back toward the guild hall, watching as the crowd roared with excitement over their new contracts.

Countless system screens overlapped, held high in eager hands.

In the reflection of the dull eyes of these bottom-rung players, he saw Bai Liu's name glowing on the contracts. One by one, they reverently signed their own names beneath it.

The dim blue light of the screens flickered in their eyes—like faith reborn from ashes.

Small Dark Room Area
Bai Liu's small TV screen displayed two groups of people standing off against each other, motionless.

On one side stood the senior members of the King's Guild—strong, towering figures radiating an oppressive sense of superiority. Their sheer height made the low-level players of the Scavenger Guild seem a full head shorter, only deepening the power imbalance. Their condescending, cross-eyed stares and the occasional disdainful grunt made the situation all the more suffocating.

The Scavenger Guild members behind Mu Sicheng and Muke instinctively shrank back. They had never been in a confrontation like this before.

The most rebellious thing they'd ever done up until now was following Miao Feichi to block Bai Liu. Even then, their highest ambition had been to join the King's Guild, not fight against it. And now, suddenly, they found themselves facing off against the very guild they had once idolized.

Internally, they were screaming.

You've got some nerve! Can't we just keep our heads down? We just took over the guild, and now you're already about to get us wiped out?!

A man standing at the edge of the room sneered, breaking the silence. "I thought no one came to collect Bai Liu's corpse when he fell into the Graveyard Bounce Zone. But now, suddenly, people are crawling out of the woodwork to enter the dark room? What, does it finally make sense to you now?"

Muke lifted his eyelids lazily. "Why wouldn't it make sense?" His voice was calm. "The Graveyard Bounce Zone didn't offer a way to save Bai Liu. But the small dark room does."

This was Muke's plan.

After carefully analyzing most players' ranking data, he had done some quick mental calculations to determine Bai Liu's most likely location among the thousands of game partitions. The answer had led them here—to this small dark room.

This area was obscure, overlooked. Most players only knew of its existence, but those who had actually fallen into it were already long gone.

Fortunately, Muke was a quick thinker. When he first entered the game, he had memorized the structure of most routes and partitions. His sharp memory allowed him to pinpoint this overlooked zone in record time.

The Graveyard Bounce Zone had a rule: to escape, the player needed to exceed their last ranking score. But that was simply impossible under siege.

Last time, Bai Liu's stats had been so high that he had nearly made it onto the King's Guild leaderboard. There was no way the Scavenger Guild alone could match the sheer number of likes, favorites, and donations needed to surpass that record. Muke was realistic enough to understand that with only the Scavenger Guild at his disposal, it was impossible to pull Bai Liu out of the Graveyard Bounce Zone.

However, the small dark room area—before a player completely fell into No Man's Land—was different.

Here, the system had a ransom mechanism in place. A last-ditch effort to squeeze every bit of value out of a fallen player. This meant that, in this area, Bai Liu's small TV could still receive donations from viewers willing to pay for his release.

Usually, this ransom amount wasn't impossibly high. It was calculated based on the total points his supporters could reasonably afford.

For Bai Liu, that amount was 100,000 points—a sum that, when pooled together, equaled the total points of Mu Sicheng, Muke, and every ordinary player in the Scavenger Guild combined.

The only problem was…

Muke lifted his gaze toward the King's Guild members standing in their way.

A human wall had formed at the edge of Bai Liu's TV viewing area. Apart from the brief gap Mu Sicheng had just created, the formation had already "healed" itself, becoming an unbroken blockade.

There was no way the players behind Muke could push through on their own.

If they wanted to break through, they needed someone on the inside to tear open the barrier.

Just a small opening—one moment of chaos—would be enough to embolden these cowardly Scavenger Guild members to follow the lead and start donating.

Muke inhaled deeply, then flipped his hands outward.

With a clean motion, a pair of sleek, dark daggers materialized in his pale palms.

One of the King's Guild members instinctively tensed at the sight of the weapons, almost taking a step back. But then, he quickly remembered—this was the game lobby. Attack skills and weapon damage weren't functional here.

Realizing this, the man's lips curled into a mocking grin. He looked down at Muke's small stature and sneered, "Kid, maybe figure out the rules before you start flashing your knives. You seriously think you can use combat skills in the lobby?"

Muke's expression remained unreadable.

In the next instant, he moved.

His body flickered like a shadow as he stepped forward, slicing through the space between them. The mocking player's expression froze.

The words died in his throat.

[System Alert: Player Muke has activated the skill (Flash Strike).]

Muke raised an eyebrow, his tone almost amused. "Who said I needed to attack to use my knife?"

His back now turned to the stunned King's Guild member, Muke didn't hesitate. He slammed his elbow backward, gritted his teeth, and shoved with force.

"It's a mental value reduction skill," he added, lips curling into a smirk. "No damage function. Just movement."

The barrier was breached.

The Rose Factory

Perhaps it is a long-standing understanding between assassins and thieves.

Although Muke hadn't informed Mu Sicheng of his plan, the moment Muke drew the King's Guild's attention, Mu Sicheng—ever the opportunist—seized the chance as a thief with a keen eye for "loot."

Mu Sicheng's gaze sharpened. With one hand gripping the shoulder of the man Muke was pushing forward, he leaped up, stepping on the back of an unsuspecting King's Guild member.

He then gave the Queen of Hearts at the very back of the group an obscene middle finger, raising an eyebrow and smirking. Without missing a beat, he moved the middle finger to his neck and made a slashing motion.

After the King's Guild members—angered by Mu Sicheng—came after him, Mu Sicheng hopped from the shoulders of the guards, balancing perfectly as he moved.

The human wall of the King's Guild holding the edge collapsed in an instant.

"Now is the time!" Muke shouted. "Charge in! Ransom Bai Liu out!"

While Muke shouted orders, Mu Sicheng stomped on the guards, trying to defend himself. Muke occasionally darted out, using his [Flash Strike] skill to cause chaos.

The scene was as chaotic as the morning rush hour on Mirror City Line 4, with bodies tangled and crushed in every direction.

As the two sides clashed, the ransom for Bai Liu on the small TV began to rise, signaling that people were charging in.

The system panel flashed intermittently, and blue screens of light lit up beneath Bai Liu's small TV.

Meanwhile, Bai Liu, chained to a small television screen in a high, old, barred shelf, looked down with calm, impassive eyes. It seemed as if he could see what was happening below him. Yet, despite this awareness, he withdrew his gaze with a single glance, as though he were a cold and distant god, indifferent to mortal life.

But it was this very god—money-hungry and unfeeling—that controlled the chaos unfolding.

Amidst the turmoil, only Hearts stood poised, holding her hat and skirt in place, seemingly oblivious to the chaos around her. Instead, she tilted her head slightly, scrutinizing Bai Liu on the small TV with a look that was both sizing and amused.

“No wonder Jiayi picked you.” Hearts’ half-closed eyes sparkled with affection as her red lips curled into a smirk. “You’re a perfect fit for her ‘brother.’”

But why not the most perfect brother? Or the one she likes best? The one who treats her best? Why Bai Liu?

Bai Liu was a man who could be described as selfish and self-serving. Devious, cunning, with only a thin veneer of humanity, a smile designed to fool others. He was calculating, loyal only to his own desires, never betraying his own ambitions.

With so many better alternatives around, why would a witch offer her antidote and soul for someone like Bai Liu?

The wind from the brawl ruffled Hearts’ burgundy curls as she watched Bai Liu on the small TV, her eyes clouded with thought.

When a person has already revealed themselves to be a “werewolf,” doesn’t that make any suspicion unnecessary?

Liu Jiayi would never have doubted Bai Liu. And that was why she chose him.

The little witch wouldn’t return; she had found her perfect “brother.”

Hearts looked up as Mu Sicheng appeared to her left. He stomped on a player’s head, pushing forward until he stood in front of her.

To her right, Muke appeared, hot on Mu Sicheng’s heels.

Muke struck at Hearts’ ankles with his daggers, while Mu Sicheng jumped onto a player’s shoulders and delivered a brutal flying kick to Hearts’ face. The two of them moved as if they had done this a thousand times before, working seamlessly together to block any possible escape routes for her.

While Mu Sicheng’s face was twisted with frustration, Muke remained more composed. As soon as he saw Mu Sicheng charging, he knew what the impulsive man was up to, but he couldn't help thinking it was a pointless endeavor.

Muke knew there was no point in attacking anyone in the game—there was no way to harm them.

But as Muke's thoughts raced, his body preemptively followed Mu Sicheng's lead.

Mu Sicheng was more impulsive, and even if he couldn't defeat her, he was determined to make a fool of the Queen of Hearts in front of her own members. He had had enough of the King's Guild and their ridiculous antics.

You always act like a beautiful woman, forcing your men around. Let's see how you act now that you've fallen.

Mu Sicheng's eyes gleamed with ruthlessness as he delivered a hard kick. Muke's dagger scraped the ground with an ear-splitting screech, the sharp blade heading straight for Hearts' bony ankle.

But everything slowed as Hearts moved.

The woman in the hip-hugging skirt adjusted the end of her skirt and leapt lightly on her knees, her movements delicate, almost childlike. Yet as she landed, her heel caught the hole of Muke's dagger, stopping it dead in its tracks.

At the same time, Hearts gracefully leaned forward, ducking under Mu Sicheng's flying kick, her wide hat brushing against him.

The kick didn't land—only slightly scuffing the hat, which then fell lazily between her and Mu Sicheng.

Hearts reversed gracefully, keeping her heel on the round hole of Muke's dagger. With one hand, she adjusted her hat, and with the other, she reached out and grabbed Mu Sicheng's ankle, pulling him upwards.

Caught off guard, Mu Sicheng fell backward as Hearts yanked him down.

The woman slowly lowered her hat, revealing a face now wearing a smile that was both model-perfect and more seductive than anything else. Her crimson lips, flawless skin, and piercing crimson eyes exuded an otherworldly charm. Her burgundy curls, disheveled from the fight, only enhanced her beauty.

Hearts leaned forward, her face hovering near Mu Sicheng's as her expression changed. Her long curls transformed into a sleek ponytail, her elegant suit became a simple school uniform, and her once-aloof, red eyes softened into kind, almond-shaped ones.

Halfway through the change, Mu Sicheng seemed entranced.

He stared at her face, unable to look away, his expression not one of fascination, but of confusion—fear and silence combining into something indescribable.

Hearts smiled as she placed her finger under Mu Sicheng's chin, teasing him: "... That's who you're most afraid of, isn't it?"

The moment Hearts touched him, Muke kicked Mu Sicheng away, who then collapsed on his back, breathing heavily, his eyes wide.

Mu Sicheng had just witnessed Hearts' skill, but Muke didn't understand exactly what it was. In any case, it wasn't good. Mu Sicheng had looked as though he had seen something truly incredible.

"Muke," Bai Liu's voice suddenly rang out.

Muke subconsciously looked up. The next second, his pupils contracted in shock.

Hearts, now fully transformed into Bai Liu, was smiling at him just like Bai Liu would.

Hearts extended her hand slowly to Muke, her voice soft and inviting: "Want to get out of here with me?"

"Want to play with me all the time?" Bai Liu's voice had never sounded so gentle with him. "You're my most useful teammate, Muke. I trust you more than I trust Mu Sicheng. I'm sorry for treating you coldly before. I didn't actually hate you."

"Even if we didn't start off on the right foot, I don't mind. You've proven how much you mean to me."

Muke's breath caught in his throat, and before his eyes, it felt like the world was hazy and dreamlike. Everything seemed clouded except for Bai Liu—so real, so captivating, so willing to follow.

“Muke.” Bai Liu smiled, his hands outstretched. “What are you hesitating for?”

Muke felt the ground drop beneath his feet, the world shaking around him. He staggered back, shaking his head as hard as he could, trying to wake up from the beautiful dream. But it was like a ghost haunting him—he knew it was fake, yet he couldn’t move, couldn’t wake up.

Like a puppet on strings, he stepped toward Hearts, his hand lifted and placed into hers.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu’s small TV has reached 100,000 points, officially unbanned!]

[Now re-posting Bai Liu’s TV to (Multiplayer Zone)]

Muke, who had almost placed his hand in Hearts’ palm, snapped back to reality. He looked up at the small television, which was flashing a notification. He saw the smirk on Bai Liu’s—or rather, Hearts’—face, and for the first time, someone had escaped the King’s Guild’s blockade.

Bai Liu's small TV in the dark room shuts off, and the next moment, it's in the multiplayer section again.

Hearts regains his calm and turns away without a second glance.

There was no point in fighting the group in the hut area. The other side had enough points to "redeem" Liu Bai—after all, the system was designed to encourage people to throw money at it.

But what happens once he's redeemed?

Hearts gestures to her men with a casual flick of her brow. "Back to the multiplayer area, and re-block Bai Liu."

The men beside her, still secretly annoyed that Muke and Mu Sicheng had messed things up at one end, now look up at Hearts in unison, stunned. "Empress, is there going to be another siege?"

It’s humiliating enough that such a big guild is blocking a newcomer who’s only played for the fourth time and hasn’t even been blocked yet. But to do it again?

"Don’t you have the guts to face this?" Hearts’ brow furrows slightly, and she tilts her waist to the side, sweeping a lazy look over the men as she speaks. Although her voice is inquisitive, her eyes glimmer with an indescribable charm.

The man she addressed can’t help but stiffen, from the top of his head to the knot in his throat. It’s as if he’s been singled out by a drill sergeant. He stands straight, his legs pressed tightly together, and answers in a weak tone, "…What if the other side cuts us off again during this siege?"

The ransom for the hut varies depending on the person’s point balance. If Bai Liu is besieged again, the system might set a lower ransom depending on the situation.

It’s as if Bai Liu, held hostage by the system, were a rich kid, and the ransom could be set at 100,000 points, something Muke and his group could afford. But now, Bai Liu is just a bunch of poor kids, so naturally, the ransom won’t be that high.

With the ransom lower and more reasonable, Muke’s group is desperate to get Bai Liu out, even if they have to borrow money.

That means there's still a chance they won't get blocked the second time around.

Hearts says, "Then block him a third time."

The man stares at her, bewildered, and blurts out, "A third… time? Do we really need to do that?"

"What makes you think you'll stop him on the first try?" Hearts responds, her tone bemused. "He's the president, it's a guild vs. guild game. Not to mention Bai Liu—a guy with a sharp mind, an ability to manipulate and control people, and an exceptional game strategy. The last person who made it to level three in a game called Spades killed our entire team in less than two dimensional clocks during the league last year."

The man falls silent, staring blankly at Hearts.

Hearts lifts her eyes and gives him a teasing look. "We're up against a player who could cause us serious problems later in the league, and you expect to take him out in one go without losing a single soldier?"

"You're not underestimating Bai Liu, but you don't think I need to go to all this trouble to deal with him? You're questioning my judgment, aren't you?" Hearts asks lightly, her tone rhetorical.

The man immediately bows his head, hastily replying, "I didn't mean that! Empress!"

Hearts brushes past him and orders, "Try to surround Bai Liu before he escapes the game, and blockade him until the Scavengers can't afford the ransom and he drops into no-man's land."

Muke, standing at the back, watches Hearts leave. He turns to the others with a stone-cold expression and explains.

"Hearts is probably going for a second siege. We'll have to find a way to get Bai Liu's little TV in the lobby to delay his arrival in the hacks section. After one more round of ransom, we might be out of points and just have to watch as Bai Liu falls into the no-name section in round three."

Muke takes a deep breath and glances at Bai Liu's small TV.

Hearts walks to the edge of the dark room and looks back at Bai Liu's small TV.

Two men—one scowling, the other smirking—speak.

"The rest is up to Bai Liu. Let's see if he can get out of the game before the third round of ransom payments."

"If he doesn't make it out before then, he's going to fall into no-man's land forever."

In-game.

Tang Erda and two other members of the King's Guild follow behind Liu Jiayi in the processing plant. The other two members keep an eye on Tang Erda, wary of a potential sneak attack.

Liu Jiayi, at the front of the group, doesn't care what's happening behind her. She focuses on the next step in drying the rose leaves—concocting and drying them.

The dried petals are stir-fried in a massive iron pot until the water evaporates, turning them a deep reddish-brown and giving off an exotic, smoky aroma.

It may sound simple, but this intense stir-frying process lasts over eight hours. If the stir-frying stops, the pan may become sticky, and the petals will burn black at the bottom.

Not to mention that newcomers can only use pots with batter marks, which makes them prone to staining, and new processors often have to stir up 360 kg of roses at once to keep their pots from being taken over by more experienced workers. It's an exhausting, physical job.

Liu Jiayi pours the dried rose leaves into a pot on the stove, which is taller than she is. The spatula she uses to stir stands high above her head.

As soon as the stove ignites, Liu Jiayi jumps up, pressing her body weight on the spatula like a seesaw, stirring with great effort.

It's clear she's determined, but the task looks unforgiving.

The sight of her furiously working the spatula has the NPC processors looking at her with expressions of disbelief.

It’s a job of strength, but Tang Erda is handling it more easily. Her eyes are shining as she powerfully stirs the pot, and soon a faint white smoke rises with the aroma of the roses.

The scent causes Tang Erda to shake slightly. He steadies himself with his shovel, and a piece of skin falls off at the corner of his mouth like peeling puppet paint.

[System Alert: Player Tang Erda's spirit value has dropped to 51, please rebound in time!]

Tang Erda pulls out a bottle of perfume from his pocket and sprays it on himself. His spirit value recovers to a safe level, and the cracked skin on his face begins to heal under the perfume’s effect. But the more the rose blooms, the more it fills his vision.

The rose is already in full bloom, having reached its tenth petal. With only ten more petals to go, Tang Erda sees it as fully opened.

The two members of the King's Guild watch for a while, then reluctantly step forward, lifting Liu Jiayi, who’s sweaty, tired, and trembling. She refuses to stop and sighs, "Little witch, leave this to us grown men."

Though they aren’t sure if this little witch is the real one, she seems different from what they remember. The Little Witch usually avoids physical labor, knowing it’s not her strength. She would typically find more clever ways to handle such tasks—like using props.

But now, Liu Jiayi seems to be pushing herself deliberately, hoping they’ll do the work for her—something that feels more like Bai Liu's tactic of taking advantage of people.

[We all owe her that.]

[The first time she wanted to protect someone like this, it's better to help as much as you can.]

Thinking of what Qi Yihang had said to them earlier, the two men from the King's Guild exchange a glance before letting out a long, bitter sigh.

Even if this Liu Jiayi isn’t the real Little Witch, when they see how desperately she’s using herself as a shield to protect Bai Liu, they can’t bear to see her fail.

--So what if this is the real Little Witch?

Liu Jiayi has literally saved their lives! Do they really want to see something happen to her if she fails her mission?

Resigned, one man lifts a spatula while the other picks up a sack of dried roses, working feverishly as sweat drips from their foreheads.

Exhausted, the two men drink stamina restorers before forcing themselves to continue.

Liu Jiayi, standing on the sidelines with her head down, sips from a recovery drink, looking worn out but still determined.

But Tang Erda, watching the scene, frowns. He glances at the 360 kg of dried rose leaves in the iron pot and senses something's off.

He doesn't believe that Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi, both quick-witted, could only produce 360 kg of dried leaves. That amount is just enough for one person to work as a processor.

But if they gathered more than 360 kg and didn't use it for promotion, where did the rest of the roses go?

Tang Erda guesses correctly that they collected over 360 kg—900 kg in total, reaching the maximum weight limit they could carry in a day.

Liu Jiayi glances absently at the sap left on her hand—the same sap she secretly helped carry out of the factory this morning.

The Rose Factory

Inside the abandoned factory, the freshly picked dried leaf roses were piled high in the open space, next to the dazed exiles who had been rehabilitated by Bai Liu. They stared in awe at the pile of 'loot' that had been brought here only that morning.

A few sweaty stragglers leaned against the rose bushes, shaking drops of sweat from their hands and breathing sighs of relief. These were the same laid-off rose factory workers who had been taken away by Bai Liu earlier to help dry the rose petals. This considerable pile of dried leaf roses had been carried back by them.

Someone, shocked by the pile of roses, stumbled forward to ask the men, fear visible on their faces, "Why did you steal so many roses? If they catch you at the factory, you'll be executed!"

"Yeah, yeah, give it back!"

"If you steal more than 1 kg of dried leaf roses, you won’t be able to work in the rose-making industry again, unless you’re killed."

Following the global spread of dried leaf rose gas, those involved in the rose factory had pushed for specific laws to protect this precious and limited resource.

Despite all the controversy, the law was published.

The law covered denunciations of the Rose of the Dry Leaves, fines and detentions for civilians promoting the idea that the Rose of the Dry Leaves was harmful, exclusive rights to the Rose of the Dry Leaves gas perfume (which could be used for 10 million years without being shared), and private research into the perfume's formula—a serious infringement punishable by a fine of 10 million dollars or more.

Any person who steals, smuggles, or deals in illegal dried leaf roses of more than one kilogram or more than three to five bottles of low-grade dried rose leaf gas would be punished by death or by life imprisonment with hard labor if the rose factory was willing to privately handle the matter.

A simple translation of the latter penalty means that if someone commits a crime related to the Rose of Dried Leaves, they can be handed over to the Rose Factory for disposal—alive or dead—if the factory so wishes.

When the law was first introduced, half the world protested against the severity of the punishment, but no one questioned the validity of it.

At this point, the Rose Factory introduced a regulation that it would reward those who reported people around them harboring illegally obtained dried leaf roses or developing perfume with a ten-year supply of free perfume.

At one point, there were voices everywhere attacking each other. It was said that at its peak, the Rose Factory could receive 100,000 tip-off calls a day. After this crackdown, which saw the Rose Factory take down many criminal civilians, the opposition waned, and fewer people questioned the rules.

Everyone had gone from fierce resistance to fear at the sight of the stolen roses—not just fear of the regulations but also fear of betrayal from within their own ranks.

The Rose Factory's reward for reporting still exists today, though it has been reduced from ten years to one. Yet, there is still a steady stream of people calling the tip-off line.

Desperate mothers or sons, trying to save their dying children or parents, have stolen dried leaf roses and become criminals, only to force their families to report them, so that they can receive the ten-year supply of perfume that could extend their lives.

But now, no one dared speak of these fears.

"It doesn’t matter to me anymore if I’m dead or not." One of the stragglers who had carried the roses caught his breath and looked up at the fearful stragglers around him with a bitter laugh. "Mr. Bai, for all the risks we took to get this pile of dried leaf roses out, he wasn’t afraid to die. Is it our turn to be afraid?"

Someone propped himself up by the rose bush, stood with a long, complicated sigh, and raised his head with a steely gaze. "Mr. Bai, a fabricator who could have lived a life of wealth and prosperity, yet he was willing to fight tooth and nail to help us, and so openly handed us such a dangerous weapon... he really believes in us, the untouchable, rotten folk."

There was a moment of silence as everyone's eyes moved towards the pile of roses.

"And I know you're all bitter and scared," the man said, turning his gaze to a couple of other porters who had stood up. "These flowers were carried by a few of us, and just now on the way here, we discussed that if any of you wanted to claim that year's perfume reward through the Rose Factory tip-off..."

He looked at the mutilated and miserable faces of the stragglers. "Then report us porters. We were the ones who moved it in the first place. We can't let the good people who stood up for us get killed."

"In this day and age, to be a good person is to break the law, and people are afraid to take the risk of being good anymore." He smiled with tears in his eyes, his voice choked as he wiped the corners of his bursting eyes. "Now, without this Mr. Bai, the next Mr. Bai probably won't come until my daughter and grandson are dragged to their deaths. I don't want him to die; he's too rare."

When the man finished, no one moved, standing still and motionless.

One minute. Two minutes. Finally, someone moved.

The young woman who had previously been holding the child and asking questions about Bai Liu put the child down to the person next to her. She took a deep breath and stepped forward, bending down to grab a large pile of roses in her arms. She turned to look at those who hadn't moved yet.

"This pile of roses must be over 1 kg." The roses set off her otherwise lifeless, white face with the rosy anger of someone still alive. She looked up at the men and said, "I count these roses as stolen, they have nothing to do with Mr. Bai. So, if you want to report me, report me."

"I believe Mr. Bai will give my children a new, free world where there will be no more death sentences for stealing roses." Her eyes burned, the roses in her eyes as bright as fire, and she spat out with clear certainty, "I would die for that."

Someone's eyes changed.

Gradually, slowly, hesitantly, as if they had made up their minds, the stragglers moved towards Rose Hill.

They came forward to embrace bush after bush of roses—dried leafy roses that would never wilt, blooming brilliantly and passionately on their chests and under their eyes like fire.

"This kilo is on me..."

"We are a family of three, including children. Please give me 3 kg..."

"Can I get 10 kg per person? It's a death sentence anyway. It can't be any worse than it is now..."

The huge mountain of roses faded into small bouquets in each stranger's arms. They stood like actors receiving flowers on an empty construction site, performing a curtain-raiser called [Defiance], just as Bai Liu had arranged and intended.

And as a token of appreciation for their perfect, passionate, wholehearted performance, Bai Liu presented each of them with a bouquet of dried leaf roses.

Standing aside, the porter who had spoken earlier looked at the stragglers in front of him, bewildered.

In all those years, there was never a collaboration against the dried leaf rose that couldn't be dismantled by the reporting reward from the Rose Factory. He had simply done what Mr. Bai had told him to do.

It was surprising that this time, not a single person had reported them for the more than 1,000 kilos of stolen roses.

This porter recalled the events of the morning.

While he was secretly carrying the roses, he had worriedly told Bai Liu about the reward for reporting, anxiously saying that everyone who helped carry the roses was committed to helping Mr. Bai and wouldn't betray him. But they were afraid someone might have a different intention!

Reporting this kind of behavior simply couldn't be stopped! Bai Liu, as their leader, must be the easiest to target!

Standing in the sun, Bai Liu lifted his eyelids, and the rose in his right eye was as vibrant and beautiful as the drifter had ever seen.

With a strange little smile on his face, Bai Liu rhetorically asked the straggler, "Why do you want to put an end to this behavior?"

The straggler was stunned. "But if you can't eliminate it, everything you've led us to do will be completely scrapped..."

"Firstly, people are self-interested creatures, and it's not logical for anyone to give up the benefits available to them and take risks for someone else's cause. So, it's fundamentally impossible to stamp out this kind of profitable prosecution of others."

Bai Liu waved him off and continued, "Secondly, I think you've been getting one thing wrong: I'm not leading you on this. The subject of this is you. I'm just a manager from whom you've bought a solution. You're the ones paying the price of the deal."

"In my opinion, the only way to completely solve this whistleblowing issue is to make the subject of the revolt against it everyone in your group—not me, some nebulous figure."

"The logic behind the benefits of reporting doesn't hold when everyone realizes that they're the ones who will get the most out of it."

Bai Liu looked at him blandly. "All you have to do is get everyone in your group to recognize, at your instigation, that they are the subject of the crime, not the object. The person they're reporting includes themselves."

"So, what do I do?" The straggler looked at Bai Liu with confusion and hope. "Mr. Bai, how should I incite them?"

Bai Liu curled his lips into a smile that would make Mu Sicheng, Muke, Liu Jiayi, and Tang Erda shudder when they saw it. "If it were me, I'd probably say this..."

The straggler's gaze became dazed and disoriented as he watched what was happening in the factory.

Almost every step of what had just happened was exactly as Mr. Bai had told him, and Mr. Bai had even mentioned a few times that he should emphasize the importance of children and offspring when speaking, making more eye contact with the mother who had asked him questions yesterday—so that this mother would be the first person to successfully incite the crowd.

As soon as the first person stepped forward, the rest would follow.

It wouldn't have been difficult, as Mr. Bai had tersely commented. Such oppressed, common-interest groups were the easiest to instigate.

Because they had no worse option than the status quo.

The Rose Factory

The roses were distributed and weighed by the stragglers.

Bai Liu used Liu Jiayi's and his single daily quota of 900 kg, leaving 360 kg for Liu Jiayi, to smuggle here.

After distributing the roses, the stragglers looked at the porters with confusion. "What are we supposed to do with all these roses, Mr. Bai?"

"The roses are to be used for brewing perfume, which Mr. Bai plans to distribute to the stragglers in order to relieve as many people as possible as quickly as possible," the dispenser explained.

Had they been discussing making perfume earlier, they would have been horrified, as stopping was a crime. But after everything that had happened, this step felt natural to them.

Someone wondered aloud, "Did Mr. Bai already have the recipe for making the perfume?"

There are two main reasons the Rose Factory holds such high status: the first is its unique cultivation of dried leaf roses. The second is the secret recipe for making dried rose leaf gas.

The aroma of dried leaf roses is fragile. If not treated and preserved in time for perfumery, the flowers lose their fragrance in minutes.

Transporting the roses from the flower fields to the abandoned factory requires more than just simple preservation.

By the time the dried leaf roses reach the factory, the scent is so faint that it’s barely noticeable without burying your head in them. For the dying exiles, this faint scent does little to help, let alone saving more people.

Strangely, perfumes are generally made in the same way. When the main ingredient is a single flower, it’s easy to decipher the process. Even if a perfect replica cannot be made, the basic steps of picking, drying, distilling, and re-drying would at least yield a crude essential oil that could preserve the aroma for some time. This could be used to provide relief to the displaced population.

However, many people had risked their lives trying to secretly research the process of making dried leaf gas. Despite numerous attempts, no one had succeeded in determining the exact recipe.

Quite a few people were aware that the basic treatment steps for dried leaf roses produced a rough essential oil with only half an hour of fragrance. This scent would dissipate instantly once the bottle was opened.

Only the Rose Factory's perfume, Rose Dried Leaf Gas, retains the rich aroma of roses for a long time.

This means that the processing steps for this perfume are entirely different from regular raw material handling.

"Mr. Bai doesn't have the secret recipe yet," the head porter sighed. "He's still just a processor. The secret recipe would have to be known by someone at the perfumer's level."

A former porter who worked in the rose factory recalled, "It is said that only the factory director knows the complete secret recipe for making dried rose leaf gas."

"So, what do we do with these roses now?" someone asked.

"Mr. Bai said we should first dry the concoction into semi-finished products. We have a lot of veterans here, and many nearby factories used to be rose factories for cottage perfume processing. Though they were closed down due to infringement, many of their tools remain and can be used," a porter explained.

"But what if we make the concoction and Mr. Bai still doesn't have the recipe? The semi-finished dried leaf roses will only last for three days before the fragrance fades," another porter replied.

"We don't have any senior factory workers here. None of us know what to do next with the semi-finished products or what vessels to use. If we don't have the means to take the next step, all those semi-finished products will be scrapped," a porter said, taking a deep breath. "Mr. Bai said that in three days, he will tell us what to do next."

"Get to work!" the head porter ordered.

---------- --

Late at night, in the flower fields.

Liu Jiayi, now relegated to the role of flower-picker, sat at the edge of the field, donning the protective clothing of a flower-picker. Beside her, Qi Yifang, who had silently followed her all day, also silently put on his gear and gloves.

Qi Yifang had given up his chance for promotion and had been demoted to a flower-picker, along with Liu Jiayi.

This Liu Jiayi adjusted the protective goggles on her eyes, and with her hair pulled out of the collar of her suit, she looked up at Qi Yifang through her goggles, her expression indifferent.

Qi Yifang, looking at Liu Jiayi's small face, half the size of her protective suit, felt mixed emotions and didn’t know what to say.

He couldn’t tell if the little witch who resembled Bai Liu—sometimes a petulant little girl—was the real one or the fake.

Finally, Qi Yifang sighed. "If we complete the guaranteed task of picking 40 kg on this map, we shouldn't be laid off and become stragglers."

He paused, sensing Liu Jiayi's indifferent reaction, which he couldn’t tell if it was genuine or feigned. He added, "If you can't gather enough later, you can come to me. I won’t be far—just call me if you need help."

With that, Qi Yifang carried his sack and prepared to head into the flower fields. But just before he left, his voice lowered to a near whisper, "Whatever you have to do to avoid me seeing, you can do. I won’t look this way."

He shrugged the sack onto his shoulder and walked away.

Liu Jiayi blinked and quietly watched Qi Yifang’s retreating figure, her gray, foggy eyes empty of any emotion.

As the night wore on, strange tentacles appeared beneath the flower fields, and the fierce-faced Rose Drifters resurfaced.

But this time, Liu Jiayi made no move. After Qi Yifang left, she laid down in a tent far from the field and opened a small Magic Space around her, perfectly protecting herself by restricting any creatures from entering.

Liu Jiayi leisurely snapped her hatchet, looking as if she were about to sleep rather than pick flowers.

The rules of Magic Space use depend on its size and the time limit. The smaller the space, the longer it lasts.

Liu Jiayi's Magic Space, which only encompassed her body size, theoretically allowed her to sleep peacefully until the next morning.

But this only ensured her safety, not her gain. Especially now that she had been laid off, with no steady income, and the perfume for the stragglers was expected to last longer—it didn't seem very sensible.

If Qi Yifang, standing at a distance, had been more perceptive or had glanced back out of curiosity, he might have been surprised to see Liu Jiayi not doing anything. He would have come over to help.

After all, in a world where spiritual bleach equals perfume, a day without labor and a constant supply of perfume would lead to madness.

But the Weather Forecaster, currently amidst a gale of Rose Drifters, kept his word and did not look back at what was happening on Liu Jiayi's side of the flower fields.

Soon, however, the situation reversed.

On Liu Jiayi's side of the field, stragglers appeared, backpacks in hand, picking dried leaf roses as quickly as their eyes could follow.

The stragglers moved cautiously around the field, avoiding the tentacles swarming beneath their feet and the thieves who might steal their roses. Their hands moved swiftly over the bushes, picking roses so quickly that it was almost impossible to track, each hand laden with freshly plucked roses in mere seconds.

Most of the stragglers were experienced flower-pickers who had been laid off for various reasons. But when the porters returned from transporting roses, the question was asked in the factory: "Who wants to go to the flower fields tonight and help Mr. Bai steal roses?"

Had they been asked to steal roses before, the stragglers would have refused.

But tonight, these stragglers brought out their long-lost speed, determined to clear the entire field of roses in one night, their eyes burning with resolve.

If Bai Liu succeeded in becoming a factory worker, eventually the factory manager, and obtained the full recipe for dried rose leaf gas perfume, all these roses would be processed into the perfume they had dreamed of and distributed to them.

That would keep them alive for a long time!

With this hope in mind, the stragglers—who had come of their own free will—became increasingly vigilant and quick, looking around as they picked, avoiding both the Rose Drifters and being reported by other flower-pickers.

Fortunately, Liu Jiayi was guarding the roses in this field.

Earlier, the porters had informed the stragglers, so they dared to come out at night and steal roses, knowing the field was safe.

The best fighters against rose thieves were the flower-pickers, because stealing roses was something every flower-picker despised. Too many stolen roses would lead to fines or even layoffs.

But now, the tables had turned. The rose-stealing drifters—former flower-pickers—looked at the growing number of roses in their arms, realizing for the first time that picking roses was a symbol of harvest and joyful labor.

The roses they had worked so hard for, risking their lives to pick, were no longer exploited. They truly belonged to them.

This joy was something the lower-class commoners, who had previously lived in misery and worked diligently out of fear of being laid off, had never experienced.

But now it was possible—all thanks to Mr. Bai's operation.

After a long night of hard work, the stragglers, exhausted and pale, with smiles of satisfaction on their faces, quietly went to the tent area. They found the right tent and reverently placed a portion of the dried leaf roses they had picked in front of Liu Jiayi's sleeping tent.

This was the reward they were willing to pay.

The Rose Factory

While the stragglers were secretly picking roses in the flower field, Bai Liu, who had been transformed into [Liu Jiayi] in the tent, reverted to his pale face. He ran out of stamina, curling up on the tiny bed in the tent, panting slightly before closing his eyes and falling asleep from extreme exhaustion.

As a player with a low base panel, Bai Liu no longer relied on stamina from higher skill cards. He had overdrawn his stamina slots and had no way to recover by drinking stamina restorers, not to mention his low spirit level.

With all these factors at play, Bai Liu knew he really needed to rest, and he didn't have the strength to return to picking roses tonight.

Thankfully, Bai Liu had built the scene earlier, leaving himself plenty of time to rest.

However, a few hours into his sleep, Bai Liu, half-awake, felt an extremely cold hand on his ankle, gently pulling him as if trying to wake him.

The crucial detail here was that Bai Liu's entire body was currently encased in the [Magic Space] prop.

What had happened the previous day occurred again—something had broken through the Magic Space barrier and touched Bai Liu, as a dizzying, rich scent of roses began to permeate the tent.

Bai Liu's eyes snapped open when he felt the object grab his ankle, but the impact of the overpowering aroma quickly caused his consciousness to blur.

It was a subtle sensation. While his mind maintained some clarity, his limbs and muscles were paralyzed by the perfume. He could barely move, his breathing slowed, and a kaleidoscope of red pike petals began swirling in front of his eyes.

It felt like being ghosted in bed.

Bai Liu noticed that the hand holding his ankle seemed to realize he was awake and let go. The fingers slid gently down his protective suit, crawling slowly upwards against his skin, their cool, thin, smooth fingers moving up his warm thighs like jade sculptures.

The slight, non-stick, almost inhuman sensation made Bai Liu arch his back and shudder. A knot formed in his throat, and his exhalation grew heavier.

The hand was almost up to his...

Even Bai Liu, who usually didn't care much about this, now felt a tingle at the back of his neck, breathless, realizing that the hand in his trousers could very well belong to Xie Ta.

His eyes were red and drowsy from the scent. Bai Liu shook his leg with all his might, and the hand, reacting, slipped down his trousers and out.

The hand seemed confused, as if it had been trying to climb up Bai Liu's body without sight. But Bai Liu's resistance threw it off with a kick, leaving the hand unsure of how to proceed.

Eventually, the hand curled into a crouching position, like a small octopus with its tentacles curled up, head down in self-imposed isolation.

Bai Liu lowered his gaze to the right hand, and for some reason, he felt a strange sense of sympathy for it, like the hand was a little cat-like.

Bai Liu: "....."

Wasn't the other person supposed to be the one causing trouble? Why did it feel like it was doing it wrong?

The hand didn't stay silent for long. It soon perked up again, struggling upwards by grabbing at Bai Liu's layers of protective clothing, eventually fumbling around his neck, searching for a rope with a coin hanging from it.

White fingers twisted down the lanyard, pausing when they didn't find it the first time before twisting it obsessively a second time.

Bai Liu understood what the hand was searching for—Tawil was looking for the Inverse Cross.

He wasn't sure what had happened to Tawil in this Rose Factory instance, but it was clear that Tawil, with only one hand, couldn't communicate. The Inverse Cross was crucial for him.

The Inverse Cross was used to channel Tawil's oracles.

But it had been taken from Bai Liu by Tang Erda before he could enter the game.

As the hand continued running the lanyard around Bai Liu's neck for the fourth time, Bai Liu leaned forward slightly, raising his hand to stop it. The scent from the factory and flower fields had overwhelmed him all day and night, but now, though still dizzy, he was at least able to move a little.

He grabbed the right hand in front of him, but the hand didn't seem to believe that Bai Liu would lose the Inverse Cross and struggled to escape, its fingers digging stubbornly into Bai Liu's slightly open collar.

Bai Liu's strength was no match for the hand's. Under the rose-scent's influence, his whole body felt soft, and moving his hand took all his remaining energy.

Seeing how the hand was playfully rough and unaware, Bai Liu realized that if it got in, some indescribable things might happen below the neck.

But in order to prevent this and keep the chapter within bounds, Bai Liu took a professional approach. He quickly figured out how to communicate with the hand without words.

Bai Liu wrote on the palm of the right hand with his fingertips: [The Inverse Cross was taken from me and I lost it.]

The hand stopped struggling, took two slow steps back, and curled into the self-conscious, octopus-like crouch again.

Bai Liu: "....."

He felt a rare sense of helplessness, leaning his head against the knuckles of the "little octopus" with a faint sigh, before gently pushing his fingers away from Tawil's wrapped fingers. He then wrote on the pale palm: [Sorry].

Tawil paused, stretched his bony fingers, and stood up, writing on Bai Liu's palm in return.

[Remember what I told you? The key to everything lies with the witch, and the antidote and poison are the keys to your choice... until your true death comes.]

After writing, Tawil's palm covered Bai Liu's face. Bai Liu blinked slightly as Tawil's index finger nudged his forehead, the cool, gentle touch reminiscent of when Tawil had lightly kissed Bai Liu's forehead during an oracle descent.

Then the pure white right hand fell to the ground in a streak of light pink petals, dragged into the earth by vines.

Bai Liu slept in a rose-colored prophecy.

The following day, Bai Liu's eyes snapped open. He sat up, finding nothing around him. Everything looked like a dream, but when he sniffed the pillow, he could still smell the lingering roses.

The scent of roses was strong on his thighs, neck, and waist—so strong it felt as though he had slept in them all night.

A right hand had indeed come uninvited last night.

Tawil seemed very limited, as shown by his fragmented form and the vines pulling him into the ground.

Despite these restrictions, Tawil had appeared multiple times, likely to alert Bai Liu to something.

Bai Liu narrowed his eyes.

Tawil's words from an earlier oracle echoed in his mind.

Was there something he had missed?

"The key to everything is in the hands of the witch... Poisons and antidotes are the key to your choice..."

"The time in you is unique and irreversible until real death comes."

As Bai Liu pondered, he heard footsteps outside the tent. Instantly, he equipped his Hearts skill card.

Qi Yifang's surprised voice rang out from outside the tent, "Did you pick so many roses last night?!"

Seeing himself transformed back into a little witch, Bai Liu looked down, momentarily pausing as a realization struck him.

[The key to everything is in the hands of the witch, the poison and the antidote are the key to your choice.] He had previously thought this referred to Liu Jiayi, but now, he understood it was about him.

Since there were two "witches" in the Rose Factory instance, and the later sentence about antidotes and poisons revealed that "witches" in Tawil's oracle weren't actually little witches...

No—he was the false witch.

Bai Liu slowly lifted his head, a smile of amusement creeping onto his face.

Tawil's oracle had foreseen that he would turn into a little witch to deceive others. If the "witch" in the oracle was false, then the antidote and poison he—the "false witch"—possessed weren't antidotes and poisons in the conventional sense.

If the "key" in Tawil's oracle was a hint for breaking the Rose Factory, then, from Bai Liu's perspective as the game's designer, the antidote and poison were likely two different endgame choices.

The poison in this Rose Factory game was obvious: [Rose Dried Leaf Gas]. Choosing [poison] meant obtaining the secret recipe of the Rose Factory, then taking the most extreme steps to become the factory manager.

Tawil had said the "witch" had a choice of [poison] and [antidote], which meant he had both.

But what exactly was the [antidote]?

The Rose Factory

Although Bai Liu had told the other stragglers that he knew a way to end it all, he had not yet been given enough information about the exact solution to the problem of dried rose leaf gas.

The current Bai Liu is unsure how to solve the problem of dried rose leaf roses.

In short, Bai Liu gave the exiles a blank cheque to settle the rose perfume, putting his life on the line to get them to work for him first.

But the 'cheque' was not without foundation. There had to be a solution to the dried rose leaf gas, and the odds were that he would get it — as Tang Erda said, and as the Bai Liu from other timelines could surmise.

Bai Liu assessed the likelihood that he would be able to complete the task as over 50%.

As a player who bets it all with more than a ten percent chance of success, Bai Liu has now used [the ability to fix dried rose leaf gas] as his prerequisite and is using it to manipulate others.

It wasn't until Tawil reminded Bai Liu of the oracle again that he was able to determine the exact solution to [dried rose leaf gas] — it was a specific [antidote].

If rose perfume is [poison], then the [antidote] would be something that dilutes or neutralizes the toxicity and addictive properties of dried rose leaves.

But in the game, Bai Liu had not been given any hints about this [Antidote], nor had the system given any related quests. From this, Bai Liu deduced that the path to the [Antidote] was most likely not the regular path, meaning it was not connected to the [Become a Factory Manager] main quest. The main quest, "Become a Factory Manager," was not connected to the main objective.

Horror or drama games usually have three endings: [good], [normal], and [true].

The first two are the easier and simpler ways to finish the game without having to uncover all the hidden information, and they are the most common paths players take. However, game designers usually hide a deeper, more complete story about the game world in the [true ending].

To reach the [true ending], the path becomes more dangerous, and sometimes players must take actions completely opposite to the main quest to trigger special plot points and uncover more information.

Apparently, Rose Factory is one of these games.

Bai Liu had previously followed this same line of thought. While preparing [the poison] secretly for his own rose factory, he also looked for traces of [the antidote] in the real rose factory.

To obtain the potion, he needed more information — but it was up to Liu Jiayi, who would soon be promoted in the factory, to take on this part of the task.

Bai Liu concentrates, closes his eyes to collect all his emotions, and after assuming his full Liu Jiayi form, he raises the curtain of the tent and steps out.

In front of the tent stood Qi Yifang, looking in awe at the small mountain of roses.

Qi Yifang saw him come out and scratched his head a little embarrassedly, "I thought you might need a little help from my side..."

He was also carrying a small bag of dried rose leaves, fearing that [Liu Jiayi] might not have enough to bring, but it seemed that it was still unclear who needed the subsidy.

Bai Liu shook his head, refusing the rose offered by Qi Yifang, his eyes dark as he looked through Liu Jiayi's grey eyes at the rose factory with smoke billowing from its chimney, resembling a heavy industrial processing site.

Inside the Rose Factory.

The dormitory for the new processors was on the ground floor of the Rose Factory, with dozens of people sharing a bunk, regardless of gender, and without the usual sour smell of sweat.

These two odors mixed into a fragrant yet nauseating scent that overwhelmed anyone who entered for the first time, forcing them to breathe heavily outside several times before daring to enter.

Liu Jiayi, the two King's Guild members, Tang Erda, and some other processors slept in the bunkhouse.

After a full day of hard work, the new processors rested for less than three hours before it was light again.

Liu Jiayi was the first to open her eyes in the dorm. She left the [Blizzard Goggles] for Bai Liu's disguise, her last visualization prop, which had kept her operating blind yesterday.

The two King's Guild members who followed her had their usual visual aids with them. Liu Jiayi thanked them politely and, in return, poured a small cup of antidote for each of them to stabilize their vitality.

The two men hesitated, as the prop was meant for the little witch, but eventually drank it with mixed feelings under Liu Jiayi's insistent gaze.

They all understood that it was the Little Witch’s habit to never owe anything to any team.

Liu Jiayi had rested well thanks to Bai Liu over the past few days. Since she hadn't done much physical work the day before and had been helped by two others, Liu Jiayi was in the best physical and mental condition compared to the processors, who had been sweating all day. As a result, she was the only one awake in the bunk.

The others, including the more perceptive Tang Erda, drifted off to sleep, exhausted by the combination of physical exhaustion and the hypnotic scent of roses in the air.

However, Liu Jiayi, who had been exposed to the original rose scent (the aroma from Tawil's hand) on her first day, was much less affected by the rose scent in the factory.

Although she had the visualization prop, Liu Jiayi didn’t want to waste it and had not used it from yesterday until this morning when she could locate her normal movements with her ears. But as she got out of bed, Liu Jiayi suddenly heard an unusual noise.

A sound like a giant octagonal spider spitting, weaving, and crawling on the ceiling, pattering back and forth above Liu Jiayi’s head. It was a small noise, but Liu Jiayi still heard it.

The evenly rising and falling breathing and snoring of the processors lying on the narrow beds, the occasional crackle of wall coverings peeling off and falling to the floor, and that faint sound, like something dragging and swimming.

She put on her visualization prop and looked up overhead, but saw nothing. The old, mottled, pale yellow walls were only a constant fall of wall skin, with a few smoked or stained, dark rose-colored marks that looked a bit like dried blood stains.

Liu Jiayi frowned. As someone who had survived on her hearing for a long time, she trusted her hearing more than her eyesight, especially on these very quiet mornings when her hearing should not be at fault.

Unless it was something that existed but couldn't be seen.

With that in mind, Liu Jiayi promptly shook a member of the King's Guild sleeping next to her, and while he was dazed and half-awake, she whispered in his ear, "Shh, can you see anything now that you're looking up?"

Although not fully awake, it was already in the nature of these rescued team members to obey the witch's orders. Without hesitation, he looked up, and after a moment, turned his head in confusion to Liu Jiayi. "There's nothing there..."

If this team member can't see either, then it's not her eyes. Liu Jiayi's mind wandered as she calmly and quickly pondered the problem.

There must be some kind of monster above the ceiling, but it is invisible to the naked eye and visual props. So in this game, the monster must meet certain conditions to be visible.

But what is this condition?

Liu Jiayi's thoughts were running extremely fast. They had only been in this factory for a day, and most of it had been spent on various types of labor. Information had not been acquired well, and trying to deduce from this factory any clues about the conditions under which the monster could be seen was something Liu Jiayi felt she couldn't do with what she had observed so far.

Normally, Liu Jiayi would have taken a step back and been more conservative, leaving the dormitory first and then returning to unlock the monster when she had gained enough information.

But now, she has another source of information — Bai Liu.

Bai Liu had spoken to her about Tawil's oracle as she entered the game.

She wasn't sure what the strange, every-game-sticks-together-and-gives-her-goosebumps relationship between these two was, but if Bai Liu was right and Tawil was the central monster of the game Rose Factory and had come to him the night before, then there was a good chance that the oracle Tawil had given Bai Liu before entering the game was some hint about the game.

Liu Jiayi closed her eyes to recall the oracle Bai Liu had told her, searching word by word for a valid message within, while murmuring in a low voice: "Don't use your right eye to feast on desire..."

Bai Liu's right eye had been eroded by the rose, but his left eye was fine!

It's a hint! Tawil is suggesting that Bai Liu sees with one eye!

Liu Jiayi's eyes snapped open as she read this sentence, moving quickly to cover the right eye of the still dazed King's Guild member next to her. She lifted his head with one hand to his chin and aimed it at the corner where she heard the sound, asking in a cold tone, "Can you see anything now?"

The King's Guild member's sleepy expression tightened, his pupils contracted, and his face twitched as if he had seen something extremely terrifying.

"Look, see a lot," his voice hitched, and his neck flickered as he turned to Liu Jiayi and said, extremely wavering, "Little witch, a room full of them... monsters."

The Rose Factory

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

After seeing the King's Guild member's reaction, Liu Jiayi wasted no time removing her right visibility prop, leaving only her left eye visible as she looked up and around.

In the four corners of the large bunkhouse, there lay a huge, spider-like creature, or perhaps a human.

The creature’s skin split from the center of its head, flap by flap, across the upper half of its body. Instead of peeling away, the skin bent at the end like a rose in full bloom, transforming into a hard, spider-like attachment embedded in the wall, allowing it to move quickly.

The flaking siding and hollow spots on the walls were the result of the creature cracking and disintegrating as it moved.

At the center of the "rose," the bloody, skinned human column became the stamen of the "blooming rose."

The upper parts of the "pistils" dripped with blood, fresh as though they hadn't been "blooming" for long. They left a trail of flesh and blood as they moved, their faces completely disfigured, with bare teeth and half-exposed, dead white eyes staring motionlessly at them. Their faces were unrecognizable, adding to their grotesque appearance.

Liu Jiayi turned her head, her face grim as she surveyed her surroundings.

In addition to these eight larger monsters, there were many more in the dormitory that appeared to not yet be fully "bloomed." The "pistils" were only half or less than half of their faces, and these smaller creatures seemed unable to fly.

Most of these smaller monsters were sleeping beneath Liu Jiayi’s bed, their eyes staring straight at them through the bedpan. This was why the King's Guild member had just turned pale with fear.

A "petal" from the creature beneath his bed pressed against his hand through the bedpan, the skin's muscular edges writhing and oozing blood, just out of his reach.

They had slept the previous night under the watchful gaze of these invisible monsters.

The palpitating aftermath was connected to the scene now unfolding. Even though this member had experienced many dangerous situations in the game, he was now paralyzed with fear, his heart trembling at the sight.

He had never seen such a bizarre monster before, and it was strange enough that he could only see with one eye. But what disturbed him most was that the monsters had stayed with them all night without attacking.

But now, this strange, unsettling calm was about to be shattered.

The monsters seemed to sense that the two could see them. All the creatures in the dormitory, large and small, twisted their heads in various directions, their eyes turning toward them. Their bright red "petals" shaved away, and they slowly formed a circle around Liu Jiayi and the others.

The member shuddered and turned to Liu Jiayi, who was on the verge of tears. "What do we do now...?"

"I wish I could pretend I didn't see this pile of monsters," Liu Jiayi said, standing on the bed with a dark expression. "But that doesn't seem possible now. Trigger first—see if you can kill one. If you can't, just run!"

As soon as she spoke, the large monsters in the eight corners of the room let out a shrill wail, and all the monsters in the dormitory began to dart toward Liu Jiayi.

But strangely, even though these monsters were making so much noise, the people on the bunks remained motionless, as though they were dead, completely unaware of the chaos unfolding. The monsters passed by the processors without causing any disturbance, as if they only existed in the world seen by the players.

Once the players sensed them, however, the monsters were in the same dimension and could kill the players.

The availability of the right and left eyes, which held desire, was the key to breaking the dimension and seeing another world in this factory.

Liu Jiayi ran as fast as she could, trying to wake up another King's Guild member still asleep. But when she reached his bed, it wasn't the guild member's face she saw.

Instead, it was the face of another processor, completely new to her, someone she didn't recognize.

The face was withered and decayed, as if it had been dead for a long time. The processing uniform was covered in dust and cobwebs. With the strength of an eight-year-old girl like Liu Jiayi, she shook the man's body twice before his skeleton fell apart and his dried skin crumbled into dust.

Liu Jiayi looked around. The large bunkhouse that had once been full of living people had now become a morgue.

As far as the eye could see, the bodies were covered in dull grey, dusty white cloths, huge cobwebs fluttering in the air and tumbling into the room like dead willow leaves. The room was decrepit and lifeless, and the dust on the floor was so thick that it made her cough with each step.

Another member, still running frantically, saw the scene and turned to Liu Jiayi, hissing, "Little witch, we've entered the inner world where these monsters are! Do something! They're moving too fast; we can't hold out much longer!"

Liu Jiayi sidestepped fluently to avoid one of the monster's sharp petals that thrust toward her. "I know. I'm trying to figure out how to get out."

[System Alert: Congratulations to player Liu Jiayi for triggering the Monster Book]

[The Rose Factory Monster Book Refresh - Celiac Staff (2/3)]

[Monster Name: Celiac Staff (Processors, Factory Workers, and Perfumers)]

[Characteristics: The upper class, who had adapted to the low concentration of rose perfume, soon could not get satisfaction from it and had to use higher and higher concentrations of rose perfume in...]

[... As they used more and more concentrated rose perfume, they became radiant, youthful, and beautiful, as green and perfect as a dried leaf rose in full bloom for life...]

[... But soon, they realized they were becoming more and more like roses, with enough energy in their muscles to burst into bloom before they could be satisfied. To delay the bloom, the addicted roses had to tame their bodies with higher concentrations of perfume, delaying their blooming...]

[... Blooming is the destiny of roses. Refusing to wither will bring about their destined bloom. The aristocrats tear off their hypocrisy to reveal their bloody true hearts. At this moment, you see a group of high-class slaves bred by roses, enjoy watching their last magnificent bloom. If you refuse, you will be taken to another world to see them in all their former glory...]

[Weakness: ????? (to be explored)]

[Mode of Attack: Rose Crushing Limb (A+), attacking the opponent with a knuckle.]

Liu Jiayi quickly skimmed the monster's description, her mind racing as she dodged the pursuing monsters behind her. In games with an in-world setting, there was usually more information hidden within the game.

If Bai Liu, the psychopath, wanted to play for the [true ending], he would need to turn the world upside down and uncover all the information hidden in the smallest details.

But in this situation, Liu Jiayi just wanted to run. She wasn't good at fighting this kind of head-to-head battle, just like Bai Liu wasn't good at the kind of strategic matches she had been in before.

While Liu Jiayi, as a caretaker, wasn't inclined to praise desperation, Bai Liu was indeed good at gambling battles—those where the odds seemed insurmountable and he would force a chance.

Such a strategy could shine in situations where the opponent was far stronger than you.

The riskiest way to fight was to leave it to those who excelled at it, rather than taking all the risks yourself. This was Liu Jiayi's tactical guideline—something she had taught Bai Liu before, and now she was about to implement.

Liu Jiayi took a deep breath, offering a sincere apology in her mind to the King's Guild member still hiding from the monsters. "In a moment, I'm going to leave you in the hands of one of your unreliable lunatics."

-- You must be careful working with him; while he generally won't let you die, he also won't make it easy for you to live.

With your intelligence, just trust him.

After muttering these words, Liu Jiayi opened her system panel and took a Spades Ace playing card from her prop library.

The skillful playing cards left by the Queen of Hearts for Liu Jiayi were a pair of Aces, Hearts and Spades.

However, without the Hearts card, these two skill cards were only useful for the Hearts A—since the Spades A skill was called [Hearts Heart].

The [Hearts A] skill meant that after Liu Jiayi used the Hearts A card, she could use the Spades A card to implement [Hearts A], swapping identities with her opponent three times.

This card was generally only useful in the presence of the Queen of Hearts, as she was the only one who could turn into anyone Liu Jiayi wanted. In extreme emergencies that Liu Jiayi couldn't handle, Liu Jiayi could use these cards to alternate with the Queen of Hearts, allowing her to take the risk for Liu Jiayi.

-- This was a skill set used in combination and was the Queen of Hearts' life-saving code for Liu Jiayi in the league. It was essentially a sacrifice, allowing Liu Jiayi a chance to escape.

Now, Liu Jiayi had given it to Bai Liu.

Running, Liu Jiayi let out a long breath, closed her eyes, and held up the Spades A card.

[System Alert: Does player Liu Jiayi use skill card (Telekinesis)?]

[OK.]

The black peach heart on the top of the playing card began to rotate rapidly, and the face in the heart gradually changed from her own to Bai Liu's. Her body jumped gently, as if it had taken off, and the next second, [Liu Jiayi] opened her eyes.

[She] looked at the situation before her and raised an eyebrow in a smile.

"Well done, little witch. You found the source of information I was looking for."

Chapter End Notes

> The card can swap two people under the influence of the Heart's card

The Rose Factory

The creature crawled, its petal-like skinned knuckles scraping against the old wall, as it scuttled forward. Its bloodied face opened wide in a fierce gape, and from its writhing throat came a low, muffled roar that seemed to shock Bai Liu.

Liu Jiayi's skill, [Telekinesis], swaps two bodies directly, which means his body is now his own. However, Bai Liu's panel speed is not very high, so he quickly falls behind as these monsters chase him.

Another member of the King's Guild spots Liu Jiayi about to be engulfed by the monster behind him, opening his "Pod" to swallow him whole.

Seeing the situation, the King's Guild member grits his teeth, reaches over, grabs Liu Jiayi by the collar, and runs with him.

Soon, they reach the door of an old bunkhouse. The member twists the rusty handle twice, but it doesn't open.

"Damn it." The member curses angrily, quickly turning around to press his back against the door, his eyes grim as he watches the bloodthirsty monsters closing in. He draws a long hammer from his hand. "These monsters are S-rank. You and I won't last long."

Bai Liu abruptly asks, "If you were alone, how long could you hold them off?"

"Five or six minutes." The member answers, confused. "Wait, why would I need to hold them off alone? Little witch, aren't you with me...?"

Bai Liu gives him a gentle smile, raising a bottle of low-grade perfume he received earlier that day. Without hesitation, he sprays it directly at the unprepared team member.

The stifling perfume forces the member to cover his face, coughing violently. As the scent spreads, a light, rosy fragrance emanates from his body. The surly monsters, who had been eyeing them closely, now lower their gaze in unison, turning toward the team member beside Bai Liu. A salivating grin stretches across the monsters' fuzzy, bloodied faces.

[System Alert: Warning! The perfume on the player is too concentrated! It has attracted the attention of the (rotten staff)! They are about to come over and suck the smell out of you!]

The team member looks up in horror. “...”

“F*ck you! You’re Bai Liu!!!”

The monsters swarm toward the team member like spiders from a nest, quickly forming an impenetrable circle around him. Trapped and cursing Bai Liu’s ancestors, he futilely swings his sledgehammer to draw the monsters' attention away from Bai Liu.

Meanwhile, Bai Liu, quick as a flash, slips through the monster's enclosure and begins searching for clues in the large passageway of the Reeve's World.

The in-world setting in games often involves two parallel worlds from different time branches or different points in time overlapping in one location. Players who enter can travel between the two world lines when certain conditions are met.

This supplemental world line usually allows players to return to certain past or future points in time, uncovering hidden information behind the game’s worldview. Therefore, there is often key information to be found within this inner world.

Bai Liu’s task was simple: find the crucial information he needed.

The bodies of a dozen workers lie on twisted bunks, dressed in uniforms similar to those Bai Liu and the others wear, though much older. This suggests they may belong to a past [inner world].

Bai Liu's theory is confirmed when he finds a newspaper underneath one of the bodies.

The newspaper is from the Mirror City Evening News, with the headline: [Illegal perfume may contain poisonous addictive substances, causing several employees to become addicted. The whereabouts of several employees have been covered up by the authorities.]

Bai Liu scans the article, his eyebrows rising as he reads further.

The report states:

[The director of the illegal perfume factory is an orphan named

Zhang. Due to congenital cataracts in his left eye, he grew up in a private orphanage called Love Orphanage, aspiring to become a billionaire. Zhang was adopted at the age of thirteen. After the death of his adoptive parents, he inherited the estate. He has been in and out of prison three times, and although he has accumulated wealth and contacts, he is still unsatisfied...]

[In September, when a poisoning incident broke out at the orphanage, Zhang saw the news and returned to raise money. However, he made a strange condition for the donation. He wanted to buy a sculpture from the orphanage, claiming it was something he deeply admired...]

[Eventually, Zhang offered a $10 million donation in exchange for the statue of a deity buried during the orphanage's renovation...]

[Shortly afterward, the director of the orphanage was imprisoned in connection with the blood lingzhi incident. Authorities investigated Zhang, who claimed ignorance of the director's actions. He said he only wanted to donate money to help the children and liked the statue.]

[When asked about the statue’s origin, the director went mad, saying it was an unsettling, evil idol purchased from a decaying seaside town known for its amulet statues. The investors believed the statue would help the blood lingzhi farming, and it was said to be the most expensive statue in the town.]

[The director claimed that the statue’s face resembled that of a long-dead child, who was said to be evil and hyped up.]

[Afterward, Zhang began developing new types of roses and perfumes. He leased large fields in the suburbs, hired workers, and started cultivating roses, calling them "dry leaf roses," named after the withered petals.]

[The dried-leaf rose grew rapidly in soil unsuitable for Rosaceae flowers, filling the countryside almost overnight.]

[Zhang’s perfume, made from the altered crop, became a hit on the market through online sales. However, the regulators intervened, declaring the perfume a serious safety hazard. It was banned, and Zhang was fined and prohibited from producing or selling it again.]

[A week later, Zhang disappeared, and his whereabouts have been unknown since.]

This is the end of the article.

But in reality, Zhang, the original director of the Rose Factory, didn't stop there. He secretly reopened the factory, turning it into a larger operation, eventually attracting the Bureau for the Treatment of Dangerous Heresies.

The employees lying here must be the original workers from the Rose Factory who died because they were intolerant to the rose perfume and were discarded here, their disappearances covered up by the authorities.

Bai Liu browses through the papers and continues searching, looking under and around each body for any clues—notes, calendars, video tapes, or diaries—anything that might serve as a message.

Soon, Bai Liu finds a diary in the abdomen of a face-up body, a knife lodged in its neck, the expression frozen in pain.

Opening the dusty, decaying diary, Bai Liu reads the first page. At the bottom right-hand corner, a regretful inscription reads:

[I have never regretted anything more than unleashing this unprecedented evil. I thought my boundless desire was the most horrible thing in the world, but then I realized it was not. The statue I brought back was.]

[The dried-leaf rose is brewed by evil gods; it does not wither, fade, or decay. It only grows beautifully in the human body it has compelled, a product of divine affection, lingering in the bones and flesh, in the fragrance of madness.]

[The rose's dried-leaf gas is the perfect perfume, a poison with no antidote. I understood the first part as an excavator and proved the second as a dead man.]

Bai Liu turns the page, his gaze unfaltering.

[I grew up in a subsidized private orphanage, and I know that the investors here were connected to a strange, evil magic, all tied to a strange child in the orphanage—a child whose face I could never see because he always hid his eyes with his long hair.]

[But I am sure that anyone who has seen this child once will recognize him again.]

[Because he was so terrifying. The moment I saw him, I had only one horrible thought that still haunts me: I was terrified of him. But after I saw his light blue eyes—like those of a giant beast in the deep sea—through his soft, fine hair, all that remained was an impulse as if I were possessed by a demon.]

[- I'll kill him! I'll tear him apart!]

But the thought was fleeting, and soon I felt shocked and frightened by the unthinkable thought that had crossed my mind. I began to reject and even bully Xie Ta, just like everyone else, though I always avoided looking him in the face. Not that I could see his face clearly, given my poor eyesight.

I was soon adopted by a middle-aged couple who had no children and left the area. But from time to time, I would dream of those silver-blue eyes, which I had merely glimpsed, devoid of any human emotion. After dreaming of them, my inner fear and an unwarranted desire would both begin to stir, making it impossible for me to sleep peacefully.

I could feel my breath burning, my blood rushing like boiling water, causing my temples to pound.

There was something magical in those eyes that drew me in.

One night, I got up from the bed, grabbed a knife as I passed the kitchen, and went to the head of my adoptive parents' bed. I looked down at the pair, sleeping peacefully, unaware of me. My breath caught.

In that moment, just like when I first saw Xie Ta, a long-lost impulse surged within me—violent, fierce, and forgotten—resurging.

I wanted to kill these two! I wanted to chop them into pieces!

The people of this world are all pigs, all dogs, all animals who have abandoned me and don't care about me! A bunch of inferior creatures who only care about money and future potential! They abandoned me just because I can't see! I've never been treated like a human being. I've never even been given charity or treated like a dog or a cat!

I will step on your heads; I will control all of you with my one seeing eye! I will make you wag your tails at me like I do now to barely survive!

When I regained some semblance of consciousness, I saw the golden-haired puppy my adoptive father had bought for me. It barked furiously at me, its tiny body covered in blood.

This little golden retriever, only two months old, had been bought by my foster father to give me a companion to grow up with.

Seeing the puppy snapped me back to reality. I knelt in front of my adoptive parents, shaking as I held their lifeless hands, crying bitterly. I called them "Mom" and "Dad," apologizing profusely.

But the little golden continued barking, and I quickly grew scared. I cried as I let the puppy, which should have been growing up with me, stay with my foster parents.

When I stood up, I looked at the scene and knew that nothing could be undone. Only I, the living one, mattered. I cleared the room, cooked them, and buried them in the backyard. A month later, when they had nearly rotted, I went to the police, crying, and reported my parents as missing, claiming they had gone out for a walk with their dog.

No one doubted that a fourteen-year-old with poor eyesight, and the unknown energy I had, could have inherited my adoptive parents' estate at the age of eighteen, especially after more than three years with no trace of them.

But the eyes inside me still stared, and I knew it wasn't enough. It was far from something that would satisfy them.

I knew there was one thing that would make it quick and satisfying—it was what the investors in the orphanage had dreamed of. Once I had it, I could sell it for an unprecedentedly high price, and soon, I would be a rich man who could dictate my own destiny!

When I returned to the orphanage, the secret was so tightly guarded that I couldn’t get it. I only vaguely knew it had something to do with the statue that resembled Xie Ta.

Soon, I got married. My wife was a perfumer with a greenhouse full of roses, and she developed many lesser-known perfumes. But it still wasn’t what I wanted—not enough to make a fuss, not enough to surpass those who were better off than us.

I did everything I could to improve our situation, but my wife never understood me. Every time she came to pay my bail, she would hysterically question why I did such things. I had to helplessly explain that I was sacrificing myself for our better future.

Soon, she left me, saying she needed a break and would come back to divorce me, leaving me with only the greenhouse full of roses.

The police later told me my wife had disappeared. Three years later, I inherited her entire estate.

Soon after, something happened at the orphanage, and I sold everything to buy the statue. The moment I saw its snow-white eyes, I knew I was going to be lucky.

I placed the statue in my wife's rose conservatory. The leaves of the roses quickly withered, and the edges of the petals turned a deep, misty crimson. The fragrance was so intoxicating that even I, who had never known perfume, was overwhelmed by it. I began to cultivate the dried-leaf rose, but no matter how much I tried, it couldn't grow properly without the statue.

I gazed at the beautiful, broken, and sacred statue, which stared back at me with its pupil-less, pure white eyes. That first, cruel, bloody, insatiable urge surged again in my chest. I smiled as I raised a sawblade towards it.

In that moment, I felt the silver-blue eyes inside me close.

After scanning through the long and disorganized diary in one glance, Bai Liu ignored the frantic cries of the King's Guild members behind him and quickly flipped to the last few pages.

He was searching for the recipe for dried rose leaf gas and the location where Tawil had been buried after being dismembered.

But no, Bai Liu kept turning the pages, not finding what he sought.

The diary was followed by Zhang's fragmented ramblings and eventual transformation. The first director of the factory, the one most poisoned by perfume, had been the first to "blossom" when he began to develop higher concentrations of perfumes. He eventually took his own life in agony, leaving behind a remorseful suicide note. Bai Liu scanned it to ensure there was no useful information and then discarded it. He was left with a letter.

— He knew Zhang well. Zhang wrote to glorify himself and deceive anyone who came after him. His logic was self-centered, a typical moral criminal justifying his actions.

This type of reasoning had been used by many serial killers throughout history—"I was compelled by the devil, and I am innocent."

Bai Liu even sensed a hint of mischief, as if the game's designers were mocking him—Zhang's early life mirrored his own: money-loving, rebellious, orphan-born, spurred by Tawil to escape the orphanage.

It felt as if something in the underworld was whispering wickedly in his ear—"Look, this is the original path your life was meant to take."

Just as Bai Liu was about to close the diary, the withered body in front of him—Zhang from the diary—sat up abruptly.

This didn’t faze Bai Liu, who calmly stepped back. While he wasn’t sure how much of the diary's information was true or false, Bai Liu was certain that the self-serving factory manager could never have killed himself.

This creature was pretending to be him, likely to trap the players who entered the inner world.

From the hollow ribs of the dry corpse, numerous tentacles began to sprout, and its skin rolled up, transforming into vibrant, bright red blood and flesh.

It's deflated head twisted, returning to a normal human shape, though disjointed. The left eye was an opaque white marble, and the right eye contained a fully bloomed rose.

If one only looked at the head, the man seemed polite and good-looking. But seeing the tentacles and tangled petals on the lower half of his body, he appeared more like a grotesque mobile incubator with roses growing from his bones.

The roses bloomed, releasing a far stronger fragrance than ordinary roses.

The aroma was dizzying, and as it filled the air, the sounds of fighting behind Bai Liu faded. He turned to see that most of the King's Guild members' head had been swallowed by a monster, their limbs limply lying outside.

Without hesitation, Bai Liu lashed out at the creature's head. It hissed in a strange tone, spat out the King's Guild member's head, and turned to glare at him in resentment.

The "spiders," drawn by the stronger scent, began to scuttle toward Bai

Liu. Behind him stood the enormous "Zhang," almost as tall as the bunk, surrounded by the increasingly intense scent of roses.

[System Alert: Warning! Player Bai Liu's spirit value is below 60!]

As if hypnotized by the intoxicating rose scent, Bai Liu collapsed to the ground, dazed. Tentacles coiled around him, tearing at him with gleeful force, while a jagged, round-mouthed creature mumbled in its strange voice:

"... You carry the breath of an ... evil god ..."

Bai Liu heard the system beep just as the creature lifted him by the waist.

[The Rose Factory Monster Book Refresh - Celiac Staff (2/3)]

[Monster Name: Surly Employee (Generation Factory Manager)]

[Weakness: ????? (to be explored)]

[Attack type: Aroma lure (S-), lures the opponent with its scent and devours them.]

As Bai Liu was lifted by the creature, a dying King's Guild member looked up in shock.

He stared at the factory monster with an instantly pale face. After inspecting its panel, he stuttered, "S—S rank monster!!!"

S-rank monsters weren't uncommon in Tier 3 games, but this one wasn't just any S-rank—its level was 13,000, a high-level monster even among S-ranks.

Since most players weren't S-rank, the only way to fight an S-rank monster was by finding its weakness.

But damn! There were only seconds left before the creature tore Bai Liu apart! Where could he find its weak point?!

Meanwhile, in the multiplayer section of the gaming lobby, in front of Bai Liu's small TV viewing area, Mu Sicheng and Muke, along with the members of the Scavenging Guild, were fighting hard against the members of the King's Guild. They seized every opportunity, though the King's Guild members were notably lackadaisical, often half-heartedly acknowledging and stomping with little effort Almost everyone in the Food and Corruption Guild had sent Bai Liu a collection of likes. With charging points hard to come by, Bai Liu was quickly nearing a drop-out from the multiplayer section.

As Bai Liu's TV screen flickered with the threat of failure, Muke, who had been focused on giving commands, was now visibly shaken. His fists were clenched, his eyes red with worry.

Unable to think outside the game, Muke went pale when someone mentioned that the monster holding Bai Liu was an S-rank monster.

If Mu Sicheng hadn't acted quickly to support Muke, Muke might have collapsed.

The previous game had seen an S-rank monster defeated by three players, but that victory had only been possible after Bai Liu managed to acquire a god-level NPC, something that had become a psychological hurdle for Muke.

Muke struggled to hold himself together, but he couldn't stop the tears from spilling. He sobbed, "Ooooooooooooooooo, Bai Liu! Bai Liu, don't let anything happen to you! What will I do if you leave?"

Mu Sicheng, taken aback, exclaimed, "!"

It wasn't over yet, and Muke was already crying as if Bai Liu had already been lost!

Mu Sicheng composed himself, but his calm didn't last long. He exploded with fury when the King's Guild members began mocking Bai Liu.

One of them sneered, "I don't think we'll last long without stomping on this trash."

Another joined in, "It's not very ethical to order a stomp, but I'm okay with it. Seeing this, and then ordering a stomp, feels so... satisfying!"

Mu Sicheng gritted his teeth, pushing up his sleeves. "I'll fucking make you comfortable..."

The two sides quickly descended into a physical clash.

The ongoing battle between the two guilds had attracted a lot of regular spectators. However, because of the King's Guild's power, the onlookers couldn't help but sneak glances at Bai Liu, curious but too intimidated to approach.

At this moment, some food-loving spectators who had been watching from the sidelines couldn't contain their curiosity any longer. They slipped closer, hoping to see more of the action.

The sight of Bai Liu's small TV immediately shocked them. This was the first time they had seen such a drastic point-to-pedal ratio on a small TV, and they were certain Bai Liu was about to drop out of the multiplayer section.

Watching the screen again, the regular viewers, though sympathetic towards Bai Liu's situation, had to agree with the King's Guild member who had mocked him—Bai Liu wouldn't last much longer without a stomp.

Some players, aspiring to the spirit of the King's Guild, condescendingly remarked, "I thought this player was making a big deal out of nothing, but it turns out he can't even pass this level. What a waste of the King's Guild's time."

Though many ordinary players disagreed with this sentiment, they couldn't help but sigh, acknowledging that Bai Liu had terrible luck.

Even knowing the weaknesses of S-rank monsters, Bai Liu had to exploit them, yet his panel was proving to be too much of a challenge.

Just as the spectators were about to turn away, someone gasped, drawing everyone's attention. On Bai Liu's small TV, as he was about to face the monster eye-to-eye, his right hand transformed into a black monkey claw, aimed at the creature's right eye. Without hesitation, he grabbed it.

The monster let out a heart-wrenching cry of pain and released Bai Liu. Bai Liu then turned, surrounded by approaching spider monsters, and launched a whip at one of the dumbfounded King's Guild members on the edge. He wrapped the whip around the man's waist and reeled him in, locking eyes with him.

The massive monster pounded the ground in fury, its tentacles whipping dangerously near Bai Liu. The ground shook as if the entire world might collapse.

Yet Bai Liu remained calm, quickly issuing orders. "Do you see the other world through this eye? Close your left eye and look at this eyeball with your desire-filled right eye."

The player, still stunned, closed his left eye. In the next moment, he found himself in a normal passageway with Bai Liu, no longer amidst the chaos.

The two guilds, who had been violently clashing in front of the small TV, stopped in their tracks.

Mu Sicheng's anger subsided. He smugly slapped Muke on the shoulder and looked provocatively at the other guild. "What did I tell you? If all these people die, Bai Liu will be fine."

Meanwhile, Muke was still staring blankly at Bai Liu's small TV. The likes on Bai Liu's TV had, for the first time, surpassed the number of likes on the stomps, a significant margin.

Other viewers, aside from their own guild, had silently liked and bookmarked Bai Liu's small TV.

Muke sighed in relief, his eyes glowing with hope. There was still a chance in this tug-of-war!

In-game:

The King's Guild member, his face pale, staggered to his bunk, gasping for breath.

Bai Liu observed him calmly before drinking a bottle of stamina restorer. He then jumped off the bunk and walked out.

Still wearing the shell of Liu Jiayi, a full-fledged fabricator from the Rose factory, Bai Liu had yet to be expelled.

It didn't take long for the King's Guild player to sneak up behind him. Bai Liu glanced back and noticed that the man had taped his eyelids open with double-sided tape, his eyes wide as copper bells, fixed on Bai Liu like a tomcat in a game of Cat and Mouse, trying to stay awake.

The man seemed dumbfounded by the blink-and-switch mechanics of the game.

Bai Liu: "..."

He silently recalled the people he had encountered within the King's Guild—Liu Jiayi, Qi Yifang, Tang Erda—and now this somewhat dim-witted player.

Why did the King's Guild members seem so out of their minds?

After following Bai Liu for a while, the man couldn't hold back any longer. He bowed slightly and whispered, "How did you react so quickly to catch the monster's eye and escape?"

"He wrote it down in his diary and told me himself," Bai Liu responded casually.

The man fell silent, then, convinced and amazed, muttered, "It's the first time I've seen such a frank monster!"

Bai Liu: "..."

He recalled Liu Jiayi's words about one of the King's Guild members being somewhat lacking in intelligence, with an IQ of 59, and sharing her surname, Liu Ji.

The fact that his name was Liu Ji seemed almost ironic, given the circumstances.

The Rose Factory

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Liu Ji followed Bai Liu's lead, saying nothing, showing no intention of attacking him, nor turning to Tang Erda to negotiate a confession.

But to remain so calm in a situation where the man clearly knew he was Bai Liu felt a bit off.

Bai Liu glanced at him sideways but said nothing.

Liu Ji was a bit of a deadbeat, to put it simply. He would do anything to help Bai Liu but wouldn't do anything harmful to him. Like his weapon of skill, Liu Ji was a bit of a stick figure, easy to deal with. This is why Liu Jiayi had shaken him up; if Bai Liu needed help, Liu Ji was the best choice.

Liu Ji, however, was unaware that he had been set up by Liu Jiayi and Bai Liu. He believed his involvement was an accident and thought Bai Liu had saved Liu Ji's life in the Inner World.

It seemed like he remembered Liu Jiayi for saving his life.

Coincidentally, the King's Guild was full of crafty people, but the reserves were mostly good-hearted—these were the people Hearts had chosen as Liu Jiayi's "spare brothers." They needed various types of character but not much intelligence, with loyalty and self-control being their most important traits, making them unlikely to betray Liu Jiayi.

The reserve team members chosen through this screening process were picked up by Bai Liu, as their personalities were exactly the type he could easily manipulate.

Bai Liu withdrew his gaze from Liu Ji and walked toward the piazza—it was the day they would hand over the semi-finished products to the factory workers.

The three processors with the highest delivery rates of semi-finished products would have the chance to be promoted to factory workers.

Liu Ji walked over and saw several factory workers sitting in the piazza.

They were dressed head to toe in robes made of pure white fabric, wrapped tightly from neck to ankle, with their faces covered in loops of gauze, making them look like they were wearing dense, heavy masks.

The first batch of fabricators arrived, but the factory workers didn't pay much attention—they had to wait for most of the fabricators to arrive before they could start collecting the semi-finished products.

Bai Liu wasn’t in a hurry. He asked Liu Ji where they kept their semi-finished products before walking over to inspect them.

The roses in the iron pot had shrunk considerably since they were first picked. What had once filled the pot was now just a layer at the bottom.

"Yesterday, we were frying them until they got lighter," Liu Ji sighed. "The semi-finished dried leaf roses are only yielding about a quarter to a tenth of a percent. With everything we had yesterday, we’ve got less than 100 kg left to fry, and there are three of us."

Bai Liu glanced around. All the other processors had more roses in their pots than they did, especially the one not far from them, which was nearly overflowing—it looked like it should have the most semi-finished products.

Seeing Bai Liu inspecting the other pots, Liu Ji quickly reminded him, "That’s Tang Erda’s. Processors are forbidden from stealing each other’s work, and if caught, they’ll be removed from their jobs!"

Bai Liu nodded in acknowledgment.

From the way the roses were placed in the iron pots, Bai Liu realized that management at the processor level was strict—at least in terms of preventing the kind of "robbing" mechanism among flower-pickers. Otherwise, the entire operation would fall apart, with no one working, just guarding and stealing from each other.

Bai Liu made the rounds and returned to their pots. Liu Ji sighed ruefully, "We have the least amount after splitting things equally. I don’t know if we’ll be demoted."

"No." Bai Liu looked at him sideways. "If you're willing to pay a small price, you can get a promotion."

Liu Ji stared at the meager layer of semi-finished products at the bottom of the pot, then looked at Bai Liu with confusion. "What's the price?"

Bai Liu smiled. "Perfume."

Liu Ji, who had a surplus of perfume, looked at him in confusion. "Perfume will get me a promotion? But I only have low-grade perfume here. How can that be worth anything?"

Even if he bribed the factory workers, they wouldn't be impressed.

Liu Ji asked a few more questions, but Bai Liu didn't respond further, which made Liu Ji suspicious. Was Bai Liu just trying to cheat him out of his perfume?

Given Bai Liu's reputation for trickery, Liu Ji couldn't believe that a few bottles of cheap perfume would lead to a promotion in this game. If it were that easy, it wouldn't be a Level 3 game.

Liu Ji shook his head, realizing that as a not-so-smart player, it was too easy for a highly intelligent player like Bai Liu to fool him.

The only thing he could do was tell himself—no matter how tempting Bai Liu's offers were later, don't give him the perfume!

There's no way Bai Liu's promise is real! No one would trade a promotion for a few bottles of cheap perfume!

Bai Liu didn't notice Liu Ji's internal conflict and quietly watched the entrance to the factory, where a white mist was swirling. He seemed to spot something in the mist and got up to walk out.

Liu Ji hurriedly followed. Bai Liu made his way around the flower field to the spot where they had been drying the roses.

There was a faint layer of mist near the flower fields in the early morning, and a few figures stood in the mist. This instantly alerted Liu Ji, but Bai Liu approached them as if he hadn't seen them, unsuspecting.

As the distance shortened, the fog quickly cleared, revealing several stragglers, each carrying a sack. When they saw Bai Liu, they approached with glowing eyes, speaking to him with the utmost respect, "Mr. Bai's sister is here!"

"We're not too late!"

Bai Liu nodded and asked, "Did you bring everything?"

"Yes, here it is!" they replied eagerly.

Liu Ji helped pick up some of the sacks that the migrant workers handed to Bai Liu.

When Liu Ji grabbed one, he was surprised by its weight. Opening it, he was stunned to find it filled with semi-finished products that had already been dried and fried!

So many sacks—how many semi-finished products must be in here?

"Thank you for your hard work." Bai Liu nodded sincerely to the stragglers, then turned to the dumbfounded Liu Ji, tilting his head naturally. "One sack of perfume for each, four sacks in total for me and you—pay up."

Liu Ji, still dazed, was about to hand over his money when he stopped, realizing something. "Wait, I'm fine with paying for the sacks I want to use, but why are you asking me to pay for yours too?"

Liu Ji was shocked by Bai Liu's bluntness. His girlfriend had never taken him for granted like this!

"What you paid for me was an intermediary fee." Bai Liu smiled smoothly. "I'm the broker for the deal between these stragglers and you. You couldn't have made a deal with them without me. Try seeing if they'll do business with you without my introduction."

Liu Ji instinctively turned to look at the stragglers.

The stragglers eyed him warily, reaching out to snatch the sack back from his hands. "Mr. Bai's sister doesn't agree to this deal. Please return the semi-finished products to us."

Liu Ji was furious. "..."

He sulked but reluctantly paid Bai Liu's share, handing over five bottles of low-grade perfume. The stragglers eagerly took them, bowed to Bai Liu, and left in gratitude.

Liu Ji: "..."

I'm the one who paid! Why isn't anyone thanking me?

What's wrong with these NPCs? They should be thanking the right person!

But what Liu Ji didn't know was that the stragglers were thanking Bai Liu because they had originally intended to give him the semi-finished products for free. Bai Liu had provided the raw materials and even gave them the perfume, but they were selling it back to him for money. This was a bit ungrateful, but Bai Liu had just smiled mysteriously, saying that someone would pay for him, and they should go along with it.

He hadn't expected any fools to take the bait! They earned five extra bottles of perfume for nothing, so naturally, they were more than grateful to Bai Liu for looking out for them.

Liu Ji wasn't exactly thrilled about the promotion, but he returned to the piazza with several sacks of semi-finished products. The piazza was gradually filling up with processors.

Tang Erda and another member of the King's Guild were working overtime to finish up, while the rest of the processors were busy, with the factory workers' audit set to begin soon.

Bai Liu followed Liu Ji over, standing still as they mixed the semi-finished products he had bought into their iron pot.

Another member of the King's Guild glanced up at them in surprise at the extra dried leaf roses in the pot.

Bai Liu subtly shook his head, signaling the other to stay quiet, and the three of them quietly shared the pot of roses.

The factory workers' audit began in earnest.

The processors lined up, placing their finished roses into sacks. The factory workers first checked the quality of the semi-finished products and then weighed them. The audit had two criteria: yield and the color of the roses.

Bai Liu's team was at the back of the line, surrounded by a chorus of regretful or evasive comments.

Most of the processors had steady outputs around two hundred kilograms per person.

Then there was an exclamation.

"352.3 kg! This one's producing at a high rate—almost fifty percent!"

"... damn, it's that new processor. The man's strength and stamina are outrageous. This output rate means he's flipping the roses fast enough to evaporate the water without too much effort..."

"That's a lot! Damn it, that'll definitely earn a spot for factory worker promotion!"

The processors behind them cursed, and Bai Liu turned to see Tang Erda standing next to the weighing table, unfazed by the rules.

He didn't seem to think that his high output of semi-finished products —three times that of others—was a violation of the trade. He shook hands with a delighted factory worker and nodded as he moved down.

Liu Ji's face froze when the total weight of their semi-finished products was revealed—it was just over eight hundred kilograms, averaging more than two hundred per person. Still, it wasn't nearly enough to compete with Tang Erda.

If someone else behind them had a higher yield... their chances at a factory worker position were looking grim.

"Pick one person who's guaranteed 200 kilograms. The other two should aim for around three hundred," Bai Liu decided quickly. "We'll keep the factory worker position."

The last member of the King's Guild let out a bitter laugh. "I don't even know how you guys got this much. It wasn't even my job, I was just trying to keep up."

Bai Liu simply nodded.

When it was Bai Liu's turn to be weighed, the factory workers, after checking his picking and output weights, looked at him in disbelief. "360 kg of fresh roses... and you've produced 302.7 kg?"

"An 84% output rate? How do you do that?"

Bai Liu: "..."

He'd gotten careless. Too many copied assignments and not enough thought about output rates.

Chapter End Notes

Bai Lui did his job too well and people are freaking out because of it.

He was too absorbed in achieving a high volume without paying attention to how well the results aligned with the expected or performance metrics, like the quality of the semi-finished products.

The Rose Factory

Bai Liu, his expression unchanged, confounded the curious factory worker: "I have special processing skills."

The factory workers looked at him with suspicion. Processing dried leaf roses was a manual task, and children had no advantage in such a high-output environment.

Bai Liu cast a feigned anxious glance at the two members of the King's Guild standing below.

Now, the factory worker understood—it was the two men who should have helped the young girl by sharing their roses with her.

Although it was forbidden to openly steal from one another, smuggling was possible, with one party 'voluntarily' giving their work to another. In every sense, the promotion of processors to factory workers wasn't entirely fair.

These unspoken rules were well-known to the factory workers who had risen through the ranks of the processors, and they weren't prepared to take on too much responsibility.

It was unclear what this little girl had done, or what the other two processors were to give her their dried leaf roses voluntarily. But, as things stood, the regular factory workers—who had stable positions and weren't easily laid off—weren't about to make life difficult for these processors trying to climb the ladder.

After all, the competition among them wasn't as fierce.

"Processor number 71063 surrendered 302.7 kg of semi-finished dried leaf roses."

The factory worker beside him recorded Bai Liu's numbers, waved him off, and let him go, turning a blind eye to the situation.

Most other processors had values under 250 kg for dried leaf roses, with only a few exceeding 280 kg.

Bai Liu, Liu Ji, and Tang Erda were the only three processors to provide dried leaf roses weighing over 300 kg.

The weighing was soon complete. While the factory workers checked the data, Liu Ji took Bai Liu's arm and led him away from the processors who glared at them with hostility.

The processors surrounding Tang Erda looked at him with similar hatred. He was more than a head taller than the others, but they dared not approach him. Instead, they stepped back, glaring at him from a distance.

These three newcomers had taken the opportunity to be promoted to factory workers right away!

The factory workers looked up after reviewing the data. "Will the following three numbered processors please come with us?"

"The three processors numbered 71063... will be led into the next workshop by our three factory workers to learn about the daily work of a factory worker. But please note that this does not qualify you to become a factory worker."

The factory worker at the head of the group spoke seriously: "This is just to give you a chance. You still have a long way to go before becoming full factory workers."

With that, he turned to Bai Liu and waved him over. "You come with me."

Bai Liu walked up, Liu Ji gave him a concerned look, and they parted ways, each following a different factory worker.

Tang Erda left with another factory worker, casting a lingering, intense stare at Liu Jiayi before walking away.

He sensed something familiar and unpleasant in Liu Jiayi today.

Bai Liu was led through a deep, vaulted, narrow corridor flanked by the bunk rooms they had stayed in the night before. The doors were closed, blocking any light from entering the corridor.

Strangely, the corridor, though occupied by only the two of them, was filled with hurried footsteps, creaking doors on either side, and gaps in the doorways as if something was staring at their feet.

The factory worker in front of him turned pale. He seemed to hear the voices too and quickened his pace.

Bai Liu remained calm, knowing that if he closed his right eye, he could see a very different reality.

But there was no need to do so now. Although he had the "key" to freely travel through the Inner World, he had entered it to gather more information, and there were clearly more important things to discover at this moment.

Bai Liu glanced at the factory worker, who was now hurrying, and politely asked, "Excuse me, if I want to become a full factory worker, what should I do?"

The factory worker, startled by the voices, snapped back to attention at Bai Liu's question. He relaxed his face and replied, "We offer some of our more accomplished processors the chance to be promoted to factory workers, but it's not an opportunity everyone can seize. Only those with certain natural traits are selected."

Bai Liu tilted his head. "What kind of traits?"

"The traits of a perfumer," the factory worker replied softly. "The reason the factory workers at the Rose Factory are regular employees who can be laid off without consequence is because we are all reserve perfumers. Perfumers have a very short career lifespan, and if we don't select our reserves in advance, there could be a break in the workforce, and the factory would have no one to continue operations."

"That's why the factory worker position is also known as an apprentice perfumer," the factory worker continued with a complex expression. "Before becoming a full perfumer, we are responsible for basic tasks like distillation, extraction, purification, and concentration. Only once we become perfumers can we actually produce the perfume—Rose Dried Leaf Gas—for the factory in its truest form."

"Most perfumers can only produce low-level perfumes in their lifetime. The intermediate perfume blending process is so complex that it is produced in small quantities, and a single drop can sell for a thousand dollars."

The factory worker turned to Bai Liu. "It's only auctioned at the annual May Rose Festival, and it's sold to the highest bidder."

"So, how do you screen someone for the qualities of a perfumer?" Bai Liu asked, mulling over the real-world requirements for a perfumer. "Is it olfactory sensitivity?"

As he spoke, he began switching panels in his hands.

[System Alert: Does player Bai Liu use player Mu Sicheng's soul note to access his opponent’s system panel?]

[OK.]

Mu Sicheng—Bai Liu recalled—had a great sense of smell.

But even with an excellent sense of smell, Bai Liu couldn’t identify too many specific fragrances. However, the game at this level likely only filtered for certain qualities. Otherwise, no ordinary player—only a professional perfumer—would be able to pass.

This seemed like something the game designer would have thought about; they wouldn’t want the game to be unplayable.

"We don’t screen processors based on a simple sensory trait like smell," the factory worker shook his head. "We screen based on a very important flavoring instrument."

Instruments?

Bai Liu had never heard of an instrument that could detect the qualities of a perfumer.

Most of the perfumery instruments he knew were for stirring and mixing—simple pipettes, paddles, and test papers, all quaint and low-tech. In a game world where technology appeared backward, such an instrument still existed?

However, when Bai Liu pressed him further, the factory worker refused to answer any more questions about the instrument.

Whenever Bai Liu tried to broach the subject, fear and awe appeared on the factory worker’s face.

Finally, he said evasively, "No, it's not any instrument you can imagine. It's an instrument from a dead person... but it’s really a living instrument—it even has a heartbeat!"

"The instrument, part living and part lifeless, selects the people who can use it."

After these words, the factory worker fell silent.

In silence, his face pale, he led Bai Liu into a plain white room, the size of an operating theatre, used for cleaning.

Bai Liu was told to change into clean, sterilized protective clothing and to wash his hands before entering the next room for screening.

The factory worker led him through a purple sterilization room, then through several others filled with an unpleasant gas. The factory worker explained that the purpose was to sterilize them before they entered the core perfumery. The heavy protective suit Bai Liu had changed into earlier would offer basic protection.

These rooms disinfected the living in a crude, direct manner, not caring whether the intensity of the sterilization could kill them. This showed that the builders of the Rose Factory prioritized the instrument that could test the perfumer's qualities over the lives of those in their care.

After passing through several rooms, Bai Liu was led into a tightly sealed, metal-filled room.

By this point, Bai Liu's eyes changed for the first time since entering this dangerous factory. He looked up and scanned the doors of the room from top to bottom.

The door was completely airtight, impossibly tall, and identical in construction to the one at the Bureau of Dangerous Heresy, number [0001], even down to the small, forcibly welded window above it.

The factory worker knocked twice on the small window. A moment later, the door, heavy and scarred from welding, slowly opened inward.

Bai Liu’s pupils contracted slightly as he took in the scene inside.

The Rose Factory

In the room, which had a luster akin to a dull red, cold water pipes emerged from all sides and clustered in the center like twisted, grotesque snakes, wrapping around some of the wooden, narrow-beam-like support structures at the top of the room. These pipes twisted and fell, converging in the middle of the space.

In the center of the room stood a huge display case made of glass, brass, and iron—once seen by Bai Liu—filled with an unknown viscous liquid.

That was the display case he had used to house Tawil when they first met in the museum in Siren. Now, in this game called The Rose Factory, that same case no longer contained a decaying, beautiful mermaid, but instead a bright red, beating heart.

Cold metal pipes were drilled through small openings in the top of the display case, connecting to the aorta, pulmonary artery, pulmonary vein, main vein, and both the upper and lower vena cava of the heart, each secured to the vessel walls with a staple-like device.

The tubes transformed into steel veins, "veins" that pumped a rose-scented pink liquid—the color of blood after carbon monoxide poisoning. Meanwhile, the heart, the color of a branding iron, hung suspended in the center of the display case, beating regularly and calmly, one after the other.

It was the heart of an old friend of Bai Liu's, a being called Tawil, the monster named after an evil god.

Bai Liu’s blurred memory momentarily cleared as he stared at the bright red heart.

He remembered when he was six, not long after meeting Xie Ta. He leaned over the front table of the church with a mischievous grin, nudged Xie Ta's heart, and asked teasingly, "You say you're a monster who can't die—what if someone, like me, deliberately ripped out your heart? Would you die?"

Xie Ta had answered without missing a beat: "No, my heart will beat in your hands."

Xie Ta had never lied to Bai Liu. Tawil would never die. But now, his heart no longer beat in Bai Liu's hands; it beat in a game of roses and destruction.

Tawil's heart, like the withering thorns of a dried rose, materialized just when Bai Liu sought it, stabbing the man who had once promised to rip it out with his own hands.

The factory worker who had led Bai Liu to the heart display led him up a wooden ladder to the back of the heart's enclosure.

Standing on the first rung, Bai Liu could reach the openings where the pipes connected to the display case.

The factory worker explained the next steps: "Be respectful of the apparatus (instrument). Use it carefully. Do not touch the pipes above; inside are extracted and distilled perfume raw liquids, sometimes boiling hot, passing through the heart cycle to become usable by perfumers. However, this raw material is weak, and the perfume will remain of low quality. It’s only after the talent of a perfumer that the fragrance will become stronger."

"Next, we’ll give you a raw, uncirculated perfume to drop into the glass case. If the raw liquid discolors, it means you have the talent to use this instrument. The darker the color, the stronger your talent as a perfumer." The factory worker looked at Bai Liu. "If you’re sure you have the talent, you can be promoted to factory worker."

The factory worker handed Bai Liu a vial of original perfume, carefully moved the clustered tubes to reveal a tiny opening, and gently nudged him. "Now, go ahead and try it."

Bai Liu held the vial of raw perfume in his palm, staring down at the heart with a motionless gaze. His eyes were empty of emotion.

His heart pounded under his eyes as though it were still inside Xie Ta's chest.

The factory worker, eyeing Bai Liu's stillness, asked with suspicion, "Processor number 70365, why aren't you down yet?"

It might have been an illusion, but the factory worker could have sworn that the processor, usually calm, seemed to grow... angry the moment he saw the apparatus.

Though Bai Liu's expression didn’t change, his aura suddenly became terrifying.

The worker, normally bold, was now too scared to prod him, whispering quietly, too intimidated to even ask why Bai Liu was taking so long during the test. Usually, at this point, someone would have been scolded harshly for being so indecisive.

The instruments were valuable; exposure to the air too long would contaminate them.

Bai Liu stepped forward at the urging of the factory worker, expressionless. He raised his hand flat, then turned it and dropped the original liquid through the opening.

A drop of the rose-red liquid landed in the glass case. As it washed over the surface of the viscous liquid in ripples, the rose-red color deepened and spread.

The factory worker's eyes widened in shock as he stared at Bai Liu, unable to believe what he was seeing.

But this was only the prelude to the change.

Soon, an inexplicable wind swept through the confined space, and the drops of original liquid, now like concentrated pigment, began to spread and thicken in a bizarre curvature, darkening layer by layer.

The liquid spread from a faint pink rose to a deeper rose, then to a lighter red, and finally to a vibrant red, the color of a ripe rose by the time it reached the heart.

At the same time, as the color deepened, the heart began to beat faster, accelerating the rate at which the liquid was pumped out.

The pipes fixed to the wall struggled to handle the pressure. Their joints began to ooze "blood" and tremble, threatening to detach, while the thick glass "cracked" as the color turned red.

The factory worker panicked, calling out to the employee guarding the apparatus, who, like him, was confused.

This was all thickened metal piping and bulletproof glass!

"Release the water for the tank!" the employee shouted, yanking at the lever.

Immediately, the lid beneath the glass case opened, a spout underground opened, and the reddened liquid poured out. Almost simultaneously, a newer, more solid case rose from below, filling it with liquid and suspending the heart once more.

Bai Liu was escorted by factory workers to the next room while the water was being changed—an area where only a few were allowed to be present to prevent contamination.

The factory worker, trembling with fear over what had just happened, overheard Bai Liu laughing.

It was a smile of demonic satisfaction, as though he had received a response from the living-dead heart that unnerved him.

The smile was particularly unsettling on the grey-eyed, blind little girl's boyish face.

The factory worker didn't dare ask what Bai Liu was laughing at. He recalled what he had just seen and, with some hesitation, began to think that the factory had just welcomed the most talented perfumer ever.

That color—one only seen in extravagant perfumes.

The worker swallowed nervously, still holding a stain of the original liquid on his hand. In a small room next to the apparatus, he began writing an application:

—"One of the three processors selected today to test the perfumer's talent caused a serious accident by cracking the glass case during the test. This sounds like an unforgivable mistake, and punishment by death is required..."]

[...but allow me to argue on behalf of this processor. This is truly an extenuating circumstance, and I petition that you not only spare her life but specifically promote her to perfumer..."]

[...This time, the test caused the instrument to produce a red color I've never seen before—ruby, blood-like, deep and beautiful. If I'm not mistaken, the processor who made this mistake would be the most talented perfumer we've ever had at the Rose Factory.]

We know how dangerous it is to be a perfumer in this world. It's a profession tied to the organs of the dead, creating the perfume of death, and ultimately heading to hell with a fragrance full of death."

[This processor is the person with the most death in her that I've ever seen. She was born for this. She's a genius in the profession—both I and the apparatus think so. Please, consider my petition carefully.]

[The May Rose Festival is coming, and we have never needed a perfumer who can produce an exceptional perfume more than we do now.]

After finishing the application, the factory worker hurried to take Bai Liu up to the office on the third floor to begin the process of converting the processors into factory workers.

At the same time, Tang Erda, now in his sterilized protective clothing, entered the freshly tidied instrument holding room, accompanied by another factory worker.

Tang Erda stared at the room with a frown—he recognized, as Bai Liu did, the odd construction.

This room in the game looked exactly the same as room [0001] in the Dangerous Heresy Bureau, a facility created for dealing with dangerous heretics.

His gaze swept across the entire dark-red, cooling-piped apparatus storage room, finally settling on the bizarre, disembodied heart linked to the cooling pipes. The heart was still beating, suspended in a large glass display case at the center of the room.

Tang Erda, with years of experience handling dangerous heretics and clearing countless games, had never seen such a strange heretic or monster, either in reality or in the game.

It was as though by allowing this heart to beat for just one more second, his own heart rate would be compelled to beat in unison with it.

He looked at the beating heart, his brow furrowing deeper as his hand reached behind him. A tiny dot of light converged to form a silver pistol in Tang Erda's palm.

The gun was aimed at the heart at an imperceptible angle.

The Rose Factory

In the end, Tang Erda did not pull the trigger.

The factory worker had told him that this was the only way he could be promoted to factory worker and then to perfumer, the central figure in the running of the entire rose factory.

Tang Erda had reason to believe that this strange heart was connected to the main quest of the game—[Become a Factory Manager].

At the sight of the heart, he felt an uncontrollable killing intent, almost as if it were being induced by the heart itself. The feeling was unusual, like something was deliberately urging him to kill, and it made him uncomfortable.

What if the heart, instead of being a monster as he had initially believed, was simply the heart of a contaminated innocent?

Tang Erda had never encountered anything like this before, so he paused for a moment, controlled the sudden urge to kill, and calmly lowered his gun. He decided to find the source of the game's contamination before making a decision.

Guided by the factory worker, Tang Erda took a bottle of rose liquid, climbed the ladder, and poured it down. The employee guarding the apparatus nervously watched as Tang Erda's hand rested on the sluice gate, ready to pull it down. The noise Bai Liu had made earlier had clearly left an impression on him.

Tang Erda's drops of the original perfume only glowed a light rosy red.

The factory workers and watchmen, waiting for the results, felt both disappointed and relieved at the same time—though it was a good result, it was far too different from the previous processor's inspection.

"You don't have much talent, but it's not entirely hopeless for you to be promoted to factory worker. We're short on staff with the May Rose Festival coming up," the factory worker who had guided Tang Erda said, looking at him. "You'll need to take another scent paper test. If you show some basic talent, you'll be ready to move on."

Tang Erda frowned. "What's the fragrance paper test?"

Meanwhile, on the third floor, in the factory workers' office.

Bai Liu looked up at the Director of Plant Engineering behind his desk. "What does the fragrance test paper mean?"

The director of the factory replied, “To confirm whether you’re talented enough to be promoted to perfumer, we dare not take the risk with the instrument again. The paper audit isn’t as accurate as the instrument, but it can provide a general range.”

“However, considering your destructive tendencies toward the instrument, you're likely to break the test paper during the test.”

He looked at Bai Liu and tapped his fingers on the table. “Although test papers are precious and non-renewable for any perfumer, if your talent is as exceptional as it seems, it would be worth the risk of losing one to test you again.”

A fragrance paper test?

The strange term caused Bai Liu to raise an eyebrow.

He had seen fragrance test papers at some perfume counters in shopping malls and remembered them as stiff sheets of paper, similar to pH test strips. These sheets are highly absorbent and can retain a perfume’s fragrance for a long time.

By placing a perfume-stained test paper about ten centimeters in front of your nose and fanning it, you could better smell the pure fragrance —this was a common device used by perfumers.

However, the word "piece" seemed off; it should be “sheet” or “slice.”

Bai Liu didn’t question further and waited for the director to continue.

“If you’re physically fine, we can proceed with the tests.” The director nodded toward the factory worker who had previously led Bai Liu through the instrumental testing and turned back to Bai Liu. “I’ll have him take you to the lower levels, where the test papers and the Rose’s death row inmates are kept, for the test.”

The director handed the factory worker a set of keys. “Take him down and show him.”

Bai Liu, a prisoner on death row, understood what was going on.

The stragglers had explained the concept to him earlier. Prisoners who had committed crimes related to the Rose of Dry Leaves could be taken in by the Rose Factory. In exchange for performing labor, they could have their death sentences converted to life imprisonment, with the factory taking control of their lives.

But holding the scent paper… and the unit of "one"…

A vague and unpleasant feeling stirred in the back of Bai Liu's mind. He recalled a vision he didn't like and the malicious intentions of the game's designers, which made the smile on his face fade.

The factory worker led Bai Liu down, passing the long corridor they had walked down earlier. They turned a corner into a shaded bend and reached the dormitory corridor.

There, a wooden door exuded a completely different smell from the rest of the rose factory—no fragrance, just a particularly foul odor.

The factory worker took out a set of keys, picked one, and unlocked the door. It creaked open slowly, releasing a stench of meat and sour sweat, reminiscent of methane gas.

The stone walls on either side of the staircase were narrow. A dim yellow bulb, not very bright, had been installed at intervals. The illumination was so poor that Bai Liu could see no more than ten meters ahead.

Anticipating this, the factory worker brought a torch and led Bai Liu down with the light.

As they walked, the factory worker explained, "This is the lower floor of the factory, where only senior factory workers and perfumers are allowed."

Bai Liu estimated they had descended about twenty meters before reaching the bottom, where he saw a structure similar to a prison.

A cramped path stretched through the wet, dreary ground, flanked by cage-like bars embedded in the wall. Inside, condemned prisoners—human and ghostly—filled the cells.

Bai Liu described them this way because they resembled the stragglers he had seen in the rose fields.

The condemned prisoners made slurred noises, weakly reaching out toward Bai Liu and the factory worker as they passed. However, they were too feeble to move, struggling briefly before letting out a mournful, desperate scream.

That scream made Bai Liu feel that they weren't calling for help but were asking for a bit of torment.

Others lay dead, their eyes and mouths wide open, decomposing to the point where only bits of maggot-filled flesh remained. Flies buzzed around, adding to the grim atmosphere.

Strangely, most of the corpses seemed to have contented smiles on their faces, if their features allowed such an expression.

It was as if living had been a painful, torturous experience for them, and death had finally brought the relief they had waited for.

Bai Liu's gaze slowly swept over the condemned prisoners, trying to read something in their expressions.

The factory worker seemed to notice Bai Liu's gaze and defensively said, "The factory doesn't have a penchant for mistreating these death row inmates. When we take them in, we perfume them almost daily to keep them alive—it's better than how most flower pickers are treated."

"Oh, really?" Bai Liu asked indifferently, "So, you're philanthropists, giving free perfume to criminals? Why don't you ask them if they want to die, or if they want to be taken over by you?"

The factory worker, struck by Bai Liu's unsavory tone, remained silent.

The Rose Factory was definitely not a place that would waste perfume. The fact that they didn't take in all the condemned prisoners, but only some, suggested something was amiss. Judging from a profit standpoint, the condemned prisoners chosen by the factory must have qualities that benefit the factory's development.

Bai Liu hadn't understood what this "profit" was at first—spending perfume on a small group of workers didn't seem like a good business move.

But now, he finally understood what this "profit" truly was.

It took a moment of silence and a sigh before the factory worker spoke with some embarrassment. "These death row inmates were specially selected by the factory to have some resistance to rose perfume."

"These people, even if they are corrupted by the perfume, do not easily show signs of addiction to it. They stick to themselves, they stick to their roots, and would rather die than give in easily to dried leaf rose gas. In fact, the reason they were caught for their crimes was mostly to develop an antidote to the rose perfume."

After another moment of silence, the factory worker spoke again. "At a time when most people have succumbed to the addictive nature of rose perfume, it is difficult to test the concentration and holding power of a rose perfume specifically through ordinary perfume test papers, except for instruments."

"Because it is difficult for people like perfumers, who are already highly addicted, to screen a perfume by their own reactions to it, most of them have become numb to the scent due to the high concentration of rose perfume they use day and night."

"But as you can see, instruments are precious, and we can't activate them to test perfumes all the time."

"At this point, we need people who can resist the rose perfume and are more sensitive to its rejection as experimental subjects. By observing the painful reactions of these people, we infer the effectiveness of this perfume. We call such people test papers."

The factory worker said as he led Bai Liu deeper inside. "What you saw just now were scrap test papers. They were on the verge of failure, but they could still be used once or twice. But I led you through a special passage this time, and the test paper you used is one of the oldest test papers we have in the factory."

The factory worker sighed. "These old test papers are also dying. Yesterday, it was said that for the May Rose Festival, a perfumer tested a bottle of extra perfume and scrapped another one. It's been transferred to the lower periphery, but this one you used this time is the highest quality test paper in our factory. He seems to be in good spirits, and his rejection reaction to the rose perfume is stable too."

Speaking of which, the factory worker couldn't help but sigh. "I've never seen someone so steadily rejecting rose perfume. It's all been so painful, and yet they never change their rejection of it. The steadfastness of mind is admirable."

"The May Rose Festival has tested several bottles of the Extraordinary Perfume on him, and although his body has suffered a certain amount of poisoning, organ failure, and weakness, the rejection has not changed in ten years."

"I wonder if people like this are really human... or too stubborn."

Bai Liu didn't say a word as he looked around at the condemned prisoners. His eyes grew darker before he finally said very softly, "Too stubborn, I think, too."

The factory worker didn't hear Bai Liu's words and turned to him, asking, "What did you say?"

This time, Bai Liu did not answer.

The factory worker led him on. As the tunnels became darker and darker, the cages to the left and right grew larger, and the living conditions inside became more like a temporary room for a person.

Finally, the factory worker stopped by a separate cage, a larger one. At the far end of the cage, the "incense paper" inside was hidden in the darkness, only vaguely visible as the black outline of a hunched human figure sitting on the edge of the bed.

The cage was much tidier than the others, with two old, yellowed clothes hanging on the bars and a table inside with some books, paper, and pens neatly arranged. A few scattered cigarette cases lay around, all empty.

The factory worker, who had led Bai Liu here, looked at the cage, which was so clean it didn't look like a dungeon, with a complicated expression. "He's cleaned it himself again... It's nothing like a man who's been tested with incense for so long to maintain such sanity."

"This is the test scent paper you tested today." The factory worker pulled out the key and inserted it into the lock.

Meanwhile, in another tunnel a wall away, another factory worker led Tang Erda inside and was proudly explaining the dungeon that is the Rose Factory.

Tang Erda frowned as he looked at the condemned prisoners in their cages. He subconsciously drew his gun the moment he saw the Rose Drifter-like condemned prisoners, but soon realized they were not the same as the Rose Drifter.

But this difference made his brow furrow even more.

These people, all awake despite having been contaminated by the perfume to this extent, were struggling to fight the rose perfume that was corrupting their consciousness.

The factory worker, walking in front of Tang Erda, knocked on the iron door of a cage and said with envy, "You're lucky. It's an old scent tester that's about to be scrapped. It was tested yesterday by a senior perfumer's bottle of Grand Cru."

Tang Erda turned his head to look inside this gloomy, dark, hazy cage.

There was little light in the dungeon, and visibility was minimal. He could only roughly make out a dark figure of a man with his back against the wall, his torso rising and falling faintly with each breath. A stench bordering on decay permeated from the man's body, causing the factory worker to wave the air from his nose in disgust.

The man—or rather, the scent-testing paper—had only one arm and half of his face poking out of the shadows, exposed to the faint light and presumably visible. Tang Erda looked up at the other man's hand and face.

The hands were almost completely cracked, dark, bloodstained lines spreading from the tiger's mouth to the elbows. The half of the face that was exposed was completely disfigured, cracked, and bloody. The light-colored eyes lolling open and unfocused, stared at Tang Erda from beyond the fence.

For a moment, an unspeakable fear rushed through Tang Erda's mind. This half-face, this half-bloodied face, which he had seen in some nightmarish world line, made Tang Erda's hand shake uncontrollably as he gripped the gun.

Tang Erda's chest was still heaving, but his breathing had almost stopped. He stood motionless, as if frozen, staring straight into the face.

The pistol slipped from his palm and fell to the ground with a dull clink.

The factory worker, however, did not notice Tang Erda's abnormality. He inserted the key into the turning hole.

The dusty and rusty door opened slowly in front of Bai Liu and Tang Erda at the same time.

The factory worker moved out of the way so that Bai Liu could see inside the cage. He handed him the torch in his hand, inclined his head, and indicated for Bai Liu to go in and wait outside himself. He explained, "The smell of roses on us is too strong and will interfere with the fragrance test paper. Usually, only one person can go in."

"When you go in, this incense-testing paper will teach you how to test your talent. He's very skilled now and has a good temper. He won't attack you." The factory worker thought for a moment and added, "Although this fragrance test paper sometimes says some very strange things to the people who come to test it, it is generally very cooperative."

Bai Liu nodded to show that he understood. He calmly took the torch handed to him by the factory worker, turned it up to maximum brightness, and took one step into the cage.

As Bai Liu walked in, the beam of the torch slowly approached the bed. In the ghastly white glow, the first thing to appear was an old leather shoe that looked familiar to Bai Liu. Then, a pair of white-washed uniform trousers. Then, sweeping upwards, he saw a man holding the butt of an unlit cigarette, sitting with his head down on the edge of the bed.

The man's face and arms were completely deformed. The joints of his fingers were bare and full of tentacled bone. His breathing was thin, near nothing. His face was pale, his eyes bulging, the sides of his otherwise square and handsome cheeks sunken in, as if he hadn't eaten meat in decades. He was so thin he was almost a skeleton.

Bai Liu had never seen him like this when they were at their most miserable.

This man was never so hungry as to be emaciated, even when he gave up a lot of food to Bai Liu in the orphanage.

Only one pair of eyes remained unchangingly gentle and firm, in which not a single rose grew.

Bai Liu finally spoke up, pointing his torch at the man's head. His tone was level, neither rising nor falling. "Lu Yizhan, you finally ran out of money to buy cigarettes, didn't you?"

He looked at Liu Jiayi, who was standing in front of him. After a moment of confusion, as if he had suddenly come to his senses, he scratched his head with some embarrassment and said to himself in a silly manner, "Ah, did I just see a vision again?"

"This time it's Bai Liu's voice and Liu Jiayi, the little girl—wow, this Liu Jiayi really looks like Bai Liu." With that, Lu Yizhan reluctantly propped himself up and moved a little closer to the bed, curiously taking a look at the emotionless Bai Liu.

Bai Liu looked at him expressionlessly.

Then, Lu Yizhan suddenly curled his eyes and smiled gently, extending his hand, which was already covered with white bones, to Bai Liu. "But even if it's an illusion, I'm still quite happy."

"Because even in the world of illusion, we haven't seen each other for a long time, Bai Liu."

The Rose Factory

The iron gate swung open, and Tang Erda, standing before it, did not move.

For a moment, it was as though he had turned into a wooden statue—or rather, in that instant, he wished he were just that.

The factory worker gave him a couple of confused pushes, but Tang Erda was too large for him to budge. It was then that the 'incense paper' inside the cage suddenly twitched, its fingers moving ever so slightly toward him.

The dimly lit eye, leaning against the wall of the 'scent paper,' struggled to focus on Tang Erda, making a faint, questioning, hoarse sound: "..... Captain?"

With a soft thud, Tang Erda, who had been frozen in place, was jolted, his body hit by the blow so hard that he almost had to grit his teeth to keep his expression under control.

Scarlet eyes, still holding onto the wall for support, glanced down at the man in the cage—or rather, at the incense paper. Something drained Tang Erda of all strength, leaving him bruised and battered, barely able to steady himself. Each step he took felt like it was bringing him closer to the cage that had always trapped him... and Su Yang.

Tang Erda walked up to the scented paper, and in that moment, he saw the other man's face clearly.

Su Yang’s face was bloomed, the roses in his eyes as vibrant as a field of flowers. His features were marred with lines of spilled flesh, and he wore the uniform of the deputy captain of the Bureau of Dangerous Heretics, complete with his badge.

The work photograph on his badge was stained with blood, dirty and worn.

That face, and the image on the badge, reminded Tang Erda of the time Su Yang had been shot by the Joker. The anguished screams of their team echoed in his mind.

Tang Erda had watched the video of Su Yang's death with a blank expression, as if detached from his own body. His mind malfunctioned, repeating a single thought over and over—If only I had been next to Su Yang.

—I wish I had been caught with Su Yang. I wish I had been the one to be captured instead of him. I wish I had been Su Yang.

If only I were the one being tortured, the one hurting, the one dying.

—Why does it always have to be Su Yang? Why, every time?

It had to be the most important person—the one he, a coward across so many timelines, had been too afraid to speak to, too afraid to look at, too afraid to confront.

Tang Erda closed his eyes, his hand still pressed against the wall, and struggled to remain standing.

In Su Yang's eyes, there was the faintest light. Despite his pain, he appeared almost innocent, his face unmarred by malice, as if he wanted to smile, to express the trust and joy of seeing Tang Erda, the captain.

But the cuts on his skin prevented him from doing so.

Instead, the corners of his mouth curved downward in helpless resignation, though his voice remained full of warmth: "It's really you, Captain!"

Su Yang tried to lift his hand to reach for Tang Erda's coat, but failed, his hand trembling with the effort.

Once again, as Su Yang lifted his hand and was about to drop it, Tang Erda silently half-crouched down. With a trembling hand, he placed it lightly, almost hesitantly, over the back of Su Yang's hand, but kept his distance.

Su Yang gasped weakly, leaning against the wall, half-closing his eyes and smiling at him. Then, with effort, he turned his hand to grasp Tang Erda's.

Tang Erda took a deep breath, trying to suppress the flood of emotions overwhelming him. For the first time in this timeline, he didn't reject Su Yang's closeness. Instead, he gently returned the grip, his voice hoarse and strained: "Yes, the captain is here to get you out."

"No, you can't... get me out of here," Su Yang coughed, a wry, helpless smile curling on his lips.

As he had so often done in the past, Su Yang seemed distressed by Tang Erda's reckless determination but remained patient, trying to persuade him.

His voice sounded broken by rapid breaths: "It's useless if you help me out. I'm really dying."

Su Yang's eyes lowered, his voice softening: "My family, my parents, my team... they didn't make it. They've all withered away. Now, I'm the only one left... but I won't last much longer."

"I've come to terms with it. I can't do anything in front of this thing. I'm too much of a failure." Su Yang's voice trailed off as he looked up, his rose-colored eyes almost unnaturally clear. His grip tightened around Tang Erda's hand, which was trying to pull away. "But you, Captain, are different. You're the one chosen by the prophets. You can change all of this."

In that moment, it was as if all the memories of countless timelines coalesced into a single sentence.

[Captain! You can do it!]

[Captain, I believe in you!]

[Captain, as long as you live, there's hope for us!]

Countless versions of Su Yang—bloody, broken, pale, scarred, or bloodied—looked at him with the same bright eyes full of hope, calling him Captain.

Then, in the next instant, they died laughing for him, their souls dissipating into the light with no trace left behind.

Tang Erda's mind blurred as he watched Su Yang's anxious expression. For a moment, he didn't feel like he was accepting Su Yang's trust and mandate, but rather a desperate curse—one he couldn't escape.

Su Yang shifted his body forward with difficulty, leaning on Tang Erda's shoulder. He whispered, his voice low: "Captain, listen... There's no point in saving me anymore. You've gotten yourself mixed up in this. You should be promoted to factory worker soon, and then to perfumer. There's an antidote to the rose perfume, but only the factory managers know it."

"Once you're promoted to factory manager, you'll know the antidote," Su Yang continued, taking shallow breaths. He leaned back against Tang Erda's shoulder, his voice light despite the situation. "That's when you'll be able to save these people."

Tang Erda was silent for what felt like an eternity before he spoke hoarsely: "What about you?"

Su Yang said nothing, instead leaning quietly against Tang Erda's shoulder, his chest rising and falling slightly, his eyes closed.

Neither of them needed to speak much. They both understood what Su Yang had decided—to sacrifice himself so Tang Erda could be promoted to factory worker.

This meant that, in the end, Tang Erda would have to kill Su Yang to save the rest.

Even if this Su Yang was just a game character, a mere shadow of the real person, Tang Erda couldn't bring himself to do it.

"But Captain..." Su Yang leaned on Tang Erda's shoulder, his eyes vacant as he whispered, almost as though to himself, "I'm beyond saving... I'm addicted."

"Captain, be a man. Look on the bright side. Everyone's going to die, eventually." Su Yang's tone was casual, almost as if he were reassuring Tang Erda. "If I have to die, I hope my death means something to you."

"I'm glad I got to see you before I completely wilted. At least that means my struggle... my refusal to give in to the rose perfume... had some meaning." Su Yang turned his head on Tang Erda's shoulder, gazing at him gently. "My meaning... is that I waited for you, Captain."

Tang Erda could see the cracks deepening in Su Yang's face, the blood seeping from the edges, reflecting in his pupils as he became more and more like a rose.

More and more, he resembled a monster.

Tang Erda had never seen life slip away so clearly in a human form.

Su Yang looked at him.

Slowly, Tang Erda released Su Yang's hand, shaking it free from his grip. He lowered his head, his expression unreadable, his voice barely audible: "Testing... what's it going to be?"

Su Yang smiled from the bottom of his heart. "Thank you, Captain."

"That's right." Su Yang suddenly seemed to remember something important. His face turned grave. "Captain, do you remember the living heretic Bai Liu you caught and then escaped from back then? When you leave here, if you have the chance, find him and make sure to kill him."

"This is the man who blew up the factory we were testing at the day he escaped from the Bureau of Dangerous Heretics."

In another cage, one wall away.

After Lu Yizhan had managed to figure out that Bai Liu had become Liu Jiayi, the two of them chatted without tension.

Bai Liu lifted his eyes to look at Lu Yizhan sitting across from him. "I blew up the Rose Factory?"

"Yes." Lu Yizhan didn't seem to think it was a big deal. He lay back on the bed, his hands behind his head, and his tone relaxed. "I, along with the other staff of the Bureau of Dangerous Heretics, saw it, and I'll go with my ten years of knowing you to vouch for the fact that the man who stood above the Rose Factory, the one who claimed he was going to blow it up, was definitely you."

"You said you were going to set off an explosion, leak dried rose leaf gas, and destroy the world," Lu Yizhan continued, his face turned upwards. "I had several conversations with you, and finally decided that you were the same 'you' I knew."

The timeline of the Rose Factory—a game set ten years after the real world—flickered in Bai Liu's mind.

He sorted through the details of Lu Yizhan's story.

The explosion that triggered the spread of dried rose leaf gas around the world occurred the day after Bai Liu escaped from the Bureau of Dangerous Heresies.

On the same day, Lu Yizhan and Su Yang, the deputy head of the third detachment of the Bureau of Dangerous Heresies, arrived at the Rose Factory to investigate the forcibly closed but secretly reopened factory. This was something Bai Liu had read about in the factory's newspaper, and it was consistent with the reality Bai Liu had suspected. It also aligned with what Lu Yizhan had just told him.

Bai Liu raised his eyebrows after hearing only a few words from Lu Yizhan about what happened next.

Lu Yizhan explained that when they arrived at the factory, they searched the entire premises for what appeared to be a stockpile of dried rose leaf gas. The whole factory was strange: all the equipment was intact, but the people had seemingly vanished.

They searched until the early hours of the morning, finding only a few iron pots with the remains of rose exercise and a distillation apparatus.

That's when Bai Liu appeared out of nowhere—almost as if from the sky—on the roof of the Rose Factory, holding a large lama from somewhere, with one hand in his pocket. He lazily shouted down to the crowd below.

Lu Yizhan said, mimicking the scene with his hands: "I am Bai Liu, a sociopath. I've been laid off for more than a month, can't find a job, and have no money to earn. I'm very sad and think the world will end with me, so later I'll detonate this factory and make the rose dried leaf gas leak, so that everyone ends with me."

Bai Liu was eerily silent for a moment, then asked, "And then the Rose Factory exploded?"

Lu Yizhan nodded honestly. "Yes. Then you disappeared completely, and because of that, for a while, the Dangerous Heresy Agency put a bounty of sixteen million dollars on your head. I was a bit moved."

Bai Liu narrowed his eyes at Lu Yizhan lying on the bed. "You don't think I did the explosion?"

If Lu Yizhan was sure that Bai Liu had caused the explosion, he would have jumped up from the bed and shot Bai Liu on the spot as soon as he walked in—if he could move. But the fact that Lu Yizhan was still calmly lying in bed talking to Bai Liu proved that he thought the explosion had nothing to do with him.

Lu Yizhan was quiet for a moment before speaking. "I'm sure it was you who shouted from the roof of the Rose Factory that you'd blow it up. I'm also sure that less than fifteen minutes after you said that, the Rose Factory exploded, releasing this perfume spill that endangered everyone."

Then, Lu Yizhan gave a very clueless speculation. "But I don't think you did this."

Bai Liu asked, amused, "Why?"

Bai Liu rarely doubted Lu Yizhan's assumptions about him. Lu Yizhan probably knew him better than he knew himself and would never lie to him.

Lu Yizhan said that the man standing on the roof was Bai Liu, so Bai Liu guessed that it was really him.

Lu Yizhan looked up at the top of the cage for a moment, as if dazed, before replying to Bai Liu, "It's very unprofessional and subjective. I'm sure you wouldn't do something like that."

Bai Liu scowled at him. "I never knew you could trust my character."

Lu Yizhan gave a slow "eh" and turned his head to give Bai Liu a light look. "Not for that, I can't believe in your character."

If it weren't for the strange lines on Lu Yizhan's face, their conversation would have been as quiet as a normal joke.

Lu Yizhan looked at Bai Liu. "But I believe in your ethics of trading. You made a ten-year hot pot deal with me yesterday. You wouldn't destroy the world when you haven't even had a meal yet. That would be a loss. I don't believe you could do such a thing."

"Hmm." Bai Liu glanced at Lu Yizhan. "I feel the same way, but the others don't, do they?"

Lu Yizhan smiled and turned his head back, his tone emotional. "Indeed, I was the only one from the factory personnel who felt that way. My speculation was too subjective to convince them, which is why the high reward for you followed."

"It's a pity that they didn't last. They all left one by one." Lu Yizhan's expression finally turned complicated as he let out a long sigh. "It seems that there's only one person left in this world who can still hold on to believing in you—and those who hate you."

The person who believes in Bai Liu is obviously Lu Yizhan. If Bai Liu is right, the person who hates him would be Su Yang—most likely the person to whom Tang Erda's incense paper is addressed at this point.

Lu Yizhan went on, "I've been thinking about the ten years I've known you here, trying to find clues as to what you really are, something that would corroborate my suspicions that you wouldn't have set off the Rose Factory. The other guy kept emphasizing the evidence, insisting that he saw you set off the factory with his own eyes."

Lu Yizhan's eyes looked straight up at the ceiling, and his tone became soft, as if talking to himself. "What kind of person are you that becomes the only reason for our survival?"

"And late in the memory, I was beginning to wonder if you existed—if you were just a friend I'd conjured up because I was too lonely here. A murderer. A kind of self-compensating salvation to stay sober. Knowing you existed, at least I got through it with some hope."

Bai Liu turned his head calmly. "So?"

Lu Yizhan gave Bai Liu a grumbling look. "At least have some sympathy for me. I'm so miserable."

After a moment of silence, Lu Yizhan smiled. "So, for a while, whenever someone came in to test a perfume, I would ask them: 'Do you know Bai Liu, and what do you think of him?'"

"Probably because I was so cooperative in trying the incense, and they basically answered. I got many, many answers about Bai Liu, but none of them could convince me that you really existed or described anyone I knew."

Lu Yizhan sat up with difficulty on the edge of the bed, took two deep breaths, and looked up at Bai Liu. "Now it's your turn to answer my question. Do you know Bai Liu?"

He looked straight at Bai Liu, who was standing by the bed, and said, "What kind of person do you think Bai Liu is?"

"I know Bai Liu." Bai Liu looked calmly at Lu Yizhan, who was gasping for breath. "He is a shameless, despicable, empathy-free, uncompromising, unconventional person with no social conscience, unconventional in his values, and who doesn't accept the abduction of universal moral subterfuge. To say the least, a rather dangerous character."

"Uh-huh." Lu Yizhan nodded solemnly. "That's the Bai Liu I know. That's right. Go on."

Bai Liu gazed at Lu Yizhan for a long time before saying, "He is indeed your friend. So even if he were such an asshole, he would have kept his deal with you. I wouldn't have detonated the factory. And if the man standing on the roof of the Rose Factory was indeed me, then there should have been some kind of circumstance that compelled me to say that and make that choice. But I wouldn't do anything to go against the deal."

Lu Yizhan was stunned for a moment, then he smiled heartily. "Yes, that's what I believe too."

Bai Liu stepped forward. "OK, enough of your nonsense. Teach me how to test."

Lu Yizhan flinched for a moment and laughed helplessly. "You're being too cruel, Bai Liu. I just heard that factory worker say that your guy's talent is likely to test me to death at once!"

"You may die here." Bai Liu scanned Lu Yizhan. "But the real you won't die. Want to make a deal with me? I can stop the explosion that's already happened and save you and the others."

Lu Yizhan looked at Bai Liu for a long time. He didn't seem to understand what Bai Liu was talking about, nor did he know how Bai Liu could have managed to stop what had already happened—but he knew that at least 50 percent of the deals Bai Liu was talking about were things he could have done himself.

"Yes!" Lu Yizhan replied in one breath, his eyes glowing. "What's the deal?"

Bai Liu: "Treat me to twenty years of hot pot."

"With the previous ten years, that's thirty years! That's too many!!!" Lu Yizhan screamed. "Look at me now, I'm not even sure I'll live that long!!!"

Bai Liu glanced at him. "Then try to live to that point in order to make this deal with me."

Lu Yizhan was dumbfounded as he looked over at Bai Liu, who had an indifferent expression, and couldn't help but laugh.

Caring people are so roundabout—and really in person.

Su Yang grabbed Tang Erda's hands, a rare expression of remorse on his face. "Captain, every day that I've been here with the team, we've regretted not taking your orders seriously..."

His light-colored eyes filled with tears, and his voice cracked. "So many people wouldn't have died because of Bai Liu's revenge. This wouldn't have leaked, it wouldn't have spread..."

"Captain, if only I could have stopped this from the very beginning—it's all my fault…"

Overwhelmed by an unbearable sense of responsibility and guilt, Su Yang slowly bent in front of Tang Erda.

In that moment, he seemed to age decades, his spine bent under the weight of regret, his thin back so gaunt that his bones stuck out like beads, too fragile to stand straight.

Tang Erda clenched his fists—it was too late for the Su Yang in front of him.

But it was still not too late for him.

As long as he acted quickly, found the antidote, and killed Bai Liu—the Su Yang he had seen, broken and desperate, would never have to suffer again. None of this would happen.

Tang Erda mentally calculated the time: when the game ended and when Su Yang had just told him about Bai Liu triggering the explosion. His eyes widened as the realization hit him—Bai Liu had gone to the factory and triggered the explosion immediately after completing the game.

He had to kill Bai Liu in the game to stop it!

Tang Erda knew that the antidote would be available once he became the factory manager. Bai Liu could no longer stay alive.

The Rose Factory

The fragrance test is a simple matter.

"Simply apply the original perfume to the palm of your hand, spreading it evenly," Lu Yizhan says to Bai Liu.

"Then place your palm on the intact piece of skin on my body," Su Yang says to Tang Erda.

"The faster it cracks, the more pain I feel, the stronger your talent, and the more suitable you are for the Rose perfume."

Su Yang unbuttons his uniform, his fingers trembling slightly, and turns his back to Tang Erda.

The uniform piles loosely around his waist, revealing his pale back, where skin blooms like an unfinished tattoo, snaking from his neck, hidden by his half-length hair, to his slightly sunken waist. Only a small piece of skin, directly opposite the tip of his left scapula, remains intact.

--That’s exactly where the dorsal projection of the heart lies. Tang Erda knows that a shot from here, off to the side, could go straight into the heart, encased in the lungs.

Lu Yizhan sits cross-legged on the bed, his back to Bai Liu, lifting his hair to reveal an intact, unblemished patch of skin on the back of his neck. He lowers his head to expose it to Bai Liu, who stands behind him.

This is one of the few good pieces of skin they have left.

Su Yang and Lu Yizhan both take a deep breath and close their eyes. "Let's begin."

Bai Liu places a drop of the original perfume on his palm, and Tang Erda applies it to his own hand in a trance. Then, they reach up and place their palms lightly on Su Yang and Lu Yizhan’s skin.

Almost immediately, both Lu Yizhan and Su Yang collapse to the ground, letting out screams that send chills down their spines.

Outside the cage, the two factory workers realize from the scream that the incense test has started. They pull out a timer and, seeing no surprise from the scene, begin recording the incense test—timing the duration of the scream.

Lu Yizhan twitches spasmodically on the bed. The back of his neck, touched by Bai Liu, appears as if carved with a knife—a deep line of blood in his bones. A rose looms in his eyes, and his face contorts with pain, all his muscles straining, yet a constant grunt of pain escapes his nostrils.

Su Yang is on the ground, breathing deeply with his forehead pressed against the floor, the roses in his eyes glowing so brightly they almost shine in the darkness of the cage. The lines on his back surge and gather, blood bubbling up from each of the saved wounds, quickly soaking the uniform hanging halfway around his waist.

Su Yang tries to hold back any sound that would burden Tang Erda, cold sweat mixing with tears that drip from the tip of his nose to the floor.

It hurts too much. It hurts too much to fight this off with all your might!

Tang Erda kneels beside Su Yang, his mind clouded by his profound pain. For a moment, he can't tell if Su Yang is being tortured or if he himself is.

For a few seconds, Su Yang’s tear-filled eyes meet his, and Tang Erda blanks. He instinctively pulls out his skill gun and tries to shoot himself in the legs, hands, and feet.

It seems that by enduring the pain with Su Yang, he can alleviate his suffering.

But Su Yang grabs his wrist tightly and says, each word deliberate, "Captain, you have more important things to do than hurt yourself out of guilt."

"There’s no point, Captain," he says softly.

Su Yang’s grip on him is light, so light Tang Erda could easily break free, but he shakily drops the gun anyway—he sees the numerous scars on Su Yang's thin arms.

Unlike the bruises from the rose perfume, these marks are man-made —self-inflicted wounds.

Su Yang, his face also bloodied from the wounds, looks up with a smile that's hard to break, and the rose-red light in his eyes dims, replaced by clarity.

"One person who went through the same thing stopped me from hurting myself. He told me if I could live by hating someone, I should hate."

"Even if the person I hate is his best friend."

Su Yang's breathing slows, his eyelids drooping as his tone weakens.

"Even with his own eyes, he believed Bai Liu didn't detonate the plant. I couldn't convince him, and he couldn't convince me."

"We don't have definitive proof whether Bai Liu detonated the plant, Captain. We've worked on these cases for years and know sometimes what you see with your eyes doesn't tell the whole truth."

"So, according to the benefit of the doubt theorem, the guy was probably right. I'm just too..."

"You can always redirect impotent anger onto others and become like a heretic."

"I've lived like a heretic, twisted and disgusted, until now. By the time I got to you, Captain, I wasn't sure if I was even human anymore."

Su Yang opens his mouth to speak again, but the wounds on his back squirm wildly, causing his eyes to turn red.

The rose that had faded starts to glow red again in his eyes, and he screams in pain, his once-soft expression becoming fierce.

Su Yang's grip on Tang Erda tightens for a moment as he leans forward, looking directly at Erda. The roses in his eyes bloom alarmingly, hatred and lust flashing across his face.

"Kill Bai Liu! Captain, I saw him detonate the factory. We can't hesitate anymore! If we don't kill him, it'll be irreversible!"

Su Yang's face falls, folding in on itself. The rose petals in his eyes stretch and bloom, completely consuming his gaze.

"Kill me, Captain. I'm really going to turn into a heretic."

Tang Erda pulls out his gun. Su Yang smiles and closes his eyes.

The silver bullets cut through the air with a thud, accompanied by a scream that could belong to anyone.

On the other side, the lines on Lu Yizhan's neck creep forward, crawling up his face as he lies on the ground, inhaling deeply. The roses in his eyes flicker, threatening to freeze in place, but stubbornly extinguish with each wave of pain.

Bai Liu stands by, watching quietly with downcast eyes, as though he has nothing to do with the man writhing in agony.

"I should have known... your talent as a perfumer was so strong," Lu Yizhan gasps, trying to control the pain. Cold sweat soaks through his clothes, but the bastard can still flirt with Bai Liu. "This job is lucrative. You should have been a perfumer."

Lu Yizhan refers to real-world perfumers.

Bai Liu gives a lazy "hmmm" and asks, "How long do you normally endure the fragrance test until my talent reaches Perfumer Extraordinaire?"

"It's hard to say. Look at the factory workers outside," Lu Yizhan says, his face pale, his words vague.

Bai Liu squats next to him, resting his hands on his knees, his gaze unyielding. "Let me ask you another way. How long do you think my talent can torture you in this test before it stops?"

The perfumer's test lasts ten minutes, depending on the person's talent. But with Lu Yizhan, it's already gone past that. The test spreads to other intact areas of his body.

If the factory worker had been inside, he would probably be shocked by the results and tell Bai Liu that his talent can endure the fragrance test.

This talent exceeds the paper's range. Usually, the test paper would transform into a monster—a scrap in factory jargon.

But Lu Yizhan, with his unyielding will, refuses to be alienated by his desires. He's holding on, but it's keeping him alive, enduring twice the pain.

Bai Liu can see Lu Yizhan is avoiding the subject, so he asks.

Despite his trembling limbs, Lu Yizhan jokingly replies, "At least 30 years. How else would I treat you to such a long hot pot?"

Bai Liu watches Lu Yizhan's white, bloodless face, cracked and oozing blood, but his eyes remain clear—just no longer rose-colored.

Lu Yizhan is one of the strangest people Bai Liu has ever met.

Most people, given the choice, would either surrender and become monsters or seek death. But not Lu Yizhan. He wants to live openly, painfully, with a smile.

He has the resilience and goodness that any ordinary person might have, only stronger, more stubborn, and unshakeable—qualities that Bai Liu usually associates with a lack of intelligence.

But Lu Yizhan is smart. He just channels all his intellect into doing good, and he's a true good person.

In Bai Liu's view, good people usually don't survive in chaos, or in a world like the Rose Factory's, they're the first to go.

But Lu Yizhan, according to his logic, would find a way to keep himself and others alive, saving more people. He would be the good guy who lives to the end.

"I actually wanted to kill you, Lu Yizhan," Bai Liu admits. "A good man like you has no place in a world like this. It's too painful to live."

Lu Yizhan, in agony, grits his teeth, his body trembling, but when Bai Liu speaks, he lets out a laugh. Struggling to open his eyes, he props himself up weakly and says, almost viciously:

"Don't underestimate the people's police. It's just a bottle of perfume."

"Does being a good person make you more vulnerable? Bai Liu, I'm telling you, good people will go to great lengths to be good!"

"You think you're bad and I'm good? I'm telling you, Bai Liu, you can't beat me!"

The Rose Factory

After a moment of meeting Lu Yizhan's stubborn, defiant eyes, Bai Liu stood up, putting away the bone whip he had taken out. He had planned to give Lu Yizhan a hard time, but it didn't seem necessary.

The snow-white whip curled to the ground, stained with the blood oozing from Lu Yizhan's body.

Lu Yizhan lay back down, his panting ragged, and his voice became a little disjointed from the pain. "You go outside and ask that factory worker. Ask him... your talent should have been extraordinarily high."

Bai Liu went outside and questioned the factory worker, who looked at the time and inquired about the characteristics of Bai Liu's test papers. He confirmed that Bai Liu's talent as a perfumer was indeed above the extra level.

At the same time, the factory worker asked, surprised, if the paper hadn't been scrapped.

Bai Liu was silent for a moment and replied, "No."

Lu Yizhan, as Bai Liu had seen him for the first time in this dungeon, sat on the edge of the bed and removed his clothes to be examined by the factory worker.

After the inspection, Lu Yizhan limped and placed his blood-soaked clothes into the sink, looking as though he intended to wash them later.

Bai Liu might have thought the man was fine if he hadn't noticed the lines on the back of Lu Yizhan's hand still spreading.

The factory workers were in awe, remarking that they hadn’t expected the paper to hold up even after the special talent test.

Before Bai Liu left, Lu Yizhan called out to him. Bai Liu turned and saw Lu Yizhan sitting on the edge of the bed, smiling with relief. The lines on his face were growing and healing, looking horrible and bloody, yet his smile held the warmth of a normal human expression.

Lu Yizhan stood up with difficulty and gently pushed Bai Liu’s back, urging him out of the cage. His voice was soft and tender.

"Thirty years of hot pot deals, you said it. Ah, remember to change the world for me."

Bai Liu, carrying the bone whip stained with Lu Yizhan's blood, didn't look back but muttered as he left the cage softly.

On the other end, Tang Erda bowed his head, stumbling out of the cage with a silver spear stained with Su Yang's blood.

When the factory worker saw Tang Erda walk out, gun in hand, he didn't say much. He just glanced at the bloody test paper in the cage and nodded to Tang Erda, uninterested. "Test paper scrapped, right? We'll take care of it later. You're qualified."

As though he hadn't heard, Tang Erda passed the factory worker with the gun in his hand and walked out, his gaze vacant, unseeing.

Su Yang's blood dripped from his fingertips. His clothes, shoes, and even his face were covered in the blood spilled from a shot through Su Yang's heart.

With each step, each breath, each movement forward, Tang Erda's path was stained with the blood of the withered Su Yang.

The blood that dripped from his hands and feet made its way to the closing cage behind him, where Su Yang was being held, as if he had never left the cage drawn by Su Yang's death.

He wanted to die in that cage with Su Yang, but he was a captain and did not have the luxury of such an end.

If Tang Erda had been any ordinary team member, perhaps Su Yang would have pitied him and let him die a clean death.

But he was the captain—a title that gave him responsibilities and meaning, ones Tang Erda hated in that moment.

Captain Tang cannot run away, cannot stop, cannot even die. He must witness, again and again, the miserable end of everyone in an endless, irreparable world line. He must watch it all in its entirety, like a machine, and then move on without any emotional turmoil.

How he longed to die, like the hunter who had completely withered, even his bullets marked with the desire for suicide.

Tang Erda's [Suicide Bullet] is a skill that can only be used if the user, himself, is genuinely attempting to kill himself every time he raises his gun. Each shot is an act of self-destruction, every minute, every second.

In the end, Tang Erda couldn't even tell if he was trying to kill the enemy or himself when he fired.

But he was still alive, as if sliced by a thousand cuts, a walking corpse bearing the hopes of all those who had died.

Bai Liu can die. Su Yang can die. His teammates can die. Any person, good or bad, can die.

Only Tang Erda, chosen as the hunter, must never die.

Because he, God Xiang, wished that all men might live, and God deprived him of the right to die.

The factory worker's distant voice rang out behind the dazed Tang Erda, disgusted. "This scrap of test paper is disgusting. Let's stir it up and use it as fertilizer."

Tang Erda tightened his grip on the gun, but in the next moment, as if hearing voices, Su Yang's faint voice echoed in his ears before he died.

"Captain, go forward and don't... turn back."

[System Warning: Player Tang Erda has suffered a severe mental shock and is down to 11!]

Tang Erda turned back, expressionless, raising his gun to the head of the factory worker who was kicking Su Yang's body. He whispered softly to himself, as though answering someone, "Su Yang, I can't do this without turning around."

For there had been no turning back long ago, and the only thing he could do was turn back.

"Bang!"

---------- --

Bai Liu, only a wall away, also walks forward with his whip in hand, his gaze shallow.

Two men, separated by a wall, surrounded by the mangled bodies of their best friends and the closed road ahead of them. They are both in the darkness of the earth, carrying weapons stained with the blood of those who matter most to them, heading toward the end of their fate.

The factory worker inserted the key into the lock and turned the door in front of Bai Liu.

Tang Erda kicked away the dead and unconscious body of the factory worker, the one who had just said he would stir up Su Yang's body.

A clear, one-shot kill wound is visible in the corpse's forehead, as if the factory worker, who had been killed by Tang Erda’s quick turn and shot a second before his death, was shocked that he would end up like this.

Tang Erda loosely grips the bloodstained gun in his two-fingered right hand and opens the dungeon door with the key clutched in his left hand.

Outside, the dawn light breaks through, casting a bright line that falls across the faces of both Bai Liu and Tang Erda.

Bai Liu looks up with a pale expression, the beam of light shifting and dazzling in his face.

Tang Erda's mouth curls up violently, his face covered in splattered blood, a strange and cruel grin on his face. His mouth stretches wide, as much as it can.

The light falls on the upper half of his face, the roses in Tang Erda's eyes stretching and blooming against the first rays of light that fall into his pupils, behind which the factory workers are dying.

"What a perfect encounter, not wasted all the time I spent designing it," the man in the black hood at the werewolf poker game says, moving the hunter card to his face with amusement.

This Hunter card is different from the opening Hunter card. The hunter, who had once worn a cold expression, now holds a wilted rose, tears of sorrow leaking from his turquoise blue eyes. As the tears fall, the rose in the hunter's heart wilts with them.

"It's interesting to watch the God-sign hunter who goes mad and turns evil, and the werewolf-sign who seems on a mission to save the world," the man adds, raising his eyes to the prophet sitting across from him, who has remained silent the entire time. He leans his chin casually on his folded hands and smiles meaningfully. "Prophet, would you like to use your powers to predict the outcome? Or perhaps, did you see this situation coming?"

The prophet remains silent.

The man doesn't press him, instead smiling to himself and continuing, "In whatever world line, it's always Bai Six who's the most interesting."

The prophet finally speaks, his voice calm, "In this world line, his name is Bai Liu."

"If you insist," the man across the table shrugs. "I think he'd prefer to be called Bai Six."

The man chuckles, "Or rather, I think he's about to turn back into Bai Six. And at the end of his showdown with the hunter, if he kills the hunter, Bai Six will lose his stance as a normal person. Then, the outcome of our bet in this world line about Bai Six will be revealed."

"And all you have to do is lose once, and our werewolf game is over."

The prophet gazes at the weeping hunter card on the table, next to the werewolf card, his expression stone-like, without speaking.

Meanwhile, by the flower fields, Liu Jiayi flipped through the diary Bai Liu had placed in her prop library with a quick glance, gaining a basic understanding of the overall additions to the game.

Just as she was about to contact Bai Liu to confirm his next move, a loud gunshot rang out from a distant factory, followed by the sound of breaking glass. It was far enough away that Liu Jiayi could hear it clearly from the flower field.

Of course, her hearing was far superior to the average person's. For example, Qi Yifang, who stood next to her, could only vaguely hear the loud bang and looked over nervously.

She quickly turned her gaze back, and with the aid of her visualization props, she could clearly see the open dormitory window on the ground floor of the Rose Factory being shattered, followed by a very subtle, muffled grunt from Bai Liu.

"Shit!" Liu Jiayi's face changed. "Bai Liu, that guy and the gunman are fighting!"

The shot was unmistakable; it was the distinct sound of the strange skill weapon she had taken a bullet from—the silver revolver!

This gun had a magazine change flap before firing!

She subconsciously wanted to rush over and see what was going on, but quickly calmed herself. Bai Liu wasn't the type to act impulsively—he was a player who liked to play small, calculated moves. There had to be a reason why he was facing Tang Erda, who had a much higher panel, at this moment.

Now was not the time to rush in to save Bai Liu, who had his own—or perhaps the witch's—skill panel, and could recover from lifesteal without dying easily.

As Bai Liu's secondary player, she now needed to figure out what he was trying to achieve by holding Tang Erda back.

Liu Jiayi opened the diary Bai Liu had placed in her props section again and finally found a hastily scribbled sentence on the last page:

-- [The time in you is unique and irreversible until the real death comes].

"Time, time..." Liu Jiayi muttered, "Before the real death comes, the real death—"

Throughout the game, there seemed to be something that represented time and death in the truest sense.

Liu Jiayi's eyes widened. "Newspaper dates of explosions and the exact times of some major deaths!!!"

The Rose Factory

Qi Yifang was confused by Liu Jiayi's sudden comment. "What? What time?"

Liu Jiayi grabbed Qi Yifang's wrist and ran. "With your intelligence, you won't understand for a while. Just come with me and help me if you want to pass the level!"

Qi Yifang, who was being dragged along, thought, "????"
I really don't get it, but you're hitting me too hard for saying it so bluntly, little witch!

As they ran, Liu Jiayi's determination was evident, but she also felt a twinge of chagrin. How could I not have figured it out until now, especially when Bai Liu had reminded me?!

When she saw the keyword "dismemberment," she should have realized that it was a collector's game, much like "Last Train." The game "Rose Factory" had a secret thread buried beneath its simple upgrade story, and that secret thread led straight to the collection Tawil, with a clue involving limbs!

The hint she had—[The time on you is unique and irreversible until the real death comes]—now made sense.

There was only one thing in this game that hinted at true death and irreversible timing: the newspaper display case she and Bai Liu had seen when they first entered the factory, which displayed all the major events in the history of the Rose Factory!

Every expansion of the Rose Factory had been accompanied by the death of countless people, a bloody path of development—a true death for those in this game world, an irreversible passage of time.

For her and Bai Liu, the outsiders, this time was illusory and reversible. But if they died in the game, they would be frozen in time—just another death at the Rose Factory, recorded in the newspapers, posted on the wall. That was the point!

Breathing heavily, Liu Jiayi entered through the main entrance of the Rose Factory and found the display case she'd seen earlier.

The display case was neatly lined with newspapers. Liu Jiayi focused intently on the wall of papers, narrowing her eyes as she began counting them from top to bottom, using a marker to mark the dates and times of the deaths.

When she finished marking all the numbers, Qi Yifang couldn't help but feel a chill down his spine as he looked at the dense, death-filled numbers.

Once Liu Jiayi had sorted them out, Qi Yifang noticed something was off. The distribution of the numbers representing time appeared unusually neat in horizontal rows and columns, vaguely forming a square shape.

"Sure enough, the range of rows and columns where the dates of death appear is 400 by 400," Liu Jiayi observed, stepping back to look at the wall. She exhaled deeply, her gaze steely. "Exactly the number of acres in the Rose Factory's flower fields—sixteen thousand."

At this point in her deductions, it was clear: Tawil's dismembered body was buried beneath a field of flowers. Each number on the newspaper wall corresponded to a field of flowers. The question now was, which field—or which number—was Tawil's body buried under?

There were ten numbers, 0 through 9. What number would this psychopath who buried Tawil have chosen, or how many of any number, to bury him under?

Was it his birthday? The day he acquired his adoptive parents' property? The day he bought his wife's property? Or perhaps the day he bought the idol?

What numbers held special meaning to him?

No way! There are too many numbers! This guy's diary doesn't have the special markings and typical numbers that serial killers love to repeat! There's no way to tell!

Liu Jiayi grimaced, grinding her teeth as she re-examined the entire wall of numbers.

The deafening sounds of fighting reached her from outside the window, and the display case on the ground floor, near where Bai Liu and Tang Erda were battling, trembled violently.

The rubble slid down the wall, as though it might collapse at any moment.

Thinking in such an environment was obviously not easy, especially when she knew Bai Liu was up against someone with a panel value dozens of times higher than his own.

Even Qi Yifang, an outsider with no idea who was fighting, couldn't help but be on edge. He pulled out his weathervane to survey the area. "What's going on?"

Liu Jiayi took a deep breath, blocking out all the chaos around her. She closed her eyes.

No, I'm thinking about this the wrong way.

She wasn't supposed to think of it in terms of a big psychotic boss within a game, which was the conventional way of solving mysteries. That didn't apply to The Rose Factory.

Because this game was not a simple one—Rose Factory was a game someone, or something, had prepared specifically for Bai Liu, as Bai Liu had already told her. Everything in this game, including the psychotic factory manager, was designed to irritate Bai Liu in order to achieve the designer's goals.

If I think about it this way, what number would the people behind this choose to bury the body of someone who had special meaning to Bai Liu?

As debris cascaded down from above, Qi Yifang anxiously called out to her. "Little witch! This place isn't going to hold!"

Liu Jiayi opened her eyes. "It's six!"

Bai Liu's former name was Bai Six!

"Qi Yifang, help me mark the coordinates for the number six on the left!" Liu Jiayi yelled amid the chaos. "I'll mark the right!"

Qi Yifang choked, covering his mouth, then gave an OK gesture. He shielded his head with his weathervane, dodging the falling sand and gravel, and moved closer to the display case to memorize the details.

On the right, Liu Jiayi lay across the display case, her eyes darting rapidly as she whispered silently, marking the numbers as fast as she could.

Near the end of their shorthand, a sudden, earth-shattering explosion echoed through the adjacent corridor. A twisted humanoid figure crashed through the wall, landing on the piazza floor with a massive impact, creating a huge crater.

With the sickening sound of a limb cracking, the man who was smashed into the pit let out a heart-rending scream of pain.

Moments later, the man, now bleeding from his seven orifices, his chest cavity sunken, slowly died, his head tilted, pupils dilated.

Liu Jiayi's pupils constricted as she looked back and saw the man who had just died. His face was familiar.

Dressed in the uniform of the Bureau of Heretics, his light-colored eyes lifeless, his face pale and bloodless, his limbs twisted unnaturally, his chest plate soaked in blood, Liu Jiayi immediately recognized him.

—This is Su Yang.

Fifteen minutes earlier, in a corridor across the piazza, Bai Liu leaned against the wall, his hands raised in surrender, facing off with Tang Erda, who had a gun pointed at him.

"I concede, how about we take a break in the middle? Captain Tang, would you mind pausing before you hit me?" Bai Liu leaned back against the wall, a smile on his face. He reached out and gently pushed Tang Erda's gun away. "You won't be using this for a while. How about putting it away?"

Bai Liu was badly bruised, blood seeping from the corners of his mouth from the beating and abrasions from being dragged across the floor. There were no gunshot wounds—everything was from the impact of fists and limbs. Tang Erda didn't want to finish him off so easily with a single shot.

Perhaps the former captain of the third detachment never expected that he would treat his enemies in the way he once most loathed and hated.

But no matter how much he tortured Bai Liu, he never saw the same pain on Bai Liu's face that he saw on his own.

Bai Liu always looked at him calmly, sometimes even with a smile. It was clear that the one being tortured was Tang Erda, but with every punch he threw, every hard blow to Bai Liu's abdomen and face, hearing the other man's muffled grunts of pain, Tang Erda felt like he was suffering a thousand times more than Bai Liu.

Tang Erda felt pain from torturing others, anger at the innocent being tortured. This was what had driven him to join the Heretic Bureau in the first place, and to this day, there was nothing he could do to change it—even if it drove him mad.

Now, anger and pain were indistinguishably intertwined on his face, and in Tang Erda's dark blue eyes, a monster named Bai Six lurked.

Even being a villain takes talent, and unfortunately, Tang Erda didn't have it.

Bai Liu leaned back against the wall, his eyes pitying as he looked at the heavily breathing, grimacing Tang Erda. "Captain Tang, spare yourself. You're not good at this kind of thing."

The expression on Tang Erda's face vanished in an instant.

He looked up indifferently, grabbed Bai Liu's wrist with his left hand, and shoved him to the side. He landed, flipped, twisted, and stepped down, aiming to break his bones.

Bai Liu's face was covered in cold sweat from the pain, but he still looked calm. "Well, it hurts, but not like you can actually use it."

Tang Erda's expression darkened again. "This is the same torture method you used on Su Yang once!!!"

"He was shipped back with almost every bone broken! You left tapes in his stomach to tell me—"

The fury in his eyes intensified, but his voice grew bitter, thick with hatred and tears. "You said what I did to you was petty. You said you'd come and teach me yourself. Is this what you call fucking torture?!"

The Rose Factory

Tang Erda raised his fist and slammed it down onto Bai Liu's face. Bai Liu choked, coughing up blood, and turned away, his fist grazing his face before cracking against the ground.

Bai Liu had planned to play a few tactics and tricks with the captain, but Tang Erda's panel suppression was so overwhelming that he couldn't move under the captain's close-quarters assault—not even to tap on the system panel. Tang Erda moved too quickly.

Even though the man's mind wasn't right anymore, his physical reflexes were superb. Every time Bai Liu tried to resist, even with the slightest movement, Tang Erda would quickly counter and dislocate his bones before he could even react.

Bai Liu deeply understood the phrase "one power to rule them all" when it came to Tang Erda.

Experience, technique, ability, skill, speed—every criterion used to judge a player was on full display in Tang Erda.

Though it was just a feeling, Bai Liu had a vague sense that Tang Erda's panel value might have surpassed 50,000 by now.

This wasn't a match of the same caliber as Bai Liu's previous opponents. Tang Erda's frenzied intensity left no room for Bai Liu to counter.

He was indeed pinned down. In this rare instance, Bai Liu found himself at his wits' end, and all without Tang Erda even firing a shot.

If Tang Erda hadn't gone berserk and tried to torture him, Bai Liu would likely be dead by now. Tang Erda could have easily killed him.

—This situation might be seen as bad luck, but for Bai Liu, it could also be a stroke of good luck if you looked at the results.

Bai Liu had long outgrown the guise of Liu Jiayi.

After encountering the red-eyed Tang Erda, Bai Liu had quickly deactivated his Hearts A skill card—it wasn't wise to use the appearance of an eight-year-old girl when facing Tang Erda, especially considering the stamina cost.

So now Bai Liu was physically wrestling with Tang Erda—or, more accurately, being beaten unilaterally. Blood spattered between them as Bai Liu watched Tang Erda's twisted, brutal face, his own breathing growing faint.

—And then, suddenly, Bai Liu smiled.

[System Warning: Player life value drops below 3!]

But even in this situation, Bai Liu didn't believe all hope was lost.

Tang Erda had become an S-class monster, his strength amplified by madness, but this also exposed his weaknesses to Bai Liu.

He just needed to gamble once. Lose the bet, and Tang Erda would go completely insane, and Bai Liu would be dead. But if he won—

Bai Liu stared at Tang Erda, who had raised his fist high—now!

Bai Liu, relaxed and seemingly unconcerned, triggered Tang Erda's muscle inertia. As his opponent's fist landed, Bai Liu swiftly sidestepped, his movements fluid, no longer hindered by the weakness he had shown in his previous attack.

This gave Bai Liu a one-second window between Tang Erda's strikes, enough time for him to tap out of the system panel quickly.

[System Alert: Does player Bai Liu wish to re-use the skill Poker (Hearts A)?]

[OK.]

The heart at the center of the card spun rapidly as Tang Erda approached. The figure inside the heart shifted, changing form.

Tang Erda took a massive step forward, his fist raised, about to strike the back of Bai Liu's head. He hissed and roared, "Bai Liu—"

Bai Liu turned slowly, his protective clothing fading into the uniform of the Heretic's Authority. His dark eyes became light and transparent, his stature growing by half a head. His hands, now covered in snow-white gloves, were a stark contrast to the semi-long hair that reached his neck.

He turned to face Tang Erda, blood staining his mouth, seemingly unfazed by the captain's impending attack. Instead, his voice was low and gentle as he softly spoke, "Captain."

—He looked exactly like Tang Erda's first memory of Su Yang.

Tang Erda's fist stopped just inches from Bai Liu's nose, blowing the wind through the bloodstained hair on both sides of his face.

Bai Liu's face, covered in the scars from Tang Erda's assault, looked eerily fitting with Su Yang's gentle expression. It was an odd juxtaposition, one that unnerved Tang Erda.

His fist trembled as it hovered in front of Bai Liu's face, his pupils wide as he looked at the face of Su Yang, a man he knew so well.

—This was the Su Yang of the first world. The Su Yang from the beginning. The—

—The real one, hidden deep in his heart. The Su Yang who would never return, the Su Yang whose soul was destroyed.

"How dare you appear before me with his face?!" Tang Erda's eyes burned with rage, almost dripping with blood. His glare was filled with something grotesque as he looked at Bai Liu. A gun materialized in his clenched fist, and without hesitation, he pressed it violently against Bai Liu's forehead, firing instantly.

"BANG—!!!"

Su Yang was hit, his body slowly collapsing to the ground, motionless —not as Bai Liu, but as Su Yang, looking at his captain with eyes that had not yet returned, before he died.

No matter the skills or props, nothing could hold after death. If Su Yang remained like this after death...

Tang Erda realized what was happening. Dumbfounded, he dropped the gun and collapsed to his knees in front of Su Yang's body.

—This wasn't Bai Liu's Su Yang. This was Su Yang.

Bai Liu's voice rang out lazily, as irritating as ever: "Captain Tang, what you just shot wasn't the Su Yang I've become. It's the Su Yang you're afraid to see in your heart. Look up. See what's in front of you —and behind you."

Tang Erda seemed to freeze, his eyes hollow, before he raised his head.

At the end of the corridor, a massive mirror stood, reflecting another mirror at the opposite end.

The two mirrors faced each other, creating an endless corridor of reflections, each mirror continuously reflecting the next. The images refracted endlessly between them.

Tang Erda recognized the mirror. It was the Murphy's Theorem Magic Mirror, specially protected by the Heretic Authority.

—This was a powerful heresy, difficult to break, and resistant to destruction. When you stared into it, the longer you looked, the more you saw the things you never wanted to face—things that would materialize before your eyes.

Bai Liu had placed two mirrors in the corridor when Tang Erda wasn't looking, creating this mirror maze. In reality, he only had one mirror to begin with—a monster book reward for the Exploding Last Train. The second had been taken at random when he was imprisoned in the Dangerous Heresy Treatment Bureau after causing a riot.

However, the real-world mirror couldn't be brought into the system, so Bai Liu had to work around it, making the mirror corridor to trap Tang Erda.

—For a hunter with a heart so twisted, there was no better prison than his own most feared past.

Various versions of Su Yang began to appear in the mirror, smiling as they crawled out, moving towards Tang Erda while softly calling to him.

"Captain..."

"Captain, look at this heretic..."

"Captain! Let's grab a drink after work! The second detachment's treating!"

"Captain, do you prefer a son or a daughter?"

It was such a familiar, warm, and happy routine, with smiling, long-lost friends, but Tang Erda was paralyzed with fear. Every finger trembled as he watched these real-life fragments of his memories, the dreamlike, haunting faces of those he'd lost. He stumbled backward, clutching the wall, shaking his head with a blank expression.

"Don’t—!"

"Don’t go on any further—!!!"

But he couldn’t retreat. Su Yang emerged from the mirror behind him.

Su Yang smiled and said, "Captain, if we win this final, we’ll have won Bai six. It’ll be all over—"

Before Tang Erda’s brain could process the words, he instinctively placed his hand over Su Yang's temple. A sharp pain surged through him, as if his very bones were cracking. He screamed, "Stop saying that! I don’t want to win!!!"

"—I want you to live!!!!"

Suddenly, a bullet fired from nowhere and passed through Tang Erda’s palm, piercing Su Yang’s skull with uncanny precision. A sickening crunch echoed.

A steady stream of blood poured from Tang Erda’s fingers as he covered Su Yang’s temple.

"Team... Captain..." The fragmented voice once again pulled Tang Erda’s focus.

Su Yang, who had just turned to smile and ask if Tang Erda preferred a son or a daughter, was now contorted unnaturally, as if something invisible was crushing him. His limbs twisted at strange angles, forcing his head back to look at Tang Erda.

This Su Yang’s face was half-covered in blood, his uniform torn and dirty, but he smiled with unshakable determination.

"Captain... must save those who are contaminated..."

"Bang!"

A shot rang out, hitting Su Yang in the back of the head, the bullet tearing through his forehead. Su Yang didn’t even finish his sentence before he fell to the ground, blood pouring from his wound.

The Su Yang who had once asked Tang Erda for a drink after work now lay curled on the ground, every bone twisted as if something invisible was torturing him. He could no longer scream; he could only shudder in pain, his pale face contorted with agony.

Invisible hands forced a piece of tape into the mouth of this Su Yang, clamping his jaw shut.

"Don't...!!!" Tang Erda collapsed to his knees in front of Su Yang, desperately trying to pull the tape out of his stomach. "Don't make him eat this! He's in pain! He really hurts!"

The tape, covered in goo, was difficult for Tang Erda to grip. In desperation, he bit down on it, tearing at it with his teeth, trying to swallow it himself.

Tears spilled from his ghostly blue eyes.

The entity forcing the tape into Su Yang's mouth seemed to realize the struggle, easily dislodging the tape and forcing it deeper, twisting Su Yang's jaw and making him swallow it, piece by agonizing piece.

Tang Erda could do nothing but watch as Su Yang spasmed on the floor, clutching his stomach, before finally falling still, his breath ceasing, his mouth filled with black blood—exactly as when he had been dissected.

Tang Erda knelt there, his soul hollow, his hands falling lifeless to his sides as if he, too, had died alongside Su Yang.

The Murphy Mirror, a reflection of everyone's deepest fears, now recreated Su Yang's death in every timeline before Tang Erda's eyes. Every moment, every fragment of their once-happy routine was now distorted, haunted by the memories of a life lost.

No matter how many times he tried, no matter how hard he ran, he had never been able to save Su Yang from Bai Six. Over and over again, he watched Su Yang tortured to death, as Bai Six calmly lectured him.

[It's true that I don't suffer because of others' pain, but you see, when I do even the slightest work, it's always you—the empathic good guy—who suffers more than me, the bad guy.]

A slow smile appeared on the tape as Bai Six's voice echoed, asking, [So, Captain Tang, after all this, can you still tell me what it means to be a good person?]

Tang Erda staggered to his feet, his mind filled with the image of the real Su Yang, as though answering Bai Six through time itself, or perhaps speaking to himself.

"It’s indeed thankless and pointless to be a good person."

"But I won’t become the bad guy, disgusting as that might be. Even if I already want to die, even if it’s just an illusion... as long as I live, I will save him!"

Tang Erda gritted his teeth, pulling out his gun and pointing it at his own head. "Because I’m his captain!!!"

"Stop this, Bai Liu!" Tang Erda’s eyes locked on to one of the Su Yangs who was behaving oddly, and without hesitation, he pulled the trigger.

The Su Yang in front of him slowly turned around, his eyes a deep, dark color—it was Bai Liu.

[System Alert: Player Tang Erda has a mental breakdown, panel is in full swing!]

[System Alert: Player Tang Erda has activated the Burst skill (Russian Carousel - Suicide Bullet)]

[Target: An anthropomorphic representation of the player Bai Liu]

[System Alert: The reels are starting to spin, the gamble is about to begin... Gamble failed, suicide bullets in effect—]

The bullet slammed into Tang Erda’s skull with a violent thud, blood pouring from half of his stunned face as he collapsed into the growing pool of blood around him, still unmoving.

In a daze, Tang Erda saw the 'Su Yang' from before suddenly transform into Liu Jiayi.

"How do you run away..." Tang Erda gazed upwards, his eyelids drooping, but a faint grin appeared on his face. "Never mind, there's always a way he can win the game."

Tang Erda’s eyes drifted closed. "I’ve finally lost the bet... and I can leave..."

"Hey, wake up." Liu Jiayi knelt breathlessly in front of Tang Erda.

Bai Liu had just teleported her there, using his telepathy. She had barely grasped the situation when she saw the big, stupid guy shoot himself. She panicked, fearing that history was repeating itself, rushing to give him the antidote.

Liu Jiayi stood frozen as she saw the big guy shoot himself in the head.

—How could he give up so easily?

As Liu Jiayi looked at Tang Erda, lying on the floor as though dying, the mirror vanished, and the corridor outside the door opened. Bai Liu walked through, seemingly having anticipated the scene. He glanced at Tang Erda lying on the floor but turned to Liu Jiayi. "Save him first."

As Liu Jiayi poured the antidote into Tang Erda, she looked at Bai Liu in disbelief. "How did you do this to him?"

Tang Erda was an S-rank player with an absurdly high panel value—no monster in this game could take him down. The only person who could defeat him in this game was himself.

But Bai Liu had somehow manipulated Tang Erda into shooting himself, with a burst of panel fire that completely penetrated his shield, leaving only a thin layer of skin between him and death.

Now, he was barely breathing, and Liu Jiayi was just one step too late. He would have been dead otherwise.

"Oh yeah, I've been studying his skill, Russian Roulette." Bai Liu explained methodically. "It's a luck-based skill. Whoever has a higher luck value won't get hit. So he should have beaten me every time, just in the nick of time. I changed the image stored in Hearts A to become you, then used Spades A to activate telekinesis and teleport you over."

"Now it's you and him. I thought you'd have better luck than me and a better chance of winning the bet." Bai Liu looked at Liu Jiayi innocently. "Looks like you won the bet."

Liu Jiayi: "....."

Liu Jiayi took a deep breath. "Bai Liu, you $#$!@#)*$@!!!!"

The Rose Factory

After milking Tang Erda until he appeared less weak—just a breath or two—Liu Jiayi stopped in time. She didn't dare revive the big guy after he'd lost his strength.

"And then what?" Liu Jiayi raised an eyebrow at Bai Liu. "What are you going to do?"

Bai Liu sat cross-legged beside Tang Erda, casually replying, "It's rare to get him to settle down. I'm ready to talk to him."

"And then we'll talk about a win-win deal," Bai Liu smiled, looking at Liu Jiayi.

Liu Jiayi took a couple of silent steps back at the sight of Bai Liu's smile, rubbing the goosebumps on her arms as she glanced at Tang Erda, still unconscious, with a little pity.
Poor fool. He's about to be conned by Bai Liu.

Qi Yifang's terrified voice echoed from afar. He was running toward them, likely still shaken from the big transformation between Liu Jiayi and Bai Liu. He was only now regaining his composure and heading down the corridor.

Liu Jiayi put away the antidote and stood up. "I'll go outside and stop Qi Yifang. You've got fifteen minutes to deal with... whatever Tang is. Is that enough time?"

Bai Liu leaned lazily against the corridor wall, raising his hand in an OK gesture.

Liu Jiayi turned to leave, tossing Bai Liu a bottle of antidote without looking back. "Take care of yourself before you take care of others."

"Shame on you for taking my skill panel and still getting hurt like that."

Bai Liu wiped the blood trickling down the corner of his mouth, caught the antidote she tossed him, and smiled. "Thank you."

Indeed, he had Liu Jiayi's witch panel, but Bai Liu had almost run out of stamina in his confrontation with Tang Erda. He hadn't had the chance to replenish it before using Liu Jiayi's skills.

Not to mention, being a player at heart, Bai Liu wasn't particularly attuned to his own life expectancy.

If Liu Jiayi hadn't been so quick to notice his low health and tossed him the antidote, Bai Liu would have been negotiating with Tang Erda on his meager three life points.

If Tang Erda were to revolt at the brink of death, there was a real chance something bad would happen to him.

The little witch waved her hand impatiently as she walked away.

Now, only Bai Liu and Tang Erda remained in the dim corridor, both having fought fiercely.

Bai Liu drank the antidote and stamina restorer to replenish his panel before approaching Tang Erda to pat his bloodied face.

Tang Erda's face was smeared with blood from his own suicide bullet, with blood continuing to pour from beneath him. His breathing and heartbeat were barely audible.

Bai Liu slapped him hard. Tang Erda's eyes faintly opened, the pale blue light filtering through his eyes, the only brightness in the dark corridor.

The moment he saw Bai Liu, Tang Erda's blood-soaked fingers twitched, as though reaching for a gun, but eventually, his strength failed him. He could no longer fight.

All he could do was stare at Bai Liu with blood-stained blue eyes, as though trying to grab Bai Liu's ankles. He laboriously managed to say, "… Let go of... Su Yang…"

"Actually, I'm curious," Bai Liu didn't dodge. Instead, he leaned closer to Tang Erda, meeting his gaze without flinching. "I saw in the mirror that the Su Yang who sent you to kill me must already be dead. His soul has disappeared, right?"

Tang Erda's pupils jerked, his hand twitching as though trying to grab Bai Liu.

Bai Liu continued calmly, "No matter what happens, even if your wish is granted, everyone's saved, and I die in every timeline, won't the Su Yang you wanted to save still not return?"

"So, what's the point of hunting me?"

Tang Erda, lying on the floor like a dead statue, didn't move. His fingers curled as if trying to form a fist, but he was too exhausted.

He couldn't even make a fist. All he could do was stare blankly at the ceiling, his mind filled with a flood of voices.

[..... Terrible opponents, the dreaded Wandering Circus. Due to the presence of their clowns, many are simply too afraid to fight them! A voice narrated passionately, But the other team in today's final match clearly wasn't composed of cowards, as they bravely confronted the Wandering Circus!]

You know the Joker Sniper's skill—Soul Crusher! This isn't a secret among us players, it was revealed by their captain, Bai Six, by default.

[This is a terrifying skill that has caused many teams to surrender before confrontation—because once hit by the clown sniper, your very soul shatters into a million pieces in an instant!]

[The people who have felt that pain themselves can no longer tell us about it, as they've all left this world. But that isn't even the worst part of the Soul Crusher. The worst part is that—]

[- It completely kills a person, with no chance of resurrection, completely vanishing from existence.]

[Even if time resets, even if the mountains and seas are reversed, there is no way they can come back.]

[For their soul is gone.]

[Today! As revealed through earlier interviews, the main target of the Wandering Circus' Clown Sniper is the captain of the other team, Mr. Hunter, who is also a gunner! Looks like we're in for an intense showdown between two top players with the same skill!]

The background noise of the field hums, bright lights spilling from above, the cheering and whistling crowd, and the other team approaching from a distance.

Liu Jiayi, Mu Sicheng, and Muke stand in slouching poses around Bai Six, who, wearing a cheeky clown mask, stands behind them with a gentle smile on his face.

Bai Six looked at him with amusement, reached out to shake his hand before the game started, and said something that has stuck in Tang Erda's mind ever since.

Bai Six smiled and said, "There's something about you that I don't have, Mr. Hunter, and I'm curious about you."

"I'd like to know under what circumstances you'd throw something like that away."

Tang Erda pulled his hand back warily. "Whatever it is you're talking about, I don't throw things away easily."

"Oh, really?" Bai Six said with the same polite smile, casting a meaningful glance at Su Yang, who stood behind Tang Erda. His smile deepened just a bit. "Mr. Hunter, it's best to ban intra-team romance; it's not appropriate for the team."

Tang Erda was stunned, and behind him, Su Yang's face shifted slightly.

Bai Six waved his finger, as if nothing had happened, and turned away with his smile intact.

"Intra-team romance?" Tang Erda frowned, turning to Su Yang in confusion. "Aren't we all guys on the team? How could anyone fall in love within the team?"

Su Yang's face paled for a moment. He looked at Tang Erda for a long time before finally smiling, almost as if surrendering to the truth.

He lifted his pale eyes, gazing tenderly at Tang Erda, took a deep breath, and slowly exhaled. With a soft voice, as if mentally preparing himself to take the blame, he said, "It's me, Captain. I liked you. I never planned to tell you. I was going to keep it a secret until I died." Su Yang lowered his eyes and smiled wryly. "Unfortunately, Bai Six saw right through it."

"Su Yang from the first world line has a crush on you, doesn't he?" Bai Liu looked down at Tang Erda. "I saw it in the mirror. You're so dense, can't you see that Su Yang likes you with those eyes?"

What men fear is not only the things they fear but also what lurks beneath them—the unspoken happiness they once missed.

Su Yang always looked into Tang Erda's light-colored eyes, always the best support on the field as Tang Erda attacked the fastest. He would blush slightly when he was dubbed Tang Erda's sage, and then quickly avert his gaze as Tang Erda, flustered, looked confused and explained.

They were the best duo in that year's tournament, outshining the perennial number one duo. As Tang Erda stood on the victory podium, a smile on his face, he turned to Su Yang and asked what he wanted as a reward.

Tang Erda knew Su Yang had worked tirelessly, training for so long just to catch up to him and work with him.

Tang Erda felt he should reward his excellent teammate.

Su Yang tilted his head, looking at him for a long time, as if victory didn't mean as much to him as a sideways glance from Tang Erda. Then, Su Yang arched his eyes, his smile bright and full of happiness, and said:

-- "Being able to stand with the captain right now is the biggest reward for me."

-- "I hope that next time the captain faces something difficult, he won't bear it alone and will think of me."

[I want to be the captain's trusty lieutenant, always.]

Su Yang always said this, silently following behind Tang Erda, who couldn't shake him off. He'd turn around to see the look in Su Yang's eyes as he stood behind, always asking what he needed.

Su Yang would always be his best vice-captain, and Tang Erda never bothered to question why.

When Tang Erda finally realized it, it was too late. His mind was blank after Su Yang's confession, his face still serious as he said he would consider it, but inside, his heart was already in a panic.

Su Yang just waved his hand, smiling indifferently. "Don't worry about it, Captain. Pretend I never said anything. If Bai Six hadn't brought it up on purpose, I wouldn't have said anything now."

-- "Consider my words later when you have time. I just thought..."

Su Yang looked back, against the light, amidst the cheers of the field, still smiling gently, but there was an unmistakable sadness lingering in his smile.

-- “It was just that moment, Captain, when you asked me, that I felt if I didn’t speak now, I might never have a chance.”

With the Wandering Circus pressing hard on the field and the presence of the clown sniper, their side hesitated to act, and Tang Erda was preparing to use himself as bait to lure the clown sniper into shooting.

As long as the Joker fired once, they’d have at least fifteen minutes to act freely, with their skills on cooldown.

But the Joker had no idea what orders he was taking from Bai Six, a man who was always impulsive and reckless. This time, however, no matter how much Tang Erda provoked him, he just circled the periphery, putting immense pressure on Tang Erda and the others.

Soon, Tang Erda understood Bai Six’s intentions—this guy was playing a war of attrition!

Bai Six’s team had a higher panel than Tang Erda’s new generation, and there was no advantage in waiting for their stamina to run out.

Tang Erda gritted his teeth, leaning against the wall. He had already lost two players to the opposing team.

But the bait wasn’t enough, and the clowns weren’t taking it!

“Captain.” Su Yang, who had been silent, suddenly spoke up. “I’ll be the decoy too.”

“No.” Tang Erda denied flatly. “You can’t be the bait. The Joker is mainly targeting me to roam. He won’t shoot if you step out there.”

“Their target is indeed you, Captain.” Su Yang smiled, holding up a Hearts A skill card. “But it’s not like I don’t have a way to completely transform into you, Captain. This prop I won from a player called Hearts can completely turn me into... you in my mind, without anyone noticing the difference.”

Tang Erda frowned. “What are the conditions for using this prop?”

“A mirror.” Su Yang lowered his eyes, his lashes fluttering softly. “All I need is a mirror that lets me see myself, and I can become you.”

Tang Erda frowned in disbelief. "All it takes is for you to look in the mirror? And you can become exactly like me?"

Su Yang looked up, smiling. "It's that simple. Nothing else is needed—just for me to look in the mirror, that's all."

Tang Erda turned to the other player. "Su Yang, you're the support. Your attack value is too low. As a decoy, you can't even land a hit. You should give the prop to—"

"No, Captain." Su Yang met Tang Erda's gaze, something flickering in his eyes, though the smile on his face was real. "This prop is only for me. To look in the mirror and become you."

"I'm probably the only person in the world who can use it this way."

They stared at each other. Neither looked away.

At that moment, they both knew—it didn't matter who else acted as bait, whether their attack value was high or low.

They were destined to lose.

The only question was who would take the Joker sniper's shot.

Tang Erda wished it were him. At least then, it wouldn't be Su Yang.

Su Yang straightened his back and saluted. "Captain! Please let me be your second-in-command—to support you until the last moment!"

Tang Erda was undone by Su Yang's unwavering, open gaze. He could feel it—Su Yang had seen right through his modest selfishness.

Just as he hadn't been able to stop Su Yang from following him into this game, he couldn't stop him now.

Su Yang had gotten his wish.

He had become another Tang Erda.

They split up, another teammate positioned at a distance, watching to see which decoy the Joker sniper would choose. With two targets, the Joker could only focus on one. He had to make a choice, or Tang Erda's firepower would turn the tide against the Wandering Circus.

Sure enough, the Joker made his move. Deep down, Tang Erda almost felt relieved when that eerie, grinning face locked onto him.

He had become the bait.

A chaotic struggle ensued. Tang Erda launched a frenzied, suicidal assault—Muke of the Wandering Circus fell dead, Mu Sicheng was badly wounded, and Bai Six lost more than half of his blood-soaked skin.

The Joker sniper, witnessing Bai Six's injuries, finally snapped. Disregarding his orders, he stopped holding back.

He raised his gun at Tang Erda.

A greyish flame ignited at the muzzle, swirling into the shape of a skull.

Tang Erda recognized it instantly—his opponent was using a skill.

A shattered soul? Seems like a fitting end.

Watching the black muzzle take aim, he even smiled. At least Su Yang and the others would be safe for the next fifteen minutes.

If the game ended within that time—win or lose—they'd be fine.

Just—

His heart stuttered, beating twice as fast, as he remembered the way Su Yang's eyes had lowered, the whisper that had left his lips just before the trigger was pulled.

"I like you."

It was a good thing he hadn't answered.

If he had said yes, Su Yang would have been devastated.

[System Alert: Player Su Yang activates the skill "Spades A Poker"—(Telekinesis) has swapped places with Player Tang Erda.]

Tang Erda would never forget what happened next.

His kind and upright lieutenant—who stammered when he lied to help teammates sneak out on lazy days—had told him one lie in his life without being caught.

And it was a lie Tang Erda would remember forever.

That Hearts skill card wasn't one, but a pair.

Su Yang had planned it all along. No matter which bait the Joker chose, he would take the shot in Tang Erda's place.

That's why he was so determined to come with me.

A white bone whip lashed out from behind, stopping Su Yang's escape. Bai Six, realizing the Joker had already committed to his shot, reacted swiftly. He played along, striking with his whip to seize Su Yang by the neck, pinning him in place.

A second later, the silver bullet pierced Su Yang's temple.

Blood splattered across Tang Erda's face before he could even process what had happened.

Su Yang crumpled. His disguise fell away, his blank eyes staring into nothingness as he returned to his true form.

He died too fast, leaving nothing behind—no final words, no last look—just the playing card still clutched in his fingers.

Tang Erda's likeness in the peach heart.

At the other end of the battlefield, his last remaining ally was quickly overwhelmed by Liu Jiayi and Mu Sicheng.

Tang Erda was alone.

Kneeling before Su Yang's lifeless body.

The Wandering Circus closed in around him—the game was over.

But all he could hear was the commentator's voice, from before the match began.

—[Soul Breaker Gun! Which is stronger, this gun or the Hunter's Revolver? The only thing we know for sure is that the Soul Breaker hurts more. After all, anyone hit by the Soul Breaker dies with a grimace, their face twisted in agony. But being shot by a Hunter's Revolver doesn't leave that expression!]

Tang Erda's gaze drifted downward.

He didn’t want to look at Su Yang’s face.

But he had to.

It was his vice-captain.

To his surprise, Su Yang wasn’t grimacing.

He was smiling.

Even with the whip marks on his neck, lying in a pool of his own blood—he looked happy.

And in that moment, Tang Erda understood.

Su Yang had felt the same thing he had, just before dying.

"The moment I knew someone else would survive in my place… I felt happy."

"A happiness so overwhelming that not even the pain of death—of a shattered soul—could overshadow it."

"Because that person was the most important to me."

—[To stand by the captain’s side is the greatest reward for me.]

—[Captain! You’re drinking again! Even if there’s no heresy, you can’t just slack off!]

—[You’re already thirty-six, Captain. Have you ever thought about settling down? No thoughts at all? No wonder you’re the one who gets pushed to marry at every New Year's party…]

—[Me? Why don’t I have a family? Probably because… the person I like doesn’t have one in mind either.]

It had been a Heresy Bureau year-end celebration.

Tang Erda had taken a sip of wine and, with some bitterness, given his ever-naïve lieutenant a piece of advice.

"You should give up on that guy before it’s too late. If he hasn’t even talked to you about marriage after all these years, he’s probably just stringing you along."

A slightly drunk Su Yang had leaned against him, his lips curling into a boyish grin, like a child given candy.

"He wasn't stringing me along. He was just… really, really… dumb."

Su Yang had wrapped his arms around him, laughing softly.

"But that's okay. You can't get rid of me. I'll always, always…"

His eyes had fluttered shut, words slurring.

"…wait for you."

On the battlefield, Bai Six prepared to deal the final blow.

But before the Wandering Circus could strike, Tang Erda raised his gun.

And aimed it at himself.

With the same smile as Su Yang.

Closing his eyes, he murmured, as if speaking to him one last time.

"You won't have to wait any longer."

[System Alert: Player Tang Erda's core desires have shifted—new derived attack skill generated: "Russian Carousel."]

[Skill locked to player Tang Erda. Cannot self-lock. Target reassigned to player with the highest killing intent—Player Bai Six.]

[The carousel spins…]

The bullet pierced through Tang Erda's skull—

—And hit Bai Six.

The Wandering Circus was wiped out.

Tang Erda had won.

Alone.

The Rangers never cared enough about winning to give up easily—they played for the thrill, toying with their opponents.

A grueling, life-or-death struggle for Tang Erda was, to them, just another game.

The gods asked him what his wish was. The hunter who had won everything looked up with empty eyes and made a wish that could not be undone:

"I want everyone, especially Su Yang, to be alive for this game."

The gods asked: "For this, will you pay any price?"

Tang Erda closed his eyes. Tears slid silently down his cheeks.

"Yes."

Lying on the cold floor, Tang Erda stared blankly at the ceiling, his soul drifting somewhere far away. It took him a long time to register Bai Liu's voice and even longer to muster a response.

Bai Liu's voice was calm. "Is there even a point in saving these Su Yangs? They aren't the one you wanted to save in the first place, are they?"

Tang Erda's cracked lips parted, his voice hoarse and strained. "I know that... I know there's no way to bring him back. But I can't accept that I never once managed to save Su Yang from you."

His breath hitched, his hands clenched. "That you always get to torture him."

With sheer, desperate effort, Tang Erda pushed himself up from the ground, his face streaked with tears. He fell to his knees, lifting a trembling silver firearm, aiming it straight at Bai Liu.

His hands shook. His whole body trembled.

Liu Jiayi had checked him earlier—Tang Erda had blown out most of his own brain. And yet, here he was, standing, forcing his body to keep going. In every sense of the word, his willpower was terrifying.

"As long as I'm still alive," Tang Erda gasped. His eyes glowed an eerie gray, the damage rendering him nearly blind. He could no longer aim properly, his shots erratic as he broke down, screaming.

"You will never get past me to hurt innocent people!"

Bang. Bang. Bang.

Bai Liu remained still, watching as Tang Erda collapsed to his knees, staggering under the weight of his own failing body. He clumsily tried to fire again but soon fell, limbs twitching in exhaustion.

His gun slipped from his grip, landing just out of reach. It flickered, threatening to disappear entirely, but Tang Erda could no longer feel it.

A hunter without his gun.

A wounded, cornered beast.

Bai Liu approached him, crouched on one knee, and picked up the weapon. He placed it back in Tang Erda's unsteady hand, guiding the barrel to his own forehead. His tone remained nonchalant.

"If you want to kill me, now’s your chance."

Tang Erda’s breath hitched, a flicker of hesitation in his ruined eyes.

Bai Liu met his gaze. "I understand why you don’t trust me. I wouldn’t trust me either. But from what I’ve gathered, we should be on the same side."

He exhaled, his voice almost contemplative. "I don’t know about the other world lines, but in this one, I have no interest in torturing your lieutenant. Someone set you up, hoping to force my hand."

A smirk tugged at the corner of Bai Liu’s lips. "But unfortunately, I don’t like playing by other people’s rules."

He tilted his head slightly. "Whoever is behind this wants one of us dead. Which means I have no choice but to keep you alive and see what happens next."

Bai Liu extended a hand toward Tang Erda.

"How about this? You give me your soul, and I'll help you get your wish."

Tang Erda barely lifted himself, his body trembling from the effort. With all the strength he had left, he knocked Bai Liu’s hand away.

Gritting his teeth, he gasped out, "Bai Liu... Do you really think I’ll believe you just because you say that?"

His fingers clenched around his gun, pulling it back toward himself, raising it shakily toward where he thought Bai Liu stood.

"Yes, I know breaking your deals has consequences. But I also know you've survived them before."

Bai Liu sighed and took half a step back. Damn. Tang Erda wasn't easy to fool.

His insight was sharp, honed through experience. He had been through this before—been tortured by Bai Liu enough times to predict his every move.

Tang Erda lifted his head slightly, his deadened blue eyes fixing on Bai Liu despite his failing vision. His gun wavered.

"I will never work with a monster."

Bai Liu hummed. "Captain Tang, what makes you so sure I'm a monster?"

His voice softened, almost teasing. "Do I seem so different from any normal person?"

Tang Erda took a deep, shuddering breath. "Of course you're different. You wear human skin, but you aren't human."

His grip on the gun tightened. "In other world lines, the Bureau of Heresy Processing classified you as a 'living heretic'—a monster that looks human."

A bitter, twisted smile curled Tang Erda's lips. "We tested you. Again and again. Every single time, we used the Murphy Theorem Magic Mirror."

Bai Liu arched a brow. "Oh? That's the first I've heard of that mirror being used to distinguish monsters."

Tang Erda's voice shook with rage. "That mirror forces people to see their greatest fear. But monsters like you? You don't fear anything. No emotions. No heart. Just a hollow vessel filled with endless hunger, consuming everything in your path."

His breath came in ragged bursts. "Every world line, without fail, we put you in front of that mirror—and every single time, you saw nothing."

Tang Erda coughed violently, blood spilling from his mouth. His body sagged against the wall, barely holding itself up. But his gun remained steady.

"Your so-called weakness—water—is nothing but an inconvenience to you. It’s not real fear. That’s why my mirror trap didn’t work. Because the mirror never worked on you at all."

His voice dropped to a whisper. "Bai Liu, you monster who fears nothing."

His finger tightened on the trigger.

This time, Bai Liu didn’t step back. Instead, he moved closer.

Too close.

Tang Erda flinched as Bai Liu reached out, catching the barrel of his gun with a steady hand.

Bai Liu’s lashes lowered. His voice was quiet, almost introspective.

"That’s not true."

Tang Erda stared at him in stunned silence.

Bai Liu leaned in, his breath ghosting against Tang Erda’s ear.

"I do have something I fear."

His fingers tightened around Tang Erda’s jaw, forcing their gazes to meet.

"I’ve always been afraid of watching someone close their eyes in front of me… and never opening them again."

The Rose Factory

Tang Erda's breath caught for a moment as a memory surfaced—the godlike NPC with closed eyes inside the mirror when Bai Liu shattered it in the Burst Last Train video.

Wasn't that entity already inside the copy, mapped out because of Bai Liu's fear?

Bai Liu ruffled Tang Erda's hair, his fingers slipping through the strands clotted with dried plasma, preventing him from breaking free. Instead, Tang Erda found himself leaning against Bai Liu's shoulder, unable to resist.

Then, Bai Liu whispered, "Do you want to face my fear?"

As he spoke, his hand moved slowly upward. A massive mirror, shimmering with a diamond-like glow, materialized before them. The surface rippled, as if something within was about to emerge.

"No...!" Tang Erda instinctively tried to turn away, unwilling to look into the mirror again. But he was too close to Bai Liu. In his attempt to escape, he turned his head—only to press directly into the crook of Bai Liu's shoulder.

The position was too intimate, too dependent, and Tang Erda—someone who had never leaned on anyone—immediately tried to pull away.

Bai Liu's voice was softer than Tang Erda had ever heard it. "It's okay."

His fingers carded through the blood-matted hair at the back of Tang Erda's head, kneading it apart in a slow, soothing motion—like calming a large, frantic dog.

"I'm the one using the mirror this time. Your Su Yang will be fine."

Tang Erda's weak struggles faded, his mind hazy under Bai Liu's touch. He barely reacted as Bai Liu tilted his face, lifting his chin until he was forced to look at the mirror.

The moment Tang Erda's gaze met the reflection, his pupils constricted violently.

—He saw a man.

A child drowned countless times, sealed in a marble sculpture to be gazed upon.

A body restrained, bound in a grotesque display, riddled with needle marks.

A man shattered and dismembered, his still-beating heart carved from his chest and placed in a factory room, forced to keep pulsing as boiling liquid was pumped into it—

Perfume.

It surged into the heart like blood, forcing it to convulse in agonizing spasms.

The realization struck Tang Erda with the force of a sledgehammer.

The heart he had seen in the factory room was actually...

His stomach lurched. The sheer cruelty of the scene exceeded anything he had ever witnessed. He shuddered violently, dry-heaving as he desperately tried to look away.

He had thought he knew the limits of suffering—the worst tortures a living being could endure.

But this… this proved that suffering didn't end with death.

Bai Liu didn't allow him to turn away. His grip tightened, fingers digging into Tang Erda's jaw, forcing him to keep watching.

"See?" Bai Liu's voice was a murmur against his ear. "We are the same."

Tang Erda's mind was blank.

"We are both terrified," Bai Liu continued. "Angry. Unable to stop ourselves from feeling someone else's pain."

His voice dropped lower. "I can feel it too."

He exhaled softly, sinking to both knees in front of Tang Erda. As Tang Erda instinctively leaned back, Bai Liu did the unexpected—he embraced him.

Tightly.

Unyieldingly.

Tang Erda stiffened, but Bai Liu didn't let go.

"I know you're in pain," Bai Liu murmured. "As much as I am, Captain Tang."

His voice carried no mockery, no deception—only something raw, something Tang Erda couldn't immediately name.

"Please believe me," Bai Liu whispered against his shoulder. "I won't hurt you anymore. Let all the pain I caused stop here."

Tang Erda didn't move, couldn't move. His breath hitched as Bai Liu's next words cut through him like a blade.

"I may not be one of those Bai Six, but I know what you want to hear."

Bai Liu's hand patted his shoulder, the gesture startlingly gentle.

"I'm sorry."

"And for everything you've been through… thank you for your hard work."

Tang Erda's breath caught in his throat.

His wide, disbelieving eyes lifted to Bai Liu's face, his vision blurring as tears slipped uncontrollably from his gray-blue eyes.

Bai Six...

No.

It was Bai Liu.

And Bai Liu had just apologized to him.

In the mirror, Tawil's eyes lifted—silvery blue, like ice melting under sunlight.

Tang Erda was momentarily dazed by their gaze. A white light bloomed on his forehead, searing through his consciousness before he lost all sense of himself.

The light spread, vast and weightless, shimmering like an aurora borealis before his eyes. For a fleeting moment, he felt lighter, as if he were floating endlessly within it.

And then, in the midst of the brilliance, he saw Su Yang's face.

Smiling. Stubborn. Unwavering.

"Captain, why are you so obsessed with convicting Bai Six? There's no solid evidence yet, is there?"

His voice was familiar, yet it struck like an accusation.

Tang Erda had said something—something that had angered Su Yang. A rare sight.

"Captain," Su Yang shouted, "if we act purely on emotion and desire, then what's the difference between us and those heretics?"

His voice rang out, sharp and raw.

"Whenever possible, always use your eyes and evidence to determine whether someone is a monster or a human being!"

Then, as if his own outburst had drained him, Su Yang lowered his head.

He looked like he wanted to leave.

Tang Erda tried to stop him, but Su Yang stood firm in the narrow aisle of the Heresy Bureau.

For a long moment, neither of them moved.

Then, at last, Su Yang lifted his head, took a deep breath, and met his gaze.

"If the day comes when you can't hold on any longer, when you become as tainted as the others..."

Su Yang smiled—gentle, as if he had never raised his voice in anger.

"I will bring you back."

He stepped forward, parting his lips to say something—

"--"

The sound of another voice cut through.

Bai Liu, whispering close to Tang Erda's ear.

"--"

The two voices overlapped in his mind, indistinguishable.

"Captain Tang, if you truly can't hold on anymore..."

"Leave the rest to me."

Bai Liu's hand cradled Tang Erda's head as he spoke softly.

"Give me your wishes.
Give me your soul.
Give me your pain.

Let me, the one responsible for it all, take it in your place—

As I should."

Tang Erda, half-conscious and barely breathing, slumped against Bai Liu's shoulder. His hollow gaze stared upward, emptied of life, his hands limp at his sides. He did not respond.

Time blurred.

Then—

A single tear slipped down his jawline.

His fingers twitched.

His arms moved—slowly, weakly, with great effort.

And then, he hugged Bai Liu back.

Desperately.

As if this was his last breath, as if he would collapse the moment he let go. His whole body trembled, and when he finally spoke, his voice was raw, choked with something fragile and breaking.

"Bai Liu..."

A sharp inhale.

"This is the last time. The last time I trust you with a deal."

Bai Liu's lips curled into an almost comforting smile.

"You won't regret it."

Tang Erda closed his eyes.

"I give you my soul in exchange for my wish."

Bai Liu chuckled, light and casual.

"I already left you the money. I'm not paying extra."

Tang Erda's breath caught.

He blinked, momentarily confused—until realization dawned.

Bai Liu was talking about the roomful of dimes he had left behind while escaping from the Bureau of Dangerous Heresy.

For a long moment, Tang Erda was utterly speechless.

Then—for the first time in what felt like forever—

He relaxed.

His gaze drifted far, far away, as if caught in a distant memory. And then, against all odds, his lips curled into something small, quiet, and almost wistful.

"You're still… as stingy as ever."

Bai Liu hummed, feigning contemplation.

"I hope you don't mind my little habit too much. After all, it looks like —"

He lifted a soul note, holding it up between his fingers.

Tang Erda's face was imprinted on the paper.

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow, smiling.

"—We're supposed to be working together for a long time."

*[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has purchased the soul of Player Tang Erda using RMB @&%@ (amount is cumbersome and still being calculated).]

Shrine.
The Hunter card on the tabletop floated, flipping face up the moment Tang Erda agreed to the deal.

The image shifted—from a weeping hunter to a hooded werewolf, fierce-eyed and predatory—and the card drifted away from the Seer's side, aligning itself with the Hooded Man.

The man in the hood caught the card between two fingers, his voice laced with amusement as he glanced at the Prophet.

"Your last devolvable god card, Hunter, has now switched sides to Werewolf.
What will you do now?"

The Prophet's gaze remained fixed on the card, unflinching.

"The game is not over yet."

The hooded man smirked, his fingers tapping lightly against the rose card lying beneath the Hunter.

"It will be soon."

"All the clues have fallen into place. Bai Six won't let this game drag on much longer."

Bai Liu stepped out of the corridor.

Liu Jiayi glanced down at the time.

"Sixteen minutes. You're done with the idiot already?"

"There."

Bai Liu casually adjusted his shirt cuffs, brushing away the dried bloodstains left from holding Tang Erda. Not that he cared.

He turned to Liu Jiayi.

"Go in and treat him."

She rolled her eyes, holding up two vials of antidote.

"Not like you really care what he's done."

"If I did, I'd have a problem with you too."

Bai Liu smiled, locking eyes with her.

"Clearly, I'm not that kind of person. Acting on personal grudges isn't in my best interests."

Liu Jiayi exhaled, withdrawing her gaze, and begrudgingly carried the antidote inside.

Bai Liu added nonchalantly:

"I'll need him later to fight the monsters in the inner world. Try to get him fully healed—he's my personal property now, and I'd rather not have him fighting for me in a half-broken state."

"Got it, got it!" Liu Jiayi waved a hand impatiently.

Qi Yifang, standing nearby, watched the exchange in stunned silence.

Bai Liu had just casually ordered the little witch around—someone on the same level as the Queen of Hearts in the King's Guild. Even the Queen wouldn't treat the witch like a common soldier.

Yet Bai Liu did it so naturally.

Bai Liu caught Qi Yifang's stare and, without hesitation, extended a hand with an insincere, businesslike smile.

"I really like your skills.
Jump in and play for our team sometime."

Qi Yifang: "....."

What the fuck kind of opener was that?!

Before Qi Yifang could react, Tang Erda walked out after Liu Jiayi.

The Captain, having just switched sides, was visibly unsettled.

The moment he saw Bai Liu, his hand instinctively moved to draw his gun—

But then, with a grimace, he remembered.

He had just been saved. By Bai Liu's people. By Liu Jiayi.

His grip on the gun faltered.

Liu Jiayi was watching him with an extremely judgmental expression. Bai Liu, standing beside her, looked entirely at ease, as if this was all going according to plan.

Tang Erda felt sick.

These two were his real enemies.
The kind he had fought against and died fighting.

Just before entering the game, he had almost killed Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi with a single shot.

Now, barely ten minutes after sealing a deal with Bai Liu, Tang Erda was already regretting it.

Had he been brainwashed?
Was it some kind of hypnosis? Some trickery?

Why the hell had he traded his soul to Bai Liu?!

As Tang Erda stewed in his deep regret over his impulsive (and frankly reckless) spending (?), Bai Liu suddenly extended a hand toward him.

Tang Erda's entire body tensed.

On instinct, his gun was already drawn, pointed straight at Bai Liu.

Bai Liu, clearly reaching out for a handshake, and Tang Erda, glaring at him down the barrel of a gun.

The atmosphere froze.

Liu Jiayi, still holding a bottle of poison, scowled.

"Bai Liu, are you sure you trained this guy?"

Bai Liu, unfazed, shrugged.

"He doesn't trust me much."

Then, as if Tang Erda wasn't aiming a gun at his chest, Bai Liu calmly stepped forward.

Without hesitation, he brushed aside the firearm and took Tang Erda's clenched fist in his own.

Lifting it.

Shaking it.

A slow, deliberate motion.

His eyes glinted with something unreadable as he smiled at Tang Erda.

"It's fine. I trust your abilities just fine."

The way Bai Liu moved—it was like a patient owner teaching a wary dog to shake hands.

Tang Erda, still reeling from the sheer audacity of it, lowered his gun.

For a brief moment, their eyes locked.

Tang Erda's wariness lingered. But, hesitantly, his fingers curled just slightly.

He shook Bai Liu's hand back. Like a wolfhound, recently tamed—its fangs hidden, ears flattened, tail drooped.

The smile on Bai Liu's face deepened considerably.

Not very clever, but certainly very deceptive, which is a plus.

The Rose Factory

After Tang Erda lowered his gun under Bai Liu's gaze, Liu Jiayi begrudgingly put away her poison before turning to Bai Liu.

"I've gathered a group of stragglers to help," she said. "We're preparing to dig up the god-tier NPCs."

"Are you sure of the location?" Bai Liu scanned her expression.

"Not a hundred percent—maybe eighty, ninety," Liu Jiayi admitted. "Based on the information you gave me, I've marked locations in the flower fields, but there's a serious problem—"

She gestured around them, spreading her hands. "What are you planning to do about these Rose Factory employees trying to stop us?"

Now that the commotion had settled and Bai Liu's group had caused significant damage to the factory, the workers—flower-pickers and processors alike—stood in a tightening circle. Their eyes averted, yet their grips firm on steel tools and flower-cutting shears, they slowly advanced toward Bai Liu and his group.

As more workers awoke to the chaos, the crowd thickened, enclosing them in a dense ring.

Qi Yifang gripped his weathervane tightly, while Liu Jiayi retrieved her poison once more. Years of cooperation had trained the two into an instinctive rhythm—they turned their backs to each other, eyes scanning the encroaching figures.

"This group of NPCs isn’t strong," Qi Yifang said with a strained chuckle. "Individually, they’re easy to handle. But there are too many of them, and if the battle gets intense, they might transform into monsters. If we trigger a large-scale aggression—if the hate value locks—” He exhaled sharply, his knuckles whitening.

"My thoughts exactly." Liu Jiayi turned to Bai Liu. "Just a reminder—you’ll have to deal with the workers guarding the flower fields before you can start digging. Otherwise, there's no point."

"But with just the few of us, there's no way we can handle so many..." Qi Yifang hesitated.

Bai Liu thought for a moment, then suddenly turned to Tang Erda, who had been silent all this time. His expression was serious.

"Can you handle it?"

Tang Erda, caught off guard, froze. He didn't answer immediately, but Bai Liu didn't look away, his gaze unwavering—calm, devoid of suspicion or scrutiny.

It was a look of complete trust.

Tang Erda barely lasted a few seconds before averting his gaze in discomfort. He opened his mouth as if to respond but hesitated.

…This was strange.

Across countless world lines, he and Bai Liu had faced each other in every way imaginable—anger, mockery, life-and-death battles, hatred —

But never this.

Bai Liu wasn't worried about him turning on them. On the contrary, he seemed to trust him without hesitation, as if he had already assigned him the rear defense.

If Tang Erda wanted to betray Bai Liu, this would be the perfect moment. A simple act of negligence in battle, a slight delay in response, and Bai Liu would fall.

It was absurd. Bai Liu was practically handing him his own throat and politely asking to be killed.

Tang Erda, who had spent so long hunting Bai Liu down, found the situation almost nauseating.

And yet—he no longer felt the desire to kill him.

It irritated him. Bai Liu irritated him.

The workers were closing in, but Bai Liu remained unhurried. He took a step forward, closing the distance between himself and Tang Erda, his voice gentler as he asked again:

"Captain Tang, can you handle this many people alone?"

…As if he were genuinely concerned about Tang Erda fighting alone.

Goosebumps prickled up Tang Erda's arms. He took a step back, turned his face away, and pushed Bai Liu back forcefully.

"I can handle them all by myself!" he snapped.

Bai Liu grinned, leaning in again. "Really? Then I'll be troubling you, Captain Tang."

Tang Erda bristled, his voice rising. "Stand still! Speak properly!"

—If he still couldn't tell that Bai Liu was messing with him on purpose, he'd have to be an idiot.

Bai Liu obediently straightened his posture, schooling his expression into something more neutral. His voice was calm when he gave the final order:

"Captain Tang, hold them off here. Liu Jiayi, Qi Yifang—you're coming with me to the flower fields. Any objections?"

Liu Jiayi nodded.

Under Bai Liu's expectant gaze, Qi Yifang automatically responded, "I don't have any issues either."

Then he froze.

Wait—what?

What did I just agree to?

Why am I suddenly working with them?

I'm in the King's Guild! This is the enemy camp!

Qi Yifang frowned. No, this wasn't just about him—the hunters were supposed to be enemies, too.

Then why was Bai Liu so casually ordering them around?

A few seconds passed before Qi Yifang finally realized the problem—

How the hell does this guy make commanding the enemy faction seem so natural?

Before he could dwell on it, Bai Liu flicked his whip forward. The strike sent factory workers tumbling aside, opening a clear path toward the flower fields. Without another word, Bai Liu bolted through the gap.

"Move!" Liu Jiayi shouted at Qi Yifang.

Bai Liu's attack had drawn the full attention of the workers—if Qi Yifang hesitated now, he'd be their next target. With no time to argue, he swallowed his protests and ran after them.

What kind of person is this?!

The enraged NPCs roared and prepared to charge after Bai Liu—

—but before they could, Tang Erda stepped forward, silver revolver drawn, an arm barring their path.

His dark blue eyes, still streaked with blood, held a bleak, steely resolve.

With practiced ease, he cracked open the revolver, loaded the bullets, snapped the cylinder shut, and cocked the hammer. The silver casing landed at his feet, bouncing twice in the flickering light.

Tang Erda stood alone in front of the factory's gates, staring down the furious, hate-filled eyes surrounding him.

In the madness of the blackened rose fields, among discarded petals and scattered remains, the hunter raised his gun, unmoved.

The workers shrieked as they convulsed, their skin cracking in the overwhelming floral scent. Their bodies twisted, alienating, as they howled—

"Kill the thief who stole the rose!"

"Kill the criminal who destroyed the rose!"

"Kill the murderer who killed the rose!"

"Kill Bai Liu!"

Tang Erda exhaled, whispering to himself, "Yeah, Bai Liu killed my rose too. If anyone should want him dead, it's me."

The next moment, without hesitation, he pulled the trigger.

His voice was steady, resolute.

"But until I find proof to convict him—"

"I won't let any man, or monster, kill him before I do."

Bang.

The silver casing hit the ground with a crisp, final note.

Far ahead, in the flower fields, Bai Liu crushed a rose under his heel as he glanced back toward the factory.

A slow, knowing smile spread across his face.

Qi Yifang's eyes widened. "What the hell?! Why are the hunters actually fighting for you?!"

"Charisma," Bai Liu replied with a deadpan smile. "I charmed him so thoroughly that he's willing to work for me."

He turned to Qi Yifang, smirking. "If you don't do your job well, I might just steal your soul, too."

Qi Yifang: "???"

He bolted.

"MY LOYALTY BELONGS TO HEARTS! DON'T COME NEAR ME!!!"

Liu Jiayi sighed. "…Don't mess with him. He actually believes it. That guy trained himself into the King's Guild just to impress Hearts."

Bai Liu just smiled.

The flower pickers, most of whom had been drawn to the factory by this morning's commotion, are now surrounded by Tang Erda alone.

There are few flower pickers left in the fields, making them much easier to handle.

After tying up the flower pickers, Liu Jiayi dusted off his hands and allowed the stragglers, who had been hesitant to enter, to come in. Once he showed them the exact coordinates, the vast excavation began.

Liu Jiayi and Bai Liu helped with the digging, while Qi Yifang used the wind to sweep away the roots and soil from the roses. The digging progressed faster than expected, but soon, a change occurred.

Some of the stragglers, as if under the influence of something, began to alienate uncontrollably and descend into madness.

After rehabilitating the stragglers with rose perfume, Liu Jiayi and Bai Liu exchanged glances, silently confirming their understanding of what had happened.

— Liu Jiayi's speculation was correct. They had dug too close to where Tawil's body was buried, which was why the stragglers were affected and began to alienate.

Standing up, covered in mud, Bai Liu clapped his hands to gather the attention of the stragglers assisting him.

"Attention, everyone. If any of you start to alienate while digging, let me know immediately. I'll take over from there."

He faintly smiled at the stragglers who had gotten themselves filthy helping him. "This is a personal matter for me, so please, let me do the rest myself."

Whenever a straggler alienated in the flower field, the others would stop digging as Bai Liu had instructed. Before long, only Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi remained, digging on their knees in the vast field.

But when Liu Jiayi trembled for the third time, Bai Liu caught her wrist, stopping her from continuing.

"That's enough."

Bai Liu looked at Liu Jiayi and smiled. "You've already helped me more than enough. I'll take it from here."

"But..." Liu Jiayi bit her lower lip, lifting her small, dirt-streaked face to meet Bai Liu's. She looked as if she still wanted to push through.

Bai Liu patted her head, his expression serious despite the quirk of his eyebrow.

"You've done great, but you've got to let me, as an adult, have something I can beat you at, right?"

Then, in a quiet whisper near her ear, he added, "Don't worry about me. It won't hurt."

Liu Jiayi was silent for a moment before she staggered to her feet. Qi Yifang and the stragglers quickly pulled her up from the excavation pit.

Now, in the middle of the flower field, Bai Liu was alone. Without a word, he remained kneeling in the messy, muddy ground, digging by himself.

The stragglers who had helped earlier didn't leave, despite Bai Liu insisting this was a personal matter. Instead, they stood silently at the edge of the site, maintaining an unspoken distance, watching him.

Liu Jiayi also stood among them, observing Bai Liu with an unfamiliar sense of awe.

She had never seen him like this before. He was no longer the lazy, indifferent trickster who always played everything off. Instead, he was serious, focused—so much so that it felt almost strange.

During their previous efforts to rescue Bai Liu, Liu Jiayi had realized how little they truly knew about him.

At the time, she had thought: Bai Liu is so smart. He has us all figured out. He never reveals anything about himself, always hiding behind a thousand masks.

But now, in this moment, Liu Jiayi had the unsettling feeling that she had finally glimpsed the real Bai Liu—the one he had buried deep inside himself.

—Bai Liu, alone, covered in mud, approaching someone else buried beneath the earth.

No one helped him. No one dared to come closer.

All they could do was watch—either by choice or by helplessness—standing behind the safety line, spectators to Bai Liu's solitary approach toward the monster underground.

For ten minutes, Liu Jiayi remained lost in thought, until a sudden commotion among the onlookers snapped her back to reality.

Bai Liu had unearthed something.

The crowd stirred with excitement as Liu Jiayi leaned forward, peering into the pit.

She exhaled in relief when Bai Liu pulled out a snow-white, knuckled right hand.

Good. She hadn’t guessed wrong.

Just as she was about to call out for Bai Liu to throw something up before the mental toll became too much, his movement suddenly made her pause. She watched as Bai Liu lowered his gaze, then, without hesitation, reached out and took the hand—his fingers clasping around it.

"Finally..."

His breath was still uneven from the effort of digging, his face smeared with dirt and sweat. But despite it all, his lips curled into a mischievous grin—the kind a fourteen-year-old Bai Liu might have worn after winning a game.

"Caught you."

Liu Jiayi blinked.

For a split second, she thought she saw it—the buried, broken hand twitching.

As if, buried beneath the roses, it had grasped Bai Liu back.

The Rose Factory

After the crowd dismantled a small tent and spread it out in the middle of the flower field, Bai Liu trudged up from the pit and carefully placed the hand he had been clutching in the center of the cloth.

Everyone kept their distance from Bai Liu to avoid contamination, yet they remained, lingering quietly like the tide—always chasing his muddy footsteps, pushing him forward.

Bai Liu continued digging, unearthing a fragmented body.

Piece by piece, he pulled the left hand, the left foot, the lower leg, half of the rib cage, and the first to third cervical vertebrae from the earth. Without a trace of expression, he placed them on the cloth, methodically reassembling the body according to human anatomy.

As the corpse slowly took shape, with only the head and heart missing, something unnatural occurred—blood vessels began to reform, growing out from the clotted musculature, torn nerves reconnecting along smooth fascial breaks. The hollow, heartless chest began to rise and fall faintly, as though it was breathing.

The sculpted body, devoid of warm blood, had been reborn in a strange and unsettling way. It functioned before Bai Liu's eyes.

Bai Liu remained silent, saying nothing. He simply continued digging, carrying, and piecing the body together. The mental strain weighed on him, and he nearly collapsed several times, but no one could help him —not that he needed it. Each time he fell into the mud, he would take a few deep breaths before pushing himself up again, staggering back to his feet.

His expression betrayed no emotion whatsoever.

Yet, for some reason, Liu Jiayi felt that, despite Bai Liu's miserable state—covered in dirt, exhausted, and barely holding himself together —he was happy.

—That kind of joy, of being reunited with someone very important after a long time.

"Mr. Bai, come on up! There's no more field left to dig!" the stragglers called from the edge, cupping their hands around their mouths.

Liu Jiayi, standing at a distance, scrutinized the statue Bai Liu had pieced together. She couldn't make out all the details, but something seemed off. She frowned. "Why is the head still missing? Did I miscount?"

Bai Liu wrapped the statue in cloth and attempted to lift it, but after failing twice, he finally motioned for a straggler to bring over a cart. Only then was he able to push the statue out of the flower field.

As soon as he stepped out, Liu Jiayi confronted him. Bai Liu waved a hand dismissively as he leaned against the cart to catch his breath. "It's not that you miscounted. The head wasn't buried in the flower field."

Liu Jiayi eyed him suspiciously. "Then where is it?"

Bai Liu's gaze drifted toward the rose factory, where the sound of gunfire echoed. A slow smile crept onto his face.

"It's a game," he said. "The best and most beautiful rewards always come after defeating the biggest boss."

Liu Jiayi stiffened, realization dawning on her. "Wait—no way. You're saying it's inside that monster...?"

"Yeah," Bai Liu replied casually. "The massive monster that used to be the factory owner."

He tilted his head slightly, half-closing his eyes, his breath still uneven from his efforts. "That factory manager saw Tawil as a symbol of desire. He blamed Tawil for his own killing spree, convinced that a demon had manipulated his mind into committing those crimes—a textbook example of a murderer with an overactive sense of self and warped morality."

"This type of serial killer usually keeps what they believe to be the most valuable trophies—an inheritance from an adoptive parent, a wife's rose greenhouse..." Bai Liu turned his head, looking at Liu Jiayi with an almost amused expression. "Or the parts of Tawil he found most beautiful—the head and the heart."

Liu Jiayi's face darkened. "So what's your plan?"

"That thing is an S-rank monster. You might be able to escape by exploiting its weaknesses, but actually trying to kill it? That's insane. Even the King's Guild would need at least twenty reserve team members working together to pull that off!"

"I can't do it," Bai Liu admitted, handing the cart over to her. "But Captain Tang, in an outbreak situation, should be able to."

"I'll go find him and ask for help. You guys keep an eye on this—make sure that monster doesn't take it."

Bai Liu smiled, his eyes curving, and gave a small wave as he took off running toward the factory.

"I'd cry if I lost it."

"Hey! Wait!" Liu Jiayi instinctively reached for the cart, but just in time, she remembered—she couldn't touch it directly without getting contaminated.

With no other choice, she used the long pincers of a flower-picker to grasp the cart's handle and push it forward.

She watched Bai Liu's retreating figure, already far ahead, and felt a sudden surge of frustration. "I told you to let me handle some of it, not dump the whole mess on me!"

Muttering under her breath, she grumbled, "Why don't you ever tell me what you're planning…?"

Then, her expression twisted into a scowl.

"Captain Tang, Captain Tang… Is he your captain now? Since when are you two so close?"

She huffed, cheeks puffing out in annoyance.

"I even took a bullet from that 'Captain Tang' for you…"

The more she thought about it, the more irritated she became. She stomped her foot in frustration.

"You don't even hold a grudge!"

Meanwhile, Bai Liu hadn't even reached the factory before he cupped a hand around his mouth and called out gleefully:

"Captain Tang! I need your help!"

Tang Erda, who had been guarding the entrance with laser focus, nearly had a heart attack.

At Bai Liu's shout, his soul almost left his body.

His grip on his gun slipped.

"—D—Damn it—Captain—you—what-are—you—doing?!"

Tang Erda didn't react at first, thinking it was one of Bai Liu's tricks to startle him. He almost shot Bai Liu on reflex.

Fortunately, he managed to control himself in time—otherwise, this story would have ended right here.

Tang Erda steadied his magazine, his heart pounding—half from the shock of nearly shooting Bai Liu, and half from Bai Liu's overzealous approach.

He quickly schooled his expression and took a step back, putting distance between himself and Bai Liu. His tone was cold: "Why are you calling me?"

"I need to ask for a favor." Bai Liu smiled, inexplicably in a good mood.

Tang Erda sharply raised his gun and shot down a monster creeping up behind Bai Liu. His usual icy scowl flickered into irritation. "Why aren't you watching your surroundings? What do you need my help with?"

Bai Liu gave him a brief rundown of the situation. As he listened, Tang Erda frowned, visibly unsettled. He had seen Bai Liu's mirror and knew that this godlike NPC was Bai Liu's most important person. And now, Bai Liu was looking for the NPC's severed head—hidden inside a monster's body.

That wasn't exactly a pleasant task.

Yet Bai Liu seemed… oddly cheerful. The contrast made Tang Erda feel a strange mix of emotions, a flicker of reluctant sympathy. Was Bai Liu hiding his grief behind that smile...?

He really was strong.

"I'll do it." Tang Erda's tone softened slightly. "But what about the monsters inside the factory?"

If he left his post at the factory entrance, the monsters inside could escape and wreak havoc. If he and Bai Liu both went into the inner world, the place would be completely unguarded.

"Don't worry about that." Bai Liu didn't spare a second thought for Liu Jiayi's feelings before casually selling out his teammates. "If the monsters come out, the little witch and Qi Yifang can handle it."

Tang Erda considered for a moment. Liu Jiayi and Qi Yifang were indeed strong—both had area-of-effect skills. In this timeline, they would have been trained by Hearts as reserve members of the King's Guild.

The factory monsters were numerous but not high-level. Once they scattered, it shouldn't be too much trouble for those two to handle.

Tang Erda holstered his gun and turned to Bai Liu. "How do we enter this 'inner world' you're talking about?"

Bai Liu held out a bloodstained eyeball—one he had torn from a monster's face. Only now did his smile take on a dangerous edge, an unsettling sharpness that made Tang Erda instinctively tense.

This Bai Liu… really did look like Bai Six in moments like this.

The aggression beneath his amusement was unnerving.

Bai Liu lifted his gaze and held up the eyeball before his right eye. "Just look at this with your right eye."

Tang Erda was a good dozen centimeters taller than Bai Liu. To align their gazes, he had to lean down slightly, lowering himself to Bai Liu's level.

As their eyes met over the disembodied eyeball, it suddenly blinked. At the same time, the rose in Bai Liu's right eye bloomed fully, its final petal unfurling.

The world fractured.

Roses reflected infinitely across shards of broken greenhouse glass, transforming into countless fading blooms that wrapped around their vision, the greenhouse, the land itself.

A deep red halo turned to pale pink, then splintered apart. Buds sprouted from their eyes, their skulls, their mouths. The silvery-blue petals grew inward, consuming them, then withered—leaving behind a pavilion of dried roses, a grotesque beauty nourished by the touch of an evil god.

A wave of dizziness hit Tang Erda, weakening his knees.

When his vision cleared, he found himself inside the faded inner world.

A monster loomed before them, massive as a small mountain, its grotesque form devouring the rose greenhouse. Its skin undulated, thick and viscous, bubbling like a melting mass. Roses festered beneath its flesh, writhing, feeding. Everything it swallowed became sustenance.

Now, its remaining left eye—sickly yellow, oozing pus—fixed itself on Bai Liu. The man who had stolen its right eye.

[System Warning: The monster (Generation Leader) has locked onto player Bai Liu with maximum aggro! Player Bai Liu has no means to fight this monster. Please evacuate immediately!]

In the past, Bai Liu would have turned and fled without hesitation.

Now, he simply darted behind Tang Erda to a safe spot, waved at him, and called out cheerfully, "Captain Tang, please take care of this first."

Tang Erda: "……"

Tang Erda, once again regretting every life decision that had led him to this moment, exhaled sharply. He raised his gun, sharp eyes locking onto the monster as it lurched toward Bai Liu's hiding spot.

With a precise shot, he blasted the creature's left eye.

The monster roared, its massive frame trembling. Dust rained from the ceiling, the floor quaked beneath their feet.

From the cracks in the walls, small spider-like creatures, seemingly roused by the commotion, skittered out, their hideous hissing filling the space. They swarmed toward Tang Erda, fangs bared.

Against most players—including Bai Liu and even members of the King's Guild—these creatures would have been an overwhelming threat.

But against Tang Erda? They never stood a chance.

He moved crisply, each shot precise, except for a brief moment when a magazine change brought the monsters closer, steadily cornering a large group just three meters from where Bai Liu was hiding. The bullets from Tang Erda swept across the area like an invisible safety line, protecting Bai Liu without a trace.

After the first round of sweeping, Tang Erda scanned the room with cold eyes, ensuring there were no small monsters that could kill the now brittle Bai Liu with a single bite. Then, without turning back, he spoke coldly, "Come out."

"The little monsters are cleared, the big ones are invisible, and the hate value locks on you are useless."

Bai Liu moved out from behind a wardrobe, patting himself down and surveying the room. The bodies of monsters, all killed by near-perfect shots, were neatly strewn three meters away from where he had been hiding. They even appeared in similar positions to how they had been before their deaths.

Bai Liu couldn't help but raise an eyebrow at Tang Erda, who stood calmly before him, not even a trace of dust on his sleeves.

— This guy is really strong.

Earlier, Bai Liu had a strong feeling that Tang Erda's panel value was well above S.

Tang Erda tossed Bai Liu a semi-circular sniper scope and gave a slight sideways nod. "Take this. I don't usually use a scope with guns in the game, but this one has a slow-playback function. You can use it to see inside the monster's body and track my bullet movements."

"There are too many human heads inside this monster, and I'm not sure whose you want, so there's a chance you'll need to aim while we fight it. If you see I'm about to hit the head you want, just warn me, and I'll move out of the firing line."

"Won't it affect you if I interfere with the command like this from the sidelines?" Bai Liu politely asked, glancing up at the large monster. "This is an S-rank monster."

Tang Erda gave him a faint glance. "Not really. On the field of play, the tactician's commands interfere more than that."

"Aren't you going to play in the league?" Tang Erda looked up at the large monster, one leg back in a jumping position. Countless points of light converged on the silver revolver in his hand. "Now you'll get a taste of what it means to be a league player."

[System Alert: Player Tang Erda is equipped with Monster Book Status: The Fading Rose Hunter]

[OK.]

Tang Erda's hair floated and blew in the points of light, and the pupils in his ethereal blue eyes contracted violently and vertically, resembling wolf's eyes.

The silver pistol in his left hand gathered points of light, elongating to about a meter. A vine-like band of equipment rapidly grew from his chest, coiling around the gun, and a large rose-decorated hovering magazine floated behind the revolver. The constant clicking of bullets being loaded echoed through the air.

"Watch the trajectory of my bullets." Tang Erda gave Bai Liu a sidelong glance. "If you're not paying attention, it's not my fault if you get hit."

The next moment, Tang Erda seemed to press down slightly with his retreating leg. With a single shot to the ground from the excessively long, bizarre revolver, the recoil sent him levitating backward, vanishing before Bai Liu, leaving only a strong, gunpowder-scented wind that ruffled Bai Liu's hair.

It soon became clear to Bai Liu why Tang Erda had given him a scope with a slow-playback function.

Because Tang Erda was moving so fast, Bai Liu couldn't even see his form, only the trail of countless bullets and the blurred motion of the man crisscrossing in front of him. Then, the creature violently twisted and struggled, letting out a heartbreaking scream as though it were being tortured.

Bai Liu put on the scope.

In the red field of view of the scope, the bullets tumbled forward in an odd trajectory, intertwining as if they were infrared alarm devices scattered across the space.

A tentacle flung toward Bai Liu, but before it could reach him, it was pierced by an unseen bullet, turning into a charred mass that bounced helplessly on the ground.

The creature's body was filled with numerous heads, like a crane machine stuffed with similarly-sized dolls, still bouncing, making it difficult to pinpoint the exact location of any one of the heads.

Bai Liu quickly scanned the creature's body twice and soon located Tawil's exact position. He saw a bright red firing line aimed directly at Tawil.

"We're almost there, Captain Tang," Bai Liu said quickly.

Almost as soon as the words left his mouth, Bai Liu saw the firing line shift, and a head next to Tawil's exploded.

Bai Liu breathed a faint sigh of relief. But his concentration was too intense, and the translucent texture of the scope's field of view, which mostly showed bones and ballistics, made it difficult to focus on specific items.

So, Bai Liu didn't notice that the creature had crawled up to his head, ready to swallow him with its "petals" wide open.

In the next instant, Tang Erda appeared out of nowhere in front of Bai Liu, holding the meter-long gun in his left hand, the muzzle aimed at the monster's head. Tang Erda's back was to the creature as he jammed his other hand into Bai Liu's shoulder, flipping him over and shielding him with his body. The rose magazine around the gun continued to make the sound of bullets loading with a "da da da da."

The muzzle of the gun aimed at the monster's head flashed red.

"Bang-bang-bang-bang-bang-bang-bang!!!"

The massive monster slowly fell backward, collapsing onto the dusty ground amidst the constant barrage of gunfire.

[System Alert: Congratulations to player Tang Erda for killing the S-rank monster - (Generation Factory Manager)!]

A clean, concentrated onslaught of fire that killed the monster in seconds.

After the monster fell, Tang Erda quickly stepped back, distancing himself from Bai Liu. He shook his fist uncomfortably, as if displeased with his subconscious act of protecting Bai Liu. Then, he looked up, slightly stern, as if remembering something, and reprimanded Bai Liu, "Didn't I tell you to watch out for the monsters around you? I thought I told you to be aware of your surroundings."

"How can you play in a league when all you focus on is the goal?"

"You're adapting to the idea of playing in a league with us pretty quickly." Bai Liu looked at Tang Erda thoughtfully. "Did I recruit you in other timelines?"

Tang Erda, crouching and searching through the corpse of the creature for its head, froze for a moment. It was as if he'd remembered something deeply unpleasant, his eyes flickering with sudden violence.

"Hmm," he exhaled, sneering slightly. "But not in the gentle way you're doing now."

Gentle?

Bai Liu didn't feel that he'd recruited Tang Erda gently.

He had exploited Tang Erda's weaknesses, almost entirely breaching his physical and psychological defenses. Bai Liu had used words and persuasion to reshape how Tang Erda saw him, all during a time when the man's sanity was fragile.

Bai Liu had also played on Tang Erda's empathy, exploiting the nature of the righteous public official, making him relive painful experiences that mirrored his own. The goal was to create a psychological connection, a sense of belonging to Bai Liu—something the essentially good captain had offered.

It was the instinct of any socially aware human to gravitate toward a familiar group, a place that accepted them. Tang Erda, a captain who had been ostracized and possibly isolated from his former team, the Heretics' Bureau, was in desperate need of connection.

He couldn't approach others to establish normal, stable relationships because his moral code prevented him from involving innocent people in the "game"—the bad luck he carried with him. Any connections he formed with groups like the major gaming guilds were superficial, using him and ingratiating themselves, but never understanding his idealism.

For a long time, Tang Erda had wandered alone in the endless darkness of time, yearning for group contact.

Now, he was almost guilt-free about it—his wandering circus provided him with some level of understanding, despite their long-standing hostility. Bai Liu's cold, yet considerate, acknowledgment of Tang Erda's feelings had made him feel that this wandering circus was, in fact, a good choice for him.

The challenge was turning Tang Erda's hatred of the circus into empathy. The strategy Bai Liu used was simple: [We are not so different, you and I.]

[We are both abandoned by fate, condemned to wander alone.]

For people who had been isolated for so long, this recognition was often a lifeline.

The transformation was not gentle for Tang Erda; it was more like a death sentence.

But Tang Erda thought it was gentle? This intrigued Bai Liu.

Tang Erda's small TV, constantly tuned to a pay-per-view service, muted every conversation between the two, which allowed Bai Liu to speak openly and directly without fear.

Bai Liu knelt down, pretending to search for Tawil among the bodies of the monsters torn apart by Tang Erda's gunfire. Casual as ever, he asked, "Can I ask what Bai Six in the other timelines did to you?"

Bai Liu quickly added with a note of guilt, "Of course, you don't have to answer if it's too painful. I'm sorry you've had to go through this because of me."

Tang Erda paused for a moment, his hand still, before he resumed searching. "You don't have to apologize. Those things have nothing to do with you."

"In that timeline, Joker wasn't meeting Bai Six's expectations. He wanted to find someone else for the league." Tang Erda's voice was heavy. "Then Bai Six saw my little TV and took a liking to me. He tried many ways to get close, but I was very hostile."

Tang Erda inhaled sharply. "At that time, Bai Six had a prop. He used it to lure me, and that's when he discovered that the most important person in my life was Su Yang."

"Bai Six tried to use Su Yang to get me on the team, but Joker, who felt abandoned by Bai Six, hated me. He thought I was the reason Bai Six dropped him."

"When Su Yang went abroad, Bai Six ordered his kidnapping and used him as leverage to get me to join. I still refused, and Su Yang wouldn't let me join an organization like that."

"But after two rounds of negotiations, Bai Six lost patience. He gave up on me and moved on to other players."

Tang Erda's voice was thick with disdain. "Bai Six threw the useless Su Yang to Joker."

"You saw what happened next in the mirror."

Bai Liu fell silent for a moment, then placed a reassuring hand on Tang Erda's shoulder, sensing that the captain needed it.

Tang Erda snapped, his eyes flashing. Just before Bai Liu's hand touched him, Tang Erda grabbed it fiercely and hissed, "Don't touch me!"

For a moment, Bai Liu thought he saw a wolf baring its teeth, preparing to strike.

Tang Erda's chest rose and fell as he tried to regain control of his breathing. He opened his mouth, as though about to speak, but in the end, he said nothing. Without another word, he turned back to his search, continuing to look for the head Bai Liu had requested.

Bai Liu briefly assessed the situation—clearly, this was a case of severe post-traumatic stress. He had gotten the information he wanted, so he withdrew his hand without any sign of embarrassment, smoothly shifting the subject.

"Captain Tang," Bai Liu asked, "You could see Tawil's head during the fight without a scope. Why give me one?"

Tang Erda paused for a moment before answering, "The view for attacking is different from the one needed to locate something. When I'm using my skill gun to speed-attack an object, I don't focus on the heads rolling inside."

"I need a sidekick to help with positioning," Tang Erda continued, pausing again. "That head is to you what Su Yang is to me. It's much safer for you to use the scope and avoid injury."

Bai Liu smiled. "Yes, he's very important to me. Thank you for thinking of me, Captain Tang."

Tang Erda's hand tightened at Bai Liu's gratitude, shaking slightly as he swallowed hard. After a deep breath, he muttered, "Sorry."

Bai Liu didn't mind. He smiled gently and placed his hand on Tang Erda's tense shoulder, his voice soft. "I understand, Captain. It's not your fault. Anyone would be furious if someone important to them was hurt. I would feel the same."

Tang Erda's posture, previously as stiff as steel, melted under Bai Liu's touch. He felt an unexplainable relief.

Tang Erda looked at Bai Liu's face, captivated, as the other man continued searching through the bodies.

— Bai Liu said he understood how he felt.

Bai Six... could actually get angry too...

In all the timelines, Tang Erda had never seen Bai Liu lose control. He was always calm, seemingly invincible because he had no weaknesses.

But just now, Bai Liu had been so focused on finding Tawil's head that he nearly got eaten by a monster. Before that, Bai Liu had approached him, smiling, calling him Captain Tang—Tang Erda now saw that smile differently, like a child trying to protect someone important to them.

Tang Erda watched Bai Liu sift through the bodies, his face streaked with mud and blood, yet unbothered.

— This was Bai Liu, with emotions and weaknesses. Not Bai Six.

"Found it!" Bai Liu gently moved a pile of skulls, revealing a sleeping head beneath the bones and roses.

Bai Liu's breathing slowed as he carefully cradled the head, his body curving protectively around it. Rose petals clung to his lashes, and mud dripped from his chin as he bent his body into a tender arc, sheltering the head in his arms.

"Found you," he whispered, his eyes lighting up as he gazed down at the skull with a pure, joyful smile.

Tang Erda stared in disbelief at the smile on Bai Liu's face, feeling a strange warmth in his chest. But the smile was so infectious that Tang Erda couldn't help but relax, leaning back against the pile of bones, letting out a soft laugh.

"It’s good you found him."

"Intact, found him intact."

The Rose Factory

Outside the factory.

Liu Jiayi drags the long pliers holding the cart in one hand, while cautiously carrying the poison in the other as she pulls the cart forward.

Surrounded by a swarm of Rose staff monsters and weighed down by the cart, Liu Jiayi finds herself outnumbered on all sides.

However, two other members of the King's Guild emerge from the factory to help her, with Qi Yifang using his wide-ranging skills to control the battlefield, effectively balancing the attacks on the scattered monsters.

"Bai Liu, this person is really..." Liu Jiayi leans back behind her cover, exhausted, to catch her breath. She raises her elbow to wipe the sweat dripping down her face, glancing over at the cart separated from her by the long pliers. She groans, "Isn't this something very important to you?"

"...You gave it to me so easily. If it's not protected, you're going to blackmail me about it later, aren't you?"

Suddenly, a monster lunges from behind Liu Jiayi, and she instinctively steps in front of the cart, swatting at the poison. "Get out of the way!"

The black poison splashes into the monster's open petals, causing it to melt and deform with a decaying sound, turning into a pool of blood.

The surprise attack causes Liu Jiayi, already exhausted from fighting, to forget to maintain her distance from the cart in her rush, and the contents of the cart make her mental strength drop even further.

Shaking her head twice, Liu Jiayi reaches for the rose perfume in her pocket to restore her strength, only to discover that the bottle is empty.

More monsters, drawn by the scent of the poisoned corpses, start to surround her, gradually narrowing the circle and pushing her closer to the cart. The presence of the godlike NPCs in the cart makes her feel increasingly dizzy, forcing her to cling to the long pliers to stay upright.

A divine NPC, now split, may have been exposed internally, affecting the player more than before—much like at the orphanage!

Liu Jiayi can't help but release her grip on the pliers, continuing to guard the cart with poison in both hands, gritting her teeth.

"Little witch! You're almost out of perfume, aren't you? Take it!"

"Over here! Take it!"

"Here!"

Voices from three directions shout, and three bottles of perfume come flying from the King's Guild reserves—her former teammates.

Liu Jiayi looks up at the three bottles slowly falling toward her. She purses her lips and pulls her hand back, unwilling to owe too many favors.

In the past, their collaborations could be described as everyone fighting together to survive, but now, with a constant stream of monsters, no one's perfume is being freely given away.

...Bai Liu is someone she'll likely encounter in the league in the future. Given what she knows about herself, these unpaid debts will make her hesitate, which is not ideal.

But if she doesn't take the perfume, she won't last much longer.

"Jiayi!" Qi Yifang calls out, seeing that Liu Jiayi is still hesitating. "Take it! Your spirit level is below 40!"

Just as the perfume was about to land in front of Liu Jiayi, a man crashes through the factory wall she's leaning against, snatches the bottle out of the air, and tosses it back in her direction.

Qi Yifang and two other men, now slightly panicked, manage to catch the perfume.

"Thank you all for your interest and help with my little witch," Bai Liu says lightly, landing like a leaf. He casually takes the cart from Liu Jiayi's hand and moves it in front of her, tossing her a bottle of perfume at the same time. He then turns and strikes out with a whip, sending the approaching monsters flying backward in a semi-circular vacuum.

He slowly raises his gaze, looking away from them, and smiles with a false, courteous bow. "But we might all be enemies in the future, so it's better not to be too friendly, don't you think, Jiayi?"

Liu Jiayi feels relieved.

Out of instinct, she quickly scans Bai Liu's body to make sure he's not injured before responding with a slight sneer, clutching her chest. "I thought you were going to keep all three bottles for yourself."

"I would've liked to," Bai Liu smirks, turning to her. "But I suppose you don't really want me taking them all, or maybe you don't want to owe them, which is why you haven't picked them up."

Liu Jiayi sprays the perfume on herself, takes a deep breath, and glares at Bai Liu. "You talk too much!"

Once her mental strength is restored, Liu Jiayi looks around. "Where's Captain Tang?"

Bai Liu whips away more approaching monsters, replying as he does, "I told him to send me out to support you first, then to clear the monsters inside the factory."

"When he finishes clearing the factory, he'll come back out and join us."

"Finished?" Liu Jiayi frowns. "Most of the monsters are still inside the factory. He can clear it alone... Finished?"

Liu Jiayi is about to question Bai Liu's faith in Captain Tang, who only recently joined them, when—

A man suddenly propped himself up against the high wall next to Liu Jiayi and tumbled out in a smooth, practiced motion.

At the same time, the man flung a meter-long, oddly shaped silver revolver with great force, pressing it under his shoulder to ease the recoil from constant firing. His posture remained strong and steady as he cleared the wall.

The wind lifted the hair from his forehead and the hem of his coat, revealing a pair of intensely focused, dark blue eyes.

As soon as the man landed, he began firing indiscriminately at the monsters closing in on Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi.

"Bang - da da da da da da da!!!"

The barrage of gunfire and smoke created an impenetrable cordon in front of them, deterring any monsters from approaching.

The dense mass of monsters that had overwhelmed Liu Jiayi was obliterated in the blink of an eye. Tang Erda landed on one knee, his movement fluid and controlled, before rising with a stony expression.

The peculiar long-stemmed revolver in his hand folded with a metallic clatter, transforming into a standard-sized pistol in an instant. He ejected the magazine, discharged the cartridge, replaced it, and turned to Bai Liu, his gaze calm and asking what more needed to be done.

"Wow, that was faster than I thought," Bai Liu raised an eyebrow at Tang Erda. "You've cleared the factory of monsters already?"

Tang Erda, his face expressionless, responded simply: "Hmm."

As if that wasn't enough, Tang Erda added with a frown, "The factory workers and those above couldn't access the workshops without a key, so the Rose Factory wasn't fully cleared. The rest has been dealt with."

Bai Liu smiled in satisfaction. "Well done."

"Well done?" Liu Jiayi stared in disbelief at the bullet-riddled ground in front of her, then looked up at Tang Erda.

The three members of the King's Guild outside stood frozen, staring at the gun in Tang Erda's hand, their minds struggling to comprehend.

—This is a Level 3 game!

It was outrageous how casually he dispatched the monsters with such firepower.

Liu Jiayi had watched many small TV clips of league players over the past two years to learn, but she had never witnessed such devastating skills, except for Spades.

This was far beyond anything that could be summed up with four simple words.

She scanned Tang Erda up and down for the first time since entering the game, quickly calculating his stats in her mind:

—One shot from him could easily take down an S-rank monster. His attack value is definitely in the tens of thousands.

Well-trained muscles, excellent combat awareness, fast execution, timely defense, and effective team protection—his actions were like the communication of frontline data to a strategist.

Liu Jiayi was taken aback. This guy was a top league attacker who had seen hundreds of battles.

His attacking stats and fighting quality were even more impressive than many top team attackers. Liu Jiayi knew that the King's Guild's attackers would probably be helpless in front of Tang Erda.

How had Bai Liu managed to recruit such a powerhouse?

And now it seemed like Bai Liu had taken this terrifying figure under his wing!

Tang Erda's sheer presence made Liu Jiayi, who had been somewhat hostile towards him, instinctively step back and stand behind Bai Liu.

Her eyes shifted to the shortened revolver in his hand, and she asked tentatively, "Why did you change weapons after joining us outside the factory? That weapon had significantly higher attack power."

Tang Erda glanced at her indifferently. "If there's no need to clear the area quickly, a pistol is enough."

Liu Jiayi almost exploded in her mind. —That's not reasonable! The attack value of a simple A-class weapon should still be over 10,000!

No wonder this man could clear a Level 3 dungeon alone. With his strength, he could walk through the entire game.

She thought back to their earlier encounter, where she had been up against him... Liu Jiayi let out a silent sigh, glancing at Bai Liu, who was still standing confidently in front of her, smiling. Her expression shifted again to one of disbelief.

In every sense of the word, Bai Liu was an extraordinary person—unbelievably lucky to have survived an encounter with such a formidable opponent.

But with people like this on his team...

Liu Jiayi took a deep breath.

—Given the bizarre course of events in Bai Liu's case, maybe this team could actually win the league?

Having mostly cleared the factory of monsters, Bai Liu unwrapped a cloth from the trolley and placed Tawil's head gently on it.

Snow-white skin spread rapidly along the neck, and the once lifeless face began to show signs of life. Long silver eyelashes fluttered slightly, and a strange silver-blue sheen stretched down the long, curled hair, which fell to the ground. The chest, once still, began to expand gently as though a heartbeat was stirring within.

Bai Liu lowered his eyes, gazing at Tawil lying motionless on his lap. He remained still for a minute.

Then, without warning, he reached into Tawil's empty chest, as if playing a game, clenching his fist and retracting it to mimic a heartbeat, his face twisted into an eerie smile.

"Bang bang—bang bang—"

[If I cut out your heart, will it continue to beat in my hands?]

At the same time, Bai Liu's face was very close to Tawil's, mimicking the sound of a heartbeat with his mouth.

[Thump, thump, thump—like this? Is your heart beating in my palm like this?]

[If you're curious...] Tawil suddenly grabbed Bai Liu's hand and placed it over his own chest, looking up at him softly. [Touch it, and you'll know how my heart beats.]

Tawil's hand covered the back of Bai Liu's hand, and Bai Liu could feel his heartbeat.

The two stayed like that for a long time, neither pulling away, their heartbeats gradually syncing with one another.

Finally, Tawil whispered, [Is it like this?]

[It's not...] Bai Liu's throat tightened as he spoke, his voice raspy. [It's thump-thump-thump-thump-thump-thump-thump-thump...]

[Is it abnormal for me to feel like this?] Tawil asked softly.

Bai Liu turned away, trying to pull his hand back. [I don't know.]

But Tawil didn't let go. He placed his hand on Bai Liu's chest as if feeling his heartbeat, and then a soft, almost imperceptible laugh escaped Tawil. [It seems normal.]

[Your heart beats like mine.]

“What’s he doing?” Liu Jiayi watched in confusion as Bai Liu knelt on the ground, clutching the god-ranked NPC, his head bowed, making strange noises. "Even if he’s the least affected by the god-ranked NPC, he can’t keep holding it like that!"

Liu Jiayi moved forward, trying to interrupt Bai Liu’s actions. "Even if the effect is small, it's still not negligible! Tell Bai Liu to put it down and move on!"

Tang Erda held out a hand to stop her. "Wait a minute."

Liu Jiayi froze, her poison raised, ready to confront him. "What for? Are you going to drive Bai Liu crazy by holding it like that...?"

Before she could finish, she noticed the shocked expression on Tang Erda’s face.

He looked utterly stunned, staring at the scene in disbelief, repeatedly confirming what he saw before speaking in a daze.

"...It’s a mechanical repetition of actions triggered by trauma..." Tang Erda’s voice wavered, almost losing his balance. "This is a typical symptom of post-traumatic stress."

Bai Liu... had the same severe post-traumatic stress as he did.

And he hadn’t noticed at all.

The Rose Factory

Bai Liu did not linger long, soon he wrapped Tawil's body as if nothing had happened and placed it on the trolley, turned to the group behind him, with that false smile on his face that was immediately apparent to Mu Sicheng, Muke, Liu Jiayi and Tang Erda, and then whispered.

"Now, let's overthrow this sinful rose factory."

Game Hall, Graveyard Bounce Area.

No matter how hard Muke and the others tried to hold on, or how desperately they pleaded with passing spectators to give Bai Liu a like or a favorite, Bai Liu's small TV inevitably fell into the graveyard bounce area under the relentless siege of foreign guilds.

Muke, born into a privileged family, and Mu Sicheng, who had never been looked down upon, whether in real life or in-game, now abandoned their pride and faces. One by one, they tried to pull in the audience to buy time for Bai Liu.

Both men breathed a sigh of relief when the game on Bai Liu's small TV finally came to an end.

— This tug-of-war against an opponent like the King's Guild was too much for them.

But for now, they could let Bai Liu fall out of the cell once, pay the ransom, and get him back. That should be enough time for Bai Liu to make it through.

"... Empress, at this rate, Bai Liu might actually make it through..." someone muttered, their grimace pressed against the Empress's shoulder. "It's support season, two sieges and no block... this is... too much of a loss of face. Our guild's battle support will be affected..."

"It's not going to fail." Hearts crossed their arms, sweeping their gaze slowly across Bai Liu's small television. "This siege will be over soon."

The man next to him froze.

Soon, someone with excitement clearly written on their face jogged over, stopping in front of Hearts, bowing respectfully, and saying, “Empress! Our team’s [Shield] has just cleared the game and is out of the pool! Should I send him over now?”

Hearts nodded slightly. “Let him come.”

The previously worried team member’s expression changed dramatically, and he looked at Hearts incredulously before turning to the one who had brought the news, asking again, his face beaming, “Is it an official team member, [Shield] coming over?”

The player’s joy was barely contained as he nodded repeatedly. “Yes! They’re heading this way as soon as they’re out of the pool! We’re on our way!”

“When [Shield] arrives, this siege will be over immediately!”

Mu Sicheng furrowed his brow at the King’s Guild members who were starting to stir in the small TV area. “What are they shouting about? Are they losing it because they can’t stop Bai Liu?”

“I don’t think so.” Muke felt an ominous foreboding. “... They’re all laughing.”

Before Muke could ask what they were laughing at, he quickly opened the system panel and scrolled through the forum, searching for the information he needed.

Soon, a post caught his attention.

— [The King's Guild’s (Shield) has left the pool and seems to be joining the siege, Hearts has gone too far this time!]

“What is... [Shield]?” Muke asked, frowning.

Mu Sicheng also opened the forum, his expression darkening as soon as he saw the title. He quickly explained to Muke, “It’s a title within the team.”

“The regular functional roles in a league’s five-man teams are [Attack], [Shield], [Roving], [Control], and [Tactician].”

“I haven’t seen the King’s Guild play, but I’ve heard their team has a double [Control] setup. Two [Control] players, both extremely skilled —one is Hearts, and the other this year is said to be Little Witch.”

“Good [offensive] players are hard to find, and Hearts hasn’t been able to find the right rotation. The quality of [offensive] players in their squad is poor—"

Mu Sicheng raised his eyes, his gaze dark with concern. "—But to compensate, their [Shield] group is extremely strong."

The sound of heavy footsteps reached them from a distance. Muke turned, his breath momentarily catching in his throat.

A towering figure emerged, his height seemingly endless. He wore heavy brass armor on his hands and feet, with spiked anklets around his wrists that clashed and rang as he walked, making it feel as though the very dimensional space was shaking with each step.

The man had long arms and legs, effortlessly swatting aside spectators and crowds, clearing a path with the ease of brushing away small grass along a country road.

He slowly approached Hearts, who stood at the center of the small TV area. He bowed his head and placed his left hand over his heart in a salute, then dropped to one knee with a booming sound that echoed like a cannonball, causing others to kneel in response.

"Queen, Τιτν (Titan) is here."

Hearts lifted the hem of her skirt and bowed slightly in return, placing her hand on Titan's massive fingers, allowing him to kiss it awkwardly.

"Τιτν, do me a favor." Hearts turned toward Muke, who stood at the edge, and smiled faintly, eyes downcast. "Beat them, as usual."

In that moment, her smile bore an uncanny resemblance to Bai Liu's on the small TV.

Titan rose and turned to face Muke and the others. He stretched out a hand the size of a grown man's head and looked down at the retreating, wary Muke and Mu Sicheng, who stood frozen.

"Yes, my queen," Titan replied.

System Alert: Player Titan uses his personal skill (Dimensional Shield) on the entire Bai Liu small TV space area.

System Message: After using this skill, different spaces will be cut off into different time-space dimensions. Neither living nor non-living beings will be able to enter another space. Light and sound will no longer propagate, and the spaces where the skill is implemented will no longer merge under the same multidimensional space (including the game lobby).

Limitation: One Dimensional Clock.

In an instant, the entire area in front of Muke, where Bai Liu's TV had been, vanished, leaving only a dark, inaccessible orb.

The orb, pure black in color, was the size of the viewing area and filled with tiny, twinkling star-like particles, spinning as though it were a corner of the universe itself.

Muke staggered back two steps, a look of desperation hidden on his face. One Dimensional Clock, without their outside support, meant that Bai Liu would fall straight into no-man's land!

Unless Bai Liu made it through... there was nothing more they could do.

Gamblers' Club Guild, President's Office.

With his eyes closed, Charles reclined in a large, luxurious boss's chair. His hands rested loosely on the leather armrests, and his right index finger, adorned with a large, shiny diamond ring, idly tapped the armrest in a steady, dull rhythm, as though deep in thought.

Across from him, Wang Shun sat rigidly, his hands resting on his knees, leaning slightly forward—his posture a clear sign of someone in a vulnerable, pleading position.

Charles, on the other hand, seemed completely at ease. His relaxed posture alone suggested he was not taking Wang Shun's request seriously.

"President Charles," Wang Shun said, his voice rising slightly in an attempt to wake up the seemingly dozing president. "I've just shown you a few videos of Bai Liu's games. He has potential, he's strong, and he fits your criteria for a dark horse. Please, think about it!"

Charles lazily opened one eye, a flirtatious smile spreading across his face. "He does seem to fit my preferences. If you had come to me ten minutes ago, I might have been convinced. But now...?"

He sat up straight, shaking his finger from side to side. "No, no. I like dark horses, but I don't like betting on ones that have already been targeted."

The term "concealed stakes" implied that someone had already interfered with the horse before the race began—like inserting small nails into the horseshoes to sabotage its performance.

In this context, Charles saw Bai Liu as a horse with concealed stakes, thanks to the King's Guild.

Charles sifted through the information Wang Shun had given him about Bai Liu, lightly caressing the young man's face on the paper before tossing it into the trash beneath his desk.

"I won't tell your boss, Hearts, that one of her inner circle came to me promoting a newcomer," Charles said with a smirk. "But you've wasted... what, thirty-dimensional minutes trying to convince me to take on a player who's already on a downward spiral?"

He checked his diamond-encrusted watch and continued, "My time is precious, and you've spent it rather freely. You'll have to pay a price for that."

Raising his eyes to Wang Shun, Charles grabbed the civilized cane resting by the leg of his chair and stood up unsteadily. He walked up behind Wang Shun, who was hunched at the waist, and placed his gloved hands on the man's shoulders, sliding them down his back in a way that was both unsettling and ambiguous.

"No one comes to me and leaves empty-handed," Charles said, his tone teasing. "Give me some information, my lovely Mr. Pepsi."

The staff of civilization, now wrapped around Wang Shun's neck, was gradually constricting, causing Wang Shun to feel the pressure building in his windpipe. Despite the urge to tear at the cane, he controlled himself. He knew if he reacted violently, this would be his last day alive.

Charles hated when people touched his prized accessories—diamond watches, rings, and especially his custom-made civilized cane, crafted from rare wood.

Wang Shun's face reddened as he struggled for breath, his eyes starting to bulge. He leaned back in his chair, trying to alleviate the pressure on his throat.

"You won’t regret investing in Bai Liu..." Wang Shun gasped. "I know the prophecy of the Adversary of the Cross regarding Bai Liu—"

Suddenly, the staff of civilization was jerked away, and Wang Shun gasped for air, clutching his throat as he coughed violently.

Charles took a silk scarf from his pocket, delicately wiped the staff, and tossed it aside. He turned his gaze to Wang Shun, now more thoughtful.

"The Reverse God? The guy who was third in the overall standings? His original name was..." Charles mused.

"[Judge against the Gods]," Wang Shun interjected. "He changed his name to [Reverse God] after transferring from the sixth guild, [Deer Hunter], to the first guild, [Killer Sequence], this year."

Charles gave a brief, nonchalant look at Wang Shun. "His skill is [Prophecy], right?"

Wang Shun nodded. "More specifically, it's called [Listening to Only the Words of God]. I managed to scope out a prophecy about Bai Liu earlier."

Charles gestured toward Wang Shun with his civilized staff, its tip resting gently over his chest as he smiled innocently. "I’d love to hear more."

The Rose Factory

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Wang Shun shifted his chair back slightly, putting some distance between his heart and the tip of Charles' civilizing staff. He spoke carefully, "I see a fragmented psalm."

"Scattered psalms?" Charles raised an eyebrow subtly. "That's not really the prophetic style of the concise [Reverse God]. What kind of poem is it?"

Wang Shun took a deep breath, cleared his throat, and began.

"The evil god boasts that there will be people drifting in his shadow,
The Man in the Shadows is fourteen years old.
Then the evil god gave him the spine, the heart, and the emblem of the gods.
It boasts that this person will be its only believer,
The man in the shadow is twenty-four years old.
Then the evil gods fell on the snowy plains, and the souls of the faithful drifted into the deep.
The spine, the heart, and the divine emblem are all broken,
The changing of the evil gods.
The man in the shadow is thirty years old.
He wanders, he wanders, and the clown crouches before him and asks the shadowed man, with a smile, where he has returned.
The man in the shadow says that when the sun is three-quarters gone, someone from the past will come looking for me, cold and stiff.
If you are already stiff and dead, says the Joker, I will crush your soul and let you fall in the snow with the gods.
The man in the shadow is forty-one years old.
God dies, and he lives, for evil lives forever."

After finishing, Wang Shun swallowed nervously and glanced at Charles with anxious eyes. "You can test me with the scales; I'm not making this up. Some of the Earth Fang Ke energy is a little hazy, but this is what I saw from the [Inquisitor of the Reverse God]."

"I don't doubt you," Charles replied, retracting his civilizing staff and glancing at Wang Shun. "I do suspect, however, that this prophecy you speak of is about Bai Liu. Such vague poetry can be interpreted in many ways, and I could just as easily claim it refers to someone else."

Charles leaned back, eyes narrowing slightly. "You say this prophecy is about Bai Liu—do you have any other proof?"

Wang Shun fell silent for a long moment, letting out a helpless sigh. "No... there's nothing more."

"So, you can't actually tell if this prophecy is about Bai Liu, can you?" Charles said, casually sitting down at his desk and crossing his legs. "So, you lied to me to convince me to invest in Bai Liu?"

Wang Shun opened his mouth and admitted, "Yes."

Charles gave a sly smile. "It's not very wise to lie in front of me, Mr. Pepsi, especially to a gambler who's ten times better at it than you are." He raised Wang Shun's bowed head with his civilizing cane, clearly satisfied. "But I did like the lie you just told—it sounds like something that could have fooled a whole lot of ignorant and impulsive gamblers into betting on Bai Liu. A rather gambler-worthy lie."

Wang Shun looked at Charles in dismay.

"Bai Liu? I'm invested," Charles said nonchalantly, pulling his civilizing staff down into a bouquet of roses and handing it to the still-dazed Wang Shun.

Wang Shun took the flowers with a confused look. "So, President Charles, what do we do now?"

Charles jumped off the table, adjusting his lapel. "Now?" He smiled brightly. "We get into full regalia for our dark horse, who's running toward the finish line in a field of roses."

Charles looked at Wang Shun in his chair, shook his head in slight disapproval, then pulled the civilizing staff, now a rose, from his chest. With a swift movement, he turned it back into a wooden stick, now only about thirty centimeters long—almost resembling a magic wand.

"You look a bit too plain for a future publicity spokesman and oracle for the Bai Liu Warriors, Mr. Pepsi," Charles commented, nudging his "wand" at Wang Shun's plaid shirt and jeans—typical programmer attire.

"It's hard to convince people with a look like that—especially when you come from a championship team."

Wang Shun still hadn't responded. "What propaganda spokesman and oracle?"

Charles explained politely, "Simply put, you're a tool who'll trick people into betting and voting for the Bai Liu Warriors." He waved his wand, and suddenly, Wang Shun vanished.

Charles eyed Wang Shun, now covering his bottom half, and whistled, raising an eyebrow. "Nice body."

"Why are you able to change my appearance settings at will?!" Wang Shun was dumbfounded, still too afraid to remove his hand from his key area.

With another flick of his wand, Wang Shun spun in place, his outfit changing entirely. He now wore a delicate polka dot bow tie, a three-piece suit with a waistcoat, taupe trousers with suspenders, his hair slicked back, and brown leather shoes with exactly five centimeters of white cotton socks showing.

"This set is for your reference. I prefer a retro style, I hope you like it." Charles put away his staff and gestured for Wang Shun to follow him. "Now, go and build up the momentum for our new battle group."

Wang Shun scrambled to catch up. The clothes, despite fitting, were a bit tight for him, and he struggled to move comfortably in them. "How do we build momentum? Bai Liu seems stuck in dimensional space by the King's Guild, who sent out a [shield] and trapped him in [No Man's Land]. He won't be able to escape!"

"If he falls into [No Man's Land], it'll be tough for Bai Liu to gain the general audience's vote—he won't even be able to sign up."

Charles thought for a moment, then said, "If Bai Liu falls into [No Man's Land], he may struggle to escape." His face darkened. "But I don't see falling into [No Man's Land] as a bad thing."

A meaningful smile curled Charles' lips. "I seem to remember Bai Liu has just won a small guild, only around five hundred members."

Wang Shun's face fell. "President Charles, even you can't do anything?"

"But I don't think it's a bad thing," Charles said, his voice more thoughtful. "I remember the Masons of Paradise. The association of all beggars, built on players who escaped from [No Man's Land]."

Wang Shun's eyes widened in realization, horror creeping into his expression. "You don't think you want to... But that would cost tens of millions of points!"

Charles gave a light chuckle. "I'm not short on money. I'm the richest player in this game." His smile deepened. "It's the thrill of gambling that excites me. And what better way to gamble than in the system's once-a-year league?"

"Besides, I'm not going to let the guild I'm betting on be as poor as the Paradise Masons. A few tens of millions of points is nothing for a bold upfront investment in a dark horse." Charles said carelessly.

"A few tens of millions of points..." Wang Shun staggered, still trying to process what Charles had just said.

In-game.

The stragglers trailed Bai Liu as he led them deeper into the Rose Factory.

They found themselves stuck at the door of a room that resembled Heretic 0001. This room also served as the access point to the processing site inside the factory.

A violent breakthrough was possible for Tang Erda, but given that Tawil's heart was hanging from a pipe attached to the wall, there was a high risk of tearing it apart. As a result, Tang Erda halted at the door, refraining from pushing further.

However, the key to the door was in the hands of a factory worker hiding inside, and there was no way to open it without forcing their way through.

Tang Erda looked at Bai Liu. "How do we get in?"

Bai Liu smiled, holding up a bottle of the original perfume. "It's simple—remember that test?" He dripped the perfume onto the door. "Let the heart open the door for me."

During the test, Tawil's heart had reacted violently to just a drop of the original perfume, shaking the suspended glass cabinet. Now, Bai Liu poured the entire bottle.

—In less than a second, the entire room began to tremble and roar.

The sound of mechanical pipes breaking and tearing was accompanied by panicked voices and frantic footsteps from within, spilling out through the door.

"The heart's beating too fast!!!"
"Open the floodgates—!!!"
"It's too late—the whole glass cabinet blew up!!!"
"Ahhh..."

After the glass shattered, Bai Liu closed his eyes, holding his breath against the cold steel door amidst the chaos.

—Then he heard it. The violent pounding of a heart.

Bang-bang-bang-bang-bang-bang-bang-bang—!

It was the same heartbeat as Bai Liu’s.

The light pink rose liquid seeped through the door, and the door began to bulge, distorting outward from the excess liquid and gas. The locking ring shook and twisted, finally collapsing with a loud crash.

A tsunami of raw liquid and scent flooded out of the room.

Bai Liu, standing closest to the door, was drenched from head to toe in the blood-like liquid. He lifted his wet lashes, gazing into the room.

Leaking, crumbling cooling pipes sprayed blood in all directions. Glass shards lay on the floor, soaked in the pink-tinted gas and translucent liquid. A nuisance of purple-blue sparks crackled along nearby pipes, close to an electric switch.

Amidst the chaos, the heart hung in the center of the room like a long-awaited, ripe, bright red fruit, beating steadily—thump, thump, thump, thump—as if reminding Bai Liu that if he didn't take it now, it would explode when the time came.

Bai Liu stepped forward, tilting his head, and plucked the heart from its place. The wet, pulsing organ throbbed in his hand as though it might escape.

The heart's beat quickened, doubling in speed with the drop of the original liquid.

Bai Liu tightened his grip, holding the heart firmly, a smile tugging at his lips.

—So, this is what it feels like to hold Xie Ta's heart in your hands.

Very—very wonderful.

What is it like to place a heart back into a person’s chest?

Tang Erda had never witnessed such a bizarre, unfathomable scene—whether in reality or in the game.

And then there was Bai Liu, the mastermind behind it all, wearing that peculiar smile that made Tang Erda want to pull out his gun and arrest him on the spot.

It was as if the heart had been dug out by Bai Liu’s own hands.

The ribs were pressed inward, the heart shielded by the lobes of the lungs, the pectoralis major muscle sealed tightly at the point of attachment. Finally, the skin was perfectly smooth—white and healthy—as if nothing had ever happened to the body lying before Bai Liu. The chest rose and fell slightly.

The lashes fluttered ever so slightly.

"Let’s go," Bai Liu said, having successfully reassembled Tawil. Liu Jiayi took several cautious steps back. "It’s going to wake up soon, and it’ll be worse for us if we stay."

The group exited the room in the same practiced manner as they had entered, thoughtfully closing the door behind them, leaving space for Bai Liu and the soon-to-awaken Tawil.

Bai Liu leaned against the broken frame of the glass cabinet and, in an unusual moment of calm, opened his system panel. After paying for the mute service on his small TV, he turned to face Tawil, locking eyes with him as he began speaking to himself.

"I know you’re awake, Xie Ta."

Tawil’s eyelashes fluttered twice but still didn’t open.

Bracing his arms on either side of Tawil, Bai Liu crouched down closer. His eyes stayed fixed on Tawil’s face, the two of them nearing nose-to-nose.

"You can even pretend like that, can you?" Bai Liu placed one hand at the back of Tawil's neck, lifting it slightly. He lowered his gaze to Tawil's pale, lustreless lips, a gesture as if he were about to kiss them.

"Pretend again, and I'll have to do something even worse to you," Bai Liu whispered.

Just before he leaned in to kiss, Tawil finally raised his hand to cover Bai Liu's lips. He lifted his eyes, meeting Bai Liu's familiar silvery-blue ones, his expression calm as he returned the question.

"Didn't you ask me to do this to you when we first reunited?"

"Is this too much?" Tawil sat up straight and moved closer to Bai Liu.

Bai Liu immediately distanced himself, turning his face to the side. He took two deep breaths before turning back to question Tawil calmly, "You remember me, then why did you pretend not to know me when we first met?"

Thinking back to when he had asked Xie Ta to kiss him upon their reunion, Bai Liu pinched his palm, forcing a shameless facade to remain intact.

Was there anything more awkward than not remembering your best friend and, when you finally meet, asking them to kiss you like you were drunk?

And here he was, standing before a fully naked Xie Ta.

Bai Liu struggled to keep his focus on Tawil's face.

Tawil stared back, seemingly unaware of any wrongdoing. "You didn't remember me, so I politely introduced myself, and we got reacquainted."

"Then why did you pretend you weren't awake?" Bai Liu pretended to absentmindedly remove his protective suit to cover Tawil's lower half. His tone returned to normal, calm but pressing. "What are you so vain about?"

Tawil paused in silence before responding earnestly, "I'm not sure why, but I sense that you're angry."

Bai Liu smirked, crossing his arms over his chest, and gave Tawil a sideways glance. "Do you? I don't think so."

Tawil: "....."

"I’m sorry." Tawil apologized quickly.

Just as Bai Liu was about to tell him there was no need to apologize, Tawil leaned in, embraced him, and whispered softly in his ear, "Maybe you're really angry now. It’s a little out of place, but I'm really happy."

"You’ve finally remembered me," Tawil said. "I thought you had forgotten me on purpose because you were afraid."

Bai Liu’s shoulders slumped slightly as he lazily whispered, "So what exactly do you have to fear from me?"

"Everything—my rotting right hand and tail, bound in a church as a blood-sucking prayer symbol, my dismembered body, and my disembodied heart that kept beating even after I left it." Tawil’s voice was icy and clear, but it fell on Bai Liu’s ears like water—soft and warm. "I’m glad you're not afraid of me, even if you don’t remember me."

"I’ve missed you."

Tawil buried his face deep into Bai Liu’s shoulder and hugged him tightly, his voice reverent. "Every time I wake up, you’re the first person I see, and slumber isn’t scary anymore."

Bai Liu’s pupils contracted slightly when Tawil said [I miss you].

His hands opened slowly, placing them gently on Tawil’s shoulders, returning the embrace in kind.

Bai Liu wasn’t used to such intimacy, but Xie Ta was an exception. They had shared a long history together—so familiar that they were indistinguishable, two monsters pretending to be human, surviving on the fragile emotional bond they shared.

But it had been too long since they had truly known each other. Ten years since Bai Liu lost his memories, and countless cycles of unbearable torment for Tawil.

Since their separation, distance had irrevocably alienated them, and they never recovered that familiarity.

Time—those long, painful years—was worse than distance, worse than life and death. It made every reunion feel more distant than the first time they met.

One party forgot, the other condoned it, leaving them strangers.

If Bai Liu's memories of Xie Ta's death haunted him, Tawil wished to be the only one to remember forever. Even if it meant starting over each time they met, he felt no pain in doing so.

But when Bai Liu saw Xie Ta's silvery-blue eyes, the past returned like a bird finding its way home, resting on Tawil's shoulder. The old connection, the friend Bai Liu had finally pieced back together, settled into his heart, bringing with it that familiar warmth.

The next moment, Bai Liu stood before him. Xie Ta gazed at him in silent stillness, his silver-blue eyes spilling moonlight.

The look was light, ethereal, beautiful—like a god seeing another god descend.

—And that was the look Tawil had just given him.

Bai Liu parted his lips, his voice soft and almost breathless.

"I… miss you too."

Bai Liu closed his eyes, allowing himself to be consumed by the intoxicating scent of roses that radiated from Tawil. He took Tawil's hand in his, his voice tinged with a distinct smile.

"I've been thinking about you since the moment I remembered you."

Chapter End Notes

I love them so much!!!!!!

Tawil closed his eyes. "Me too."

"You have a choice to make." In an unexpected turn of events, Tawil released Bai Liu, resting his forehead against him, and asked softly, "Antidote or poison?"

Bai Liu's hand curled in defeat.

Tawil looked at him calmly, his silver-blue eyes like a mirror placed beneath water, reflecting Bai Liu's emotionless face as ripples shimmered on the surface.

He spoke again, "You should know what the antidote is. Make your choice."

Bai Liu's eyes momentarily seemed empty, his thoughts drifting far away as his gaze met Tawil's.

In the old orphanage library, oil-stained old poems were spread across Xie Ta's lap on a summer afternoon. Sunlight streamed through his hair, casting a grid-like pattern through the dense branches of a tree, illuminating the yellowed, worn pages of a book.

The air was dusty and hot. The library's bay window was half-open, offering a view of the untouched green grass, while the pond glistened like fish scales under the scorching sun, a million diamonds reflecting on the water.

Bai Liu, uninterested in reading, drowsily covered his face with a book and slouched on his hands, his collar damp with sweat from the oppressive heat.

He couldn't quite recall what offense had led them here, but they were tasked with cleaning the library—something common to both Bai Liu and Xie Ta.

Fortunately, it was a small library, and Xie Ta wasn't in a hurry. He sat quietly by the window sill, flipping through dusty old books and reading softly.

"How can I compare you to summer?

You are not only cuter and gentler than he is...

But your long summer will never fade...

Or death boasts that you are adrift in his shadow.

As you grow with the times in immortal poetry.

As long as there are human beings, or people with eyes, for one day

The gods will endure and give you life."

Bai Liu was finally roused by Xie Ta's chanting. He removed the book from his face, but his eyes didn't open lazily. "Stop reading and tampering with other people's poems."

"The original line is [this poem will live on and give you life]," Xie Ta said without irritation, meeting Bai Liu's gaze with a look that seemed to take him in. "I'm not very good at writing poetry, but I see you in this poem."

"This poem suits you."

Bai Liu mentally processed the love poem, pretending to roll over and avoid looking at Xie Ta. After a moment, he spoke again.

"Don't just pick a random poem and flirt with me."

"No random poem," Xie Ta said unhurriedly. "Your long summer will never fade. This is the poem that describes your future. Someone will tell you."

"My future? What about you?" Bai Liu rolled onto his back and raised an eyebrow in a prickly manner. "So only my long summer will never fade, huh?"

It was a joke, but that day Xie Ta fell silent for a long time before looking up at him, his voice soft as a falling leaf.

"I don't have a summer."

He exhaled gently. "I just... secretly shared your summer."

Xie Ta gazed out the window at the lush summer landscape. "This summer is indeed lovely and gentle, the most beautiful summer I've ever seen, but these... they're not for me."

"I will always leave."

At the end of that summer, Xie Ta disappeared into the depths of the pool.

And at the Rose Factory, at the beginning of summer, the roses bloomed in May, just in time for their first round of flowering.

The moment Tawil let go, Bai Liu sensed something. He instinctively grabbed Tawil's wrist and looked at him calmly. "You're leaving again, aren't you?"

"We will be reunited." Tawil gently lifted his other hand to stroke Bai Liu's eyelids and face. "This is not your summer and roses. I will not stay here, and neither should you."

Tawil's cold hands seemed to touch Bai Liu's skin like snow on his face.

"When the sun is three-quarters gone, the deceased will come to seek the cold and stiff; fear not the separation that death brings, fear not the broken reverse cross in the snowy plain."

"Don't fear living, or dying because of me." Tawil took Bai Liu's head in his arms and leaned down to kiss his wet, rose-scented, broken hair. "Don't fear me leaving you for the summer."

"I am a fallen god without a summer, but I have a whole winter waiting for you."

"Now make your choice, antidote or poison." Tawil lowered his slender, snow-colored eyelashes as he held Bai Liu, who remained still, burying his head in Tawil's arms. Tawil gently stroked the dripping ends of Bai Liu's hair. "Whatever choice you make—"

"You're all going to leave, aren't you?" Bai Liu asked in a muffled voice.

Tawil was quiet, answering truthfully, "Yes."

Bai Liu froze, but Tawil felt Bai Liu's hands tighten around his waist and stomach—it was exactly the same as when he was a child.

Tawil suddenly wanted to laugh.

When faced with a situation he didn't want to confront—when he was angry with another child or a teacher, or when he refused to acknowledge a difference—fourteen-year-old Bai Liu would feign indifference, even making sarcastic remarks.

But when no one was looking, the thin Bai Liu would sneak back and hug the long, patchy, ghostly figure of a doll, burying himself in it and releasing his emotions—just like this position now.

"But no matter what choice you have to make..." Tawil stroked away the strands of hair pressed against Bai Liu's ear, lowering his head close to whisper in his ear. "You will always be the most important to me."

"Whatever I have to go through, I will definitely, definitely come to see you."

Bai Liu slowly propped himself up from Tawil's arms and sat up, staring at him—finally recalling why he had avoided looking people directly in the eye until he was fourteen, but only since then.

Because Xie Ta had said: [Don't look at me directly, I have scary eyes.]

Bai Liu teased him wistfully: [But how would you know I'm talking to you if I don't look at you? What if I'm talking to someone else, and you think I'm talking to you? Wouldn't that be awkward for you?]

Xie Ta had been silent for a moment, then replied: [But then I can pretend that, when you're talking to everyone else, I can tell myself that you're talking to me, no matter who you're looking at.]

Bai Liu remembered Xie Ta saying this to him as he lowered his head, shielding his eyes, his lips pressed together.

—Just like now.

"Don't say things like that while you're leaving." Bai Liu stroked Tawil's hair from his forehead and smiled, almost complaining. "While giving me that look, as if you're more reluctant to leave than I am."

Bai Liu, ten years ago, had said: [You don't have to pretend anymore. Essentially, you're the only one I talk to, and you're the only one who actually listens to every word I say.]

[So, whoever I'm talking to is actually talking to you, and I'll always look you in the eye when I speak.]

[I don't think you're scary.]

Ten years later, Bai Liu said: "I won't fear your death anymore; after all, death is the worst thing that can happen to a human."

"And you're not going to die, no matter who gives you this—whether it's a god or a demon, whether people see you as a monster god or something else—to me, you're just Xie Ta, and I'm glad you're going to stay alive."

"I don't think you're scary."

Bai Liu paused for a moment before continuing calmly, "The poison is the dried leaf rose that grows from your body, and the antidote is the blood lingzhi that flows through your veins, right?"

Bai Liu had realized what the antidote was when he saw that the diary was linked to the orphanage.

The Blood Reiki item was described as stopping all negative effects, likely including the addictive state caused by the dried leaf rose. And since the factory owner had purchased the idol from the orphanage, it was possible Tawil's body still contained the essence of Blood Reiki within him.

However, it had been fragmented, preventing the formation of connected blood vessels and organs, so it couldn't produce the blood needed to sustain the blood lingzhi.

The factory manager should have known this, but he was beyond control.

It was clear that the [poison], more concentrated and addictive—rose perfume—was far more appealing to Tawil than the [antidote] that would save him from himself.

His inability to stop craving the rose perfume, let alone reintegrate the heart and restore Tawil to his full form, had ultimately doomed him.

The game's principle was clear—after discovering the core secrets of the Rose Factory, two paths lay before the player.

One was to continue using Tawil to cultivate dried leaf roses for the production of rose perfume.

The other was to feed on Tawil's blood, as those investors in the third copy had done, allowing the thorny blood primrose to grow through his body, offering salvation for everyone.

The smooth, thornless roots of the dried leaf rose complemented the thorny, rose-like branches of the blood primrose—two plants, created as a complementary, mutually restraining pair.

"You're running away, aren't you?" Tawil asked Bai Liu. "Because you don't want to choose either path."

"But there's no escaping it—you must realize that this game has been designed from the start, and you're forced to choose between these two paths."

"The man is pushing you to choose—save the world by torturing me, or make me feel better by letting the world suffer."

Bai Liu knew.

He'd known from the moment he entered the game—someone was forcing Tawil to be tortured by Bai Liu.

The Rose Factory

Someone was forcing Bai Liu to do to Tawil what the investors, the factory manager, had done to him—and then forcing him to become the person he was supposed to be.

Bai Liu didn't want to do it, but he had no choice. He needed to take a gamble.

But this was something Tawil would never allow.

The moment this solution crossed Bai Liu's mind, he quickly bowed his head.

Tawil knew him too well. Bai Liu could hardly hide his thoughts from this man. All he could do was furrow his brow and pretend to think, before giving the only answer he could: "...The antidote. I have no other choice. I've already made a deal with someone else."

"Then only my blood will do." Tawil held out his hand. A tiny, thorny vine, blood-streaked, threaded its way through the green veins beneath his pale wrist, and the bright red blood immediately began to spill down the sides of his wrist.

The vine greedily wrapped itself around the path where the blood had flowed, growing wildly. It spread inward in bundles over Tawil's arm, sharp black thorns piercing his porcelain-white skin, and soon, more blood poured from the hole-like wounds.

Tawil's face grew pale as the vines twisted around him, and his breath slowed from the blood loss, which dripped from his fingertips as he held Bai Liu.

"I... need a container for the blood," Tawil said haltingly, his eyelids drooping. "Like a baptismal font."

Bai Liu's eyes scanned the room, settling on a glass display case with an opening at the top.

Tawil moved toward it, consciously sliding into the replacement glass cabinet the factory workers had prepared for his heart—still intact, unbroken, and about as long as Tawil was tall enough to lie in.

The blood silently seeped out, soon soaking the backs of Tawil's hands on either side of the glass case.

The scene mirrored that of Xie Ta lying in the baptismal font in the church.

Bai Liu instinctively turned his face away, standing up and turning his back to the scene.

His breathing quickened involuntarily, his hands fidgeting as he grew closer to Tawil. The aroma overwhelmed him, causing his mental state to dip, bringing him to the edge of hallucination.

Many mixed voices began to flood his mind.

[He's in pain! Can't you see he's in pain? Are you a monster? Don't you have any feelings? Stop it!]

[Do you know how much pain he's in? Why are you torturing him? Can someone like you ever have someone who matters most?]

[Are you incapable of empathizing with others?]

[He really is a monster, isn't he?]

[Bai Liu, your mental state isn't right. You need to see a psychiatrist...]

[Severe traumatic stress syndrome. Subconsciously repeating stereotypical actions when encountering a traumatic scene...]

[Bai Liu, why are you afraid of the water? You're not afraid of the water at all. You're afraid of seeing the body in the water. Do you remember who he is?]

[Really, Xie Ta died for you!]

[Some people with PTSD aren't experiencing the hurt themselves but are so empathic they imagine the pain in others to alleviate their guilt...]

[If only I were the one being tortured, the one hurting, the one dying... If only I could replace Su Yang...]

Everything in Bai Liu's head went haywire.

Through a narrow slit in the curtain, he saw Xie Ta, submerged in the baptismal pool, drops of blood hanging from the hair framing his face.

From start to finish, Bai Liu's childhood fantasies had always been about Xie Ta—being called a monster by children, being rejected and punished by teachers, being baptized and locked up alone in church, drowned again and again in the baptismal font, unable to escape the orphanage. All of them, Xie Ta. Not Bai Liu. Xie Ta.

Why had Bai Liu become the one experiencing this in his lost memories?

Bai Liu's breath caught, a tingling sensation spreading across his skin, as though some vine had burrowed beneath it.

He pressed a hand to his neck, feeling a sharp pain in his veins, like thorns piercing him—yet nothing was there.

Tawil's neck was pierced by a thick vine, and his breath slowed. His long hair hung in the blood, tangled with the vine.

Bai Liu began to feel unsteady on his feet, as if every bone in his body were sprouting spikes, with each breath causing sharp pain as his muscles contracted and were sliced open. He swayed, almost collapsing.

But in reality, there was nothing wrong with Bai Liu's body. It was all just an illusion, a vivid and overwhelming illusion.

These illusions, created by Bai Liu's subconscious, were causing him and Tawil to experience the same pain.

Tawil's voice broke through the haze: "Are you leaving?"

"What are you going to do?" he asked.

Tawil's calm voice helped steady Bai Liu.

Bai Liu clutched the cooling pipe and took two deep breaths, trying to clear his muddled thoughts, before replying: "Tell the others I found [the antidote]."

"Lying." Tawil's voice was soft. "Bai Liu, you never look me in the face when you lie."

His tone was gentle, as it had been when they first met in the church: "Would you like to tell me what you're leaving me to do?"

-- [Would you like to read a book with me?]

Like a malfunctioning robot, Bai Liu's body was controlled by some unknown consciousness. He turned around stiffly to face Tawil, who was sitting up in the pool of blood.

Tawil was covered in thorns, but still focused, his eyes not meeting Bai Liu's. He had pin-sized wounds all over his body, yet wore a faint smile.

Bai Liu's pupils constricted before widening.

...It was the body of Xie Ta, covered in pinholes, beside the pond, with an exhausted Bai Liu kneeling next to him, unable to perform CPR after who knows how long.

Bai Liu's eyes glazed over in confusion, and he leaned in close to Xie Ta's lifeless body. Clenching his fist against Xie Ta's chest, he gently opened and closed it, mimicking the sound of a heartbeat.

"Bang... bang... bang..."

"Doesn't it make your heart beat faster? Why isn't it even skipping a beat now..."

"Dance for me..."

The words of the psychiatrist who had seen Bai Liu several times echoed in his mind.

[...By your friend's words, you're severely PTSD, sort of a visual scar type. You need to self-regulate...]

[But your personality is so extreme that if you encounter a similar scenario again, your reaction will be overwhelming—you'll do everything to prevent it from happening again, even substituting yourself for the other person...]

"What are you going to do, Bai Liu?" Tawil's silvery blue eyes locked onto him.

Bai Liu's fingers twitched, summoning a deck of cards—the A of Hearts.

He opened his mouth, finally speaking: "I'm going to look for a mirror."

[Liu Jiayi, can this A of Hearts completely transform a person into another, including their blood and everything?]

[Why are you asking this? If you can find the presence of the other person in your heart and get close to them, a skill card like blood composition for a basic transformation is doable.]

[What about characteristics? Blood regeneration, death tolerance?]

[What is this? Who are you going to turn into? Who has someone this important to them? Blood regeneration, death tolerance... sounds like...]

[It's like a monster.]

"What's the point of looking for a mirror?" Tawil asked.

"Let me see myself." Bai Liu replied.

[Yes, who has someone this important to them, to turn into such a monster?]

[Wow, Bai Liu, you look disgusting! You just laughed so strangely!]

"Why do you want to see yourself?" Tawil asked.

Bai Liu dropped his head and calmly looked at his reflection in the puddle on the ground, mesmerized by the ripples like roses on the water's surface, his face devoid of emotion.

A long silence passed while the heart at the center of the A of Hearts card he held spun rapidly.

The person in the heart soon shifted from Su Yang to someone else.

Bai Liu's hair grew longer, his limbs became sculpted and perfect, his body covered in pinholes, his neck pierced with thorns. He was bathed in blood, his long silver-blue eyelashes falling, light pink rose liquid mixed with blood dripping from his jaws. His eyelashes and curly hair cascaded down his back.

"Because this time... I want to be the monster being tortured." Bai Liu said.

The Rose Factory

Liu Jiayi and her party stood outside the closed door.

She frowned as she watched the raw rose liquid dripping from the doorway. The color darkened gradually, eventually taking on a blood-like brilliance.

Liu Jiayi wrinkled her nose. Beneath the light rose aroma of the liquid, she could detect an unpleasant scent—one of blood and mushrooms. It reminded her of the last instance she had encountered.

...The last instance. In a flash of realization, Liu Jiayi thought of the Blood Lingzhi, the monster book reward from The Loving Welfare Institute.

She hadn't been able to obtain the monster book reward for the orphanage herself, so there had been no Blood Lingzhi.

Liu Jiayi hadn't considered the Blood Lingzhi before; it seemed too outrageous. But as soon as she smelled it, she understood what Bai Liu had meant when he referred to an antidote.

—It's the Blood Lingzhi.

Then there were the strange questions Bai Liu had asked her about the Hearts A skill card... she couldn't even begin to imagine what he intended to do.

Liu Jiayi sighed deeply, feeling the headache of a war party member who typically dealt with fools. She swatted away the stragglers in front of her, sprayed herself with enough rose perfume to dull her senses, and removed her visualization prop before heading toward the door.

—The greatest strength of the God-level NPC's alienation attack was his eyes. If she couldn't see them, she hoped it would slow the effect of the alienation.

But as soon as Liu Jiayi lifted her foot to move, countless thorny vines spilled out of the doorway, as though they had been waiting for her.

The vines, like creepers, rapidly spread along the narrow corridor of the Rose Factory, transforming the tunnel into a dense, primeval jungle. The vines stretched as far as the eye could see, their thick spikes growing in clusters like the teeth of a vampire still feeding, sucking the blood-colored liquid from the ground and rapidly growing larger.

Dark red fluorescent dots gathered around the spikes, pulsing like a heartbeat, as if ready to explode at any moment.

"What's going on?" Tang Erda asked, her voice tense. She pulled out her gun and aimed at the expanding spikes. "This isn't a dry leaf rose plant. What did Bai Liu do?"

Liu Jiayi placed the visualization prop back on her head and glanced up at the closed door. "He did what he always wanted to do."

Tang Erda froze.

The tightly closed door burst open with a surge of vines, and Tang Erda turned to look inside.

At the center of the room, her breath caught as she saw the core of the growing and spreading canes.

In the transparent display case filled with blood, two figures lay intertwined, leaning against one another. Spiked canes protruded from their bodies in a steady stream, yet they embraced as if they felt no pain. They seemed at peace, immersed in the warm blood, as if frozen in a moment of eternal sleep.

A red-stained Hearts A playing card floated atop the blood.

The spikes burst brilliantly, their dark red points of light drifting away, floating through the deep, dark corridors and towards the distant daylight—towards the 16,000 acres of flower fields, where old friends were buried.

The rose's inner trousseau was devoid of nourishment, and the dreamy pale pink sky withered as the gods departed. The sixteen thousand thoughts, shredded and hidden, briefly reappeared as the sun reached the threshold of summer. Then, like petals falling into dust, they dissipated.

The gale trampled the delicate stamens of early summer. The period of summer lease was not too short, and the sun burned with the intensity of an eye left by the gods.

The 16,000 acres of roses, which had once turned the world upside down, began to fade. But your long summer would never fade.

—It was a summer even the gods had praised for its beauty.

---------- ----

In the game lobby, a small TV area that had been left vacant by Titan's skill flickered twice before suddenly reappearing.

Mu Sicheng and Muke, who had been waiting nearby, jumped to their feet. Mu Sicheng checked the time—far from a dimensional clock, but it seemed this King's Guild player was out...

He and Muke shared a growing sense of foreboding.

Titan emerged from the small TV area with a ground-shaking stride. His lanky arms were flattened, and a lazy, lip-smacking, yawning Hearts rested on his shoulder.

Seeing Muke and Mu Sicheng in her path, Hearts closed her eyes for a moment, then opened them, swinging her gaze between the two. She suddenly flashed a soft, knowing smile.

"Staring at me with hatred isn't going to help," she said, her smile still warm, her eyes soft. "Now, go rummage around in no-man's land. You might even find your boss."

"Of course," she continued, her grin deepening, "if you can’t find him, and if Bai Liu doesn’t make it out alive... and you don’t know where Fang Ke went..." Hearts lazily extended a hand to Muke, "The doors of the King's Guild are always open to promising players like you."

Muke quickly pulled Mu Sicheng, who was about to lash out, back and took a deep breath to steady his emotions.

Muke's face had gone completely white the moment he heard the words, "Bai Liu won't make it out alive," as though all color had drained from him. He looked like a porcelain doll about to break.

Though he knew Hearts was probably fishing with her comments, Muke couldn't ignore the sinking feeling in his chest. The disappearance of Bai Liu made his mind race, and he knew panic would only make things worse. If he panicked now, everything they had done to help Bai Liu would be lost.

Muke pulled Mu Sicheng, whose eyes were red and filled with anger, by the back of the neck. He closed his eyes, took a deep breath, and turned to face the guild members behind him. With a perfect smile, he spoke calmly.

"Gentlemen, we've just scored a stage victory."

The anxious team members and Mu Sicheng both looked at him, confused and questioning. Muke smiled demurely, still maintaining his composure, and continued.

"Is Bai Liu the most important person in this guild? No, the most important person is you. Bai Liu is just an agent—it's optional. Anyone can take his place. The real strength of this guild lies with you. You are the core, the heart of the guild. You are the most important."

Muke's tone remained calm as he recounted, "And now, you've proven your power. With Bai Liu's unimportant presence, you've managed to shake the King's Guild and force them to send one of their strongest players to stop you. Isn't that a victory? Isn't that a win?"

The guild members exchanged uncertain glances, unsure about Muke's logic but finding themselves drawn in by the force of his words.

"All we have to do now is never give up and ride it out," Muke added, his smile radiating calm confidence. "We've already won half the battle. All we need to do is find Bai Liu in no-man's land, and we'll have won!"

Finding someone in No Man's Land seemed impossible, but Muke made it sound achievable with just a little more time and effort.

Mu Sicheng leaned in close to Muke's ear and, in a low voice, reminded him, "There's no telling how many small, scrapped TVs there are in No Man's Land. With all of us together, we wouldn't be able to find them in ten years."

"Then we'll look for twenty years," Muke replied quietly, his smile never faltering. He glanced at Mu Sicheng with a fiery look. "If they die in the game, I'll recruit new members. We will find Bai Liu. I'm not giving up."

Muke lifted his chin slightly, his expression one of quiet arrogance. "You can leave if you want. I'll be more useful to Bai Liu than you."

Mu Sicheng froze.

Ignoring him, Muke turned back to the guild members, raising his voice. "Now, we're heading into No Man's Land!"

Hearts, sitting on Titan's shoulder, raised an eyebrow at the sight. This Muke guy was a smooth talker.

She shifted her heels, and the team members below looked up at her, their hearts somehow in alignment with her words. "What can I do for you, Empress?"

Hearts' eyes lingered on Muke's back. "Tell Wang Shun to check out this new guy named Muke."

Before she could finish, someone started clapping.

"Clap, clap, clap!" Charles applauded, laughing as he sidestepped Wang Shun, who was following him. "Wang Shun, I've found someone better than you to promote Bai Liu's team."

Wang Shun, fully dressed, stood still, his hands pressed nervously against his trouser legs, too afraid to look at Hearts. His voice was barely above a whisper: "Empress…"

Charles bounced lightly on his heels, took off his high hat, and flipped it twice in his hands, bowing with a dramatic flourish before raising his hand in a mock salute. "Good afternoon, my beautiful queen."

All the smiles faded from Hearts' face as she glanced between Wang Shun and Charles, her expression cold and calculating. "Charles, I thought it was a convention between guilds not to interfere with each other's members?"

"That's true for the larger guilds," Charles replied, flipping his hat back onto his head and straightening up. He looked at Hearts with a playful smile. "But there should be some special allowance made for newcomer guilds, right?"

"If by 'newbie guild' you mean the Scavengers guild," Hearts said, leaning toward Titan with a smile that didn't reach her eyes, "I regret to inform you, Charles, that about three dimensional minutes ago, the president of that guild—Bai Liu—fell into No Man's Land."

"That's unfortunate news," Charles said, folding his hands over his heart as though mourning. But the sorrow lasted only a second before his smile shifted into something more sly. "Maybe it wasn't such a bad outcome."

Hearts finally realized what Charles was up to and sat up straighter, her expression darkening. "Charles, the support season has just started. You have plenty of better options. No need to waste your time on a newcomer."

"But I fell in love with him at first sight," Charles said dramatically, leaning on his staff with a mock-swoon gesture. "I could never look at another player again."

Charles smirked, cynically playful. "Queen, gambling is like falling in love. You have to be single-minded when you're immersed in it. A horse I like to bet on is worth throwing my money away for."

"Even if he's only played three games, dropped into No Man's Land, and has only a raggedy guild?" Hearts asked, her tone bland but piercing. "And you don't change who you bet on?"

Charles shrugged. "You know, Queen, for a gambler like me, picking a horse is as irrational as falling in love with someone."

He looked up at Hearts, his teasing smile now flirtatious. "I would think that Her Majesty, having had her heart deeply broken by a man, would understand the feeling of being overwhelmed by someone—even when you know it's wrong, wouldn't you?"

The Rose Factory

Muke moved quietly behind Charles.

Though he didn't know the identity of the sudden appearance of Charles, Muke could sense that Bai Liu was being helped by Charles in a situation that had become explosive.

"I don't think it's the same thing to be obsessed with a man as it is to fall head over heels for a gambling horse every year," Hearts said, her scowl deeply concealed. Her burgundy eyes darkened. "Don't compare your animal nature to mine, Charles."

"Then I apologize for my indiscretion," Charles replied, leaning back with a widening smile. "But to me, 'animalistic' is a positive word. I admire people who are animalistic."

Hearts was silent for a moment, realizing that Charles had to get Bai Liu out — a man with a gambling streak no one could control.

Without hesitation, Hearts turned to Titan. "Titan, surround them."

A massive black orb descended from the sky like a black hole, threatening to swallow Charles and the group behind him, including Wang Shun and Muke.

However, Charles remained calm, raising his staff of civilization to counter the falling orb.

As the black orb made its way along the staff, about to touch the tip of Charles' nose, he removed his black top hat and dragged it back to the end of the staff. With a flip, he pressed the hat against the orb.

As if by magic, the orb shrank under the brim of the hat, compressing into a black bouncing ball in Charles' gloved hand.

[System Alert: Player Charles uses skill (Phantom Devourer)]

[This skill swallows the opponent's skill the instant it attacks and transforms it into a magic item for storage.]

"It's useless to use your skills on me, Queen," Charles said, waving the bouncing ball in his hand with amusement. He then removed his gloves, wrapping them around the ball and slipping them into Wang Shun's pocket. "It's dirty. You can have it."

Wang Shun: "????"

He had heard that Charles was eccentric, but this was beyond anything he imagined—just casually bouncing the orb on a clean floor and then dismissing it.

Charles, now sporting a new pair of white gloves, saluted Titan and Hearts with a reserved smile. "May I be excused, Empress?"

With that, Charles turned, nudged Wang Shun's elbow, slightly lifted his chin in a polite gesture, and tapped his index finger twice on his elbow.

Wang Shun, confused at first, quickly realized Charles wanted him to support him.

...This is really a lot of personnel...

Despite a few snide remarks, Wang Shun took Charles' hand, and Charles, satisfied, proceeded.

He walked up to Muke and smiled. "I believe you've seen my sincerity towards Bai Liu. Would you mind coming with us to [No Man's Land]?"

Muke, who had been waiting for the President's signal, took a steady breath. Rather than panicking, he offered his hand and thanked Charles sincerely. "I don't mind at all."

"You're very welcome to join us."

No Man's Land

After Charles' intervention, the regular spectators, who had previously been too afraid to watch under the siege of foreign guilds, leaned in.

Thanks to the constant flipping of the [Siege Bai Liu] situation, the topic had reached a boiling point on the forums, leading to massive discussions. Now, most of the regular players were curious about what was happening.

A crowd of spectators followed Muke and the others, pretending to pass by as they made their way to No Man's Land.

They couldn't be too flamboyant because the King's Guild members were following them, and the onlookers didn't want to draw attention.

The two camps faced each other at the entrance to No Man's Land, a place where no ghosts dared to tread, with Charles and Hearts standing before their guild members, ready for battle.

The crowd, awed and silent, could only watch. The league hadn't even started, and yet supporters were already indulging in endless gossip.

Inside the unoccupied area, flickering snowflakes and static noise emanated from stacks of old TV sets. Occasionally, a distorted human figure appeared under the flickering black-and-white stripes of the screen, most of them pleading for help.

A hoarse, desperate voice stretched from the broken speakers, producing an eerie tune that had an unsettling quality.

The players trapped in No Man's Land flickered intermittently on the screens like ghosts, using the distorted footage to remember their lives after death.

The No Man's Land was surrounded by blinding white walls, with mountains of old FM TVs stacked as far as the eye could see.

No one knew if there was an end to No Man's Land—no one had ever reached it.

The full name of [No Man's Land] might suggest emptiness, but it was a graveyard, filled with those who had lost their names in the game and had become monsters, forgotten by time and surrounded by the nuisance of old television.

It was Muke's first time here, and he felt a deep shock. Wang Shun sighed as he explained, "A lot of players who enter here are newcomers to the game. They don't get recognition or reward points from the audience, so they can't afford props. It's very hard for them to survive."

Wang Shun's eyes reflected deep sympathy. "They end up here quickly, and all they can do is stall for time, gradually being alienated until they eventually just try to survive for as long as they can."

"They don't see any hope. They just struggle through the game, waiting for someone to rescue them."

Muke stared at the mountain of TVs, his voice barely above a whisper. "Is... this like Siren's Town?"

"Yes," Wang Shun said. "If Bai Liu hadn't saved you then, this place would have been your grave."

"There's not much they need—just a little encouragement. That's enough to bring them back to life and help them crawl out of this graveyard-like No Man's Land."

Wang Shun sighed, turning to Muke. "But sadly, few people in this game have such kindness."

"Not everyone is as lucky as you, to have Bai Liu force his way through dimensions to save you." Wang Shun finally managed a small smile. "But perhaps many people will be saved because of him."

The onlookers whispered, speculating about what Charles and Hearts were up to.

Hearts glanced sideways at the mountain of TVs and turned to look at Charles, who was smiling. "Are you sure you want to waste so many points on Bai Liu just to get him out of this dump?"

"It's not a waste," Charles replied with a grin. "Anything I can spend to please me is reasonable entertainment. Bai Liu is amusing, isn't he?"

Hearts was silent. "You're an unbelievable man."

Charles bent to the task. "Thank you for your kind words."

"How many points are you going to spend before you stop?" Hearts asked.

Charles straightened, gazing out at the blinding white landscape of No Man's Land, adjusting the diamond ring on his thumb. He narrowed his eyes. "Until I see Bai Liu reappear in front of me."

Muke took a deep breath, standing in front of the guild members. He gave the order on Charles' behalf. "Charles will transfer a million points to each of you, but there are restrictions on how these points can be used."

"The only purpose of these credits is to charge the small TVs in No Man's Land with 5 to 10 points each and collect likes until the TV turns off."

"Mark the locations of the TVs that reach 10 points but don't turn off, send them to me, and we'll run a secondary analysis of the players inside. If we determine that Bai Liu is among them, we'll conduct further actions."

Muke stepped to the left, introducing Wang Shun. "This is Wang Shun, our union's data analyst. He'll handle all the data from the small TVs you collect."

"And this is God Mu, fourth on our prestigious Rising Star list." Muke glanced at Mu Sicheng, who had been silent, head lowered. "He'll guard the gates of No Man's Land to protect our operations from the King's Guild."

Mu Sicheng raised his head, locking eyes with Muke, a fire in his gaze.

He took a deep, annoyed breath and tsked, not responding verbally. Instead, he got up and stood at the entrance of No Man's Land, chin raised, facing the foreign guild members.

Mu Sicheng felt Muke's hostility and it bothered him. But even more than that, he was frustrated by how organized Muke was.

Muke scanned the guild members. "Is there anything else you don't understand?"

The guild members were still in shock.

They had never seen a million points in all their time with the Scavenging Guild. Now, they were expected to spend it on saving someone they hadn't even met. It was an exciting thought they never could have imagined, leaving them dizzy with disbelief.

The onlookers couldn't believe it either. They looked at Charles, who was calmly wiping his cane as if nothing had happened. His eyes glazed over, fixed on the vast mountain of TVs in No Man's Land.

— Charles is joking, right?!

To find one person among this sea of TVs would cost tens of millions of points at the very least!

But as they soon realized, Charles wasn't joking.

The guild members approached Charles warily, raised their system panels, and waited for the transfer. Once it was done, they moved forward.

Tens of millions of points were transferred, and Charles never lost his smile.

He gently patted the guild members on the shoulder. "Now, go find your hidden president."

Shrine

In the middle of the table lies a card that has been suddenly flipped over. The figure on the card is a mysterious magician, gently pulling his hat down to cover his smiling face.

The man with the hood over his face taps his fingers thoughtfully on the card and, with a smile, says, "Interesting. A magician card has appeared, one that belongs neither to the werewolf camp nor the gods' camp. The tables have turned."

"Do you still want to reveal the cards, prophet?" he asks with a playful smile.

The prophet falls silent for a moment before responding, "Not yet."

"This scene is already a mess..." The man's eyes flicker over the Hunter card, which has transformed into a werewolf, the Witch standing nearby, the Rose card flickering and on the brink of disappearing, and the newly appeared Magician card. He smiles lightly, a touch more chaotic now. "More chaos, then."

A new card materializes between his forefinger and middle finger. He places it to the right of the werewolf card.

The prophet’s eyes change imperceptibly at the sight of it.

This card is unlike any other. It defies the rules. As soon as it touches the table, the character on the card comes to life, floating like a 3D projection. The character is holding a flashy, toy-like flare gun, shooting it across the table.

The figure wears overstuffed pom-pom-spiked boots, bright red turnip pants, and a puffy-sleeved top with a lace-covered neckline wrapped around its neck. A two-horned, two-colored hat with a bell at the tip jingles as it moves.

Its face and neck are covered in thick white oil paint, its mouth outlined in bright red, while its eyes are painted black with turquoise pupils hidden beneath. Small golden curls glimmer on top of its head.

This, clearly, is a clown.

The clown shoots its flare gun across the table, laughing loudly and eerily, hitting the faces of various characters on the cards. It makes a chaotic mess before stopping in front of the werewolf card—the only character card it hasn't destroyed.

"King!" the Joker exclaims with delight, its bright green eyes shining under its forked hat. It plops down on the werewolf card, curling up against it, pressing its face into the card and chanting playfully, "King! Find my king!"

"What did you do to the Joker?" The prophet's tone turns rare and strained. "This is not how the character cards normally behave when they first appear. The Joker seems to remember Bai Liu, but in this timeline, the Joker and Bai Liu haven't even met yet."

The man sitting across from him folds his hands on the table, his smile widening. "Are you afraid? Afraid that the clown's influence over Bai Liu will turn him into Bai Six?"

The prophet retorts coldly, "You're breaking the rules of the game."

"I never break the rules of the game," the man responds casually, uncrossing his hands and smiling unabashedly. "I just delegated the Joker card early and kept it from making an appearance."

The prophet opens his mouth to speak, "What... does that mean?"

Before he can finish his sentence, he pauses, incredulous. "You... put him in no man's land?!"

"Yes," the man says casually. "The first single game I had the Joker log into was a Level 3 game. Naturally, he got trapped in it and couldn't get out. Soon, the audience lost interest in the poor, unskilled Joker, leaving him stranded in No Man's Land." He speaks with a hint of pity.

The prophet's voice shakes. "How long has he been in the game? How long?"

"He's been living with those monsters... for almost ten years, I think. I wouldn't really let him die, but he's definitely out of his mind by now."

The prophet straightens, his eyes narrowing as he looks across the table. "Why would the Joker remember Bai Liu?"

The man leans forward, eyes gleaming with dark amusement. "Because I gave him hope to keep him going in that horrible, torturous third-level game that was pushing him to the brink of suicide. I made him dream every night."

"In his dreams, the clown saw a man called Bai Six come to his rescue, like a god. Bai Six took him on a killing spree, invincible and victorious."

"The man understood him completely, agreed with him, appreciated him. He was the only one who allowed the clown to follow him. The clown became his most loyal servant. He was his KING."

The man glances down at the clown on the table. "That beautiful dream has kept him going all this time."

The prophet closes his eyes, his breathing shallow. "You made the Joker dream of the rest of the timeline... but now this timeline has gone completely awry, and Bai Liu was never meant to save him..."

"The Joker waits alone in the game for Bai Liu, who will never come. Ten years of waiting..."

"Congratulations," the man says, his smile widening, "he's going to finally stop waiting, isn't he? Bai Liu will soon be in No Man's Land to rescue him."

"Have you ever heard of a fairy tale?" The man abruptly changes the subject, but his interest is clear. Without waiting for the prophet to answer, he continues, "It's called 'The Fisherman and the Devil.'"

"A long, long time ago, a clownish demon was sealed by God in a bottle. He suffered greatly, but no one could see his pain. He survived only through visions in his dreams."

"So, he made a wish in his heart. If someone freed him in the first year, he would give them more wealth than they could ever spend in a lifetime."

"Unfortunately, that man never showed up. In the third year, the Joker thought that if the man freed him now, he would join him, entering his service."

"Still, the man didn’t appear. In the sixth year, the Joker thought that if the man freed him now, he would become his loyal servant, selling his soul."

"But the man still didn’t come."

The man looks at the prophet, his smile unchanging. "After waiting ten years, when the Joker finally meets the one he’s been waiting for, what do you think he’ll do to Bai Liu, the King he’s waited for?"

The prophet opens his eyes, his voice steady. "He will kill Bai Liu."

The Rose Factory

May Rose Festival
The piazza of the Rose Factory was adorned with thorny rose canes and dried flowers. None of the employees had roses in their eyes as they came and went, happily hauling unwanted perfume-making equipment out the door.

Bai Liu sat pale beside a field of fading flowers, still recovering from the sacrificial ritual that had drained so much of his blood.

Liu Jiayi and Tang Erda stood behind him, flanking him on either side.

"I didn't think you'd be so self-sacrificing as to get involved yourself," Liu Jiayi sighed, swaying on her feet before dropping down beside Bai Liu. "So many blood lingzhi have grown, and now you've come up with the idea of turning them into a perfume spray—it could save so many more people."

"But not all," Tang Erda interrupted stiffly.

Liu Jiayi rolled her eyes, about to retort, when Bai Liu spoke up with a faint smile, his gaze distant.

"I've given them the solution. They've chosen [the poison] themselves. If they want to go back to the path of [the antidote], they'll have to pay the price."

"You're going to let them cultivate the blood lingzhi themselves?" Tang Erda quickly grasped Bai Liu's implication. Kneeling down, he frowned. "But the way blood lingzhi is cultivated—it's too dangerous. It requires the blood of special children to grow—"

"If there were no dried leaf roses, then yes," Bai Liu said, curling one leg in a half-bend and lazily resting his chin on his knee. "But the dried leaf rose and the blood lingzhi are companion plants. Those contaminated by the dried leaf rose— their blood is remarkably effective for nourishing the blood lingzhi."

Tang Erda narrowed his eyes. "How do you know that?"

Bai Liu squinted in satisfaction as a soft breeze ruffled the flowers. "Haven't you noticed? When blood lingzhi grows, it absorbs the essence of the rose as well. And it thrives."

"The game's implication is clear enough." Bai Liu turned to Tang Erda, lifting his chin and meeting his eyes. "Like Tawil, the poison grows from these people's desires. But the antidote is hidden in their own bodies as well."

"It all comes down to choice." Bai Liu turned his head away again, voice faint. "To see if they have the courage to walk the path of the [antidote], to endure thorns digging into their bones and piercing their hearts in order to save themselves."

Liu Jiayi helped Bai Liu to his feet, brushing the mud and grass from his trousers.

"Good or bad, people always pay for their choices." Bai Liu turned to a baffled Tang Erda and smiled. "It's just that they never had a choice before. Now, I'm giving them one more. But in the end, neither you nor I decide how the world goes."

Bai Liu looked past Tang Erda, toward the people running toward him, faces lit with joy.

"It's them. They decide."

"Mr. Bai—!!!"

"Mr. Bai, we've finished setting up the May Rose Festival display!"

"Slow down, Mr. Bai! You're still not fully recovered!"

Having witnessed Bai Liu spill his own blood to save them, these people now held him in high esteem, fussing over him whenever he moved.

"As you ordered, we've held the May Rose Festival and destroyed all the perfumes in the factory," one of them reported eagerly. "Only those meant to be auctioned at the Extravaganza remain."

"The people attending this year are all the wealthiest figures profiting from the dried leaf rose industry. Every year, they come to bid on a bottle or two of the special perfume for their own pleasure—"

"Now, they're all waiting in the piazza for you to appear."

Tang Erda took a step closer to Bai Liu, still unable to understand him. "You've already destroyed most of the roses and perfumes. Why keep these special ones?"

Bai Liu adjusted his shirt, then turned to Tang Erda with a knowing smile, voice light and scattered.

"Because it’s only fair to give everyone the same choice."

A man at the front led Bai Liu around the factory, opening a back door to a small flight of steps. Reverently, he bowed his head and pulled back the curtain, gesturing for Bai Liu to step onto the stage.

"They're waiting for you, sir."

Without hesitation, Bai Liu ascended the dais. Sunlight poured over his face, pale to the point of translucence from blood loss.

Before him stood a simple wooden lectern, custom-made for him. A microphone stood upright at his mouth, and below, a crowd of well-dressed elites shifted impatiently.

Bai Liu smiled, lowering his eyes as he stepped toward the microphone. His voice, a little hoarse, echoed through the piazza’s speakers.

"Thank you for your patience, distinguished guests."

"I am the new agent for the Rose Factory. Bai Liu."

After a brief introduction, Bai Liu raised a hand and gestured to his left. Upon a wooden board lay small mother blood lingzhi branches, cut into 1-2 cm lengths, their thorns still sharp and full of life.

"This," Bai Liu said smoothly, "is a new product we’ve developed—a by-product of rose perfume, so to speak. A fresh branch, cut and dried, its thorns still thriving."

His gaze swept across the room. "I’m sure you’re all wondering why I’m presenting a mere thorn. Let me tell you what it’s worth—this little section of thorn can undo the addictive effects of rose perfume on the human body."

A murmur rippled through the audience.

In the front row, a man raised his hand sharply. "Agent, I’m willing to buy the patent for this thorn. You must not allow it to be mass-produced!"

"Yes, yes! If this gets out, the perfume industry will collapse—"

"I've just secured a high-ranking official with my perfume, and now—"

"There's no need to panic, gentlemen." Bai Liu interrupted, smiling. "This thorn must be used under strict conditions, and the side effects are severe. One must swallow it and endure the pain of the thorn growing inside them, feeding on their blood, draining their strength—only then can they produce the antidote that purges the drug."

"And because the thorn requires blood compatibility, much like an organ transplant, only your own blood can cultivate the medicine that detoxifies you."

"So, anyone who wishes to purchase the Thorn Antidote must be prepared to suffer. Perhaps even die from the pain."

The crowd fell silent.

Behind the curtain, Liu Jiayi peeked out, lifting a small corner of fabric. A giggle escaped her.

"Bai Liu, this guy… he's so unethical."

Though she was scolding him, amusement shone on her face. "Blood lingzhi—once used by investors to exploit children—is now a tool for self-torture, all thanks to Bai Liu and his blood purity requirement."

"Thorns. He actually thought of using thorns to grow inside people." She sighed in admiration. "He's a sadistic genius."

Tang Erda stared at Bai Liu, increasingly unable to understand him.

"What the hell is he planning?"

Liu Jiayi shot him a look of exasperation. "Can't you see it?"

Tang Erda frowned. "...See what?"

Liu Jiayi smirked, pressing closer to the slit behind the curtain.

"He's taking the choices the man behind the curtain forced on him—and passing them on to others."

"He's making them choose for themselves."

Bai Liu swings again, this time to his right.

On the display table beside him, mountains of exquisite perfumes are neatly stacked, their diamond-shaped glass bottles glistening under the sunlight. Inside, the pale pink liquid swirls like a dream.

"As is customary, we have prepared a special perfume for the auction," Bai Liu announces. "This time, I crafted it myself—a highly concentrated, unique blend."

He gestures left and right simultaneously, then smiles. "Antidote or poison—what will you bid for?"

A frenzied auction erupts.

Some swallow the thorns, others inhale the dark fragrance, and soon they are transformed. On the piazza floor, bodies twist and contort—thorns pierce hearts and spines, roses ignite their sanity and pain.

People become monsters beyond their own control.

The first of them hisses and lunges toward Bai Liu, who stands motionless on the stage. A silver bullet cuts through the air, lodging into the monster's brow. Bai Liu lifts his gaze from the writhing mass of bodies to Tang Erda, who stands panting at the factory entrance, gun raised.

One dead monster wouldn't leave Tang Erda breathless. What unsettles him is the sight before him—the once-pristine elite of society, now writhing in agony, impaled by thorns or intoxicated by the perfume's effects.

Ten minutes ago, they were symbols of power and wealth. Now, they grovel at Bai Liu's feet, stripped of dignity.

And Bai Liu didn't even force them.

Tang Erda clenches his jaw, wanting to say—You could have saved them. Then—If this was punishment, you could have just killed them.

But instead, what comes out is:

You're torturing them. Why?

Bai Liu seems to read the question in his eyes. He tilts his head and smiles.

"Torture? Not exactly. They knew the risks—I warned them to beware the roses, both the thorns and the flowers."

He steps down from the stage, moving unhurriedly through the bloodstained wreckage. "I simply let them choose. And now, they pay the price." His voice lowers. "It's a trade-off—between you and me."

Bai Liu stops in front of Tang Erda and meets his gaze. There is no light in his dark eyes. No roses.

"—Like someone did to me. To Tawil."

He absently taps Tang Erda's shoulder as he brushes past him, not looking back. "Clean up for me, will you?"

Tang Erda remains silent. He wants to say something—but in the end, he only grips his gun and starts firing.

Killing the monsters Bai Liu created.

Or rather, the monsters who chose to become monsters.

Even after such a grotesque spectacle, Bai Liu simply drifts toward a field of withered flowers, directly opposite Tang Erda. He walks among them as if admiring the view.

Liu Jiayi follows behind, walking backward with her hands clasped behind her back, chattering away. Whatever she says makes Bai Liu curl his eyes and smile.

If not for the pile of monster limbs in front of him, Tang Erda might have thought Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi had never passed through this carnage at all.

For a brief moment, Tang Erda is stunned—distracted just long enough for a monster to slip past him. It lunges for Bai Liu. Tang Erda reacts instantly, stepping forward and shooting it down.

Bai Liu glances up at him, expression light. "Finished cleaning?"

"It's over." Tang Erda exhales, gripping his gun. He mutters, almost without thinking, "You didn't have to."

"Torture?" Bai Liu immediately picks up on the implication. His gaze sharpens, amusement flickering in his eyes—a look that sends a chill down Tang Erda's spine.

"I've always found something curious about that," Bai Liu muses. "You accuse me of torture—but I see someone else who shares my... preferences. One of your own teammates."

Tang Erda stiffens.

"You hate me," Bai Liu continues, smiling. "But you're more lenient with Joker. Why?"

Tang Erda's grip on his gun tightens. His voice is hoarse. "I don't know where you got the idea that I forgive him. I hate him."

"But it's different, isn't it?" Bai Liu tilts his head. "Your hatred for Joker is secondary. An accessory to the crime. But your hatred for me?" He touches his chin in thought. "I'm the main culprit, aren't I?"

Tang Erda glares at him. "You manipulate everyone into committing crimes—"

"Interesting." Bai Liu's gaze sharpens. "That clown—does he have some special relationship with me?"

Tang Erda opens his mouth to deny it—but hesitates. His brow furrows as old memories surface.

"...We had suspicions," he admits.

"Joker's loyalty to you is absolute," Tang Erda continues, voice measured. "He obeys only you. He excludes the rest of the Wandering Circus."

"In one of our attempts to capture you—" He takes a breath, as if recalling something unpleasant. "He shot Mu Sicheng without warning. Left him bleeding on our doorstep and told us to kill him."

"Our research—his psychological profile—indicates he doesn't see the others in your circus as comrades. He resents them." Tang Erda's gaze is piercing. "Because he thinks they share you."

"He's your one-man clown."

Bai Liu raises an eyebrow. "That level of loyalty—" He hums. "It takes years to cultivate."

"It's not cultivation," Tang Erda snaps. "It's domestication."

Bai Liu accepts the correction with good grace. "And intense domestication at that. Starting from childhood, I'd guess." His expression darkens. "How old is he?"

Tang Erda hesitates. "...Our best guess? He was fourteen when he first met you. You were twenty-one."

Bai Liu's smile fades.

"The following year, his father died," Tang Erda continues. "That was when you made contact with him in reality—helped him seize his father's inheritance. A massive smuggling operation, arms and more."

"He idolizes you. Calls himself your sole believer. The first member of your circus."

Tang Erda watches Bai Liu carefully. "He calls you 'King' most of the time. But sometimes—he calls you something else." His voice drops. "We believe that after his father's death... you became his godfather."

Bai Liu exhales softly. "I'm twenty-four now." His voice is distant. "So, if he's still alive, that means—"

Tang Erda meets his gaze. "The day before you entered The Rose Factory was his seventeenth birthday."

He hesitates, then adds, "In other timelines, Bai Liu always throws him huge birthday parties."

His eyes narrow. "You coddle him."

No Man's Land
A steady stream of small TVs flickered off and drifted away as players cautiously ventured deeper into No Man's Land. They navigated around the towering mountain of screens, their fingers constantly tapping to charge their favorites, exhaling in relief each time one dimmed.

Messengers ran back and forth between the different divisions, spreading updates on whether the latest darkened screen belonged to Bai Liu.

Meanwhile, a flood of unfamiliar players' small TVs filled the general section. Dazed viewers sensed that something significant was happening. A quick glance at the forums confirmed their suspicions, and soon, a crowd gathered at No Man's Land to witness the unfolding chaos.

At the same time, some players—those who had received financial backing—had finally cleared the game. The number of people boarding the exit steadily increased. These players, who had endured untold struggles alone in the game, collapsed upon stepping out, releasing anguished cries.

Most were newcomers. Their initial outbursts of rage gave way to stunned aimlessness. The game had drained them of all emotions and motivation, leaving behind nothing but hollow shells of flesh and blood.

It was only when they noticed the murmurs around them—whispers tinged with awe—that they lifted their heads.

“They actually made it out?”

“Bai Liu saved so many people this time…”

“Damn, I don’t get the way the rich play this game. Cleaning up No Man’s Land for Bai Liu is insane.”

One of the rescued players, his face still streaked with tears, hesitated before stepping forward. “Excuse me… this comrade Bai Liu—did he just save us?”

The older player he addressed wore a conflicted expression. “Can’t say he ‘saved’ you exactly,” he admitted. “But if not for him, you wouldn’t have made it out.”

The man’s eyes lit up with an almost desperate fervor, as if he had found his long-lost anchor. “Then… where can I find him?”

The older player sighed. “No Man’s Land. Right where you came from.”

The Rose Factory

No Man's Land
Players emerging from the boarding exit slowly gathered in the once-deserted area.

Weary and dazed, they looked up at the stark white zone that had once imprisoned them. The endless emptiness, now seen from the outside, left them with a lingering sense of detachment.

The space, once lifeless, was now teeming with all sorts of people, all searching for something.

One by one, they dismantled the obsolete TVs, their hands moving anxiously as they charged and checked the small snowy screens. The moment a screen flickered off, they let out long, relieved breaths before turning toward the exit and calling out:

"Wang Shun! One of the small TVs here just went out!"

"There's one over here too!"

"Brother Wang, three this way!"

At the entrance, Wang Shun stood with a thick virtual notepad, his pen leaving behind faint sparks of data as he scribbled.

Once he had logged nearly a hundred extinguished TVs, he tore off the data and handed it to a few of the members guarding him, issuing clear, precise instructions.

"Based on my calculations, the TVs rising from No Man's Land are being promoted in either the multiplayer or single-player sections, as well as along the edges of the central hall. Head there and see if you spot any Bai Liu TVs."

The men took their assignments with a nod and sprinted toward their designated areas.

Just then, the last scouting team returned, panting from their search through the sub-district. One of them shook his head at Wang Shun.

"Brother Wang, no sign of Bai Liu in this batch of TVs."

For a brief moment, disappointment flickered across Wang Shun's face. But almost instantly, he composed himself and waved them off. “That’s normal. Take a break and get ready for the next rotation.”

The entire operation ran like a well-oiled machine—a fast-moving assembly line.

The newly freed players from No Man’s Land stood in stunned silence.

Before them, stretching endlessly, was a mountain of TVs, and among them, ordinary players worked tirelessly, dismantling old screens one by one. Watching the effort unfold, the newcomers felt an odd sense of disbelief.

This is how we were pulled out of that place of despair.

—All for a man named Bai Liu.

Like them, Bai Liu was trapped in No Man’s Land.

But he hadn’t given up on himself. And the people who had fought to save him believed, with unwavering certainty, that he never would.

That belief was what had given them, those who had been lost in hopelessness, the chance to step back into the light.

A surge of newfound determination filled their hollow chests, a sensation like I, too, can change reality.

They clenched their fists, then, unable to suppress their agitation any longer, stepped forward. With careful, sincere voices, they approached Wang Shun, the clear leader among them.

“Excuse me… can we join the search for Bai Liu?”

“We were saved because of him. We want to do something for him.”

Wang Shun glanced toward Muke, who had been watching from the sidelines.

Muke stepped forward with a warm smile, placing a firm hand on their backs as he guided them inside. “Of course you can. We need your help…”

“But we… we don’t have many points,” one of them added hesitantly, face flushing. “…Apart from the game pass, the only reason we even had enough was because you mistakenly charged us while pulling Bai Liu out…”

Muke's smile deepened, turning gentle. "How could that be a mistake?"

"Your presence alone has made those points worth a hundred times more."

"You survived. And now, you're here to help Bai Liu. That's exactly what we hoped for when we charged those points."

"You can help by liking and favoriting each small TV—it may not seem like much, but it helps more than you think…"

As Wang Shun watched the new volunteers be guided away, he turned back to Charles, who had been observing with clear amusement.

"This was your plan all along," Wang Shun muttered. "You knew the surviving No Man's Land players would return. The members' favorites are nearly full, and without more people to help with the likes, the cost of fishing Bai Liu out is only going to rise."

Charles raised an eyebrow, lips curling into a smirk. "Of course they'd come back. How else did the Heavenly Masons get here?"

His gaze lingered on the backs of the rescued players. "People who survive disasters have a stronger sense of empathy. They want to help those who have suffered the same way. It makes them easier to rally."

"Especially when they've just escaped and learn that the person who saved them is now trapped in the same situation," Wang Shun murmured, rubbing his forehead. "That overwhelming feeling of powerlessness pushes them to act. They go from helpless victims to determined fighters—because now, Bai Liu isn't just a person to them. He's part of their identity."

Charles chuckled. "Exactly. They'll feel a stronger connection to Bai Liu than they ever did to me, the person who actually paid to save them."

His tone was light, even amused, as if the realization didn't bother him in the slightest.

"If this works, they'll relive their own salvation through Bai Liu's rescue. They'll feel their strength, their ability to fight fate. And when that happens—"

"Bai Liu will become a complete symbol of their spirit," Wang Shun finished, voice heavy.

“They’ll be his most loyal followers.”

Wang Shun’s brow furrowed in discomfort. “You’re manipulating their emotions.”

Charles only spread his hands with a shrug. “Maybe. But I doubt they’d mind. Even if I told them my reasons, it wouldn’t change how they feel about Bai Liu.”

His voice was calm, certain.

“They chose to follow Bai Liu of their own free will.”

“And honestly?” He smiled. “It’s probably what’s best for them. With Bai Liu, at least they won’t die so easily.”

Wang Shun let out a quiet sigh, shoulders slumping.

He didn’t like it. But Charles had a point.

In a game this ruthless, this cruel… Maybe this really was the best outcome for these ordinary people—people who still had enough heart left to care.

Just like him. Just like his own choice—to follow Bai Liu.

In-game.

Bai Liu stepped onto the stage for the ribbon-cutting ceremony of the new factory, a pair of scissors in hand.

On the sidelines, Liu Jiayi clapped while whispering to Tang Erda beside her, "Don't you think Bai Liu is basically a construction foreman at this point? Running factories all day long?"

She paused, then added dryly, "Is this even still a horror game? Did we take a wrong turn somewhere?"

Tang Erda reflexively defended him. "He’s just trying to clear the game," he said. "If he wants everyone to make it out, he has to run at least six factories."

Beyond their quiet commentary, the rest of the audience applauded enthusiastically, their eyes shining as they watched Bai Liu in his crisp suit. They had once been exiles, but now, thanks to the rose perfume, they had been cured.

Standing at the podium, Bai Liu adjusted the microphone, swept his gaze over the crowd, cleared his throat, and began speaking in a composed, unhurried tone:

"With golden autumn in full bloom and the fragrance of laurel in the air, we gather here today to celebrate the fruits of our hard work as we launch our sixth Thorn Factory—"

"Ah! What a joyous occasion!"

Liu Jiayi choked. "Pfft—!!!"

Tang Erda: "..."

Liu Jiayi groaned. "Oh, come on! He's using the same speech again? Where the hell did he even get it from?! He's said this six times already! How does he not feel embarrassed?"

Bai Liu, utterly unfazed, continued reading his opening remarks, reciting them word for word from the speech his old boss used to give.

"Though we come from all corners of the world, today, here and now, we stand as one—"

Liu Jiayi clutched her head and wailed, "Somebody stop him!"

Meanwhile, in No Man's Land.

The exhausted diggers glanced back at the "TV mountain" towering behind them. For a fleeting moment, they marveled at how much they had cleared. Then, reality hit—they turned back again, only to be overwhelmed by how much still remained.

Wang Shun was lightheaded with exhaustion. He had long since lost track of time, his body running on autopilot. It wasn't until Charles reminded him that he realized he needed a break. Reluctantly, he found someone with a sharp eye for numbers to take over.

Without Wang Shun, their efficiency dropped even further.

Muke remained tense, overseeing the work. Mu Sicheng rotated in and out, his high-speed movement allowing him to cover for an entire shift on his own, freeing up more people to continue the search for Bai Liu.

Charles, leaning casually on his "Staff of Civilization," stood in front of the remaining King's Guild members, barely putting in effort. With Hearts gone with Titan, his only job was to hold down the fort—it was, by far, the easiest task.

Mu Sicheng sprinted between the different mini-TV divisions. During a rare pause, he gulped down a stamina potion and slumped onto a small TV, his chest rising and falling rapidly as he caught his breath.

Without a word, Muke sat down beside him and took a swig from his own potion.

His voice was cold when he finally spoke. "Did you think about giving up on Bai Liu when he fell into No Man's Land?"

He didn't look at Mu Sicheng, but Mu Sicheng knew the question was directed at him.

Mu Sicheng tilted his head back and drank another bottle. He didn't deny it.

A heavy silence stretched between them before Mu Sicheng, in a rare moment of thoughtfulness, muttered, "Honestly... I think Bai Liu is probably safer in No Man's Land."

Muke's expression darkened. His voice dropped even lower. "You don't have to dress up 'giving up' to make it sound noble."

He stood abruptly, as if to walk away.

Mu Sicheng scoffed, watching him from the corner of his eye. "What, is the idea of giving up a sore spot for you?" His tone turned pointed. "Who abandoned you? A brother? A girlfriend? Your parents?"

At the word parents, Muke stiffened. His grip tightened around the potion bottle.

Mu Sicheng arched a brow. "My advice? Stop projecting your own issues onto Bai Liu. Don't start thinking of him as some replacement for your 'parents' or whatever."

He stretched, crumpled the empty bottle in his hand, and flicked it toward a trash bin in a lazy arc.

Muke didn’t move.

Mu Sicheng shoved his hands into his pockets and walked past him. "The guy’s too reckless to stay out there. He gets targeted by everyone. Rushing to be his 'kid' is a losing game," he muttered. "He’s better off with someone crazier watching his back."

Muke said nothing, head bowed. The empty bottle in his hand had been crushed into an unrecognizable tangle of plastic.

Their standoff lasted only seconds before a runner came sprinting back, drenched in sweat, panting heavily.

He dropped to his knees, gasping for air, then shouted with all his might—

"I—I found Bai Liu’s little TV!"

Both Muke and Mu Sicheng snapped to attention.

The Rose Factory

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"In the middle, on the edge of the central hall!" The man pointed toward the far side. "Bottom row!"

Before he could finish, Mu Sicheng was already sprinting away.

Muke took a deep breath, crushed the twisted plastic bottle in his grip, and ran after him.

On the sidelines, Wang Shun, who had been resting, watched the two disappear into the distance and sighed, reluctantly getting up to handle the chaos they left behind.

"Gentlemen, your hard work has paid off," he said with a smile. "Now go see the president we just dug up."

For a moment, the crowd climbing the TV hill was stunned into silence. Then, as the words sank in, they erupted into cheers, hands raised in victory.

Tears streamed down some of their faces as they scrambled down, rushing toward the messenger. After confirming the news again and again, they finally let out a collective breath and roared:

"The President is out!!!"

"He's back!!!"

Central Hall, Outer Fringe
Mu Sicheng, the first to arrive, skidded to a stop in front of the small TV. He took a step back, scanning the screen, searching for a familiar figure.

His gaze locked onto the bottom corner. He stared for a moment, then exhaled sharply, a smile tugging at his lips.

Wang Shun, arriving later, would understand that smile instantly—Bai Liu was in the exact same spot where he had first met Mu Sicheng in the Central Hall.

"What a hell of a life," Mu Sicheng muttered, crossing his arms as he took in Bai Liu's appearance. "Looks like he's in pretty good spirits."

Muke, right behind him, froze. For a long moment, he simply stared at Bai Liu, safe and unharmed on the screen.

Since learning that Bai Liu had entered a Level 3 game, Muke had been terrified, though he kept it to himself. He had a job to do, a promise to fulfill. But now that he could finally see Bai Liu, the emotions he had been suppressing surged up. His breath hitched, his eyes burned, and despite himself, he sniffled, blinking rapidly to keep the tears at bay.

If Bai Liu were standing in front of him now, Muke might have broken down entirely.

Wang Shun, leading the group, caught sight of Bai Liu's small TV and stilled. Then, relief spread across his face, and he broke into a wide smile.

"It's good that he's okay."

The others—players who had been rescued from No Man's Land because of Bai Liu—stared at the screen with a mix of awe, curiosity, and emotions too tangled to name.

On the narrow, outward-curved display, Bai Liu stood in a crisp white shirt and suit trousers, holding a stack of papers, reading calmly. Occasionally, he glanced to the side and smiled.

He didn't look like a player stuck in a Level 3 game.

—This was Bai Liu.

What the hell was he doing?

Unable to resist, the crowd pressed closer, stepping into the viewing area of Bai Liu's little TV. As soon as they did, his voice became clear.

Bai Liu, eyes lowered to his speech, spoke in an even, measured tone:

"…We have all endured our darkest moments—trapped in a place where no light reaches, struggling to survive, exploited, discarded, locked away the moment we were drained of value…"

The alias for [No Man's Land] was the Game's prison.

A ripple of unease passed through the crowd. Murmurs spread as players exchanged glances.

"…Does President Bai know what's happening outside?"

"Isn't he in the game? Why does it feel like he's talking to us?"

On the small TV, Bai Liu suddenly lifted his gaze. His eyes swept across the screen, and then, unexpectedly, he smiled.

"Lift your heads and look straight at me. You are the ones who have fought beside me. I am not your leader. I am not your savior. I am one of you. Do not bow your heads when facing me."

A shiver ran through the crowd.

People instinctively glanced around, confused. Then, hesitantly, as if compelled by some invisible force, they looked up at Bai Liu on the screen.

Mu Sicheng's skin prickled. His muscles tensed. Something about this felt… off.

Leaning toward Wang Shun, he whispered, "Shit. What the hell? Bai Liu acts like he knows exactly what's happening outside!"

Wang Shun sighed helplessly. "How should I know? Do you think I can figure out what Bai Liu is thinking?"

Charles, on the other hand, looked utterly fascinated. He stepped closer to the screen, tilting his head as he studied Bai Liu. "This is the first time I've seen a player whose actions align so perfectly with the outside world," he mused. "He's more my style than I expected."

A slow, appreciative grin spread across Charles' face. "Beautiful. In both looks and actions."

On the small TV, Bai Liu lowered his gaze, his expression composed as he continued reading.

"It is an unfair world," he said. "There are those who see us as nothing more than ants, who build their kingdoms atop our suffering, indulging in their pleasures at our expense. They hoard power and resources, binding us, forcing us to survive under their rules."

"No matter how hard we resist, there comes a time when they succeed."

He looked up then, meeting the eyes of the tearful exiles watching him.

"We have paid a heavy price."

The players outside the screen fell silent.

The bottom-rank players. The exiles of No Man's Land.

They realized, all at once—

Bai Liu was speaking to them. Because that was exactly where they stood.

"There is no shame in losing. There is no shame in being defeated by those who oppress you. The only shame is in giving up, in refusing to fight because you're afraid of losing."

"Anyone can lose—the good and the bad alike." Bai Liu's gaze swept over the stragglers before him. "I can lose, too."

The stragglers couldn't help but protest. "Mr. Bai, you won't lose!"

Bai Liu let out a soft laugh. "I appreciate the sentiment. But right now, in a place I can't reach, I've already lost everything."

"I fell into a place where only the dead remain. A place darker than your prisons, filled with ruins and wreckage. No one has ever walked out of there alive."

Bai Liu's voice was calm. "And I won't either."

Silence fell over the stragglers.

Beyond the screen, the audience stared at Bai Liu's face in a daze.

They knew what he was talking about—about being surrounded by the full force of the Grand Council and falling into No Man's Land.

He really knows!

"We, as individuals, are powerless against forces greater than us. Even if they take our property, our lives, our very souls—even if their actions defy morality, the law, or the natural order—" Bai Liu's voice remained steady. "—as a collective, we are not powerless."

"I couldn't escape that place alone. But I knew there were people who would find a way to pull me out. People who would grow in number and strength. A new group that would rise and reshape the old order."

"You will change the world. Save yourselves. And save others."

Bai Liu's expression didn't waver. "The order we believe in doesn't always win. More often than not, the logic of the wicked is more destructive than that of the just."

"Good doesn't always triumph over evil. And every one of you who has suffered at the hands of injustice knows this all too well."

"But as long as even one good person remains, justice survives in the heart of the collective."

"You may lose. But as long as one of you keeps fighting, you will never be erased."

Bai Liu unfolded a long document.

"So I've made a decision. I am granting each of you a share in the six newly established Thorn factories. Each of you will take on a portion of the responsibilities of a factory manager."

"And what comes next—" Bai Liu straightened his papers, gave a slight bow, and stepped back from the podium. "—is up to you."

A long silence fell over both the game and the outside world.

Those who had escaped No Man's Land, along with others drawn in behind them and Bai Liu's guild members, lowered their heads in thought. One by one, they wordlessly pulled up their system panels.

They had spent every last point collecting player channels in an effort to bring Bai Liu back.

It felt like they had done nothing at all, yet at the same time, like they had accomplished something incredible.

Only now, with Bai Liu's speech, did they fully realize the weight of what they had achieved.

—They had pulled a new player out from under the King's Guild's siege.

If they could unite like this every time, then wouldn't the big guilds lose their ability to crush them at will?

—Could such a collective exist?

—In this ruthless game, could a guild exist where power was truly shared among all members?

Whispers spread about Bai Liu's guild. More and more people began asking Muke how to join, and one by one, their small TV collections began to include Bai Liu.

Charles smirked at Wang Shun, who looked utterly baffled. "Looks like our dark horse—or perhaps white horse—knows exactly how to handle things in his own way. No need for me to manipulate emotions with points."

Wang Shun, unable to hold back a grin, threw up his hands and laughed. "Yes!"

More and more people gathered around Bai Liu's small TV.

The influx of inquiries overwhelmed Muke to the point that his memory panel nearly overheated, but Wang Shun quickly stepped in to help manage the chaos.

Bai Liu's small TV numbers skyrocketed.

The moment he exited No Man's Land, it was as if his TV had been strapped to a rocket. His promotion rank soared, skipping multiple tiers in seconds until he reached the Central Lobby's core promotions.

Within ten dimensional seconds, the audience watched in stunned silence as Bai Liu's small TV shot past the Nightmare Nova Room, securing the number-one spot in under three seconds with insane stats.

Mu Sicheng stared, dumbfounded. "I knew this guy wasn't normal, but does this even make sense?"

"Not really," Wang Shun admitted. "In all my years tracking players, I've never seen a small TV reach these numbers on a fourth game."

"Even Spades couldn't get this many people to follow him so wholeheartedly in a single game."

He turned to look at the flood of players clamoring to join Bai Liu's guild and murmured, "……It's like he was made for this game."

And then—

The system announced the game's completion.

Bai Liu's small TV screen went dark as the settlement began.

The final stats were incomprehensible.

A ten-million-point figure.

Even Wang Shun, meticulously taking notes, started to wonder if he had misremembered the numbers flashing on his screen.

—That was an order of magnitude only Spades had ever reached. Could Bai Liu, a newcomer with no foundation, truly pull it off?

But then the system delivered its final tally, dispelling any doubts.

[8064673 people liked Bai Liu's TV. 307700 people favorited Bai Liu's TV. 1256171 people charged Bai Liu's TV. Player Bai Liu has gained 2,789,651 points.]

[Player Bai Liu has received over 5 million likes in one minute and gained over 2.5 million points in charges! You are adored by the audience!]

[Congratulations to Player Bai Liu for securing the final promotion spot—]

A massive virtual salute flared to life around the small TV, followed by a grand crown logo appearing at the center. The system's jubilant voice echoed:

[Unbelievable—Player Bai Liu has ranked first in the entire region in overall small TV stats and secured the top spot in the central screen King promotion! You are the king today!!!]

[Player Bai Liu's small TV views are skyrocketing...]

[Congratulations to Bai Liu for unlocking all main quests and clearing The Rose Factory]

[System: Player has reached the true ending—"The Factory Where Roses Fall Forever"]

If there is a world that forbids the cultivation of roses and the production of perfume, where only thorn-covered stems remain—forced upon the people to consume—this is that world.

At first glance, the people who live here seem poor and unfortunate, having lost their right to roses. But in their eyes, their world has never been more beautiful—it was their choice.

A heart weighs 250g, a rose weighs 2g. Would you trade a heart for a hundred roses or a hundred roses for a heart?

The Rose Factory is waiting for your choice.

The Rose Factory True Ending Rewards :
Completion Bonus: 300,000 points
Attribute Points: 500 (can be allocated as needed)
Monster Book Rewards:
- Dried Leaf Addict Page Collection → Prop: Tentacle Cage (one-time use, captures moving objects)
- Rose Staff Page Set → Prop: Reversed Right Eye (lowers mental value, enhances evil tendencies, reveals hidden scenes, single-use per instance, Transcendent-tier)
- Idol Pages Set → Prop: A Rose Without Bloom (Quality: Unknown, Status Attribute: Unknown)

[System: Player Bai Liu's overall small TV rating]

With a combined statistic surpassing 20 million credits, Bai Liu's gameplay video, The Rose Factory, has been awarded the Diamond and Crown Badge.

The system's algorithm assigned a 214:13 like-to-downgrade ratio, leading to a final rating of Gold Crown Badge level. As a result, Bai Liu's video is now eligible for the VIP Library.

Access Conditions:
Players must be VIP members to watch Bai Liu's The Rose Factory gameplay.
Each viewing costs 10,000 points, with profits split 50/50 between Bai Liu and the system.

[Achievements Earned]

#1 on the King's List
Seventeenth player to achieve a small TV view count exceeding 10 million

---

Game Exit

Due to Charles' extravagant move of flooding No Man's Land with money, a surge of players were logging out simultaneously. The typically balanced system space now felt cramped and overcrowded.

From the exit gates, the King's promotion screen was faintly visible, towering over the central hall.

Positioned in the very center of the lobby, the King's Seat was the most prominent display—a massive screen announcing top-ranked players across all divisions. It was the ultimate publicity for any rising contender.

As soon as players stepped through the boarding gates, they were greeted by Bai Liu's small TV speech playing on the King's List. The system's loudspeaker blasted its cheerful announcement:

[Unbelievable—Player Bai Liu has ranked first in the entire region in overall small TV stats and secured the top spot in the central screen King promotion! You are the king today!!!]

Whether out of curiosity or sheer fascination with Bai Liu, most players instinctively flooded toward the Central Hall upon exiting.

However, not all players joined the crowd. Some had urgent matters—like senior guild members being summoned for emergency discussions about Bai Liu's unexpected rise.

Charles' interference, coupled with Bai Liu's growing reputation, had thrown this support season into chaos. Even if Bai Liu wouldn't be competing until next year, his presence was already fracturing alliances this season.

"This guy always makes an entrance..."

"But this time, it's on another level."

With the league on high alert, Bai Liu had managed to steal nearly all the attention.

The Unseen Consequences
While some players rushed to their guilds, others were in a far worse state.

Many had suffered severe injuries in the game, and upon logging out, they collapsed—unable to move.

Under normal circumstances, in-game wounds would not carry over. But for those whose sanity had been completely eroded, where the lines between game and reality had blurred, their injuries became real.

Because their minds were convinced the wounds existed, their bodies complied.

At the boarding exit, a scattered mass of players lay motionless. Some were being stepped over by the crowd. While no one deliberately trampled them, few spared them a second glance.

Even after regaining slight mobility, most of them didn't move. They lay on their backs, eyes empty—lifeless husks, indistinguishable from corpses.

But among them, one 'corpse' moved.

He looked like he had crawled out of a sea of blood.

His entire body was soaked—whether in his own blood or someone else's, it was impossible to tell.

His features were delicate, youthful—suggesting mixed heritage. His golden-blond curls were now dyed a deep orange-red, matted against his face. Beneath the tangled mess, fresh apple-green eyes flickered.

From his slumped position against the exit wall, his gaze was locked on the giant screen.

He did not blink.

Not when minutes passed.
Not when blood dripped into his eyes.
Not even when his vision turned red.

He tilted his head, staring at the image of Bai Liu on the screen.

Then, slowly—painfully—he dragged himself forward.

With shattered limbs and fractured fingers, he crawled.

Each agonizing movement pulled him closer to the massive display where Bai Liu's speech played:

"..... I did my best to save each and every one of you, as promised ....."

"Each and every one of you is worthy of being saved ....."

His climbing hand froze.

His battered body convulsed, limbs twitching like a broken puppet, barely stitched back together.

He wrapped his arms around himself, hunching inward—a defensive posture.

Yet, beneath his fingers, his lips twisted.

If he removed his hands, the expression beneath would be monstrous.

An eerie, soundless tremor ran through him.

Then—

He laughed.

A hoarse, rasping laugh.

A sound that belonged to something that had crawled out of the abyss.

"Bugiardo." (Liar.)

His voice was a whisper.

"Padre, mi hai mentito." (Father, you lied to me.)

Chapter End Notes

The end of another arc!!!!!! ❤

Reality

The audience gathered under the King's screen in the central hall, eagerly watching the playback, but soon it ended.

Unable to contain their excitement, the crowd began chanting.

"Go to the exit to meet President Bai, who has passed the game!"

With that, the people made their way toward the exit in a frenzy.

Normally, the exit functioned smoothly, but now it was jam-packed with not only those who had come to greet Bai Liu but also onlookers and other guilds curious about him.

Fortunately, the crowd was divided by dimensions, or else a stampede would have been inevitable.

The boarding gate was bustling with people, everyone straining to catch their first glimpse of Bai Liu as he emerged from the exit.

Amidst the bustling crowd, Bai Liu stepped out.

Though there were countless players coming and going, the moment Bai Liu appeared, anyone who glanced in that direction immediately recognized the man in a plain white shirt, suit trousers, and an eerily calm demeanor.

"Bai Liu!!!"

"He really made it through Level 3!!!"

The crowd, which had left a narrow aisle, suddenly swelled, forming an impenetrable semicircle around Bai Liu. Everyone wanted to see up close the man who had reached the top of the King's List despite falling into no man's land.

But it was the members brought by Muke and Mu Sicheng who cleared a path, pushing the crowd back to give Bai Liu some space.

Bai Liu was followed by Tang Erda and Liu Jiayi, who had come through the boarding gate with him, along with Muke and Mu Sicheng, who were visibly relieved.

Amidst the cheers and shouts, a man, lying bloodied on the ground, caught sight of Bai Liu and whispered something to Tang Erda through the throng of legs.

Bai Liu stood in the center of the crowd, overshadowed by the masses, yet undeniably at the center of it all.

He knew that a single glance from him would silence the crowd and command their obedience.

He had dreamed of this moment three thousand seven hundred and forty-one times.

His apple-green eyes reflected Bai Liu, separated by countless shadows, and the people around him—Tang Erda standing behind Bai Liu's left shoulder, Liu Jiayi barely reaching Bai Liu's waist, Muke, who was on the verge of tears as he neared Bai Liu, and Mu Sicheng, grinning with his elbow on Bai Liu’s right shoulder.

In this dream, the person closest to Bai Liu had always been him.

He would always stand sixteen inches behind Bai Liu, in a protective position where he could defend against anyone except Bai Liu. He would stand there, waiting for Bai Liu to turn around, reach out, and pat his head, spine, or shoulder, saying with a smile, "Daniel, good job."

As Bai Liu came closer, he suddenly moved.

Daniel dragged his injured limbs across the soles of the crowd’s feet, being trampled, but he didn’t mind. His eyes stayed fixed on Bai Liu’s face, and inch by inch, he crawled forward, leaving a bloody trail behind him.

Finally, he reached the spot he had dreamed of—sixteen inches away from Bai Liu.

He stayed still, quiet, and motionless, trampled by the crowd, his trembling arms supporting his small, bony frame like an injured animal hiding in the grass.

He raised his head slightly, prostrated at the feet of the crowd, and peered through the gaps to gaze at Bai Liu. The faint light glimmered in his eyes, the blood dripping from his jaw onto his trembling hands.

Daniel waited for Bai Liu to turn back to him—and he would. Bai Liu always turned to check for him whenever they left the boarding exit, and if Daniel wasn’t there, Bai Liu would wait for him to appear.

[Daniel is my most important child].

Bai Liu always said this, teasing him with a smile.

Bai Liu stopped abruptly, and Daniel looked up, his breath halting. A circle of light fell over his head, and Bai Liu's emotionless face appeared, godlike after a horrific game.

Just as in his dream.

Bai Liu turned around with that smile Daniel could draw with his eyes closed. He clapped his hand on Muke's head and said, "Why are you crying? You did a good job, Muke."

The gods, in the presence of his suffering, bestowed blessings on other children.

—Simply because that child was crying with happiness.

Muke was fine, but after being comforted by Bai Liu, he nearly had a heart attack.

Bai Liu didn't waste time with Muke, simply giving the order, "Stop, there's something to do."

Muke's tears stopped immediately. He looked up at Bai Liu, trying to appear professional. "What's up?"

While they were talking, a small, bloody hand suddenly reached out from the crowd, grabbing Bai Liu's ankle, trying to stop him from leaving.

Startled, Muke instinctively stepped forward to block the hand.

He kicked the hand away, and it fell limply to the ground, quickly swallowed by the crowd.

"What's wrong?" Bai Liu turned to Muke.

"Nothing... looks like someone's playing a prank," Muke replied, looking suspiciously through the crowd to find the culprit.

Bai Liu had made many enemies, and some guilds wanted to target him, but it was odd to do it in a game lobby—players couldn't attack each other there, and a bloody hand like that seemed more like a horror game prop.

Muke assumed it was just a prank.

Still, he wanted to find the person responsible, but after searching twice and failing to identify them, he gave up. "What did you want to talk to me about?"

The moment Muke turned, his shoulder blocked Bai Liu's view of the crowd.

They wouldn't know that beneath the cheering crowd, in the darkness, bloodstained green eyes watched, unwavering and desperate, as Bai Liu seemed to walk away.

—Watching everyone around Bai Liu, saved by him and graced by his presence.

"Muke, do you remember the address of the factory under investigation?" Bai Liu asked, looking at Muke. "That factory is about to explode. We need to log out quickly and get there."

Everyone paused, confused.

Tang Erda, still processing, looked at Bai Liu incredulously. "Are you going to blow up the factory?!"

His mind was still stuck on the time when Su Yang had told him Bai Liu had blown up a factory. He assumed if he stayed close enough to Bai Liu, the explosion wouldn't happen.

"I didn't blow up the factory," Bai Liu said quickly. "If I'm not mistaken, it's part of the game's process when logging into reality—the factory directors at the Rose Factory started the explosion."

Bai Liu didn't wait for Tang Erda to respond and turned his attention to Muke.

After a moment of shock, Muke quickly caught up with Bai Liu's train of thought. After a brief search in his mind, he confirmed, "I remember the address of the factory."

"Great. Now check for the closest logout point to the factory for any of us." Bai Liu glanced at the group. "Has anyone logged in or out near there? A car would be best."

Everyone lowered their heads to check their logout locations.

Tang Erda, still uneasy, was reassured when Bai Liu patted his shoulder and said calmly, "Relax, whatever happens, I have a solution."

Whenever Bai Liu said that, Tang Erda felt a shiver run down his spine. But today, those words were strangely comforting.

Tang Erda exhaled, settled himself, and quickly checked his logout position.

"I have a boarding place only 5km from there." Mu Sicheng raised his hand quickly. "I rented a flat near campus, and I have my car here. It only fits two, though, so we'll need to find another car…"

Bai Liu interrupted him, "Two people is fine. What kind of car is it? Is it fast enough?"

Mu Sicheng twitched a smile. "Fast enough to be a heavy-duty motorbike."

At four in the morning, the streets of the neighboring suburbs were eerily quiet.

It was clearly a disruption to tear through such a peaceful street on a roaring motorbike, but it was obvious that the two men couldn't care less about that at the moment.

Instead of sitting normally, Bai Liu arched his back, pressing himself against Mu Sicheng, who was riding in front of him without a helmet. Bai Liu's hands gripped Mu Sicheng's waist tightly, and his white shirt fluttered in the night breeze.

Any traffic cop who saw the two of them in this position would surely have been forced to blow their whistle.

"…I told you this bike is mine. I don't usually carry passengers. It's a single-seater," Mu Sicheng muttered, his voice muffled by the oversized helmet. His hands gripped the handlebars, steadying the bike to keep Bai Liu from falling off.

He continued to complain, his voice tinged with frustration. "There's only one helmet, and you still have to climb up here with me! And now I have to drive at full speed!"

"Over four hundred at full speed! If you get thrown off, you'll end up splattered all over the place!" Mu Sicheng snapped.

"I trust you won't let me die like this," Bai Liu replied coolly, unfazed. He glanced at the time on Mu Sicheng's wheel, then calmly added, "Go full speed, or it'll be too late to stop the game from landing."

"Fuck!" Mu Sicheng cursed as he tightened his grip on the handlebars. The engine of the motorbike roared in response, signaling its sudden acceleration. "Hold on tight! If you get thrown off, I'll be fully responsible when the traffic cops get to you!"

Reality

In the dead of night, a massive motorbike with tawny trim zoomed past, kicking up a cloud of dust.

They were drawing closer to the factory, which was on the verge of exploding.

The factory, where the rose perfume had been secretly produced, was located on the outskirts of the city—right at the moment when Su Yang and his team had come to investigate.

Su Yang held the special gun of the Bureau of Heresy against his side, cautiously peering around with his back against the factory door.

After scanning both sides, Su Yang stepped out, lifted his collar, and spoke into the small microphone pinned to him.

“No one. Safe.”

At the same time, a voice crackled through his headset.

“Captain Su, all clear on our side too. Safe.”

“Zone 2 is also clear.”

“...Zone 3 is safe too, Captain Su. This is strange...” The voice in the headset faltered for a moment. “It doesn’t even look like anyone’s been here. The ground is all dusty, and the most recent footprints are all ours.”

“The last time we inspected this factory, it wasn’t like this. It’s like it’s been abandoned for years...”

Su Yang’s eyes remained calm and clear. “Don’t panic. It’s possible a new heresy has emerged with the dry leaf rose, or perhaps this new heresy is the source of the dry leaf rose.”

“That would mean the heretic has some kind of ability.”

Su Yang continued his search, stepping over the piazza littered with withered leaves. He reached the processing clerk’s dormitory, where he eyed the old, warped door. Without hesitation, he kicked at the gap at the bottom of the door where dampness had caused it to buckle.

Inside, the corpses lying on the dormitory beds stirred, their twisted limbs rising as they stumbled to their feet. Their rotting eyes turned toward the door, which was about to be kicked open, and moved slowly towards it, their skeletal bodies dragging along.

Meanwhile, on the ground floor of the factory...

The team held their noses as they moved through the foul-smelling replica of a prison. They scanned the neatly arranged iron cages one by one, while a team member behind them carefully filmed the structure with a night camera.

The greenish glow from the camera cast an eerie light over the dimly lit underground.

"...These cages were built to hold something," one of the team members remarked, furrowing his brows as he stepped further inside. "When we seized this factory a month ago, it wasn't like this at all."

"Yeah," another team member agreed. "And we've had people monitoring the place closely. This factory hasn't been operational. I don't know what they've been using to produce and ship the perfume."

As they spoke, they moved deeper into the factory.

At the far end of the basement, a massive, three-meter-high cylindrical glass tank stood, with an opening at the top emitting rosy smoke. Inside, the brightly colored liquid made from the dried leaf rose was swirling.

On the glass case, a countdown timer ticked down, showing less than ten minutes remaining.

If Bai Liu had been there, he would have estimated that the amount of perfumed liquid inside the case could easily pay for the entire staff of the Rose Factory in the game for a year.

Dried leaf rose gas is a highly flammable and explosive substance. A portion of it could explode, sending the fragrance of the rose throughout the nearby city, still asleep in its peaceful night.

Even if Bai Liu had figured out how to neutralize the dried leaf rose using blood lucerne branches, there would still be many dried leaf roses that would have wilted in the early days of the disaster before any kind of order was established.

For example, mothers still breastfeeding and newborns just a month old.

The players carefully approached the end of the cage when one of them suddenly sniffed the air and frowned. "...I smell a very strong rose scent."

The words instantly put the team on high alert. They raised their torches and searched the dungeon, walking past the glass tank filled with the fragrant liquid.

But something odd happened. It was as if they couldn't see the glass tank at all. They even seemed to be able to walk straight through it, as if they were in two different dimensions from the object that was about to explode.

"...This is strange. I can smell it, but why can't I see anything?" The team stared at the empty last cell, their brows knit in confusion. But eventually, they chose to turn away.

The team moved toward the exit on the ground floor and switched on their comms to broadcast to Su Yang. "Captain Su, we can smell the roses on the ground floor, but there's nothing here."

Behind them, the countdown timer skipped a second, dropping from 9:00 to 8:59.

On the ground floor of the factory, outside the dormitory, Su Yang kicked open the door.

Su Yang stepped onto the dusty dormitory floor, gun in hand, scanning the room warily. He finally tucked the weapon into the back of his waist.

He frowned at the empty dormitory, then lifted his collar to inform his team. "I didn't find anything on this floor either. But I did smell a strong odor of decomposing bodies..."

"I thought I'd find the dozen missing employees here after a month, but there's no sign of them..." Su Yang sighed and then perked up. "No news could also be good news. Maybe they're still alive."

"Let's stay alert. In addition to searching for the equipment used to secretly produce rose perfume, we also need to look for those dozen employees who were listed as missing when we last searched the factory a month ago..."

“Most of them are high-risk individuals who travel abroad for work. No one would notice if they went missing. They might still be alive. Have the team ready to rescue them at any time...”

As he spoke, Su Yang stepped outside.

In the space behind him, a dozen pairs of rotting, maggot-ridden eyes stared at him without moving.

Eight minutes and forty-seven seconds remained until the explosion.

“Eight minutes and forty-seven seconds to go,” Bai Liu calmly informed.

"It's going as fast as it can!" Mu Sicheng gritted his teeth, his motorbike tires nearly sparking on the cold ground as they spun at high speed. He cursed in frustration, "Damn it! If the explosion in the game is really that big, it must take a massive container of perfume. So why can't the people who went to check it out see anything?"

"It’s impossible not to see." Bai Liu replied coolly. "To minimize the danger from the rose perfume, the Heresy Handling Bureau investigation has crossed into a territory that's preventing them from seeing what’s happening."

"Normally, not even a single rose seed would be missed, let alone an entire bottle of perfume."

Mu Sicheng paused, stunned. "Then why...?"

"Because the entity that planned the Rose Factory game has a level of authority above theirs," Bai Liu said, his voice steady as the night wind tousled his hair. He raised his eyes toward the factory in the distance. "It’s like how ordinary people can’t hear anything about the game world in reality."

"These people, who are trying to protect others, can’t see or touch anything related to the game world."

"The game designers created a fabricated ‘inner world’ for the factory manager, which hides the real Rose Factory. This allows the factory to continue running in ‘reality,’ undetected."

Mu Sicheng exhaled sharply. "It’s the same design as the Rose Factory game, isn’t it?"

"Exactly." Bai Liu squinted against the harsh night wind. "From what I understand, Tang Erda and his team are monitoring these factories 24/7 for potential perfume production, yet this one continues to produce it for export. That's illogical in itself."

"Unless they're making the perfume in the inner world and then flipping it to sell in reality, making it completely untraceable." Mu Sicheng spoke, more rhetorically than expecting an answer.

"That's right," Bai Liu confirmed.

He continued, "Not only that, the in-game newspapers report that before the explosion, the Bureau of Heresy Processing had repeatedly searched the factory, yet instead of issuing an urgent evacuation notice for the city, they stayed put until the bomb detonated."

"It shows they didn't detect anything dangerous."

"Most likely." Bai Liu turned his gaze back to the approaching factory. "They probably just saw an empty factory, set up as a decoy."

"There won't be anything inside."

"Captain Su, it's an empty factory," the team reported over the comms after searching the entire building. "There's nothing here."

Su Yang frowned as he looked up at the weathered factory, his unease growing. He turned toward the car to retrieve some special night-vision equipment for another search. But the moment he opened the door, a hand reached out to him, as if expecting him.

Su Yang looked at the person sitting in the car, surprised. "What are you doing here? I thought I told you to stay at the Heresy Bureau and get some rest?"

Lu Yizhan, seated in the back, scratched his head sheepishly and gave a bitter smile. "Captain Su, I thought about it. This is related to Bai Liu. If he really did it, as a public official near him, I can't just ignore it. So, after reconsidering, I came along."

Lu Yizhan raised his eyes, exhaling deeply as he looked at Su Yang. "Please, Captain Su, let me search with you!"

Su Yang hesitated for a moment, then, defeated by the earnestness in Lu Yizhan's eyes, nodded. "It's an empty factory. There's no danger. If you want to come, you can."

Lu Yizhan breathed a sigh of relief, got out of the car, and followed Su Yang into the factory for the second search.

6 minutes and 31 seconds until the explosion.

The motorbike came to a halt with a steady, sideways skid in front of the factory.

A quick glance at Bai Liu revealed several vehicles with the Dangerous Heresy Bureau insignia parked outside.

Bai Liu had ridden in one of those cars on his way to the Heresy Bureau and had been unsettled by the creepy octopus emblem.

Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng quickly found a spot to hide as they got out of the car. The Heretics were patrolling outside, and since they were both escaped heretics and criminals, they were wanted by the Bureau and would be arrested on sight if spotted.

Getting arrested was not a big deal, Tang Erda could help with that, but dealing with it would waste valuable time.

"How do we get in? Break in?" Mu Sicheng asked, looking at Bai Liu, who glanced at his electronic watch, grimacing. "Only six minutes left!"

Bai Liu's gaze remained fixed on the factory. "We walk right in."

He touched the reverse cross and the system coin returned by Tang Erda, which was pinned to his collar.

[System Warning: Props not related to core desires are prohibited in reality - Zilla Zilla - Ban - Stop - -]

The rebellious electric zing of the warning faded.

[System Alert: Does player Bai Liu use the Transcendental Prop (Reversing Eye)?]

[This item provides a glimpse of the hidden evil truth.]

[OK.]

Bai Liu retrieved a glass marble-shaped eye with a rose floating in the center and held it between Mu Sicheng and himself.

"Close your left eye and look into this eye. It will allow us to enter the inner world of the factory."

Before Mu Sicheng could question Bai Liu's intention, he instinctively closed his left eye in compliance.

The rose in the eye bloomed slowly, dazzling them both. The surrounding lush landscape withered rapidly as the sounds of rotting corpses and the skulls of unknown creatures appeared beneath their feet.

Mu Sicheng took a deep breath, covering his head, pushing the eye away, and stepping back.

Though he had raced for so long without feeling any discomfort, just looking at the eye for a second made him nauseous—he felt a mental contamination from it.

They had entered a dark, realistic [inner world].

Bai Liu seemed unaffected as he gathered his composure, turning to look at the factory behind him. The once empty and silent building was now alive, bathed in dim light. Shadows—both human and spectral—moved around, carrying dustpans to deliver roses.

It was exactly the same scene as in The Rose Factory.

Bai Liu grabbed Mu Sicheng's wrist and pulled him forward. "Let's go."

"Wait! Do you even know where the bombs and the perfume are kept?!" Mu Sicheng tried to pull Bai Liu back. "We need to locate them first, or this will be a gamble."

"I'm guessing it's the cage at the far end of the dungeon, ground floor." Bai Liu glanced back briefly as they ran. "Someone told me."

Mu Sicheng was dumbfounded. "Who told you?"

Bai Liu's expression remained neutral. "Lu Yizhan. The fool."

"Hey! Wait a minute. When did he tell you that? Was it when the Hearts were blocked? Come on, tell me, Bai Liu!"

Bai Liu said nothing, not bothering with Mu Sicheng's questions as he pulled him toward the factory.

In the game The Rose Factory, Lu Yizhan, serving as a scent tester, had been locked in the last cage of the prison on the ground floor.

And Lu Yizhan, the fool, if caught with a group after the bombing, would have volunteered to be detained in the most perfume-contaminated, aroma-infused part of the factory to protect others and endure the worst of the torture.

— Was there a more polluted place in the entire Rose Factory than the spot where the explosion occurred ten years ago?

Bai Liu didn't think so. And he figured Lu Yizhan didn't think so either.

— So, the fool was locked in the very place where the explosion took place, for ten long years.

Bai Liu bypassed the factory guards and entered through the back door. As they passed a hallway, Mu Sicheng swiftly dealt with a few shambling corpses before turning the corner toward the basement entrance.

Mu Sicheng turned on his phone's flashlight and illuminated the way as they descended to the last cage.

A large glass vessel continued to emit a light pink smoke, and the entire cage was filled with the scent of roses.

The countdown on the glass container read four minutes.

"What do we do with it?" Mu Sicheng covered his mouth and nose and asked in a strained voice. "Do we move it? Or smash it?"

Bai Liu stared at the vessel for a second before responding calmly, "It's too late."

"What's too late?!" Mu Sicheng's mind raced as he looked at the countdown on the bomb. "There's still more than four minutes left!"

Bai Liu's gaze moved to the bomb beneath the glass container. "Smashing it won't help. The real bomb isn't this timed one. This one is just a lighter, and the real bomb is the perfume liquid—the gas bubbling out of it."

"Dry leaf rose gas. These perfumes are some kind of liquid-gas hybrid. Even if we smash this glass jar or remove this bomb, as long as the liquid remains, the explosion can still happen. Any spark could set it off."

"If the game designer planned for the factory to explode tonight, anyone in the factory could trigger it, just using the massive amounts of perfume liquid stored here. We can’t prevent that."

Bai Liu remained calm. "Unless the perfume stored here is used up all at once, they can still cause an explosion in the inner world and then transfer it to the real world when it happens."

Mu Sicheng dropped his hand from his face, his expression tense. "What now?"

"Evacuate the people." Bai Liu lifted his gaze. "Then we preemptively blow up the factory."

Tang Erda had commandeered a passing high-end private car, with Muke driving it at full speed toward the factory.

Muke and Liu Jiayi were in the back seat. The owner of the requisitioned car had been reluctant to lend it, but Muke handed over a credit card with a balance of over three million dollars, buying the car outright so they could make a quick trip.

"Still can't get through?" Muke glanced anxiously in the rearview mirror.

Tang Erda responded quietly, "I don't think we’ll get through. They always switch off their phones when they're on a mission. If we want to contact them, we'll have to go back to the Directorate headquarters and use the FM radio to intervene."

"It’s too late." Liu Jiayi shot back immediately. "Bai Liu should already be there. Call him and ask for an update."

As if on cue, Bai Liu’s call came through.

He called Tang Erda. "Captain Tang, is there any way to evacuate the citizens in the blast radius quickly?"

"A city-wide air-raid alert." Tang Erda replied quickly, but his expression tightened. "But that requires strong evidence of an imminent risk, and my privileges only allow me to deal with heretics in the Bureau. I can’t activate that alert."

"But we can’t prove it," Bai Liu responded rhetorically. "How can we explain to these people, who aren’t in the game, that the factory’s about to explode? It’s all in-game content, and we’ll be silenced if we try to warn them, right?"

Tang Erda leaned back against the seat helplessly. "Yes... they're completely deaf to it."

"The explosion..." Tang Erda's voice was hoarse as he rubbed his eyes. "It's still going to happen, isn't it?"

Bai Liu answered frankly, "Yes."

"But maybe it's just an explosion." His tone remained steady, without a hint of panic. "Earlier, you said that if someone could prove that something as dangerous as a rose gas explosion would happen, the alarm could be activated, right?"

Tang Erda sat up straighter, realizing that Bai Liu had come up with some plan, but he couldn't figure it out.

"Yes," Tang Erda said, breathing heavily. "But no matter the method, they won't believe it. They'll just think we're crazy if we tell people to run."

"How do you plan to prove that such a terrible thing could actually happen?" Tang Erda asked.

Bai Liu's voice took on a lazy, amused tone. "Captain Tang, don't forget your privileges. Remember to bail me out."

Then he hung up, leaving a confused Tang Erda behind.

The wind hunts through the night as dawn approaches.

Bai Liu adjusts his black trench coat, which doesn't quite fit him.

After smashing the glass jar and tossing the time bomb far enough to explode, they, the two outsiders, were indeed spotted by the Rose Factory employees in the inner world.

Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng were discovered and chased by the staff, who were also frantically preparing a second explosion using a stockpile of rose perfume—just as Bai Liu had predicted.

To buy time, Bai Liu left the fast-moving Mu Sicheng in the inner world to disrupt the staff preparing for the second blast, while he logged out to handle evacuating the city's population from the blast zone.

Before leaving the inner world, Mu Sicheng had asked Bai Liu and Tang Erda the same question: How would they convince the people in the real world that an explosion was imminent?

How could they convince ordinary people, who weren't part of the game, that their world was a brutal game full of monsters?

Especially since Bai Liu had been banned.

The real world felt a little cold, so Bai Liu wore the trench coat he had taken from the inner world to protect himself.

He stepped out from the hidden stairwell at the back of the factory, heading for the top floor of the Rose Factory. A large red-and-white plastic loudspeaker, which seemed to be used for staff training, was strapped to his wrist—just as it had been in the inner world.

As soon as he reached the top floor, the team below, who were closely inspecting the factory, spotted him.

"There's someone on the roof!"

"Is that the factory manager trying to escape? Hit the high beams and see who it is!"

"Level 1 alert!"

Two unmistakable beams of high-powered light swiveled toward him, illuminating the figure on the rooftop. Bai Liu squinted against the glare but didn't move, remaining still atop the highest point of the building.

The cold night breeze ruffled his hair and tugged at the hem of his ill-fitting trench coat. Morning dew lingered around him, and the scent of roses brushed his feet.

Below, the people recognized him.

"It's Bai Liu!!!"

"How did he get here?! Alert the Processing Bureau! The fleeing heretic 0006 has appeared at the factory!"

"Captain Tang says he's extremely dangerous! He can control all the heretics! What's he doing here?!"

Su Yang and Lu Yizhan stared up in disbelief at Bai Liu, who appeared to have descended from the sky.

Bai Liu, with his usual smile, raised the loudspeaker to his lips. "Good morning, everyone."

"Well, before I escaped, I decided to do something fitting for my status —" Bai Liu's smile widened, and the wind picked up around him. "—as a laid-off worker branded as antisocial. How could I not get back at society?"

"I lost my job, my friends, everything I had for no reason. I couldn't find anyone to hold responsible, and I was branded a monster and locked in a cage by you."

"How could I not retaliate?" Bai Liu's grin deepened, and he whispered, "I've decided to show you what it feels like to become a monster too."

"I'm going to blow up this entire factory, fill the world with dried leaf rose gas, and make all of you my slaves."

For a few seconds, there was stunned silence, before someone shouted urgently, "Contact the city! Sound the air-raid siren and evacuate all residents from the blast zone!!!"

"Someone is intentionally spreading the gas addictive substance!!!"

Su Yang watched Bai Liu creepily, standing on the top floor with one hand in his trench coat pocket.

The man was smiling at him, amused, through the morning breeze and the fading night. He spoke casually, his lips moving languidly, "Do you like the scent of roses, Captain Su?"

Reality

"Immediate apprehension of Heretic 0006, Bai Liu!"

Su Yang pulled out his walkie-talkie and issued a stern order, "HQ is sending in a large number of gas masks and extractors. The rest of the team will take the perimeter and use the extractors to secure the entire factory."

"Make sure to control the aroma from the explosion!"

The team members saluted and quickly moved out.

The only ones left in the clearing in front of the factory were a few team members with their guns trained on Bai Liu, and Su Yang and Lu Yizhan, who still hadn't recovered. Lu Yizhan stared at Bai Liu in disbelief, his clothes fluttering in the cold night wind.

Bai Liu, showing no sign of guilt or urgency, casually waved at him, unfazed by the fact that he was committing a mortal sin and should be fleeing immediately. With a smile, he addressed Lu Yizhan: "Remember to buy me thirty years of hotpot, Lu Yizhan."

For a moment, Lu Yizhan's mind was distracted by Bai Liu's words, and he almost asked, "Wasn't it ten years of hotpot? How did it suddenly go up to thirty?"

But before he could speak, Bai Liu raised his hands in surrender, as though he could sense the team members approaching behind him to arrest him, fully prepared to give in.

The team was momentarily stunned but quickly reacted, moving to pin Bai Liu's hands behind his back and cuffing him with the strongest, tightest handcuffs they had.

At that moment, Su Yang's stern voice came through a communicator on one of the team members: "Be careful not to engage him! Captain Tang said he has a strong verbal compulsion on strangers! He's very good at manipulating people to do things for him!"

"Is that so, Captain Su?" Bai Liu approached the team member's communicator slowly and methodically, tapping the answer button with his chin before the team member could react. He smiled into the device and said, "If I told you I have a solution to the rose perfume issue, would I be allowed to speak?"

All the team members focused their attention on Bai Liu for a moment. One couldn't resist stepping forward, grabbing Bai Liu by the neck, and demanding to know the solution.

This, they thought, was the way to save Captain Su and the 1,000 ordinary people from the Heretic's Bureau.

Su Yang's breath hitched for a moment before he coldly ordered, "Put him in mouth shackles and forbid anyone from making contact with him until HQ takes over!"

"Of course," Su Yang's tone softened slightly, a common psychological tactic in their interrogations, "If you're willing to share the location of your explosion, I could get you to talk."

Bai Liu sighed and replied nonchalantly, "I really tried to stop it, but the explosion was what solved everything."

Su Yang paused for less than a second before issuing a new order: "Withhold his ability to speak, forbid him to communicate with anyone, and don't let him influence anyone."

The team affixed a large ring shackle to Bai Liu's molars, forcing his mouth open—this tool, usually used to prevent heretics from biting during transport, resembled a dentist's mouthpiece but looked far more sinister.

Bai Liu was escorted down from the roof, his mouth forced open, unable to speak. As he passed Lu Yizhan, he glanced sidelong at him, his hands cuffed behind his back, and silently made the gesture for thirty.

Lu Yizhan stood, dumbfounded, watching as Bai Liu was led away to the car.

For a moment, his knees went weak. He took two deep breaths to steady himself and turned to Su Yang, who had followed the car. "What... what are you taking Bai Liu for?"

"Interrogation," Su Yang replied, placing one foot on the car and glancing back at Lu Yizhan. "Leave it to the professionals. We'll interrogate him like a heretic."

With that, he shut the door.

The last time Lu Yizhan saw Bai Liu, the man looked up at him, his gaze calm and unwavering.

—It was as if he had expected all of this.

The car, speeding toward the factory, suddenly swerved under Muke's driving, veering onto another road and leaving blackened tire marks behind.

"Bai Liu's phone is out of order, right?" Muke kept his eyes on the road but leaned his whole body toward the back seat, his voice dripping with venom. "When Bai Liu made that declaration, Captain Tang, do you know what that meant for you?"

"He should've been taken by your Heretic Authority. You'd better throw in the towel and get him out of there." Muke's eyes were cold with intensity. "If anything happens to Bai Liu, I won't spare any of you in the Heresy Authority."

"That includes you, Captain Tang." Muke glanced at the rearview mirror, his expression turning grim.

Sitting in the backseat, Tang Erda's mind was as muddled as ever. Bai Liu's comment had stirred him into confusion—it was clearly the same as in the other timelines, but with an entirely different purpose.

This made Tang Erda wonder: was the Bai Liu from the other timeline also there to save the day?

But Tang Erda quickly dismissed the thought. Bai Liu wasn't there to save anyone. His purpose at the factory was to spectate, or rather, to enjoy the explosion as the world fell apart around him.

Bai Liu knew when the factory manager would detonate the factory and deliberately directed an entire third detachment to the Rose Factory at that precise moment. Then, he positioned himself on the top floor, with the best view, to witness the disaster unfold up close.

But Bai Liu was different from his other selves—he found inspiration in chaos and used it to achieve what he hadn't been able to do before. He used a completely irreversible approach to accomplish his goal.

Tang Erda never imagined that someone would so directly threaten others into following their lead, but this was exactly how Bai Liu operated.

The process was harrowing, the methods extreme, and the consequences costly. It was beyond what any normal person could have come up with.

But Bai Liu had achieved his goal.

The sirens wailed relentlessly in the sky, their shrill echo reverberating over the city. Tang Erda watched as the lights in the houses along the street flickered on. People rushed out of their homes in panic, some in their pajamas, hastily driving toward the outskirts of the city in response to the sirens.

Meanwhile, a large number of heavily armed police officers arrived, following the sound of the alarm. Tang Erda observed some team members joining the scene.

Dressed in full protective gear—face masks, gloves, and tightly wrapped from head to toe—the officers wielded shield-sized electric fan-like extractors. They formed a reverse exhaust defense line, positioned five kilometers from the factory.

The quiet streets, once still, were now filled with activity.

Tang Erda tried to maintain his composure, struggling to make sense of the chaotic situation.

"Bai Liu's phone is off, so he's probably under the control of the team," he muttered. "Mu Sicheng's phone is out of service, and we still don't know what's going on. If Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng are both in the custody of the Heresy Processing Bureau—two high-risk heretics—then they'll likely be transferred to the Directorate for interrogation."

Tang Erda sighed deeply. "If Bai Liu covered for Mu Sicheng and was arrested alone, I know the Bureau of Heresy has a stronghold three kilometers from here."

"It's specifically for pre-processing heretics before they enter the Directorate. Now that the explosion hasn't happened, they'll need to extract information about it. Bai Liu will most likely be transferred there for interrogation."

"What if Bai Liu stays silent during the interrogation and continues pretending to be the mastermind behind the bombing to ensure the citywide retreat happens?" Muke asked, his tone calm but rhetorical.

Tang Erda's voice took on a sharp edge. "... We could use some of that on him, specifically for heretic interrogation..."

Muke's grip on the steering wheel tightened. "Like the Murphy Mirror, right?"

Tang Erda closed his eyes, the weight of the situation heavy on him. "… Yes."

Muke gritted his teeth and slammed his foot down on the accelerator.

Bai Liu was led into an interrogation room draped with a black cloth, which was only removed from his face after he was seated.

Looking across the table, Bai Liu raised an eyebrow in mild surprise.

Su Yang's gaze was heavy as he focused on the ring that was lodged in Bai Liu's molars. With a subtle flick of his fingers, the shackle that prevented Bai Liu from speaking was removed with a soft click.

The pressure on his gums had caused blood to seep from the corner of Bai Liu's mouth the moment the yoke was removed.

He absently licked the cold, metallic blood from his lips, then looked directly at Su Yang with a smirk. "I didn't think Captain Su would be interested in questioning me a second time."

"Isn't that what you wanted to see?" Su Yang didn't flinch, returning his gaze with equal intensity. "You named me as the poisoner of the rose perfume and used that to lure my team. If they were the ones to interrogate you, their fear of me would make them easy prey for you, catching them off guard."

Bai Liu leaned back in his seat, his hands cuffed behind his back, but the smile on his face only grew. "So, you chose to come yourself to protect your team from me, Captain Su. You're a good captain."

His smile widened as he added, "—reminds me of another not-so-popular captain."

"Compared to you." Bai Liu lifted his gaze, still smiling as he looked at Su Yang. "He's been treated so poorly by the players, no one even cares where he is after such a big event."

Su Yang's heart sank at the thought of Tang Erda, who had been so determined to capture Bai Liu, only to be questioned. His hands clenched in his lap, but he quickly forced himself to calm down, refusing to be distracted by Bai Liu. He remained focused, maintaining a cool demeanor.

The captain was right—Bai Liu was skilled at manipulating emotions, almost like a heretic himself.

“You wanted me to interrogate you, and now you’ve got what you wanted,” Su Yang said, locking eyes with Bai Liu. “So, are you willing to tell me where the blast site is?”

“No, I don’t want to,” Bai Liu responded softly.

Su Yang stared at him, trying to maintain control. “Why are you doing this? If you have an agenda, you can tell us. The Heresy Bureau can help you achieve it in a more reasonable way.”

“There’s no reason for that,” Bai Liu replied, amusement dancing in his eyes as he met Su Yang’s gaze. “If I must say, I’m just trying to show the world that there’s a third spellbinding pastime besides cigarettes and alcohol.”

Bai Liu leaned forward, his voice dropping to a whisper as he got close to Su Yang’s ear, his smile soft and unsettling. “They should try the rose,” he murmured. “Because it’s really wonderful.”

“I’m sure your captain would agree with me too.”

Su Yang’s pupils contracted slightly.

Reality

Muke drove the car as if it were taking off, reaching the stronghold Tang Erda had mentioned in less than three minutes.

Tang Erda got out of the car, adjusting his uniform and ID badge, and shut the door behind him. She blocked Muke from exiting, warning him sternly, “You and Liu Jiayi are still on the Heresy Authority’s wanted list, so stay in the car. If you insist on coming in with me, you’ll only delay saving him.”

Muke paused, his hand still on the door handle.

“I promise I’ll bring Bai Liu out unharmed,” Tang Erda assured him, his eyes locked on Muke’s. “He’s kept his word to me, and I’ll keep mine to him.”

“Do whatever it takes to get him out,” Muke said, pulling his gun from his back as he hurried toward the stronghold.

The Heresy Bureau’s base looked like an ordinary convenience store, but in the midst of the city’s panic, it seemed odd that the store was still running smoothly, with people calmly shopping.

As soon as Tang Erda walked in, the staff noticed him, then happily led him to the warehouse.

Watching Tang Erda disappear into the store, Muke took a deep breath, finally releasing his grip on the door.

“Do you think he’ll do everything he can to get Bai Liu out?” Muke asked uncertainly, glancing at Liu Jiayi, who had remained silent in the backseat.

Liu Jiayi, wearing sunglasses to hide her unusual eyes, showed no sign of panic. After Tang Erda left, she stretched, claiming the entire back seat and settling in as though ready for a nap.

“You’re asking me?” Liu Jiayi turned her head toward Muke, pulling down her magic mirror to reveal her gray eyes. “I think you should ask the question differently.”

Muke was slightly startled by Liu Jiayi’s relaxed demeanor but quickly responded, “...What question should I ask?”

“It’s not about when Captain Tang or whatever his title is will get Bai Liu out,” Liu Jiayi said, pushing the magic mirror back with a finger and slouching comfortably. “It’s about when Bai Liu thinks Captain Tang is qualified—and willing—to get him out.”

Muke frowned. “What do you mean…?”

Liu Jiayi whispered, “You’re not an idiot. Why are you still so confused about Bai Liu? Can’t you see? Bai Liu let himself be caught by the Dangerous Heresy Authority on purpose.”

Muke froze. “…On purpose?!”

“Right.” Liu Jiayi’s tone was unflappable. “If not, Bai Liu could’ve achieved his goal after making that explosive declaration. He forced the city into alert mode—he could’ve used his eye flip to go into the ‘inner world’ to hide, not stay put and wait to be caught.”

“But he got caught anyway.” Liu Jiayi shrugged. “That can only mean one thing—he let himself be caught on purpose.”

“Then why did Bai Liu let himself get caught?” Muke jolted, suddenly staring at the convenience store. “Is he trying to trick Tang Erda?”

“I think you’re right about one of his goals.” Liu Jiayi shifted in her seat, continuing, “Bai Liu allowed Tang Erda to join, so now Tang Erda is part of our group. The guy is so controlling, he won’t let Tang Erda feel a sense of belonging to anyone but us.”

“Bai Liu probably wanted to use this incident to force Tang Erda to make a choice—to cut himself off from the Heresy Authority and be completely controlled by him. Tang Erda’s the type to be easily manipulated out of guilt, and Bai Liu’s taking advantage of that.”

Liu Jiayi glanced sideways at Muke. “If I’m right, Bai Liu would have had the person in the Heresy Bureau who’s closest to Captain Tang interrogate him, even inducing him to be punished…”

“-If seeing Bai Liu punished by those closest to him would make Tang Erda feel more guilt and voluntarily cut himself off from the Heresy Bureau to make amends for Bai Liu…” Muke muttered, finishing her thought.

Liu Jiayi snapped her fingers. “Bingo!”

Muke exhaled. “So Bai Liu did this for the league, right?”

“Exactly.” Liu Jiayi nodded. “Tang Erda, as a committed main attacker who was loyal to his original team’s tactician, wasn’t submissive to his new team. Bai Liu, as the new tactician taking over, needed to break him psychologically to ensure his absolute loyalty.”

“This kind of treatment is usually a way of severing the psychological connection between someone and those closest to them.”

“-Just like Hearts did to me,” Liu Jiayi added after a moment of silence. “It was brutal, but necessary for a life-or-death tournament.”

“On the field, we can’t have the slightest doubt about the tactician’s orders—they must be absolute. Tang Erda clearly still has some rejection and doubts about Bai Liu, and that’s a fatal flaw for a starter of his caliber.”

“So Bai Liu set him up like this.” Muke relaxed, reassured that Bai Liu would be fine. “You said this was just one of Bai Liu’s goals. What about the rest?”

Liu Jiayi took off her sunglasses and gazed out the window at the convenience store’s sign.

The sign featured a small Q-shaped octopus—the logo of the Bureau of Dangerous Heresy.

“My guess is that Bai Liu used his status as a bomber to work with the Dangerous Heresy Authority, with Tang Erda acting as a third-party coordinator.”

Muke was stunned. “Cooperation?”

“With everything going on, the Heresy Bureau should be desperate to take down Bai Liu. And this is still cooperation?”

“What did you do to the captain?!” Su Yang’s tone finally shifted, his fingers tightening on the tabletop as he struggled to hold back his rising anger.

Bai Liu leaned back on the bench, which creaked under his weight. Crossing his legs, he lifted his chin slightly, flashing an almost contemptuous smile. “I compelled him with rose perfume and made him completely loyal to me.”

“He was abandoned by you, so I picked him up, trained him to be loyal to me, and to betray you.” Bai Liu smiled wider. “What’s wrong with that?”

“We didn’t abandon the captain!” Su Yang slammed his hand onto the tabletop, his breath shaky as he tried to steady himself, to regain control. He needed to change the subject, which Bai Liu had deftly deflected. “Where was the explosion?”

Bai Liu smiled, unfazed. “At the factory. Didn’t Captain Su know?”

Su Yang pressed further. “Where in the factory?”

“Oh yes, Captain Su still doesn’t know why the explosion site was chosen at this particular factory, does he?” Bai Liu’s smile grew more pleasant. “I know Captain Su’s home is within five kilometers of it.”

Su Yang’s breath caught in his throat for a moment.

“Captain Su has seen the videos of the deaths of people who tried to escape, right?” Bai Liu leaned back, resting his head on his shoulder as he looked at Su Yang. “Let me tell you something you didn’t see in those videos.”

“The blast’s impact creates a fragrance strong enough, within five kilometers, to send newborns and mothers into a state of heavy addiction,” Bai Liu’s voice was light, almost casual. “If they don’t get a high concentration of perfume within thirty minutes, they begin to wilt.”

“Captain Su hasn’t seen the wilting process of a heavy addict, has he? I’ve seen it many times.”

“The baby’s arms and eyes start to crack open like dry skin. The pain makes them cry, begging you for perfume as if it were milk.”

“And you, as a father, knowing exactly what they want, can only watch as your child screams in agony, turning into a corpse in your arms—broken into pieces…”

Su Yang’s eyes were bloodshot as he forced out the words. “Where was the explosion inside the factory?”

Bai Liu looked directly at him, then abruptly curled his lips into a smile, his tone now turning more conciliatory. “Why do you think I know so much about the wilting process of a newborn under the influence of the perfume?”

“Because I’ve experienced it myself, of course,” Bai Liu said, his voice softening. “A poor child withered in my arms, his mother kneeling at my feet, helplessly begging me to save him.”

Bai Liu sighed, a sad, almost nostalgic look crossing his face. “But I could do nothing but watch him wither, and his father wasn’t even around.”

Su Yang tried to maintain his composure, but his mind raced, his fears growing like a black hole inside him. No... An An and the baby were fine before he left...

His gaze instinctively shifted toward the door of the interrogation room, where a team member outside held up a scale, his face grim.

This is heresy [1076]—the judge's scales, a tool used to detect lies.

When Bai Liu lies, the scales tip to the [no] side. Throughout the interrogation, the needle had pointed to the [yes] direction.

This meant that Bai Liu hadn’t lied about a single word.

Su Yang’s mind went blank.

Bai Liu’s voice dropped to a whisper, his eyes downcast. “Captain Su, you know bombers often pick small, relatively close locations to test their explosions before carrying out the actual plan, right?”

“Guess where the pre-test site for tonight’s explosion was?”

Bai Liu’s eyes gleamed with a smile, his lips curling at the corners. It was a smile Su Yang had seen on countless deranged and tainted faces —a completely dehumanizing smile, lighter on Bai Liu’s face, but more disturbing than ever.

Bai Liu smiled, his voice soft yet cold. “How did you think we got your ID card?”

“Maybe you could ask your wife how she’s doing tonight?”

Reality

Su Yang emerged from the interrogation room, his face ashen, appearing more like the one being interrogated than Bai Liu. He almost collapsed as he stepped out.

His team members quickly rushed to support him.

The interrogation had taken place in a one-way glass room, and the conversation could be heard by everyone outside. Everyone understood the implications of Bai Liu's words.

"Captain! Use other heretics to interrogate him! Like that Eye of the Spring! Captain Tang said 0006's weakness is water!" one of the team members urged.

"No!" Su Yang snapped, coming to his senses, gripping the team member's hand to stop him. "There's no direct evidence that Bai Liu is really a heretic. We can't use that on him."

"If he's just a common criminal, it's against the rules. We can't do this to him. It's unfair..." the team member's voice shook with frustration. "A common criminal who put the whole city at risk with a dry leaf rose explosion?!"

"Captain," the team member continued, his voice growing more intense, "I know what you're trying to do. You're trying to treat Bai Liu like a human, not a heretic. But does he deserve that?"

Su Yang stared at him, his pale face resolute. "He's worthy."

The team member was momentarily stunned by Su Yang's unwavering response. His chest heaved as he struggled to regain his composure. "Even if your loved ones—your children, your parents—could have been tortured to death in that explosive pre-experiment, you still insist he shouldn't be treated as a heretic?"

"Yes, I insist." Su Yang didn't hesitate. "If Bai Liu is a human being, then he shouldn't be treated like a monster."

The team member took a deep breath. "Captain Su, the second team is coming to take over Bai Liu. If you don't get something out of him before then, they won't leave him for us to deal with. They'll go straight to the spring, just like Captain Tang did."

"I know." Su Yang waved them off, taking a sip of water before pushing himself to his feet. "I'll try again."

Su Yang reentered the interrogation room.

He hadn't slept for days, and the toll of the dry leaf rose had left him haggard. Yet, he did his best to remain calm, sitting across from Bai Liu— the man who had likely done something to his wife and daughter.

Su Yang poured Bai Liu a glass of water, setting it before him. "I really want to help you. If you tell me where the explosion was set, I'll do my best to help you get leniency."

Bai Liu's eyes flicked briefly to the glass of water, but he didn't reach for it.

Su Yang's voice remained steady, but his mind raced. "Is there someone preventing you from talking? Someone else involved in the bombing? If you're afraid of retaliation after leaving here, we can protect you..."

Bai Liu interrupted him, his expression shifting. He glanced at Su Yang with a hint of pity in his voice. "It's not that I don't want to tell you. It's that I can't. Even if I do, you won't be able to understand. You won't be able to see, hear, or remember it."

Su Yang was taken aback. Bai Liu continued, his tone calm and almost detached. "Your captain fought tooth and nail to get you... and these people behind that glass will never see the truth."

Bai Liu turned his gaze to Su Yang, his smile almost melancholic. "It's foolish, but if that's what he wants, if you can't carry the burden of his foolishness, I might have to... cut you apart."

Su Yang's heart skipped a beat. "What do you mean?"

Before he could get an answer, his communicator rang.

"Captain Su! Captain Tang is here!" came the voice over the intercom.

"Captain Su, the second branch is here too!" another voice added urgently.

Su Yang's face flushed. He stood up, heading for the door, but Bai Liu's gaze met his unflinchingly, as if waiting for him to answer his question.

"Captain Su, when you spend time with your wife and daughter, do you ever feel like your protectiveness will one day suffocate them?" Bai Liu's voice was soft, but heavy with meaning.

Su Yang froze for a moment, uncertainty creeping into his thoughts.

Bai Liu's words lingered in the air. "Your captain feels the same way."

Bai Liu turned his attention to the glass, his expression unreadable, as if peering through it to something beyond. Su Yang knew it was impossible—unless Bai Liu wore special contact lenses, he couldn't see what was on the other side.

Su Yang stepped out of the interrogation room, his mind clouded by Bai Liu's cryptic words. There was something unsettlingly gentle in Bai Liu's coldness, as if he had chosen to leave something cruel for Captain Tang to face instead of finishing it himself.

Out in the hallway, Su Yang walked into a heated confrontation.

The second detachment, known for its ruthless and decisive methods, had a much more brutal reputation than the third detachment. Their leader, Cen Buming, was a man of severe authority, and under his command, there would be no hesitation to use extreme measures against a suspected heretic.

However, the third detachment had one trump card: Tang Erda.

Tang Erda's authority was unmatched, delegated to him by the former head of the first detachment. Even Cen Buming was bound by this higher authority.

As soon as Su Yang emerged, he saw Tang Erda confronting Cen Buming.

Cen Buming's appearance was imposing. His left eye was covered by an eyepatch, and two deep scars ran from his jaw to his collarbone. His uniform was loosely draped over his shoulders, with bloodstains still visible on his cuffs. The ID card hanging from his jacket read:

[Second Detachment Leader: Cen Buming].

It was common knowledge that Cen Buming had lost his left eye during the arrest of a heretic. He had never appointed a vice-captain, preferring to wield all the power himself.

"Captain Tang, Heretic 0006 should have been transferred to Detachment 2," Cen Buming said, his tone cold. "The explosion was imminent, and after 13 minutes with Team 3, no information was obtained. It's logical to move on to the next phase of interrogation. But your vice-captain—"

Cen Buming's piercing gaze focused on Su Yang, his eye bulging like a hawk's as he continued, "—Su Yang, has been inaction. This delay is a major dereliction of duty."

Tang Erda stepped forward, standing between Su Yang and Cen Buming. "I gave the order. Bai Liu is not yet confirmed as a heretic, and cannot be subjected to that kind of torture."

Cen Buming sneered, his gaze shifting to Tang Erda. "Captain Tang, if I remember correctly, you used more than three types of heresy on Heretic 0006 during the torture 25 hours ago. And in his escape, he unleashed heretics throughout headquarters, injuring 67 members, 17 of whom are still in critical condition."

Cen Buming's voice dropped into an icy sneer. "And now you're telling me he's not a heretic?"

He ripped his jacket off and tossed it aside, pulling out a file from the team member behind him. He handed it to Tang Erda, who flipped it open and froze at the number on the file: 0006.

The document confirmed Bai Liu had already been classified as a heretic by the Bureau of Heresy.

Tang Erda's eyes scanned the report with a stony expression. The file included disturbing details about Bai Liu's abilities—his manipulation of other heretics, his hostile nature, and his capacity for extreme cruelty. The report also noted his resistance to water, making him an especially dangerous target.

The final line of the report left no room for doubt:

Danger Class: Unknown (Extremely High, Classification Pending).

Reality

"Everything here, Captain Tang, is something you personally testified to in front of everyone. There's no turning your head and disowning it."

Cen Buming stepped forward, forcefully trying to enter the room where Bai Liu was being held.

But just as he reached the door, a loud bang echoed overhead. After the ground shook for a moment, someone stumbled through the exit, their face pale. They looked up at the group and spoke in a strained voice.

"Report! ... The factory exploded—it's gone up in flames!"

Su Yang, visibly anxious, immediately asked, "Have all the people within a five-kilometre radius been evacuated? Not just the citizens, but even the homeless on the streets—have they been informed?"

The man hastily swallowed before responding, "Everyone's been swept out and notified. Not a single cat was left behind. The smoke is still spreading, but we're setting up a second extraction line. It should contain the contamination within 28km of the factory."

"But the members of the first line of defense..." His voice faltered with sadness. "They're all tainted."

Tang Erda closed his eyes. The worries and fears he had been holding onto for so long relaxed in an instant. Every muscle in his body collapsed as he fell back onto a bench, his arms and legs dangling loosely over the edge, his head tilted back, staring at the blinding incandescent lights on the ceiling.

For a few seconds, he couldn't hear the voices around him. All he could hear was the ringing in his ears, punctuated by Bai Liu's calm voice—[Captain Tang, leave it to me. I have the solution.]

—This was the least amount of casualties and the most manageable outcome Tang Erda had ever experienced across all the worlds he'd known.

It felt unreal, like a dream granted by divine mercy.

Tang Erda raised a hand to his face and laughed aloud, breaking the tense silence. His sudden laughter startled the players around him.

They turned their heads in shock, staring at Captain Tang, who was sitting on the bench, half-covering his face while laughing. For a moment, they wondered if their captain had lost his composure, overwhelmed by the bad news.

Cen Buming raised an eyebrow at him. "If Captain Tang is still drunk, I'll take the heretic 0006 who caused two major group accidents."

Tang Erda lowered his hand and stood up, his gaze darkening as he fixed it on Cen Buming. "You can't take him."

"I'm using my [Prophet] authority for the last time." Tang Erda took off his ID card and placed it on the table, sliding it in front of Cen Buming with four fingers. "I pledge as Captain to extract Heretic [0006] as my personal responsibility bound to him."

"If Bai Liu has done something wrong, I will take full responsibility for him." Tang Erda looked up steadily at Cen Buming. "If you want to torture him or kill him, then you'll have to torture and kill me too."

A long silence followed.

Su Yang stared at Tang Erda in disbelief. "Captain?!"

Tang Erda didn't blink as he locked eyes with Cen Buming.

Cen Buming remained silent for a few seconds before slowly reaching out and taking the Captain's ID card from the table. He raised his eyes to meet Tang Erda's gaze. "Captain Tang, once you bind this Heretic, you will no longer be able to return to the Heretic Authority, and you'll cease to be the 'shiny' captain you are."

"You must take responsibility for guarding the heretic for the rest of your life. If the heretic does anything wrong, you'll be guilty alongside it. And if you can no longer control the heretic, you'll have to take your own life and bring the heretic back..."

"You'll exist only to allow this heretic to move about in the world like a human. You'll be nothing but a cage, a safety pin to keep the heretic contained." Cen Buming asked, his voice low, "Even so, are you sure you want to release Heretic 0006?"

Tang Erda's gaze never wavered. "Yes."

"Even if, like the captain of a detachment, you lose your sanity and kill yourself because you're bound to Heretic 0001—do you still have no regrets?" Cen Buming's eyes bored into Tang Erda's.

"No regrets," Tang Erda replied firmly.

The [Prophet] permission within the Heretic Authority grants special privileges to the captain of the first detachment, and among these privileges is one that allows the captain to bind a heretic and release it into the human world, taking full responsibility for the heretic's actions.

This permission was an anomaly, running counter to the primary goal of the entire Heretics Directorate.

Whereas capturing heretics for the [Bureau for the Treatment of Dangerous Heretics] is a process of dehumanizing these dangerous individuals and treating them as nothing more than monsters, this authority instead attempts to restore human rights to these heretics and reintroduce them into society.

Naturally, this process is fraught with peril.

So when the original leader of the first detachment proposed this permission, a poignant question arose—[Who is responsible for the heretics released back into society?]

[What if these heretics continue to kill and harm others? Who will bear the consequences?]

Thus, the captain of the first detachment introduced the concept of [lifetime responsibility], or [parental responsibility authority].

Anyone advocating for a heretic's release assumes full responsibility for their actions—becoming the heretic's guardian, educator, and protector, taking on the role of a parent.

But as a parent of such a dangerous "child," constant surveillance is mandatory.

The player chosen to bear this responsibility essentially ceases to be a part of the Heretic Bureau and becomes the heretic's lifelong guardian.

No one wanted this responsibility. No team member willingly accepted it. They couldn't understand why the [Prophet] thought these evil, dangerous heretics could somehow become human, deserving the compassion of parents and the hope of being reformed.

In the eyes of most team members, a heretic is a monster—a being fundamentally separate from humanity, born evil and deserving of eradication.

But the [Prophet] could see more of the future than they could, and so, in the end, this authority passed. The first experimental case was Heretic 0001.

But the experiment failed. The heretic went mad, killed the captain, and destroyed the records, leaving them sealed deep underground, never to be spoken of again.

Despite the failure, the authority still existed. It was a part of the strange permissions passed to Tang Erda by the [Prophet].

If Tang Erda used this [parental authority] on Bai Liu, he would have to step down as captain, guard Bai Liu at all times, and take full responsibility for everything Bai Liu did—including the recent explosion at the Rose Factory.

Cen Buming threw the ID card back onto the table. "How can you be responsible for this when nearly two thousand people are infected, including half our team?"

"Bai Liu has a solution," Tang Erda responded quickly.

Cen Buming scoffed. "A bomber, and you think that will fix things?"

Tang Erda took a deep breath but didn't engage with Cen Buming's taunt. Instead, he asked, "Can I speak with Bai Liu inside first?"

"If you insist on binding this dangerous heretic," Cen Buming, who had stepped back to the doorway, gave Tang Erda a meaningful look, his tone light, "You certainly have the right to talk to your 'child.'"

Tang Erda pushed open the door and walked in.

Bai Liu, chin propped on his hand, glanced up boredly at Tang Erda.

His eyes lingered briefly on the empty spot on Tang Erda's right breast where the ID card used to be before he smirked. "Wow, Captain Tang must be making quite the sacrifice to get me out of here."

Tang Erda turned and sat upright in a chair, hands neatly clasped on the table, head bowed in silence. He looked more like someone being reprimanded than Bai Liu, who had a casual, relaxed posture.

"I'm sorry," Tang Erda said quietly. "Thank you."

The apology was for everything he had done before, and the gratitude was for Bai Liu's willingness to help despite it all.

"It's fine, no need to thank me," Bai Liu said with a smile.

Bai Liu glanced at the glass, then asked, "How many people were affected by the explosion?"

"The current count is nearly a thousand, mostly team members," Tang Erda sighed. "But the spread is under control, so it could be worse."

"So, you came in because someone wants to save those thousand team members?" Bai Liu dropped his hand from his chin and rested his head on the table, cocking it to one side, his voice tinged with amusement. "Not really, but I have one condition."

Tang Erda leaned in, intrigued. "What's the condition?"

Bai Liu's eyes were still fixed on the one-way glass as he smiled faintly. "I never make a deal without something in return."

"If you want to work with me and let me save lives, show me something that can impress me."

Tang Erda stepped out the door and addressed the team. "You all heard Bai Liu's conditions."

The team members exchanged complex and mixed glances, overwhelmed by Bai Liu's request, with the exception of Cen Buming, whose expression remained unreadable.

The captain, however, seemed intrigued, his gaze fixed on Bai Liu, who was still lounging behind the glass, seemingly asleep.

"Interesting," Cen Buming remarked with a smirk. "I thought he was going to ask for money, but it turns out he wants us to open the door to Heresy 0001."

Reality

Headquarters of the Bureau for the Treatment of Dangerous Heresies

Bai Liu was escorted here under heavy guard. This time, he was ushered through the gates with a formal reception.

On either side of the main entrance, people stood in line, their eyes filled with fear, hatred, and disbelief as they stared at the heretic who had escaped last night and voluntarily returned this morning.

The massive glowing white sphere slowly rotated, opening its entrance to him.

Bai Liu entered without a glance, flanked by his second detachment leader, Cen Buming, on his left, and Tang Erda on his right, with a large contingent following behind them.

If his hands weren't still cuffed behind his back, he would've looked like the leader of both teams—the former captain of the first detachment.

But in reality, he was just a fugitive who had been pursued by two detachments before being captured and brought back.

Bai Liu was led to the elevator. Cen Buming swiped his card and pressed the operation button, while Tang Erda stepped forward, took a deep breath, and pressed the bottom button.

The elevator descended, plunging deeper into the ground.

At some point, the smell of the sea began to permeate the narrow lift.

"I'm surprised you agreed to my terms so quickly," Bai Liu said, glancing at Cen Buming, who stood behind him on his left. "After all, Heretic 0001 seems very important to you."

Cen Buming glanced at him. "Not more important than two thousand lives. It's more significant to the first detachment captain—its guardian, and the one who decided to seal it, a heresy we don't even know much about."

He paused. "And you just said you'd take a look. It's not our problem." Cen Buming sharply tapped the back of Bai Liu's head, forcing it forward with a click. "Look ahead and don't look at me. The dossier says your eyes have a... compelling effect on people."

Bai Liu, caught off guard by the tap, said nothing.

Tang Erda, who had provided the information for the file, remained silent.

The elevator stopped, and the doors opened smoothly. Bai Liu stepped out.

Stepping once again into the depths of the Dangerous Heresy Bureau, the atmosphere was drastically different from last time, but the scene remained the same—a long, dark tunnel, completely devoid of light, with the scent of seawater drifting in from an unknown source. At the end, a door stood silently, forever sealed.

"Just to be clear," Cen Buming spoke as they walked, "we're not opening this door for you. After all, we don't know how dangerous Heretic 0001 is." He glanced at Bai Liu. "We promised you could use Heretic 7061, the Mirror of Perspective, to see what's behind the door."

"One minute. That's all."

Cen Buming held up a black box marked with [7061] and waved a strangely shaped watch in front of Bai Liu's eyes. "If you confirm, I'll unlock the cuffs, give you the Mirror of Perspective, and start the clock."

Bai Liu turned to Cen Buming, accepting the uncuffing without objection.

Cen Buming unlocked the cuffs, but added, "As far as I know, everyone who's seen Heretic 0001 has gone mad and committed suicide."

He paused. "Including my former captain, the greatest captain of the Heresy Bureau, [Prophet]. It's not too late to back out."

As soon as the cuffs were removed, Cen Buming pressed a gun to Bai Liu's head.

Bai Liu raised his hands in a casual manner to show he was unarmed, then rubbed his wrists, which were bruised from the cuffs. He turned his head to face Cen Buming, who stood with the gun still pointed at him, and asked with interest, "And this great captain, did he say anything else about Heretic 0001?"

Tang Erda, standing nearby, shook his head. "Most of the information is sealed in top-secret files, and no one has access to it."

"But there's a small part I know." Cen Buming looked at Bai Liu. "[The Prophet] said everyone would be so terrified of what Heretic 0001 reveals that they'd go mad upon seeing it."

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. "Like Murphy's Magic Mirror?"

"No," Cen Buming replied, moving closer to Bai Liu with the gun pressed against his forehead, his eyes as cold as the muzzle. "Murphy's mirror is fake. What Heretic 0001 shows you is real." He leaned in closer. "All heretics have names. Do you know what Heretic 0001's name is?"

Bai Liu asked, "What is it?"

"[The Future]."

Bai Liu glanced at Tang Erda, who seemed just as disoriented as he was. He, too, was hearing the name Heretic 0001 for the first time.

"[The Future]? Why does it drive so many people mad with fear?" Bai Liu turned his attention to Cen Buming, whose demeanor suggested he was harboring many secrets.

"Maybe the very existence of [The Future] is to make people afraid and drive them mad," Cen Buming answered coolly, pressing the gun to the back of Bai Liu's head as he guided him forward. "Fear comes from the unknown. Is there anything more unknowable, more frightening, than [The Future]?"

Bai Liu raised his hands and walked forward. "Sounds like Captain Cen has seen his [future]."

"I haven't," Cen Buming said, his tone unnervingly calm. "But the known [future] would strip away both my fear and my motivation to chase it." He paused, then added, "But you're about to decide whether you want to see your [future]."

Bai Liu looked up and saw the massive, welded-shut door of Heretic 0001 before him.

The door was tall, cold, and impregnable. It stood like an immovable wall between Bai Liu and the scent of Xie Ta that lingered in the [future].

Bai Liu inhaled deeply, sensing Xie Ta in the [future] that awaited him.

"Thinking?" Cen Buming asked, eyeing Bai Liu. "Do you want to see your scary [future]?"

"Maybe sometimes [The Future] isn't so scary," Bai Liu replied softly. "When you know there's someone in your [future]."

Without turning around, Bai Liu calmly extended his hand to Cen Buming, who, after a moment of hesitation, placed the box containing Heretic 7061 in Bai Liu's palm and unlocked it with his fingerprint.

The heavy stainless steel box unfolded in all directions, revealing a pair of finely crafted, old-fashioned spectacles, wrapped in velvet cloth.

"Hold it up until it's flat against the line of your pupil position, like when a doctor measures your prescription for nearsightedness," Tang Erda directed in a hushed voice. "Adjust it until the iron door in front of you becomes transparent."

At the same time, Cen Buming pressed a button on his watch, starting the countdown.

As the second hand ticked, Bai Liu saw through the old, scratched lenses of the monocle. The iron door slowly faded away, revealing an empty, silent, white void.

The pure white light spread endlessly inward, as if no matter how much one looked, all that could be seen were these emotionless lights.

Then, as Bai Liu’s vision began to blur, a small television with a static-filled screen appeared in the distance.

It flickered twice, then changed to a black-and-white screen with a blinking dot and a large row of subtitles:

[Last World Line Game]
[Player: Bai Liu and his friends (?) We] [Set Mode: Very Hard Mode (Hell Mode)]
[Setting the main game part 1 - The tragedy of parting love]

The image blurred as if viewed through a haze, reminiscent of a horror game from the 80s or 90s.

On the screen, Bai Liu saw bobbing water, floating ice, and bubbles rising from his mouth and nose. He appeared to have fallen into the water, struggling weakly. Judging by the floating limbs, he had been drowning for over four minutes, yet seemed to be diving deeper instead of swimming toward the surface, as if reaching for something that had sunk below.

As the perspective shifted, Bai Liu saw what he was reaching for: a heart, still beating, sinking into the ocean floor.

Just as he was about to grasp it, a hand reached through his chest and grabbed the heart first, crushing it as it was pulled away, the blood misting out into the water.

Bai Liu watched himself slowly turn, his body stiffening and sinking, his eyelids closing as the waters turned red and blue, the screen flickering and turning black.

But in that fleeting moment, he saw the man who had crushed his heart—his face identical to Tawil's.

The figure, holding the still-beating heart, watched from above as Bai Liu froze in the icy water, the cold dark sea consuming him.

The image faded out, and new captions appeared:

[Setting up the main game part 2 - Ten-year-old friends who went their separate ways]

The small TV screen trembled violently, as if someone was shaking Bai Liu, shouting at him in desperation:

"Bai Liu! You can't go on any further! You've done enough to win!"

Bai Liu recognized the voice.

He also recognized the man who was shaking him on the screen—his face bruised, tears streaming down, a look of desperation in his eyes. It was the first time in ten years that Bai Liu had seen this expression.

Lu Yizhan stood before him, gripping his shoulders, wrestling him to the ground repeatedly.

Bai Liu's body was drenched in blood, bruises covering his limbs, while Lu Yizhan, though less wounded, seemed to be on the brink of tears. He wiped his eyes, his face a bloody mess, before looking up and choking out, "Bai Liu, what is the meaning of your existence?"

"- Just to be the monster standing opposite me?"

"Aren't you alone?"

Reality

Lu Yizhan's screen fades to black, and a new line of captions appears on the small TV.

[Setting the Game's Main Line, Part 3 – The Fractured Intimate Team]

The scene fades in from a distant view, revealing a full sun over the sea, shrouded in a gentle, misty haze. As the camera draws inwards, it focuses on a vast, majestic temple, mysterious and beautiful, hidden within the blue sea mist and the light of the day.

Yet, it seems the temple has just endured a fierce battle. Black craters mark the ground from fallen fire and stone, with unmistakable fusion marks: Liu Jiayi's poison, Mu Sicheng's claw scratches, Tang Erda's bullet holes, and Muke's dagger cuts.

The men should have been here, but strangely, Bai Liu is the only one present. It's also odd that Bai Liu hasn't found any traces of his own attacks.

The marks from the fishbone whip are distinct, but Bai Liu searches the footage several times and finds nothing. The signs of attack from the other four men, however, are everywhere.

It feels as though Bai Liu had never been there or that his presence no longer mattered in a team battle where everyone fought fiercely.

As Bai Liu presses on, through the charred jungle shrubs and scattered grey stones, he finally finds the trail of the four men.

Or perhaps "trail" isn't the right word—it should be "corpses."

Liu Jiayi, with a bullet hole in her forehead, lies on her back, her grey eyes wide open. The poison from her hand spills onto the ground, where Muke slumps.

Muke’s eyes are dazed. The dagger in his hand clings to one of its blades, while the other is lodged deep in Mu Sicheng's chest. Mu Sicheng is pinned to a tree by this dagger, slumped against it, his claws hanging limply at his side, blood dripping steadily down.

The blood belongs to Tang Erda, who leans against a rock, his head tilted and eyes closed. His throat is scratched and bloody, and his hand still grips a gun—but the gun is nowhere to be found.

Bai Liu now understands why there are no signs of his own attack. This was a team civil war that he hadn't participated in, and one that, for all its brutality, had not yet ended.

At that moment, Bai Liu hears a voice, faint and distant, drifting through the clouds with an eerie laugh that echoes across the mountains and forests:

"It's game over for this world line, Bai Liu."

"You lose."

The screen fades out, and the text on the small TV turns black:

[Set Game Mainline DLC - Game Archive for Other World Lines]

The noisy static on the TV clears up, revealing a plain white room identical to Heretic 0001. In the center of the room sits a long table, with five earthy-yellow file folders neatly arranged.

Behind the table, a man in the uniform of the Bureau of Heresy Processing is sorting through the files. The image is framed at his chest, obscuring his face, but an ID card clipped to his breast pocket reads [Captain of the First Detachment].

The name on the back is coded, making it impossible for Bai Liu to decipher.

The Captain flips open the first folder.

[Heresy 0004: Mu Sicheng]

Spiritual Degradation: After witnessing the accidental death of his classmate Yuan Qingqing in 200X, Mu Sicheng’s descent began. Encouraged by his college roommate Liu Huai, he entered the game. Later, he became enraged upon seeing Liu Huai's betrayal and killed him, ultimately joining a wandering circus...

Archived Ending in World 0237: Assassinated by Liu Jiayi, the Little Witch.

Archived Ending in World 0412: Abandoned by Bai Liu after three years of incapacitation, shot by Joker in a chase.

World 0045: Taken in by the Heretic Authority, transformed from a heretic to a normal human through spiritual ascension. Later integrated into society.

Formed a new team with Bai Liu in the current world line (Serial number 0658), mentally stable, no signs of further descent into monstrosity.

The Captain moves to the next folder.

[Heresy 0601: Liu Jiayi]

Spiritual Degradation: Born blind, Liu Jiayi endured severe abuse before the age of six due to her father's actions. After being kidnapped and sold into prostitution, she was saved by Liu Huai but later triggered a violent outburst, joining the game.

Archived Ending in World 0261: Shot dead by authorities after resisting arrest while abusing her father.

World 0068: Taken in by the Heretic Authority and integrated into society after spiritual ascension.

The Captain swiftly flips through the next files.

[Heresy 0005: Daniel Cinchimani]

Spiritual Degradation: Born into a family of arms smugglers, Daniel was raised in gangs, indifferent to death. At age fourteen, he led a gang in an arms smuggling operation involving Bai Liu's heretical goods. He later killed his father and brought his family to Bai Liu.

Archived Ending in World 0107: Killed while on a mission after slaughtering seven team members and releasing 108 heretics.

Daniel is highly domesticated by Bai Liu, making him extremely difficult to capture.

The Captain hesitates for a moment, sensing something unusual, before picking up another file.

[Heresy 0002: Tang Erda]

Spiritual Degradation: Originally a member of the first team, now the leader of the third team. His spiritual stability began to decline after he became a hunter in World 0317. Tang Erda, chosen by Bai Liu in World 0325, continued to descend through multiple world lines until he fully transformed into a heretic in World 0642.

Under observation by the Heretic Authority, Tang Erda is now mentally stable, with no further signs of degradation.

Bai Liu's gaze lingers on the final file, marked [Heresy 0006: Bai Liu].

Spiritual Degradation: Unknown, spiritual descension seems to have been complete from birth.

In every world line except the current one, Bai Liu has successfully contaminated the world, resulting in game over. In World 0407, his contamination successfully disrupted the timeline.

Bai Liu requests a game of Heretic Contamination against the Heretic Authority, with the outcome determining whether the world line is fully contaminated or not. If Bai Liu wins, the Heretic Authority will continue to exist in every world line as a hostile force.

The ending of this world line remains undetermined.

The images on the small TV fade to black as Bai Liu's lens is removed by Cen Buming, standing before a thick metal door.

Cen Buming raises an eyebrow. "Time's up. What did you see that you haven't seen enough of?"

"I saw the truth of the world," Bai Liu responds.

Cen Buming looks at him. "That sounds even scarier than [the future]."

Bai Liu smiles. "I agree with you on that one."

"So, what's the truth?" Cen Buming asks.

Bai Liu says softly, "The truth is that our reality is a game that can be constantly restarted."

Reality

Cen Buming covered his ears, frowning for a moment before quickly letting go. "What did you say? My ears were ringing, and I didn't hear you."

"Nothing." Bai Liu changed the subject. "I've seen what's behind the door, and in return, I'm going to give you a way to free these two thousand people."

"- There's something that can painlessly eliminate the contamination caused by dried leaf roses."

Cen Buming held his breath. "What is it?"

"Blood Lingzhi." Bai Liu shrugged. "If I remember correctly, you've preserved the raw material for the cure — or, in your words, 'housed' it — by taking the strain from the few children who survived the orphanage."

Cen Buming stared at Bai Liu, his gun now raised to Bai Liu's forehead. "Blood Lingzhi can only be cultivated using the blood of certain children. Yet, there are nearly two thousand adults waiting for rescue. Are you suggesting we use young children's blood to illegally breed heretics?"

Bai Liu smiled. "Isn't it often said that the antidote is hidden within five steps of the poison? Perhaps you could try using the blood of the two thousand infected to cultivate the Blood Lingzhi."

Cen Buming froze.

Bai Liu brushed past Cen Buming's shoulder as if he didn't notice the gun aimed at him and walked toward the outside lift entrance.

Tang Erda placed a hand on the gun Cen Buming still aimed at Bai Liu, locking eyes with him before shaking his head in warning.

Cen Buming lowered his gun, shooting a quick glance at Tang Erda before looking at Bai Liu's retreating back. He narrowed his eyes at Bai Liu's intact right eye, then firmly wiped his gun and tucked it back into his waist.

"You know, Captain Tang," Cen Buming said coldly, "this isn't the first time I've used the Mirror of Perspective on someone. But it's the first time I've seen someone use the lens with their left eye — especially when that person is right-handed, which doesn't align with their usual habits."

"I was almost starting to think your ward was mocking the fact that I only have one right eye."

Bai Liu was indeed the kind of person to have that kind of malicious wit.

Tang Erda noticed Bai Liu deliberately switching hands when holding and positioning the lenses. He raised an eyebrow and glanced slowly at Cen Buming's left eye.

Bai Liu was a man with a score to settle, and when Cen Buming teased him, though Bai Liu rarely spoke about it directly, he didn't shy away from subtle ways to provoke him.

Cen Buming shot Tang Erda a cold, stern look. "Are you sure you want to let such a clever heretic go free?"

"I owe him." Tang Erda replied before running toward Bai Liu.

It took a long time before Cen Buming finally emerged from the shadows. One hand stroked the blindfold on his left eye, his right eye fixed on Bai Liu and Tang Erda as they walked away. He muttered in a grim tone.

"No one owes the monster. It's the monster that owes us."

Tang Erda dropped Bai Liu off at the door of the Heretic's Bureau and winced as he saw a group of Third Squad members standing there, eyeing Bai Liu with hostility.

— These are the debts he owes.

Many of the team members who had stayed behind last night had battled the heretics Bai Liu summoned, and since the truth couldn't be revealed, their hostility toward him would likely linger for some time.

Unless... those resentments were redirected toward him.

As Tang Erda stood there, lost in thought, a sudden shout broke through. "Captain!!!"

Tang Erda's pupils flickered, and he stopped, slowly turning around.

Su Yang stood in the doorway, looking at him intensely. He held his uniform in his hands, his eyes red, and behind him stood almost the entire third detachment.

They looked at their former captain as though they had been abandoned, watching the confused and fleeing hunter.

"Captain, do you really have to go?"

Tang Erda froze, unable to move. His fists clenched.

— These people. These players. These eyes.

The smallest moments of happiness and beauty he had known in over three hundred meaningless reincarnations were tied to these faces—faces that smiled, faces that slept peacefully.

The faces of these men remained as vivid in his memory as the image of the soundly drunken hunter, curled up exhausted in a pile of monsters with his gun as his pillow.

— It was his duty. His mission. His destiny. His inescapable fate when these men died for him.

Bai Liu, also halted in his tracks, glanced back at the scene. Not at all surprised, he patted Tang Erda's shoulder in a reassuring gesture and gave him a gentle push forward.

"Say your goodbyes to your crew. I'll see you outside."

Bai Liu said, then waved lazily and turned away, walking off without looking back.

Tang Erda stumbled forward at the push, looking down at his worn-out Heretics Authority uniform, at his hands, thick with calluses from battling monsters and living heretics. Then, he looked up—deeply, confusedly, and in disbelief—at Su Yang and the team standing across the room.

— Su Yang.

Suddenly, it dawned on him that he had almost lost track of himself—and of them.

Tang Erda only remembered the bad, the broken, the images of blood and hatred carved into each of their faces like small knives, slowly shaping his memory into something disfigured and bloody.

He couldn't remember the last time he and Su Yang shared a drink from a chipped beer mug, or when they celebrated with the others. He couldn't recall the time Su Yang had leaned over his shoulder, curling his eyes and saying, "I'll be waiting for you in the background."

It had all been so important, so precious—these memories had kept him going. But now, they felt so distant, so faded, as if they belonged to a different third detachment leader altogether. Not the Tang Erda he had become—a monster.

The more he tried to return to the past, the further he was pushed away from it.

"Captain, please don't go!!!"

Su Yang held Tang Erda's uniform flat in his hands, his back straight, and gave him a solemn 90-degree bow. His voice was strained, but still filled with emotion.

"Captain, please don't go!!!"

Led by Su Yang, the entire third detachment of players bowed their heads in unison, shouting for him to stay. Some of them even had tears streaming down their faces, dripping onto the ground.

Tang Erda finally took a step forward, slowing his pace as he moved toward Su Yang and the others. He silently accepted his uniform from Su Yang.

Su Yang looked up in surprise. "Captain?!"

Meanwhile, at the other end of the area...

Muke and Liu Jiayi had received a text message from Tang Erda and immediately drove to wait outside the Heretics Authority.

When they saw Bai Liu emerge unharmed, Muke, who was in the driver's seat, let out a long breath and slumped back in his chair.

Liu Jiayi, who had gotten out of the car to stretch, leaned against the door and, hearing footsteps, looked up in surprise.

After a few moments of listening, she asked incredulously, "You're the only one with footsteps, and you left that big guy at the Heretic's Authority?!"

"Aren't you afraid he'll stay there?" Liu Jiayi crossed her arms and, eyeing the direction of Bai Liu's footsteps, added, "I don't believe you haven't noticed that he has a stronger sense of belonging to the Heretics Bureau as a group. Leaving him there, expecting him to cut his psychological ties to the Third Branch... that's like sending a sheep into a tiger's mouth."

"He won't develop a sense of belonging to our side." Liu Jiayi shook her head, saying with certainty, "I can feel that he's repelled by us—he even harbors some hostility."

Liu Jiayi raised an eyebrow, criticizing Bai Liu. "Aren't you going in circles to control Tang Erda? What's going on? You're not the type to drop the ball at the last moment."

Bai Liu turned to face Liu Jiayi, unbothered by her confrontation. He leaned against the car door, took a sip from a bottle of water he grabbed through the driver's side window, then answered her question.

"I'm just curious to see what choice Captain Tang would make if I didn't intervene."

"What's up with you all of a sudden?!" Liu Jiayi stamped her foot. "The league's in two months! If you don't control your team soon—and with someone like Tang Erda—you'll lose him like Hearts did!"

Bai Liu looked down at Liu Jiayi. "So, you want me to control Tang Erda the way Hearts controls you? Tear him away from the people closest to him?"

Liu Jiayi froze.

"I had planned to do the same," Bai Liu admitted unapologetically.

He put the cap back on his water bottle, casually pocketed his other hand, and gazed out over the massive white circular building. The morning breeze and the dew from the sun ruffled his hair and made the hem of his untucked shirt flutter in the wind.

The dazzling sunlight bathed Bai Liu in its glow, casting a pale smile on his face as the dawn faded away.

"But sometimes," Bai Liu murmured, "I think it feels good to connect hearts and minds... in a Lu Yizhan kind of way."

The glittering daylight pierced through the foggy morning mist, splitting into countless bright rays that merged into one another, tinting the sky and casting light across the barren, monster-ridden ground. The huge round metal buildings and the octopus-shaped uniforms gleamed in a brilliant gold as the beams reflected off them.

Tang Erda looked down at the sunlit octopus badge on the team shirt, which had followed him for centuries. He stared at it for a long time, then let out a long, deep breath, followed by a soft laugh.

"Captain?" Su Yang asked carefully.

"Do you remember when we first trained as reservists in the Heretic Authority?" Tang Erda asked, bringing up an unexpected topic.

Su Yang was stunned but answered seriously, "I remember. We all started as reserves for the first team and trained hard."

"It was hard to stop me from being reckless, wasn't it?" Tang Erda mused. "I was the most impulsive person in the whole detachment back then. Whenever I saw heretics killing people, I couldn't hold my temper—I had to fight back. Every time, the first detachment leader would stop me, teaching us so much."

"Yes, back then Cen Buming was still the vice-captain of the first detachment, and he was very strict with us, but also kind, calling the first detachment captain 'senior,'" Su Yang recalled.

Tang Erda seemed lost in thought. "Did I really fight with Cen Buming?"

"It was over twenty years ago, so it's normal if you don't remember," Su Yang smiled. "Why bring this up all of a sudden?"

"I just... suddenly remembered something the first detachment captain once said to me." Tang Erda lowered his eyes, staring at the squad badge, clenching it as he whispered, "There are no two identical leaves in this world, nor are there two identical timelines—"

"When you're chosen by time, no matter how many things or people you encounter that you want to stop for, you know they are no longer the real ones. The ones you wanted to stop for—they've long passed. You can't look back. You can only move forward."

"This is the future that belongs to you."

Tang Erda raised his head and glanced around at all the players before speaking in a deep voice.

"I became the Guardian and Binder of Heretic 0006. The accidents caused by Heretic 0006 last night and this morning were the result of my misjudgment, which led to the intensification of the situation—"

His dark blue eyes were clear and resolute. "I am solely responsible."

"Heretic 0006, who is not a wounded-type heretic, controlled himself during two violent riots and didn't kill anyone. He made amends afterward to avoid the consequences. But I misjudged him and used various methods to force him into causing the accident, for which—"

In front of the stunned team, Tang Erda bent deeply and bowed.

"I am deeply sorry."

"I will do my best to compensate the 67 players injured last night, and the explosion at the Rose Factory has been resolved as punishment—" Tang Erda gripped the team badge and pulled it off with a firm tug.

Su Yang snapped, "Captain!!!"

But it was too late.

The team insignia was torn off intact, and Tang Erda took a deep breath. "I resign as the leader of the third detachment and, as the Binder of Heresy 0006, I will never return to the Heresy Management Processing Authority until it is fully integrated into society."

Su Yang closed his eyes, his jaw trembling with clenched teeth.

Tang Erda straightened up, smiling as if he had let go of everything. His eyes were red, and he held the team badge trembling in his hand. He shook off his uniform and draped it over Su Yang's shoulders, patting him on the back and gently placing the captain's badge in Su Yang's hand.

Su Yang stared at him, dismayed.

Tang Erda's voice was soft. "I hereby appoint Vice-Captain Su Yang as the new Captain of the Third Detachment, transferring all permissions to him except the Prophet permission."

"I order you, Lieutenant Su, to pick up the badge!" Tang Erda's tone was firm.

Su Yang held back the tears that streamed down his face, clenching his teeth as he took the team badge from Tang Erda. "Yes, Captain."

Tang Erda smiled, his voice quiet. "You'll make a better captain than I ever did, Su Yang."

Su Yang held the badge and uniform, crying uncontrollably.

For over twenty years, Su Yang had never imagined the day Tang Erda would no longer be his captain, or in such a self-punishing way.

Su Yang understood the significance of the Heretic's Bureau to Tang Erda, and how terrifying it must be for him to give it up.

Su Yang had thought of countless ways for Tang Erda to leave the Heresy Authority—whether through being killed by heretics, dying by contamination, or even perishing as a heretic's caretaker. But he never imagined it would end like this. To Su Yang and every team member, the idea of Tang Erda leaving the Heretic's Bureau alive was unthinkable—it was worse than death.

Tang Erda had led them into battle. He was the ever-present, righteous, and brave captain—impetuous at times, but always present in life-and-death battles, never afraid of a heretical "game" that never returned.

But when did they begin to drift apart?

Su Yang watched tearfully as Tang Erda walked away in the early morning sunlight. He waved, resigned, yet his dress trousers and shoes, tailored by the Heretic's Authority, were worn and ragged. They still clung to him as if the old uniform had become part of him.

But the crest that had "grown" on his heart had been ripped away by his own hand.

Bai Liu leaned against the car, waiting. Liu Jiayi couldn't resist making a sarcastic comment about Tang Erda, still inside. "Bai Liu, you'll regret your weakness. Our captain doesn't look like someone who can leave the team without a fight. He'll turn his back on the team..."

No sooner had Liu Jiayi spoken than a dark figure appeared under the circular building, heading toward them.

It was Tang Erda. His team shirt was torn and tattered, but he was walking toward them.

Liu Jiayi's words trailed off as she looked incredulously toward the source of the footsteps.

Tang Erda approached, and Bai Liu appraised him from head to toe, his eyes lingering on the tattered team shirt. With a teasing smile, he said, "I thought you'd leave the team logo with Su Yang, along with the shirt."

Tang Erda, no longer surprised by Bai Liu's insight, nodded and spoke in a husky voice. "That was the plan—the uniform and the badge were for him..."

Bai Liu's gaze settled on the shirt Tang Erda was wearing. "So?"

"But Su Yang insisted on leaving me the uniform," Tang Erda murmured. "He said the badge was always meant for me for a while, and that he would always wait for me to return."

He fell silent for a long moment before continuing, "But I can't go back. That's not the future that belongs to me."

"I just have to keep moving forward."

The Game Pool

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

In the car on the way back, Bai Liu, sitting in the passenger seat, briefly shared his ideas for the league.

"You guys want to compete this year?" Tang Erda frowned.

"I think it's too soon," Liu Jiayi slumped back in his seat, exhausted. "Only two months left, and Bai Liu and Muke are both still 48 and 49 entries short for the league games. I think you'll have trouble signing up for both."

Bai Liu turned slightly to Tang Erda, who was sitting directly behind him. "Captain Tang, do you have any suggestions? If you were leading us, what would be the fastest way to get through a copy?"

Tang Erda's frown deepened. "I don't know your situation well enough to predict..."

Bai Liu quickly changed the question. "If it were you, what would be your fastest time through a Level 3 copy, measured by real-world time?"

Without hesitation, Tang Erda replied, "31 minutes."

Liu Jiayi, who had been drinking water in the back seat, choked, and Muke, who was driving, nearly swerved off the road.

They both asked in unison, "How did you do it that fast?!"

"31 minutes to clear a Level 3 game... What kind of monster is this guy?"

Tang Erda explained calmly, "Time in the game dimension is converted to real time through two separate conversions: first to the dimensional time in the system lobby, then to real-world time from the system's dimensional time."

"In-game time is converted into dimensional time in the system lobby, but it's not based on the duration inside the game. It's calculated through three possible game endings."

Tang Erda continued, "For example, a game can end in three ways: [bad end], [normal end], and [true end]."

"[Bad end] results in invalid dimensional time. If a player hits a bad end, dies, or becomes a monster in the game, their time becomes frozen and cannot convert to either dimensional or real time."

"As for you, Bai Liu, the dimensional time you typically achieve through [true end] is the longest a game can last. Converting that into system time takes around 3.5 to 5.5 dimensional hours, which then converts to 21 to 27 real-world hours."

Bai Liu stroked his chin, deep in thought. "Is there a fixed ratio for converting dimensional time to real time?"

Tang Erda shook his head. "No, there seems to be a pattern, but it's not fixed. It can remain consistent for a while, then change later. I haven't figured out a stable ratio yet, so I can only estimate."

Bai Liu narrowed his eyes. "The fluid, indeterminate time conversion rules... isn't that similar to the time conversion between a game copy and the system lobby?"

Combining what he had seen in [Future], Bai Liu was almost certain that [Reality] was also a kind of game copy dimension.

If [reality] is another copy within the system, then the time conversion between [reality] and the system should follow a different "end" path.

The system and [reality] seem to have some kind of time conversion rule, where players follow a fixed "end" path during this period. When they change paths, the time conversion rules shift as well.

—So, what “end” of the game path is he following in this copy of [reality]?

[True end], [normal end], or [bad end]?

"The fastest way to clear is to follow the [normal end] path," Tang Erda continued. "Without exploring any monster books or searching for clues, just kill the big boss and meet the quest conditions to rush through. My fastest record for a Level 2 copy was 17 minutes."

Liu Jiayi slumped into his seat, stunned.

"Seventeen minutes for a secondary copy..." he muttered.

At this speed, even if they took on four copies at a time, two months would be more than enough to enter the league.

The league is fierce—and terrifying.

"But two months is still too short," Tang Erda warned seriously. "Even if you qualify, you're so far behind in player quality that training will be more important than qualifying."

"Once you register, you'll need to train in the game pool at least sixty times and become familiar with the league's game copies and rules before you can join."

Liu Jiayi raised his hand and added, "And popularity matters a lot. You need to gather support outside the game to boost your votes. Players who rank in the top 100 for popularity during the support season get a [get-out-of-jail-free card] for the league."

Muke, still feeling a bit lost, asked, "What are the game pool and the get-out-of-jail-free card?"

As a newbie, Muke had just gotten the basics of the lobby and wasn’t as familiar with the league’s specific rules as Tang Erda and Liu Jiayi were.

Liu Jiayi sighed, realizing Muke was still catching up. "Right, I forgot you're both new. The [Game Pool] is a special division that only players who’ve successfully registered for the league can access. It’s mainly for internal training for league players."

Tang Erda nodded in agreement. "The game pool has a separate game selection screen, login and logout portals. Games played in this division aren't shown to the public—this is the [non-small TV section]."

"In the game pool, players can exit a game at any time," Liu Jiayi added seriously, raising a finger. "This is a key feature: the system offers protection for league-registered players. If their life or mental value drops to a dangerous level, they can exit the game by spending some points."

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. "So, the league is really important to the system."

—it even has this training area that sacrifices harvesting players' souls, just to make sure they can participate without issue.

"Don’t underestimate it," Tang Erda warned quietly. "The reason the game pool exists is that the games there are Level 3 copies directly tied to the league. Many people die before they can log out."

Liu Jiayi nodded eagerly. "That's right. From what Hearts said, the league matchups are drawn randomly from the game pool. It's hard to ensure familiarity with these copies. After each league, big guilds would immediately grind 52 copies to train in the game pool."

"Is that why we don't see many big guild players out there?" Muke asked.

"The only people you'll see in the [small TV area] are star players put on display by the guilds for business purposes. The really strong players spend all year training in the [game pool]," Tang Erda explained.

Liu Jiayi countered, "But that doesn't mean star players are weak. Most of them are actually very strong."

Muke was puzzled. "Star players?"

Bai Liu pulled out a pen and paper from the front seat drawer, quickly jotting down a few key terms. He circled one of them: [Death-Free Gold Medal]. "Does the existence of star players have something to do with death-free gold medals?"

Tang Erda paused for a moment before answering, "Yes."

"While you can log out anytime in the game pool, you can’t log out of league games until a winner is decided. That means the losing side is basically wiped out."

Bai Liu tapped the paper with his pen twice, his gaze focused as he murmured, "But this is a league, and if the losing team is wiped out, one team will disappear entirely from the game. The game couldn't continue otherwise, and they couldn't manipulate audience emotions to maximize league interest."

"That’s where the [Exemption Gold] comes in," he continued. "To preserve more popular and valuable players, the league created this prop."

Liu Jiayi sighed. "That's probably correct. If a player is awarded a [Death-Free Gold], the system will automatically log them out when their life or mental value reaches a dangerous level during a match."

"[Exemption Gold] is awarded based on popularity value—the audience's support. This is why the support season is so important. Two months before the league starts, major guilds aggressively promote their teams, pushing their star players for business."

"If a team has one or two star players, the rest of the team doesn't need to worry about [Exemption Gold] because the star players' fans will vote to ensure the whole team stays in the league."

Liu Jiayi raised two fingers. "For example, Hearts from the King's Guild, Spades from the Slayer Sequence, Charles from the Gamblers' Alliance, Georgia from Golden Dawn, and the Deer Hunter's Reverse God Inquisitor—he transferred to the Slayer Sequence this year."

Liu Jiayi held up two fingers next to Bai Liu. "So, this year, the Slayer Sequence has two star players, and their guild's support season is practically set."

"But," Liu Jiayi's expression turned sour, "I'm the only half-star player in our guild. It'll be tough for you to get a [Death-Free Gold], so we'll need to figure out how to help with your support..."

"It doesn't matter whether others help or not. The league judges your strength," Tang Erda cut in coldly.

Liu Jiayi's eyes widened, and she put on a pair of goggles, giving Tang Erda a once-over with an exaggeratedly judgmental look.

She snorted. "With your looks, I can understand your jealousy over not becoming a star player and getting an exemption."

At the moment, Tang Erda wasn't exactly an appealing sight—bearded, ragged, his eyes bloodshot, and a strange, nauseating mixture of rose and blood clinging to him. Disheveled and unkempt, he sat stiffly in the back seat of the car, resembling a large dog Bai Liu might have picked up off the street after it had been wandering for over six months.

Tang Erda opened his mouth, seemingly about to say something, but when his eyes flicked to Liu Jiayi, who was seated at a height just above his waist, he felt as if he were arguing with a little girl. So, he turned his head away, coldly staring out of the car window, refusing to engage with Liu Jiayi's words any longer.

Liu Jiayi huffed in victory, settling back into her seat behind Bai Liu and resuming her chatter. "Don't listen to him, Bai Liu. The [get-out-of-jail-free card] is really important. Hearts showed me the league's fatality summary report, and teams with star players have a higher survival rate than others."

Tang Erda, his hand subconsciously grasping at empty air as Liu Jiayi spoke of survival rates, furrowed his brows, his expression growing serious. He seemed lost in thought—perhaps Liu Jiayi was right after all.

At first, he'd insisted that strength was all that mattered, avoiding any sort of business or popularity push, and focused solely on intense game pool training. But when it came time to face Bai Liu's team, the result was disastrous—his whole team had been wiped out, leaving only him alive. Ironically, he was the one with the immunity card.

Bai Liu scribbled the words [star player] on a small notepad and circled them with a question mark.

"I understand the importance of a star player," Bai Liu said, glancing at Liu Jiayi who was leaning over the back of his chair. "But it's not easy to make one, is it?"

He continued, his gaze sharp. "I assume most star players rise to prominence because they've done exceptionally well in league matches, right? Simply by being in the [small TV section], I think it's tough to build a star player with a huge fanbase—just like you, Jiayi."

Bai Liu's eyes followed Liu Jiayi's features as he continued to speak, assessing her with calm precision. "You have a pleasant face, a highly specific skill set, and a top-tier guild pouring all their efforts into building your profile. You even have a second-ranked star player helping you along the way."

"You've built up the perfect setup for a player who hasn't even competed in the league yet. But can you really be sure you'll get a free pass once you're in the league?"

Liu Jiayi blinked, stunned by the question.

Bai Liu tilted his head slightly, his voice unwavering. "You can't, can you?"

"I agree with Captain Tang," Bai Liu continued. "For our mostly new team, it makes more sense to focus on something we can control—like strength—rather than relying on something given to us from the outside, like popularity. The league is essentially about strength, not fame, so for the next two months, our priority should be training in the game pool."

Bai Liu flashed a chilling smile, glancing at Liu Jiayi, still dazed by the shock, and then at Tang Erda, who sat motionless, a look of relief slowly creeping into his expression.

"But that doesn't mean we're giving up on attracting an audience," Bai Liu added. "We still have nearly 50 more games in the [small TV area] before we even get to the game pool."

"We're going to use these 50 games to draw in as much support as we can."

Bai Liu's gaze lingered briefly on Tang Erda's hair, which was still tangled and frozen in place. "Let's start by making Captain Tang look presentable for business."

Tang Erda: "……?????"

Mu Sicheng choked and coughed as he sprinted out of the factory's back door. Once he made sure the Heretic Authority team had fully taken over the RI factory and had secured the generation director, who was trying to escape, he slipped out the side and sped off on his motorbike.

With a helmet on and a single-ear Bluetooth headset in place, Mu Sicheng dialed Bai Liu's number as the wind howled around him, urgency in his voice.

Bai Liu… This guy is going out and claiming he's the bomber, leaving him in the relative safety of the inner world to stall for time.

Who knows what the deranged crew will do to Bai Liu once he's under the Heretic Authority's control?

The last time Bai Liu went in, it felt like he lost half his life!

Although Bai Liu keeps saying he has a way to deal with it, he's just an ordinary guy in the real world. How much can he really do against such a large organization?

Mu Sicheng took a deep breath, impatience mounting as he waited for the call to connect. When Bai Liu finally answered, Mu Sicheng immediately asked, "Bai Liu, are you all right? Where are you?"

"I'm fine." Bai Liu's voice wavered slightly, as if unsteady. "I'm at..."

Before Bai Liu could finish his sentence, a hysterical scream echoed in the background: "Get away from me! What are you doing to me?! I'm not doing this!!!"

Mu Sicheng frowned, hearing the voice of Tang Erda in the chaos. He slowed his motorbike and asked hesitantly, "You got Tang Erda out of the Heresy Bureau and took control of him?"

Bai Liu held the phone up to Tang Erda, who was strapped to a hair-washing seat, struggling against a mass of foam. "You could interpret it that way."

"Let me go!!!" Tang Erda stared at the beautician, who was holding up a black duct-tape-like object, her expression eerie. "Put me down!"

Mu Sicheng, a mix of gloating and concern, couldn't help but ask, "What are you doing to him? Torture? This is the real world, Bai Liu, don't go too far."

Bai Liu tried to explain, "I'm not torturing Tang Erda."

A muffled grunt of pain from the background made Mu Sicheng stop his motorbike, unconvinced. "So, what are you doing to him?"

"Full-body hairdressing." Bai Liu glanced at Tang Erda's legs, which were covered in hair-removal tape. "To be specific, I'm removing his leg hair."

With a grimace, the beautician grabbed the end of the tape and ripped it off in one swift motion.

Tang Erda clenched his fists, letting out another stifled grunt. He looked at Bai Liu almost pleadingly, tears hidden in his eyes. "Why do I have to do this?!"

"I don't know," Bai Liu shrugged. "Ask Muke. He's the one who brought us to this beauty shop and got you this top-of-the-line grooming package."

Tang Erda turned his gaze to Muke.

Muke, grinning like a spring breeze, replied, "This is the best celebrity grooming shop I know in the industry. A lot of popular stars come here for styling and grooming. I thought it might be a good fit for you, Captain Tang. Plus, it's a good business move."

The beautician chimed in, "Yes, yes! Zhao Muchi, the star of the show, has been coming here for years! Two hit dramas this year!"

With that, she tore off another strip of tape with ease.

Tang Erda sucked in a cold breath, groaning, "It didn't have to go this far. I don't even show my legs on TV..."

"I think it's necessary," Muke said, stepping forward with a friendly smile. "Who can say? Maybe someday you'll show your legs on TV to attract viewers."

The beautician, tearing off another strip, looked at Tang Erda's toned body and wore a strange expression.

Muke glanced back to ensure Bai Liu was turned away, still on the phone with Mu Sicheng, and then leaned in close to whisper in Tang Erda's ear, his smile never faltering. "Did you think it was unnecessary when you drowned Bai Liu?"

Tang Erda flinched, a barely noticeable jolt.

Bai Liu, still on the phone with Mu Sicheng, turned around sharply after hearing that sentence.

Muke quickly pulled back and, with a gentle look, glanced at Tang Erda's legs, now covered in tape. "I ordered the best package for you. No need to thank me. I'll cover all the costs. I specifically got you a full-body, semi-permanent manual hair removal. It's a bit painful, but it works."

Muke smiled, patting Tang Erda's red, torn leg. "Be a good businessman for our team once you're a big, handsome man, Captain Tang."

Tang Erda, whose entire body was aching, could only let out a small, defeated sound.

The beautician, grabbing the tape near Tang Erda's inner thigh, tore it off just as Muke was speaking.

Looking at Tang Erda, who was starting to slump in the chair, Bai Liu gave Mu Sicheng the location of the salon with a sympathetic expression.

Mu Sicheng, now with a wooden face, removed his headphones, which were still echoing with muffled grunts of pain.

Chapter End Notes

Mu Ke has a mean streak.

The Game Pool

Shave, hydrating mask, hair care package, muscle sculpting, massage, jaw stretching face relaxation…

Tang Erda was tossed around so much that his eyes gradually lost their usual spark.

There was an orthopedic procedure scheduled, but the orthopedic specialist said Tang Erda's bones were already in the correct position and that doing it again would be overkill. Muke reluctantly abandoned the idea—he'd heard it would be painful, too.

To save time, Muke insisted on multitasking as much as possible. While Tang Erda's hair was being worked on, the beautician also trimmed his eyebrows and stretched his facial muscles.

To accommodate Tang Erda's hair lying down, the male makeup artist almost straddled his body. The more he did, the redder his face became.

Captain Tang, lying down with his eyes closed as his hair was washed, remained blissfully unaware of the awkwardness.

Having spent his life immersed in games and the Heresy Bureau, Tang Erda had no idea that places like Fang Ke could be a high-risk area for gays.

Bai Liu, sitting on the sofa nearby, casually flipping through a magazine, caught the scene and smiled slightly.

Liu Jiayi, wearing goggles, noticed the faintest expression on Bai Liu's face. Following his gaze, she couldn't help but twitch the corners of her mouth.

Bai Liu set the magazine down, rose gracefully, and sat next to Tang Erda. He glanced up at the male makeup artist.

As if sensing a warning in Bai Liu's eyes, the makeup artist panicked. He hastily finished trimming Tang Erda's eyebrows before rushing away.

Liu Jiayi, following him, couldn't help but whisper next to Bai Liu, "Why did you come over to protect him like that? Why not let the big guy get bullied a little more?"

Bai Liu looked over at Tang Erda, who had finished getting his hair washed and sat up. His voice softened as he turned sideways, "I don't like seeing my property taken advantage of by others."

"Especially when it doesn't serve my greater good."

Bai Liu reached up and stroked Liu Jiayi's head soothingly. "If anyone bullied you, I'd be angry too."

Liu Jiayi suppressed her words and looked away from Bai Liu, sulking a little because of his attitude toward Tang Erda.

This man had shot her, and she hadn't forgotten.

"And what if I want to bully him?" Liu Jiayi asked, feigning fierceness.

Bai Liu smiled. "As you wish, I don't mind the mutual 'engulfment' of my property—as long as you don't hurt each other too much and reduce its total value."

Liu Jiayi, now reassured, looked up at Tang Erda, ready to find a spot to strike, but she froze when she saw his face.

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow and leaned in close to Liu Jiayi's ear, whispering, "Try not to damage his face during your bullying. It seems to be worth a lot."

Tang Erda, now fully tidied up, stood up uncomfortably, rubbing the back of his neck and touching his chin. He glanced over at Liu Jiayi and Bai Liu, who hadn't said a word, and grew increasingly restless.

He pursed his lips, reluctantly adopting an imposing captain's stance. "I told you all this was useless on me. It won't make me more appealing to the audience…"

"No." Bai Liu swept his gaze over Tang Erda, his smile deepening. "At least, from an aesthetic perspective, your appeal to me has definitely increased."

The makeup artist had just trimmed Tang Erda's eyebrows and lightly shaped his sideburns, bringing out the sharpness of his jawline and the intensity of his haunting blue eyes. His bony, angular frame, cold expression, and broad, athletic build made him seem poised for action, exuding an aura of danger and restraint.

Liu Jiayi circled Tang Erda for a moment before admitting, frustrated,

"This guy is exactly what the audience will love, looks-wise."

Tang Erda didn't just outshine others due to his strength; his appearance also played a part in securing his "get-out-of-jail-free" card.

Of course, he didn't realize it himself.

Or rather, Tang Erda had no clear perception of human appearance, thanks to his long association with heretical monsters.

He thought of himself as average-looking and believed Su Yang's gentle, affectionate appearance was the true standard of beauty.

When Captain Tang saw Bai Liu smiling and complimenting him, his first thought was that Bai Liu was flirting with him again.

So, Captain Tang grew more uncomfortable, furrowing his brow and taking on a stern look. He raised his hand to mess up his newly styled hair. "I told you it's no use! Don't try to use that kind of force on me!"

The makeup artist beside Tang Erda tried to salvage his work, and he screamed as he clung to his arm. "I won't allow you to insult yourself like that! It's cool! If you wear a couple of better outfits, scouts will be lining up outside my door!"

"If you debut…" he trailed off, gently stroking Tang Erda's lean arm, his little face flushing, "I'll be a fan of your wife."

"What?"

Tang Erda, who had only heard of wife cakes but not "wife powder," pulled his arm out of the makeup artist's grasp with a confused expression.

Bai Liu looked away. "Go choose two outfits that will suit him."

"Are custom shops okay?" Muke asked. "I know two ready-to-wear custom shops. Otherwise, he won't be able to find clothes in regular shops that fit him."

"Yes." Bai Liu raised his phone. "I'll let Mu Sicheng know that the location has changed."

Inside the ready-to-wear bespoke shop.

The sign was in French, which Bai Liu couldn't understand, and most of the staff were foreigners. However, Muke communicated fluently in French, so Bai Liu sat back and watched.

Muke certainly had an eye for style. Tang Erda was measured by the tailor at 6'2", and finding men's clothing to suit him would have been a challenge—his options would likely be limited to sports shops.

Even in the ready-to-wear store, Tang Erda's clothing choices were scarce. The bearded tailor waved his hands in disbelief at Muke, who insisted on measuring the overall circumference before making any decisions.

Tang Erda was then ushered into a white-curtained fitting area and stripped down to his top for measurements, while Bai Liu and Muke entered to help him choose clothes.

Liu Jiayi, however, was forced to stay outside.

By this time, Mu Sicheng had arrived. After hearing the story from Liu Jiayi, he rolled up his sleeves, grinning mischievously.

Could there be a better moment to get back at Captain Tang?

When he saw a topless Tang Erda later, he'd be sure to humiliate him! He'd say Tang Erda didn't look good in anything!

What kind of handsome guy could Tang Erda be after sleeping on the street for six months?

Mu Sicheng had no doubts—there was no way Tang Erda could be more handsome than him. So, he straightened his hair, lifted the curtain dramatically, and stepped inside.

Tang Erda, topless, lifted his eyes and looked over with a mischievous glint.

His old uniform hung loosely around his waist, and his chest and back were covered with large and small scars, including gunshot wounds. His muscles, exposed without their usual protective layer, were taut and stretched from his spine all the way to his mid-back, creating an incredibly powerful, smooth, and undulating curve.

His short, neat hair, clean-cut square jaw, and piercing dark blue eyes created a stark, aggressive look. He stared at the person who lifted the curtain, made sure it was a harmless teammate, and then coldly looked away again, reaching out to the tailor to measure his hand length.

The bruises, though faint, made the tailor, who was measuring Tang Erda, nervous. He measured cautiously, not daring to breathe.

Mu Sicheng lowered the curtain with an expressionless face, then silently pounded his chest in a brief, exaggerated silent howl.

One look, and he was done! Damn, he looked so cool! What a body!

After hesitating for a moment, Mu Sicheng gritted his teeth, took off his tracksuit jacket again, and prepared to enter, now wearing only a T-shirt.

Damn, he had been working out too, and wasn't in bad shape!

Liu Jiayi, who had seen it all, pitied him. "You can't win against Tang Erda. His pecs are bigger than yours. I think his chest is over 110."

Inside the fitting area, Muke's voice came through, confirming: "A 115-inch bust, is that right? Are you sure that's a normal chest size? Is he not overdeveloped or something?"

The tailor, responding in broken Chinese, said, "Very, standard, PERFECT!"

Muke, with a bust just over ninety: "..."

Mu Sicheng, with a bust of less than a hundred: "..."

They were doomed.

Mu Sicheng silently put his sweatshirt jacket back on, zipped it up to cover himself, and adjusted his expression before lifting the curtain again to step inside.

Tang Erda was getting dressed, and he was clearly uncomfortable with the lack of protection as he was measured. With his face now tense and his tone sour, he asked, "Do you want to keep going?"

"No!" The tailor waved his hands excitedly, gesturing as he compared Tang Erda's chest, waist, stomach, and buttocks, giving him a thumbs up in English with a peculiar accent. "—Beautiful!"

Tang Erda pulled away from the tailor with a scowl.

Mu Sicheng and Muke, watching nearby, exchanged hidden jealous glances as they stared at Tang Erda's chest, then looked down at their own with dissatisfaction.

Mu Sicheng even raised his hand to compare his chest to Tang Erda's, then exaggerated the difference by roughly 5 cm, feeling increasingly miserable. If you're cool and handsome with such a big chest, why didn't you show it earlier? Why keep it hidden just to humiliate me now?

After measuring Tang Erda, the tailor spoke to Muke, looking at Tang Erda with his chin propped up, which made Tang Erda's skin crawl.

Muke translated for Bai Liu: "He just asked me about Tang Erda's background. Generally, few people at this height have such a standard build, so I told him Tang Erda went through professional military training but is now retired."

"So he recommended some uniform styles," Muke continued. "Military and police uniforms have strict rules, but there are versions of clothes we can try."

As he spoke, the tailor took a dark gray jacket off the rack and handed it to Tang Erda to try on.

A minute or two later, Tang Erda emerged, dressed.

His broad shoulders filled the stylized jacket perfectly. The shirt underneath, slimmer than Bai Liu's social animal shirt, had a black double-breasted vest that accentuated his chest, while black shoulder straps flared from the back down to his waist.

The trousers were loose at the waist but tightly gathered around his hips, with a dark leather pistol holster clipped to the back of his waist.

The tailor nodded in satisfaction and spoke to Muke.

Muke translated: "He said it's a reference to an FBI-style uniform, and it suits someone like Tang Erda—trained and with such a standard build."

Tang Erda was still fiddling with his collar, clearly uncomfortable in the tight clothing. His brow furrowed.

"Well?" Bai Liu asked. "Does this outfit hinder your movement?"

Tang Erda hesitated for a moment, moved his arm through the air, and then replied honestly, "No."

"Then this one," Bai Liu clapped his hands. "Wrap it up and let's move on to other things."

Forty-seven minutes later

Tang Erda, who had finished buying his tie, shoes, socks, and other accessories, stood in Bai Liu's small rented room with a cold expression. His eyebrows furrowed as he raised his hand to unbutton his shirt—it was too tight, and he wasn't used to it.

Inside the room, Bai Liu was on the phone with the leader. "Muke is here with me. Come and get him."

After hanging up, Bai Liu called the Xiang Chunhua couple. "Jiayi is with me. Come and get her."

Closing the phone, Bai Liu turned to Mu Sicheng. "Can you go back on your own?"

Mu Sicheng nodded.

Having taken care of all the team members, Bai Liu addressed them: "Thanks to Captain Tang's support, registration is no longer an issue, and we have more time to plan."

Bai Liu's gaze met Tang Erda, who was standing at the end of the room. "Captain Tang told me that besides training, it's important for the players to recuperate. It's almost 11 p.m., so go back and rest for the afternoon. Get yourself in shape. We'll meet at the hot pot restaurant in front of my place at 5:30 p.m. I'll treat you all to dinner. We'll log into the game at 6:30 p.m. to officially start league training. Any objections?"

Everyone shook their heads.

"Alright," Bai Liu nodded, ready to continue when the doorbell rang.

Tang Erda, who was standing by the door, opened it, startling the leader, who had rushed over in response to the call.

Tang Erda's towering height and disheveled uniform—after all the mess he'd been through—caught the leader off guard. His freshly done hair was slightly tousled from discomfort. A few slash scars were faintly visible under his open collar, and his body carried the scent of freshly showered shampoo. The ends of his hair still dripped water, making him look wild, as if he'd just rolled out of bed.

While Bai Liu was still explaining things inside, Tang Erda blocked the leader from entering and looked down at him condescendingly. "What can I do for you?"

The leader, fearful, stammered, "I... I'm here to see Muke."

"Wait a little longer," Tang Erda said. "Bai Liu is still inside, finishing up... whatever he's doing."

The leader, incredulous, interrupted. "Bai Liu's not done yet? Didn't you finish with him already?"

The leader's question was odd, but Tang Erda didn't pick up on it. He frowned and replied, "Bai Liu has only finished with me, not the other two yet."

Liu Jiayi could handle things on her own, so Bai Liu didn't need to worry about that.

The leader, still dizzy, braced himself against the wall and asked shakily, "Bai Liu's still handling the others... while you're out here?"

Tang Erda frowned in confusion. "What's wrong with that?"

The leader, shaken by Tang Erda's question, managed to stand and glance at the bruise on Tang Erda's collar. "Those bruises... they weren't caused by Bai Liu, were they?"

Tang Erda's expression changed quickly. He tightened his collar and grabbed the leader's hands, slamming him against the wall. "How do you know? Have you played the game too?"

"I'm not playing that dirty, evil game with Bai Liu!" The leader growled, "Get off me!"

The leader's jealousy and suspicion towards Bai Liu's group made him angry. Just thinking that Tang Erda might have been involved with Bai Liu made him want to arrest and kill him.

Just then, Bai Liu opened the door and gestured for Tang Erda to release the leader with a subtle lift of his chin. "He's not a player. Let him go."

Tang Erda, still in disbelief, released the leader.

The leader, now free, looked back at Bai Liu as he stepped out of the room. Bai Liu's face was pale, with dark circles under his eyes, as if he had been awake for days.

The leader caught a glimpse of Bai Liu's open collar and noticed a small, round burn mark on the side of his neck—similar to the one Tang Erda had. The leader quickly went to pick up Muke.

When the leader picked up Muke yesterday, he hadn't noticed this wound on Bai Liu.

In just one night, the game had been so intense!

The leader, feeling uneasy, grabbed Muke's hand and quickly fled.

Once outside, the leader couldn't help but gossip. "Did Bai Liu get his neck burned by the guy at the door with a cigarette while playing a game?"

Muke, sounding eerily curious, asked, "How do you know?"

The leader sighed, pulling out a cigarette and lighting it. He gazed into the distance, exhaling a cloud of smoke. "These eyes of mine have seen too much filth in this world..."

The Game Pool

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

5:30 PM, outside the hotpot restaurant.

Bai Liu sat at the edge of a boiling pot, next to a confused Lu Yizhan, who was holding up a menu just after finishing work.

It was a rare moment when Lu Yizhan didn't have to work overtime. The previous day's unprecedented explosion had allowed the Heretic Authority to temporarily take over Lu Yizhan's department, giving the regular staff a break from their duties.

So, Bai Liu invited him for hotpot, and Lu Yizhan had come without hesitation.

But there was more to it. Lu Yizhan had come to find out what really happened that day.

He didn't understand why the Bureau was so consumed by the bombing, and why the events were being broadcast everywhere. Meanwhile, Bai Liu—the one responsible for it—sat beside him, sipping barley tea from the hotpot restaurant's complimentary cup and shamelessly asking the waiter for another shrimp slider.

Lu Yizhan grabbed the menu and glared at Bai Liu, irritated.

Bai Liu took a slow sip from his tea and glanced at him, "What? Are you going to ask me about the other day?"

"No!" Lu Yizhan responded firmly, "You can't order more food even if it's on me! There's enough here to feed six people!"

Bai Liu stared at him, speechless.

This guy's brain really works differently.

Lu Yizhan hadn't mentioned the explosion since they met, and he remained as calm as ever.

If Bai Liu hadn't been sure that Lu Yizhan had seen him that day, he might have thought that Lu Yizhan didn't even know he was the bomber.

"Aren't you curious how I could have blown up the Rose Factory—and still made it out alive to sit here eating hotpot with you?" Bai Liu asked, glancing sideways at him.

Lu Yizhan nodded, "Curious, but I stand corrected."

"Corrected?" Bai Liu raised an eyebrow.

Lu Yizhan continued, "I don't think you were the one who blew up that factory."

"Why not me?" Bai Liu asked, a hint of sarcasm in his voice. "You saw it with your own eyes, didn't you?"

"It's because I saw it that I don't think it was you," Lu Yizhan said, taking a sip of his drink and exhaling slowly. "Emotionally, I'm sure you wouldn't have broken ties with me after our deal. Logically, the thing you value most is money."

Lu Yizhan turned to face Bai Liu. "To set off a factory like that, I get the impression you have no personal stake in it. The factory's owner does. So, I'm guessing the bomber was the arrested factory director, and you were just a scapegoat."

"I don't understand why you volunteered to take the blame, but I won't ask why. You have your reasons."

Lu Yizhan's guess was spot on, and Bai Liu had to admit it.

Bai Liu had known from a young age that Lu Yizhan was extremely sharp.

Highly accomplished, decisive, and determined, Lu Yizhan was never one to hesitate when he set his mind on something. His perseverance was unmatched.

Though Bai Liu had been winning in their various games, he knew it was only because Lu Yizhan wasn't taking them seriously.

Lu Yizhan didn't care about winning or losing; his focus was on being a good person. That's why people who didn't know him well often thought he was naïve or foolish.

But Lu Yizhan wasn't naïve at all. He was, in fact, very pragmatic—otherwise, he wouldn't have accepted Bai Liu's trading terms so easily.

It takes someone emotionally mature to accept that a friend is paid to give them something.

But Lu Yizhan didn't mind at all, which meant he fully accepted Bai Liu's idea of trading.

Bai Liu idly twirled the pencil he was holding, clearly bored. "Wanna play Gomoku?"

Lu Yizhan sighed, his mind elsewhere. "Now's not the time for games."

"If you win three in a row, I'll tell you more about the factory explosion you're so curious about," Bai Liu said, drawing a cross on the menu with his pencil. "If you win five in a row, I'll help you out with this situation."

Having already solved the explosion issue, Bai Liu wasn't worried about making Lu Yizhan think he was fooling him.

"Deal!" Lu Yizhan quickly accepted, placing his glass down and grabbing the pen Bai Liu handed him. After a moment of thought, he cautiously drew a circle on the paper.

They played Gomoku at a fast pace, each move so swift it was almost instantaneous. The games didn't drag on for long—within a minute, the winner would tear up the sheet and toss it in the trash.

By the time Tang Erda arrived, the trash bin beside them was already full of crumpled paper.

Lu Yizhan was so focused on the game that he barely noticed the others arriving, his eyes following Bai Liu's hand as it moved swiftly over the paper.

The game continued until Bai Liu closed the paper, signaling a break. "Time's up. We'll eat first. You haven't won a game in a row yet."

Lu Yizhan looked up, regret on his face, and nearly toppled his chair in shock when he saw the group of people watching them.

"Let me introduce my new colleague," Bai Liu said, holding up four fingers as he gestured to the group. "Tang Erda, Mu Sicheng, Muke—the kid you know, Liu Jiayi—and everyone else, meet my hairdresser, Lu Yizhan."

Muke nodded casually. "Hello, Mr. Lu."

Mu Sicheng scratched his head awkwardly. "Uh... hello."

Tang Erda gave a serious nod. "Hello."

Liu Jiayi, sitting with her legs swinging, smiled sweetly at Lu Yizhan, resting her face in her hands. "Hello, Uncle Lu!"

Lu Yizhan stared at Liu Jiayi, dumbfounded. "No way. Bai Liu, what kind of company do you work for? Why are you employing child labor?"

Bai Liu smirked, taking a moment to think. "If I had to say... a major star-making company?"

Lu Yizhan swallowed nervously as he looked at the brightly cleaned group around him, then asked shakily, "Is that... legal?"

Bai Liu smiled, "It's legal."

Lu Yizhan was about to ask more, but seeing that the group had started eating, he swallowed his doubts, his flesh aching at the thought.

No wonder Bai Liu had ordered so much.

But soon, Lu Yizhan's attention shifted when Bai Liu began to distract him with Gomoku while eating his hotpot.

Liu Jiayi had a small appetite and quickly finished most of her food. She moved a small bench and sat next to them, watching the game closely.

She wore a contact lens prop to help her see, but Lu Yizhan, focused on the game, didn't notice it at first.

As Bai Liu and Lu Yizhan played faster and faster, Liu Jiayi's serious expression matched their intensity. Her eyes widened in disbelief as she watched the game.

She looked up at Lu Yizhan, incredulous. This guy looks like a good old boy, but his reflexes are just as sharp as Bai Liu's?! And the winning margin is getting bigger?!

Muke, intrigued by the matchup, joined her to watch.

Mu Sicheng, still not full but curious about what Bai Liu was up to, wandered over with a small bowl of vegetables to take a look.

But Bai Liu and Lu Yizhan's speed was overwhelming, and Mu Sicheng was left in the dust, unable to keep up.

He turned to Muke, asking, "What kind of game are they playing?"

"Gomoku," Muke replied.

Mu Sicheng frowned, more confused. "I think it's like a quintuplet, but I only see them playing three moves in a row before they tear the paper up and start again..."

"Because it's already a dead game," Muke explained, his eyes fixed on the paper. "They've played this game so many times that they know it well enough to recognize when it's over."

By now, Bai Liu had lost two games in a row.

Mu Sicheng's eyes widened. "Bai Liu can actually lose?!"

Muke took a deep breath. "A simple game like five-in-a-row relies on quick thinking and reaction time. Bai Liu's intelligence is high, so he's usually dominant. But Lu Yizhan—he's improving with every move."

Mu Sicheng looked at the paper in disbelief. "You mean Lu Yizhan is now the one with the upper hand? Bai Liu's the one losing?"

Bai Liu, who was typically associated with never losing, was now, astonishingly, struggling.

Bai Liu stopped writing and crossed his fingers on the table, staring at Lu Yizhan without expression.

Lu Yizhan, still immersed in the game, looked up at him, confused. "Why aren't you continuing?"

"I can't win if I keep playing," Bai Liu admitted, standing up and moving behind Liu Jiayi, letting her take his place. "Jiayi will play for me. If you can win three games in a row against her, our deal stands."

Lu Yizhan frowned. "This little girl can't see—don't make jokes like that..."

"Uncle Lu, I can see," Liu Jiayi said, pointing to her eyes. "I wear contact lenses that Uncle Bai Liu bought for me to help with my vision."

Liu Jiayi gave a hopeful smile. "Uncle Lu, I think it's fun watching you play. Can I play too?"

"...Fine, as long as it doesn't strain your eyes." Lu Yizhan hesitated before agreeing.

Liu Jiayi shed her innocent look, grabbed the pencil Bai Liu handed her, and carefully drew the first cross on the paper.

Mu Sicheng, now utterly confused, asked, "What's going on here?"

"Liu Jiayi's intelligence is higher than Bai Liu's," Muke explained, eyes locked on the paper. "She has the upper hand in a game like this. Bai Liu's testing Lu Yizhan's game intelligence."

Liu Jiayi's pace quickened, and she quickly started dominating the game, while Lu Yizhan, who had once been in control, struggled to win.

But soon, Liu Jiayi's expression soured as she slowed down, and Lu Yizhan remained fast and focused.

Muke nodded. "Liu Jiayi can't hold out any longer."

Half an hour later, everyone left the hotpot restaurant. Lu Yizhan, tears in his eyes, paid for the meal and the two books they'd used up while playing backgammon, then waved goodbye to Bai Liu and the others.

After Liu Jiayi sweetly said goodbye to Uncle Lu, Lu Yizhan's face darkened as soon as he turned around. "Bai Liu, this friend of yours isn't right."

"What's wrong?" Bai Liu asked, casually breaking open three paper balls in his hands, revealing the last three games played between Liu Jiayi and Lu Yizhan.

--And Liu Jiayi had lost all three games.

"A simple game like Five Pieces is the easiest way to measure someone's intelligence," Liu Jiayi said, looking up at Bai Liu. "For someone with a high intelligence value, there's no catch-up period, or at most, a very short one. But for someone with a low intelligence value, they'll just keep losing in this game."

"There's no such thing as being bad at first and then getting better…" Liu Jiayi frowned, recalling the game he'd just played, scratching his head in frustration. "…Especially since Lu Yizhan keeps getting better as the player's intelligence rises. It's like the person you're playing against keeps surpassing you, like their intelligence is increasing without limits—”

“—Isn’t that the case?” Bai Liu squinted at Liu Jiayi, then glanced at Lu Yizhan’s back. “I often felt the same way when I played games with him.”

“But as soon as I started feeling like that, he would let me win.”

Liu Jiayi was stunned. “Why didn’t he let you win today?”

“Maybe I put something he wanted right in front of him.” Bai Liu shrugged casually and popped a mint from the fondue place into his mouth. “So he decided to get serious about the game.”

Chapter End Notes

> Gomoku, also called Five in a Row, is an abstract strategy board game. It is traditionally played with Go pieces (black and white stones) on a 15×15 Go board while in the past a 19×19 board was standard. Because pieces are typically not moved or removed from the board, gomoku may also be played as a paper-and-pencil game.

The Game Pool

Game Lobby.

Bai Liu led the way in and went straight to Charles. Muke had already explained what had happened, but Bai Liu felt the need to meet the extraordinary Fifth Guild leader in person.

Inside the Gamblers' Guild.

Charles, seated across the desk, raised an eyebrow in mild surprise. He motioned for the servant to stop pouring Bai Liu's tea and repeated, intrigued, "You want to join the league this year?"

"Isn't that what you're planning to do, President Charles?" Bai Liu replied calmly.

"Of course not." Charles waved it off without a second thought. "Although I've chosen you as my [betting horse], normally, [betting horses] go through a year of preparation before they get on the track."

Charles gave Bai Liu a scrutinizing top-to-bottom look, then regretted the gesture. "Bai Liu, you're not at the top of your game. It would be better to keep you in the dark for now."

"Feeding?" Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. "So that's why the charge point collection mechanism exists? To build up momentum for the big gamble of [the league]?"

Charles nodded appreciatively. "Yes, you're very clever, Bai Liu."

He stood, grabbing his staff, and moved behind Bai Liu. "All players in the game exist to earn more points. In our [Gamblers' Guild], there are two ways to earn points: [Gamblers] and [Horse Racing]."

"Betting on horses means being bet on. You rely on training in the game, being charged by us, and playing in the leagues for points. It's a simple way to gain labor, but there's a more exciting, risky, and rewarding method of investing in the game—"

Charles flashed a sly smile, flipping his fingers. A peculiar chip appeared between his index and middle fingers, which he leaned down to place in Bai Liu's hands.

"—a method we call [gambling]."

“As [gamblers], we’ve chosen you as our [gambling horse]. We’ve invested in you, trained you, made you famous, and when the annual league comes, we bet our whole fortune on you—”

Charles’s gaze became intense as he looked down at Bai Liu. “If you win, we double our investment and make a profit. If you lose, we lose everything. That’s the relationship between [gamblers] and [betting on horses].”

Bai Liu tilted his head back slightly to put some distance between himself and Charles. He looked down at the chip in his hand—a gold-rimmed piece with a dark green background and a value of six.

He recalled that real casinos didn’t use chips with this kind of value. This chip was unique to the game.

“Essentially, what makes this gamble in the league so attractive for you [gamblers] is the money both players bet,” Bai Liu mused. “A game with stakes this high wouldn’t reach such widespread popularity otherwise. The odds are too risky.” He paused. “So someone must be sitting on the base handicap, right?”

“Yes.” Charles replied, a grin spreading across his face.

“The person who sits at the bank is the system. When the league bets against each team, the system places a base fund in the gambling pool for each team. This base fund is the sum of the charge points for each person on the Double Fang Team—” Charles held up five fingers. “—five times.”

“In other words, the higher the sum of charge points for both our team and the enemy, the higher the base fund in the Double Captain Fang Wu’s gambling pool,” Bai Liu pondered. “So if our team beats a strong team, the players who bet on us to recharge are more likely to double their winnings.”

“And this base fund doesn’t include points for additional bets. The points in the final loser's gambling pool are distributed to the winner in proportion to the bets placed,” Charles clarified.

He gave a simple example. “Let’s say your team is playing the Kings Guild, and the Kings Guild has 10 million charge points while your team has 1 million charge points. The base handicap in both gambling pools would be 5 million.”

“On top of that, if the Kings Guild bets 50 million points and your team only 100,000, their pool grows to 150 million, while yours only has 55.1 million."

"If the Kings Guild wins against you, the players who bet on them will share the points in your gambling pool, according to their bet amounts."

"For example, if I bet 25 million out of the total 50 million, that's 50%. I would then receive 50% of the 55.1 million in your gambling pool, which is 27.55 million, a 110% profit."

"That's a high profit margin," Bai Liu commented, his tone neutral.

Charles smirked, eyes glittering. "Yes, it's a good deal, but it's not a gamble."

Bai Liu looked up, and Charles continued, "Let's turn it around. What if you won against the Kings Guild and the 100,000-point bet in your gambling pool was all mine?"

"Then I could win 150 million from my 100,000 bet, a 1,500% profit margin."

Charles spread his hands, flashing a smile at Bai Liu. "That's gambling, baby."

"Welcome to the Gamblers' Club."

Bai Liu, unfazed, considered the implications. "So, according to this, the more risky and controversial our team is, the more attention it gets, and the higher the profit margin. Wouldn't it be the perfect time to enter this year's league?"

Charles paused, then looked at Bai Liu with an impressed, almost amused, expression. "Looks like I've met a crazier gambler than myself."

He spun back to his seat, tapping his staff sharply twice before knocking it off the table with excitement. "I like your offer. You're at the peak of your gimmick, and I don't have to keep the discussion going for a year to maintain it until the next league."

Charles locked eyes with Bai Liu. "You're in the spotlight now. If you lose badly in this league, you'll be worthless in the future. Are you sure you want to play this year? If so, I'll handle all the support and logistics for you."

Bai Liu nodded. “I’m sure.”

Charles flirtatiously took Bai Liu’s hand and kissed it in the air. “As you wish, my Prince Charming.”

Bai Liu blinked, slightly disturbed. “…”

His investors were, to put it mildly, disgusting.

But it didn’t matter. He was an adult, and he could tolerate this for the sake of money.

Bai Liu walked away from the Gamblers' Club and made his way straight to the Scavengers' Guild.

Charles had reminded him to be prepared for business if he was going to play in the league—things like player appearances, guild names, team formation, and even the guild icon all needed careful attention.

Once Bai Liu arrived at the guild and consulted with the members, the guild name was quickly and simply changed to Wandering Circus.

Then came the bombshell: they were going to participate in the league this year.

There was an outcry.

But Bai Liu didn’t force them to turn in props for the league, participate in high-risk games to find advanced equipment, or even require them to recharge their accounts to expand their teams like other guilds did. All of that was handled by Charles—who might be a bit of a badass, but was an excellent resource.

The players for the company's war party had already been selected.

Normally, it would be a huge deal for a guild to enter a tournament, requiring the efforts of the entire guild. But Bai Liu managed everything on his own and simply informed the members of the decision.

The guild members were initially overwhelmed and worried. However, Bai Liu’s calm demeanor and the twists and turns he had navigated so far helped settle them down.

If it’s President Bai, maybe winning isn’t so impossible after all...

At that moment, they gained a new understanding of this incredible guild.

It really seemed like they didn't have to give anything to this guild. Even for major events like participating in the league, their president never asked them to worry about it. Instead, they were left to grow in the community without concern.

"Is there anything we can do for you, President Bai?" someone asked cautiously. "It's support season. Do you need us to support you or something?"

— It was honestly a little strange that the members didn't have to do anything for something as big as the guild's participation in the league!

"Of course, we need support. Please help spread the word that I'm going to play in the league," Bai Liu smiled. "Then, sing my praises and claim that I'll never win, exposing all the faults of our team. Or better yet, say that you guys don't support my participation at all, but I'm bent on doing it myself. That's about it, please."

The members: "..."

The members: "????"

What kind of support is this?

Wang Shun, who had been with the King's Guild for several leagues, was dumbfounded when he heard about Bai Liu's unusual way of rallying support.

He had never seen such a response before!

"…No, Bai Liu, what are you doing?!" Wang Shun's eyes glazed over as he hurried to catch up with Bai Liu. "What do you want them to sing your praises for? Player support will directly impact whether or not you get the get-out-of-jail-free card…"

"I'm probably not going to get it before the tournament." Bai Liu casually made his decision. "It's more cost-effective for me to run a negative campaign before the tournament and then consolidate my support during the official matches to secure the free pass."

Wang Shun was stunned. "What kind of profit are you anticipating from that?"

Bai Liu smiled, his eyes glinting with mischief. "I'm going to raise the odds and place a bet on [Wandering Circus]. I just realized there's a [table] play hidden in this game. It's so interesting."

Wang Shun: "!!!!"

Wang Shun put a hand to his forehead in exasperation. "Did you talk to Charles?"

He knew something like this would happen when he put these two troublemakers together!

Wang Shun felt helpless, trying to stop Bai Liu. “There’s no such thing as playing in the league and gambling on it.”

“Do the rules allow it?” Bai Liu shot Wang Shun a sidelong glance.

Wang Shun hesitated. “The rules allow it.”

But he quickly added, “But the players that participated rarely survive the preparation season. Controlling the gamble requires a lot of resources and manpower, and also puts a huge amount of psychological pressure on the players. They'll get hammered by the crazed gamblers if they lose!”

“Then we’ll just keep winning.” Bai Liu responded simply.

He cut off Wang Shun, who was about to argue further. “The guild is in your hands now. The next move shouldn’t be too obvious—be careful not to draw attention from the other guilds.”

“—Or we’ll get beaten up by them.” Wang Shun mumbled.

“...Why would you get beaten up?” Before Wang Shun could respond, Bai Liu lazily waved him off and headed toward the group waiting outside the circus.

Soon, Wang Shun understood why Bai Liu had said that the next move shouldn’t be too obvious.

“Mr. Wang Shun, there’s a commotion on the forum!” Someone rushed in to report, nervously glancing around. “Where’s President Bai? Someone is impersonating him and making posts on the forum!”

Wang Shun opened the system panel, his face quickly turning pale.

At the top of the forum, dozens of red posts had appeared, all posted by someone using Bai Liu’s real name. In these posts, he mocked the top ten guilds while praising his own, the Wandering Circus. Most provocatively, he sent a letter of challenge to Spades, the number one player in the rankings:

[— I’m not thrilled about having Spades right before me, but I sure enjoy seeing my name right behind his.]

Wang Shun staggered back, nearly dropping to his knees.

It was the height of the support season, and any spark between fan groups could escalate into chaos. Guild teams took great care to avoid giving their opponents any advantage.

Now that Bai Liu had dropped so many "atomic bombs," all the attention on the forum was focused on him, and the situation had exploded into a full-blown brawl.

Angry fans had already begun surrounding Bai Liu, eager to vent their frustrations by taking him down.

Wang Shun, left to clean up the mess Bai Liu had made, slumped in his chair, bitterly laughing with vacant eyes. “You’re a real bastard, Bai Liu...”

On the other end, instead of feeling guilty, Bai Liu grew more arrogant. He pulled on a pair of exaggerated sunglasses and strutted to the game registration portal, flanked by his circus members. Tilting his head, he began selecting the game he wanted to log into.

Mu Sicheng looked around, puzzled. “Is it just me, or does it feel like a lot of people are really hostile towards us...?”

“It’s not your fault.” Muke clicked on the forums, frowning. “The forums are full of discussions about us, but it’s all negative... someone using Bai Liu’s name has been posting a lot of provocative stuff about other guilds.”

Liu Jiayi approached, reading the posts. After skimming them, her expression soured.

It was clear that Bai Liu had masterminded this chaotic stunt.

—This reverse-marketing tactic is extreme, and while it’s gotten them plenty of attention, Wang Shun is probably going to have a major headache.

After all, if the fans can't vent their anger directly at Bai Liu, they'll likely take it out on the guild instead...

As they discussed this, angry players continued to approach Bai Liu and his team.

In his posts, Bai Liu had gone into detail about the entire Wandering

Circus, even describing the type of sunglasses he was wearing. These players recognized him immediately.

Once Bai Liu finished selecting his game, he turned and flicked his sunglasses down slightly, revealing a pair of smiling black eyes as he faced the approaching players.

He seemed to find the scene amusing.

But then Bai Liu quickly turned back to his team. “Get in the game. We plan to play at least ten games a day. If anyone can’t keep up, take a break and come back later.”

The five of them disappeared into the crowd.

In the corner, a pair of apple-green eyes watched the scene before shifting to a secondary game.

Inside the Gamblers’ Guild, Charles pulled a silk scarf from his chest. The golden threads of fate embroidered a crown on the scarf, and Bai Liu’s face flickered in and out of view. With a smile, Charles pocketed the scarf and raised his red wine glass, clinking it into the void.

“To victory and money given by fate, here's to it.”

Inside the King's Guild, Hearts shook a bottle of Psyche's tears, which Liu Jiayi had returned to her.

Hearts' gaze drifted far off, staring through the teardrop-shaped bottle as if remembering some long-lost soul. But her reverie was interrupted by a soft knock on her door.

Someone entered uneasily, whispering, “Empress, Bai Liu seems to be entering the league this year…”

“Then let him enter.” Hearts put away the bottle and replied flatly. “We’ve done all we can to stop him. This outcome... it’s probably the best we could’ve hoped for.”

Hearts glanced at the photo on her desk—a group picture taken after a major clearance. Guild leaders, like all people in power, needed these ritualistic images to solidify their authority.

In the photo, Liu Jiayi lifted a corner of her witch’s veil, offering a rare innocent smile on her typically cold face. She looked trustingly at Hearts, who stood beside her in a treacherous fog—the perfect backdrop for their dangerous game.

But the danger seemed to fade when Liu Jiayi's pure smile shone through.

Behind them, a goofy Liu Ji stood, while a wounded Qi Yifang crouched at Liu Jiayi's feet, smiling widely. In the background, the massive Titan knelt silently, his chin captured by the camera, his head lowered in an attempt to stay out of sight.

Hearts stood at the center of the group, Liu Jiayi cradled in her arms —the twin core of this year's team, encircled by everyone.

Her gaze lingered on the photograph for a moment before she reached out and covered it with her hand.

Silently, she placed the glass jar in the deepest drawer, then looked up. "Spread the word—The Little Witch has defected from the King's Guild."

The reporter flinched, his back stiffening as he lifted his reddened eyes. "Empress, the Little Witch… she really isn't coming back, is she?"

Hearts continued giving orders, her expression void of emotion.

"…Activate our original secret rotation player, [Sister], to replace the Little Witch. Have her enter the game pool today—I will begin her special training as a full team member."

The debriefer lowered his head in defeat. "...Yes, Empress."

As he turned to leave, Hearts suddenly called out.

"Wait."

He turned back, surprised to find the ever-composed Empress now resting her forehead against her hand, gaze unfocused on the photograph she had just hidden away.

For some reason, she had stood it up again.

The debriefer hesitated before asking, "Is there anything else, Empress?"

Hearts' eyes lowered as her pale fingertips traced Liu Jiayi's image in the photo. She let out a soft sigh, as if in quiet despair, then closed her eyes wearily and tossed two small boxes onto the desk.

"—These were originally meant for the Little Witch," she said evenly. "One contains a pair of contact lenses that grant permanent vision—no environment can impair their function." She paused before continuing, voice quieter now. "The other is a potion that restores sight permanently."

She looked up, her expression unreadable. "Take them to her for me."

Then, more softly: "And give her a message—next time we meet, it'll be on the battlefield."

"Tell her… whatever she chooses—whether it's the future, betrayal, or doubt—she must not regret running away. She must watch it all unfold with her own eyes."

"That is the last thing I'll teach her."

The reporter stood still for a long moment before bowing deeply. "Yes, Empress."

When he was gone, Hearts remained in the darkness, staring at the photograph in silence. Eventually, she placed it inside the same drawer that held Psyche's Tears.

In the deepest recess of that drawer, barely visible, lay a much older photograph—a young Hearts sitting on the lap of a faceless man, her tiny arms wrapped around his waist as she laughed, carefree.

Hearts locked the drawer. She rose, left the room without looking back.

Golden Dawn Guild.

Despite its radiant name, the third-ranked guild's headquarters was located in one of the game's darker districts. From the outside, the building was dull and unassuming—much like the guild itself: quiet, efficient, and understated.

Inside, however, it was as bright as a summer morning. System panels flickered with streams of data, their analyses displayed before players moving with focused determination. The atmosphere was more akin to a high-tech research lab than a guildhall.

Golden Dawn was an enigma. Unlike open guilds that saw frequent player turnover, it operated in secrecy, much like the Killer Sequence. Few entered, fewer left.

Most outside guilds shared the same impression of Golden Dawn as Wang Shun did—it seemed to be almost exclusively foreign.

And, as Wang Shun recalled, its president was a foreigner as well.

A sharp knock interrupted the silence of the office.

"Captain Georgia, I have a report."

"Come in."

The door eased open, revealing a tall, slender man seated behind the desk. His long, dark brown hair was neatly tied back, his dark eyes calm yet piercing.

Captain Georgia had a sharp but elegant profile—high cheekbones, a regal nose. Fans often described him as possessing an otherworldly refinement, as if he were dawn itself streaked with gold. Or, more simply, he looked expensive.

The moment he debuted in the league, fervent supporters had voted him into the safety rankings, earning him a coveted gold medal—a medal infamously awarded more for his looks than his performance. Currently, he ranked third in popularity, just below Hearts, largely due to his reclusive nature.

At first glance, he seemed approachable. But the instant he turned to face you, that illusion vanished.

Georgia’s gaze was intense, unwavering. It gave people the eerie impression that they were important to him—until they realized he was merely assessing whether they were a threat.

As meticulous as his demeanor, his sleek dark hair was bound into a high bundle, yet his complexion was unnaturally pale. A faint coldness lingered around the edges of his lips, betraying his otherwise composed appearance.

The man who had entered stiffened upon seeing Georgia bracing himself against the desk. Instantly, he moved to steady him.

"Captain, you're still recovering from the contamination wounds from the Heretical attack! Please, just sit and listen to my report!"

Georgia clenched his fist, coughing lightly before murmuring an apology and taking his seat.

His subordinate exhaled in relief before continuing.

"Captain, the Heresy Authority in District One has recently taken in two heretical entities. One is called Rose Perfume, classified as Extra Class 1 Red. The other… appears to be a mass of corpses related to Rose Perfume—highly dangerous. The current classification system can't even properly categorize it."

"The issue is, these remains have the ability to trigger evolution in other heretics. Keeping them in District One—where the most heretics are concentrated—is too risky. They're considering transferring them abroad."

"Currently, the leading proposal is to relocate them to our division, Sector Three." He handed over a system panel. "District One has given us clearance to prepare a stronghold to contain this unidentified heretic. If you approve, we'll log out of the game and begin preparations."

Georgia skimmed the document but frowned at the signature.

"…Why is Captain Cen Buming from the Second Detachment handling this? Normally, the Third Detachment captain would submit a request for an Extra Class Red transfer."

The subordinate hesitated, glancing away before finally surrendering under Georgia's sharp stare.

"I heard… the Third Detachment's captain left the team."

"Left?" Georgia blinked, momentarily caught off guard. "Why? I thought they loved the job."

The man shrugged. "Captain, not everyone is like you. Unlike you, some people actually take their vacations instead of working through injuries. The Heresy Authority is exhausting, and it doesn't pay as well as gaming does. I completely understand why they quit."

Georgia's expression remained unreadable. "It's a sacred duty."

The subordinate wisely shut his mouth, miming a zipper across his lips.

Georgia approved the transfer, handing the system panel back. But instead of leaving, his subordinate hesitated.

Then, in a softer voice, he asked, "...Georgia, is your brother still mad at you for leaving him behind on that mission? For getting hurt without him there?"

The shift in tone was clear. Instead of Captain, he had called him by name. A personal question.

Georgia's grip on his pen tightened. He didn't look up.

The subordinate studied him carefully. "Or… are you still angry that he hid his gaming from you for a whole year? That he secretly joined our guild and trained for the league—only for you to shut it all down?"

Georgia remained silent.

The team member couldn't help but chatter, "Young people are reckless and impulsive. He did it because he was worried about you. Maybe you could talk to him—you're the last family he has. You know you're not well after being affected by that heretic, and you're always getting injured. He just wanted to protect you..."

"He's the last of my family too." Georgia looked up, cutting the player off. "If he had considered my feelings, he wouldn't have done this behind my back."

A faint flush appeared on Georgia's usually composed face as his emotions surged. His breathing quickened, and he abruptly looked down, covering his mouth as he choked violently.

"Okay! Okay! I'll stop!" The player stepped back, hands raised in surrender. "Just take a deep breath, Georgia!"

Georgia raised a hand, his expression cold. "Please leave."

The team member hesitated before finally turning toward the door. Pausing, he murmured one last thing before stepping out, "Georgia, I heard that the leader of the third detachment quit the team for a man named Bai Liu."

"It's said he made the rose perfume. Somehow, District One let him go, and the captain of the third detachment ran off with him. Some say he followed Bai Liu because he fell in love with him—otherwise, there's no reasonable explanation."

The player shrugged. "Sounds ridiculous, right? I think so too. Just gossip, so don't take it too seriously."

With that, he quickly shut the door behind him and fled before Georgia, the old curmudgeon, could scold him for spreading rumors.

Inside the room, Georgia remained seated, lost in thought. "...Bai Liu?"

On the other end, Bai Liu and his group emerged from the game lobby, having completed their tenth game in a row.

Bai Liu's shirt and trousers were completely soaked, as if he'd been fished out of the water—but it was all sweat. Muke collapsed onto the ground the moment they stepped out, while Liu Jiayi fell onto his back, panting heavily.

Mu Sicheng fared slightly better, leaning against the wall and downing a stamina rejuvenator, sweat dripping from the ends of his hair.

Tang Erda, of course, was in the best shape. Apart from a damp patch on his back, he looked as composed as he had before entering the game.

The players who had tried to mess with Bai Liu's group in the login area had long gone numb—this was the tenth time they'd seen these lunatics appear here.

This group of freaks... They could clear a Level 2 or even Level 3 dungeon in less than half an hour. One after another, games on the screen were being devoured by them.

The mini-TV section's audience was just as dumbfounded. Even with their screens set to 32x speed, some couldn't even tell what the game was about before Bai Liu's team had already moved on to the next one.

The forums had been flooded with accusations of Bai Liu being ungrateful, but now? Silence. No one dared to say a word.

Tang Erda was an absolute powerhouse. A one-man wrecking machine.

Where did Bai Liu even find such a terrifying main attacker? How high was this guy’s attack stat? And how the hell were the others managing to keep up with his speed? Could they even see his attacks?

With the sheer amount of attention they were drawing, the discussion around Bai Liu quickly shifted, dominated by speculation about Tang Erda's overwhelming strength.

Bai Liu, still sprawled on the floor, ran a hand through his wet hair, pushing the damp strands back. He let out a relaxed breath before glancing at Tang Erda with a teasing smile.

"You racked up the highest charge points in those ten games. Looks like the spectators love your strength. And your looks, of course."

"..." Tang Erda wasn't particularly skilled at handling conversations about his own attractiveness. He changed the subject bluntly. "That's enough training for today. Log out—we need to gather intel on your future opponents."

"Ugh, why is there more...?" Mu Sicheng let out a dramatic groan and slumped over lifelessly.

Bai Liu made an OK gesture.

Inside Bai Liu's rented house.

Bai Liu pulled out a whiteboard and markers from somewhere, setting them up for Tang Erda to use. The rest of the team sat cross-legged on the bed across from the board, all lined up and waiting for Mr. Tang's lecture.

Tang Erda felt... uncomfortable. Being stared at so intently by a former enemy eager to learn from him was unnerving. But he suppressed the feeling, cleared his throat, and picked up a red marker.

"The top ten guilds in the game are your primary enemies. You need to be ready to fight any of them. As the saying goes, know your enemy and win a hundred battles. I'll go over each major battle group in order of guild ranking..."

Tang Erda's gaze swept over the room before he continued.

"I'm not particularly familiar with the Slayer Sequence warbands, and you all already have extensive knowledge of the King's Guild. So today, we'll focus on the third-ranked guild—"

He turned back to the board and wrote:

Golden Dawn Guild.

Once the lecture was over, the others packed up and left, either heading home or back to school. Bai Liu lingered, watching as Tang Erda sat in front of the whiteboard, still staring at the words Golden Dawn.

Bai Liu poured a glass of water and placed it beside him. "You know their president, don't you?"

Tang Erda hesitated for a fraction of a second before responding. "...I'm not even going to ask how you know that anymore."

Bai Liu smirked. "I figured as much."

Tang Erda remained silent.

"You're deliberately avoiding explaining his skills," Bai Liu observed. "That's usually how people act when they know someone personally. So, tell me—who is Georgia, the president?"

Tang Erda pulled out a cigarette and held it up. "Do you mind?"

Bai Liu chuckled. "You know I don't like the smell of smoke. But go ahead if you want."

Tang Erda lit the cigarette and took a slow, deep drag. "...I don't actually know him well. We were colleagues. He worked at the Heresy Processing Bureau in Zone 3, handling high-risk heretics."

"To be precise, the one person who really knows him—" Tang Erda exhaled a long, deliberate stream of smoke before looking Bai Liu dead in the eyes.

"—is you, Bai Liu."

Bai Liu's expression didn't change. "What happened between me and him in the other timeline?"

Tang Erda leaned back slightly, his voice calm but laced with something unreadable.

"Your man, Mu Sicheng, was smuggling heretics overseas when he ran into Georgia on patrol. He captured him and handed him over to you. And after you... did something to Georgia—used some kind of heretical contamination, maybe—you released him the next day."

"But when Georgia returned, his body deteriorated rapidly. Day by day, it was as if he was suffering some kind of violent, unseen torture. He became delirious—so much so that he couldn't even say what exactly you had done to him that night. Sometimes, he even exhibited suicidal tendencies."

Tang Erda exhaled another slow breath of smoke.

"Later, Georgia's brother, Armand, ambushed the smuggling line Mu Sicheng was running, trying to avenge him." His voice dropped slightly. "...He died with him."

Bai Liu simply remarked, "That does sound like something I'd do in any timeline."

Tang Erda studied him for a moment. "If that were all, it would just be one of your many crimes."

He paused. "But if that were all, I wouldn't still remember it now."

Bai Liu turned his head slightly. "What else happened?"

Tang Erda exhaled. "After Armand's death, Georgia recovered physically—but emotionally, he was shattered all over again. The fact that Armand had died avenging him destroyed him. He tried to go back to work, but he wasn't himself. The Bureau of Heresy had to force him into an extended leave."

"After that, he locked himself in Armand's room and stayed there for days. I visited him a few times, tried to talk to him, tried to ask what Bai Six had done to him. But he barely acknowledged me, just mumbled to himself like he wasn't even there—"

"This isn't how it was supposed to be. This isn't the future I saw. It should have been me. It should have been the rest of the world. Not Armand."

Tang Erda fell silent for a moment, biting his cigarette as he looked up at the words [Golden Dawn] scrawled on the whiteboard.

"Later, I asked one of his colleagues if Georgia had ever said what Bai Six did to him. They told me Georgia said Bai Six just… showed him the future."

"No one knows exactly what he saw. But what happened afterward was beyond my expectations."

Tang Erda turned his gaze to Bai Liu. "Bai Six destroyed six of the Heresy Bureau's secret facilities in rapid succession, taking many high-risk heretics with him. We managed to kill the Joker he sent to break them out, but we still suffered heavy losses."

"But that wasn't the terrifying part," Tang Erda continued, voice dropping. "What truly frightened us was how Bai Six even knew where those bases were. The locations of the high-risk containment sites were buried under layers of encrypted security, hidden through torturous means, protected by every safeguard imaginable. Only one person in the Bureau had full access to that information."

"Georgia."

Tang Erda let out a slow sigh. "None of us wanted to believe he would betray the Bureau, let alone for Bai Six. But we had to be sure, so we started investigating him in secret."

"Georgia passed 127 rounds of interrogation." Tang Erda's jaw tightened. "He loathes Bai Six. He would never willingly betray the Bureau. That much, we confirmed. In the end, higher-ups let him keep his position, but the investigation continued—just underground."

"The external investigation hit a dead end. But inside the game… I started noticing something."

Tang Erda's eyes darkened. "A masked player had suddenly joined Bai Six's team. A powerful attacker. Cold, decisive—a killing machine. Same height as Georgia, similar build. But what made me really suspicious was his skill."

Tang Erda took a slow drag from his cigarette before exhaling. "He wielded a bow and arrow—the Bow of Retrospection. It rewinds a person's body back in time… exactly three hours."

He looked at Bai Liu.

"The time between Armand's death and the discovery of his body was exactly three hours."

Tang Erda took another deep breath. "I found Georgia and asked if that masked player was him." His fingers clenched around the cigarette. "He admitted it."

"I don't understand why he joined you," Tang Erda said hoarsely. "He passed the Bureau's tests. I know he despises Bai Six. I know he believes in peace and justice. But for some reason… he still chose to become a weapon in your hands."

"So I asked him why," Tang Erda continued. "And Georgia told me—"

"No matter how hard I tried, it never led to peace. Never to justice. Never to a future where Armand existed."

"I have to correct the future. And Bai Six is the only one who can do it."

Tang Erda's voice was quiet. "He told me that no matter how much he hated Bai Six, no matter how much innocent blood he had to spill, it was worth it if it meant setting the future right. And the moment Armand was brought back—"

"I'll die for my sins."

"That is the right future."

Silence settled between them. Bai Liu handed over an ashtray and met Tang Erda's gaze as he abruptly stopped speaking.

"Where does Georgia end up in this world?" Bai Liu asked.

Tang Erda wordlessly stubbed out his cigarette in the ashtray. Then, he exhaled one last ring of smoke and let it drift straight into Bai Liu's face.

"He won the league after you," Tang Erda said finally. "Got a wish." His voice was unreadable. "I don't know what he wished for. But he killed himself the next day."

"Same place Armand died."

"We found his body three hours later."

"I hope Armand will be resurrected in the right future."

In his sleep, Georgia saw himself—bloodstained and kneeling before a mass of light, its outline indistinct. A long, rusted silver bow lay at his side, its sleek shape betraying its age.

He was vaguely aware of the extraordinary presence within the light —something divine.

God asked him, "Do you not wish to live in the right future?"

Georgia watched himself shake his head. "I don't deserve that future. I made the wrong choice, and I must take responsibility for it. Death is the future that awaits me."

God asked again, "You are a righteous victor. Do you not wish for others to exist in the right future as well?"

Again, Georgia shook his head. "A broken future is the result of every decision made by every person in this world. Just as I must bear the weight of my own injustice, so must everyone else. They, too, must suffer the consequences of their indulgent desires."

Then, God said, "And yet, you spare Armand. You indulge his mistakes, gifting him the right future despite his wrong choices."

"This is your selfishness, Georgia. This is your injustice."

Georgia closed his eyes, his head hanging low. Blood dripped from his lashes, falling to the ground like self-pitying tears.

"Yes," he admitted. "It is my selfishness as a brother. I know he was wrong, and that he must answer for it. I only wished for all the guilt to be mine alone—not Armand's."

"But I know that's not possible."

God's voice remained unwavering. "Both you and Armand must pay for your selfishness and injustice."

"As punishment, you will forever lose the future in which Armand exists, and Armand will never exist in a world where you are his brother."

"The moment of birth will be erased, and you will walk eternally on opposite roads."

Georgia tried to wake from this fevered dream, but the harder he struggled, the more the dream fragmented—warping, twisting into something darker.

He saw himself again, head bowed, kneeling before a figure hidden in shadow. The bare skin of his neck was laced with deep red welts, the marks of a whip.

A long, black whip uncoiled in the man's hand. He tilted Georgia's chin up—not with his fingers, but with the toe of his polished leather shoe.

For the first time, Georgia saw his captor's face.

A man lounged in a wide leather chair, his smile warm and harmless. His features were sharply handsome—an Asian face adorned with a friendly expression that did nothing to soften the weight of his presence.

"Georgia, I'm very pleased with you."

His voice was light, almost conversational.

"I know you didn't mean to submit to me, but your performance is just too good."

Bai Six lowered his gaze, replacing his shoe with the handle of his whip, forcing Georgia's jaw higher and higher.

Georgia's throat bobbed in silent restraint, his long, pale neck stretched near its breaking point. The fresh welts on his collarbone stood out in stark relief against his skin.

"One game," Bai Six mused, almost in admiration. "And you killed a dozen players without hesitation. You gave me the locations of six secret strongholds with a single breath. You handed me hundreds of names without so much as blinking an eye."

He exhaled, a sigh of appreciation. "You are perfect—like a machine. In both execution and beauty."

"They called you a cold, unfeeling elf in the game." Bai Six's thumb brushed across Georgia's expressionless face. "And I have to agree. You look nothing like the righteous, noble Captain Georgia anymore."

He paused, studying him.

"It's fascinating, isn't it? How the death of someone dear to you can change you so completely."

Bai Six withdrew his hand, tightening his grip on the whip in thought.

"I've been through the same thing," he murmured, "but the only thing it changed in me... was my ability to control my anger when I see your face."

"You look too much like your brother."

His tone remained lazy, almost indifferent—so much so that when he struck, it was unexpected.

The whip cracked against Georgia's body.

Georgia barely flinched. He had long since learned that Bai Six would strike him without warning. After a single shudder, he lowered his head again, waiting.

"Tell me," Bai Six said, tapping the whip thoughtfully against his palm. "During the last game, when you shot those innocent players—where did you aim?"

Georgia's lashes trembled.

"I remember." His voice was quiet.

Bai Six's eyes half-lidded. "Then you know what must be done. Strip."

Georgia stood, removing his clothing with practiced obedience. His body was littered with crisscrossing welts—wounds that had not yet faded, curling around his waist and thighs like coiled vipers.

Each mark, he realized, represented a life he had taken.

The breath caught in his throat.

Bai Six had never needed to inflict suffering through physical pain alone. Georgia felt nothing from the whip.

But Bai Six knew that.

Instead, he made Georgia name every victim, recall every fatal wound he had inflicted. Then he traced the strikes across Georgia's body—marking each life with deliberate cruelty.

"What I do to you," Bai Six had once said, "is not even a fraction of what you have done to them."

After the punishment was over, Georgia dressed in silence, bowing respectfully before exiting Bai Six's quarters. His uniform was zipped high, collar stiff against his jawline.

He moved through the corridors without pause, his steps unwavering.

Then, as soon as he reached his room, he rushed to the toilet and vomited.

He clawed at the welts across his skin, as though trying to carve something out of himself—something rotten, something unclean. But he could only bring up clear water, and soon, his body convulsed from the strain.

He tortured himself in every way he could.

Digging his nails into his wounds. Pressing a blade to his own skin, deepening the marks Bai Six had left.

His breath came in ragged gasps. Silent, ceaseless tears streamed down his face.

At last, Georgia collapsed onto the bed, curling into himself.

In his hands, he clutched a pocket watch.

He wanted to open it—to look inside.

But in the end, he only pressed his lips to the surface, closed his tear-stained eyes, and drifted into unconsciousness.

He knew what was inside.

A single photograph.

Him and Armand, frozen in time.

Bai Liu escorted Tang Erda out of the room, and they chatted as they walked down the street.

"I'm curious," Bai Liu said, glancing sideways at Tang Erda. "You must have reported Georgia's betrayal to the Heretic Council as soon as you found out. What did they do with him?"

Tang Erda shrugged, pulling on his jacket as he turned around. "First, Georgia was stripped of his position. Then, they launched an investigation into the reasons behind his defection—but by the time the investigation started, he had already gone rogue."

"There were two main theories within the Heretic Authority at the time. The first suggested that Georgia had been contaminated by some kind of heresy through Bai Six and had suffered spiritual corruption, making him fall under Bai Six's control."

"But that theory didn't explain everything—especially the fact that Georgia revealed the location of the secret stronghold to Bai Six. Even if he had lost his mind, Bai Six wouldn't have been able to extract that information unless Georgia trusted him completely. No amount of insanity alone could have accounted for such an action."

Tang Erda hesitated for a moment, his expression twisting slightly. "Then there was another theory... Some speculated that Georgia had developed feelings for you. That, due to a Stockholm Syndrome effect, he fell in love with you—and that's why you had complete control over him."

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. "District 1 is surprisingly gossipy."

"It's not gossip," Tang Erda argued stiffly. "To uncover the truth, we had to consider every angle." Then, after a brief pause, he added in a more subdued tone, "Another reason why that theory gained traction was... Georgia often had unexplained whip marks on his body. And your—well, Bai Six's—weapon just so happened to be a long whip."

Bai Liu: "..."

Had he really played that rough in other timelines?

The Game Pool

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Armand jolted awake, sitting on the edge of his bed, drenched in sweat. His head hung low as he tried to catch his breath, the remnants of his nightmare still clinging to him.

Or rather, a reprieve from the nightmarish reality.

He flexed his cold, clammy fingers, but the last image from his dream refused to fade—a bleeding Mu Sicheng, his head on the ground, pupils blown wide.

The other man's blood had spread across the floor, merging seamlessly with the pool beneath him.

Armand sat in a daze, staring at nothing as he thought back to his dream—or rather, his past life.

His older brother, Georgia, had been the head captain of the Heretic Authority's Zone 3 for as long as Armand could remember. The job was dangerous, and Georgia had always been fiercely protective, going so far as to dictate Armand's every move. He had a strict plan for everything Armand did, ensuring his safety at all costs.

For example, Georgia had outright forbidden him from joining the Heresy Authority or engaging in anything related to heretics.

But Armand had never been one to listen. The more Georgia resisted, the more determined he became. To him, the Bureau of Heresy wasn't just a job—it was the fantasy of saving the world.

As a child, Armand idolized his older brother and, in turn, became fascinated by the Heretic Council. By adolescence, his rebellious streak had reached its peak, and he defied Georgia completely by enlisting in the Heretic Authority's training camp.

It led to their first real fight. Armand threw a fit, stubbornly refusing to back down, until eventually, he got what he wanted.

Georgia had only looked at him coldly and said, "Armand, you're soft-hearted and cowardly. You lack the cruelty necessary to face your enemies, and if you stay this way, fate will punish you severely."

Looking back now, Georgia had been right. Georgia was always right.

Back then, Armand had yet to be punished. He still clung to naive illusions about fate's mercy.

Despite being accepted into the Heresy Authority, he had been placed in the safest possible role—handling paperwork in the heresy control department. It was Georgia's way of keeping him out of harm's reach.

Bored and frustrated, Armand spent his days cataloging heretics, always looking for an opportunity to move to the front lines. But every time, Georgia caught wind of it and tightened his leash, keeping him firmly confined within Zone 3 headquarters.

It left Armand feeling a strange, suffocating solitude.

All his life, Georgia had built an impenetrable wall around him, shielding him from the horrors of heretics. Inside that wall, there was nothing—just Armand, alone. Even Georgia remained outside, distancing himself, taking every precaution not to contaminate him.

And so, Armand grew up within that fortress, still isolated, still alone, with no one to talk to.

Until that night.

Zone 3, Georgia's jurisdiction, was a high-risk storage area for some of the most dangerous and valuable heretics. Its strongholds were located in secret places, nearly impossible to breach.

But for Zone 3's greatest adversary—Mu Sicheng—those barriers meant nothing.

Mu Sicheng was the district's worst nightmare. Every time the arrogant thief made an appearance, the entire division scrambled, desperately analyzing his weaknesses in a never-ending effort to capture him.

Yet, after all that research, the best they had managed was barely scratching the surface.

Armand sighed, stuffing his mouth with bread as his teammates once again started discussing Mu Sicheng's background.

"Mu Sicheng… his best friend died… he refuses to work with anyone now, completely withdrawn and solitary…"

"He takes it pretty hard. Loses control when it's brought up… maybe we can use that…"

Armand, still chewing, mumbled through a mouthful of food, "How is a dead friend considered a weakness?"

He playfully thumped his own chest. "Unless you make him a living friend. Now that'd be a weakness. I'd make a great spy as the thief's new best friend."

His teammates laughed at the absurdity. Since Armand was Georgia's brother, they humored him. "Do you even know how his last friend died?"

Armand shook his head.

They grinned. "Mu Sicheng killed him. If you befriend him, you might end up the same way."

Armand choked on his bread.

That night, Zone 3's red alert blared.

He woke in a daze to Georgia's voice over the radio:

"All districts on high alert! Mu Sicheng has been shot in the waist after stealing three heavy Level 2 Red Heretics and is now incapacitated but attempting to escape! All teams, commence search!"

"—Shoot on sight if necessary!"

The entire sector was thrown into a frenzy. The search parties were practically celebrating, thrilled at the thought of capturing the infamous thief at last. Armand, sneaking among them, found himself ignored—his status as Georgia's brother meant they turned a blind eye to his presence.

Excitedly, he joined the search.

He was caught, of course. Georgia spotted him within two searches, scolded him harshly, and sent him back to his room in disgrace.

But when Armand returned, something felt… off.

The room appeared untouched, but there was a scent in the air that didn’t belong.

Blood.

His heartbeat spiked.

Armand knew he wasn’t capable of handling an intruder alone, so he turned to leave, intending to alert the others.

But before he could take another step, sharp claws hooked around his throat. A low, ragged breath brushed against his ear, followed by a chuckle.

"You're sharp, aren't you? Your nose is as good as mine. You smelled my blood, didn't you?"

Armand stiffened, raising his hands in surrender. Before he could reply, the weight on his shoulder suddenly slid away.

He turned, stunned.

Lying weakly in a pool of blood was a young man his age, monkey headphones resting on his head, his breathing shallow and labored.

Mu Sicheng.

He was on the verge of shock from blood loss, Armand realized, staring at the wounded thief. Despite his condition, Mu Sicheng clutched the three stolen heretic boxes as if they were his lifeline.

Memories of all the intelligence reports on him flooded Armand’s mind.

[No friends… always alone… seems lonely… only ever speaks with a presence behind him.]

[Everything he steals, every move he makes—it’s all to impress someone in the shadows, to earn their approval.]

Armand had imagined some sinister, middle-aged figure pulling the strings. He hadn’t expected… this.

Blood pooled beneath Mu Sicheng, but he made no effort to tend to his wounds—only to protect what he had stolen.

Armand pressed his lips into a thin line. His fingers hovered over the gun at his waist.

Then, he gritted his teeth and drew it.

But no matter how much he steeled himself—he couldn’t pull the trigger.

Georgia had been right.

Even knowing Mu Sicheng was a criminal, even knowing he was dangerous, Armand couldn't bring himself to shoot.

Because in Mu Sicheng’s fading eyes, he saw the same thing he had always longed for—

A desperate, quiet yearning to be understood.

A knock on the door shattered the moment.

Armand startled, then, without thinking, yanked Mu Sicheng under the bed. He hastily wiped the blood from the floor, sprayed an excessive amount of air freshener, and flopped onto the mattress, feigning sleep.

The visitor asked, "Have you seen any suspicious activity?"

Armand blurted out, "No! The air freshener is because I just took a really nasty shit, so I had to spray a lot!"

A long pause.

"…You didn’t have to tell me that."

The visitor left, muttering complaints about the overpowering smell.

Armand exhaled, collapsing onto the bed. After a long moment, he hesitantly placed a healing potion and a roll of bandages under it.

A while later, a pair of monkey paws snatched them away.

Then, a quiet voice drawled, "Hey. What's your name?"

Armand answered honestly. "Armand."

A scoff. "Sounds awful. You look just like the guy who shot me. Who is he?"

"…My brother."

A long silence. Then, the inevitable question: "Why did you save me?"

Armand sighed. "I don't know. I just… couldn't help it."

A raspy laugh. Then, a low, amused murmur.

"Idiot."

Armand: "....."

Although he thought it was pretty ridiculous too, wasn't it still wrong for him to say that?

When Armand woke early the next morning, Mu Sicheng was gone. He felt relieved—but at the same time, he wondered if he had lost his mind, working himself into a frenzy just to succeed. Maybe that was why he'd dreamed of chasing Mu Sicheng.

But why had his dream self saved him—only to let him go?

Armand gave up trying to make sense of it.

Not long after, however, the notorious thief made another appearance at the Heretic's Authority. This time, he didn't take anything. Instead, he left something behind.

Like every arrogant, over-the-top eccentric thief in history, he had the audacity to send a teaser letter—naming three districts in advance.

[- Coming Wednesday to steal something. What? Don't know yet. Watch and find out. And tell your captain's brother—the one with the ugly name—to clean up and wait for me at the door!]

Georgia lifted his gaze and tossed the letter onto a stunned Armand's desk.

"Explain why Mu Sicheng is targeting you."

"..... I don't know....." Armand was nearly in tears. He really, truly regretted everything.

Georgia let out a long breath, fixing Armand with a sharp stare before delivering his judgment.

"Whatever happened between you and Mu Sicheng, Armand, you need to understand this: that man is a demon. And he will get you in the end."

"But if you need a firsthand lesson in reality, I'll give it to you."

Georgia assessed Armand's faint-hearted expression before handing down the final verdict.

"Take a gun and join the raid on Wednesday."

Come Wednesday, Armand stood at the front of the team, gun in hand, wary.

Then the thief arrived.

For the first time, Armand saw Mu Sicheng in action—stealing and running.

Mu Sicheng moved like the wind, as fast and free as a passing storm. He laughed, a blur to the naked eye, and in the span of a heartbeat, he brushed past Armand—grabbing his wrist and yanking him along.

Gunfire rang out. Shouts echoed through the streets.

And yet, in the chaos of the Heretic's Authority scrambling after them, the infamous thief and his accidental accomplice sprinted off like two kids caught pulling a prank.

Armand snapped out of his daze, jerking his arm to break free. But by then, Mu Sicheng was already glancing back at him with a mischievous grin.

"Isn't it fun watching them fail to catch us?"

Armand instinctively turned back to look at his own team—their faces twisted in frustration as they sprinted full-speed after them, only to be utterly outmatched by Mu Sicheng's impossible speed.

It was... kind of funny.

Despite himself, Armand laughed.

Mu Sicheng ran faster, dragging Armand along.

These dangerous heresies—items so carefully measured, contained, and guarded by the Heretic's Authority—meant nothing in Mu Sicheng's hands.

They weren't threats. They were toys.

This wasn't a criminal act against the world.

To Mu Sicheng, this was just a game.

With a smirk, Mu Sicheng tossed one of the heresies to Armand.

"Know what this does?"

Armand squinted at the item, brain scrambling for the statistics he had memorized.

"Number 8035… I think this one is… um…"

Wind.

Butterflies.

They could summon hurricanes.

Mu Sicheng didn't wait for him to finish. He impatiently flipped open the box.

A swarm of multicolored butterflies burst into the air, their wings fanning out fierce winds. Within seconds, the gusts whipped through the chamber, strong enough to push Armand clean off his feet.

Caught off guard, Armand was sent flying.

Mu Sicheng caught him by the ankle before he could be blown away entirely, laughing as he kept him anchored.

"You've been guarding this place for so long, and your brother never even let you play with these?"

"Is this a game?!" Armand yelled, voice breaking. "Shut it down! It's causing extreme climate shifts!"

"No."

Mu Sicheng effortlessly balanced himself in the raging wind, floating just above Armand. He steadied Armand's shoulders and leaned in, voice low and amused.

"That's stupid. Your brother never taught you this, did he? Watch—every heresy has a weakness."

Guiding Armand's fingers, Mu Sicheng made him grab the tail of one of the butterflies.

Whispering close to Armand's ear, he murmured:

"The moment you find it, the heretic is yours."

Armand watched, stunned, as the butterfly stilled at his fingertips.

Mu Sicheng grinned. "Right?"

Then—just to be a menace—he let go, flicking the butterfly's tail feathers.

The wind roared to life.

Armand barely had time to panic before Mu Sicheng seized him by the back of the neck, dragging him backwards into the storm.

Laughing wildly, Mu Sicheng shot a gleeful two-fingered salute at the Heretic's Authority as they came rushing after them.

"I'll be borrowing your captain's brother for fun!"

And just like that, they disappeared into the howling wind.

The storm didn't carry them far before Mu Sicheng abruptly stopped.

Somewhere along the way, he had picked up a call.

His previously exuberant expression instantly sobered. His voice, usually light and teasing, turned measured and serious.

"……Yeah, I got it. I'll bring the goods back. No issues on security along the smuggling line."

As soon as the call ended, Mu Sicheng turned and took one look at Armand—

And burst out laughing.

Armand, still reeling from everything, was a sight to behold.

He had Georgia's face—ninety-nine percent identical.

But right now, after experiencing high-speed pursuit and a literal hurricane for the first time, his brown hair was windswept into an absolute disaster. His entire expression was frozen in bewildered, shell-shocked idiocy.

He was on all fours. Not because he wanted to be—he just hadn't regained his balance.

Mu Sicheng crouched in front of him, smirking.

"I thought the big kook's brother would be a little kook." He let out an exaggerated sigh. "Didn't expect a little idiot."

Armand glared. "Say that again."

Still grinning, Mu Sicheng stuffed his hands into his pockets, casually pulling out a few heresy boxes and tossing them to Armand.

"Well, I had my fun for today. See you next time. Bye."

With that, he turned on his heel and sauntered off, exuding effortless swagger.

Armand looked at the boxes in front of him—

And was suddenly struck by a thought.

Not only had Mu Sicheng stolen boxes today, but he had also returned the three he had taken before—ones Armand had recovered after Mu Sicheng's last injury.

"Mu Sicheng—" Armand hesitated, then called out, "You gave back what you stole last time, too."

Mu Sicheng raised an eyebrow, pivoting on one foot. "What, is returning them not good enough for you?"

Armand answered honestly, "You were just having fun today. The ones you took were all low-tier, level-one red heretics. But these three —" he gestured at the boxes— "they're all high-risk, level-three red. They should've been your real targets. I appreciate you giving them back, but honestly? I'm more worried you'll just come back and steal them again."

Mu Sicheng smirked. "They were my targets." His tone was light, almost amused. "But last time, you caught me. I failed. And if I fail, it doesn't count as my prize."

With a casual wave, he turned away, his voice carrying a grin as he left.

“Of course I’ll steal again. Try to catch me if you don’t want to lose, Armand.”

Armand stared at the boxes for a long time, lost in thought.

That day, after finally recovering stolen heretics, he officially earned his place on the front lines.

From then on, Mu Sicheng would send him teaser letters from time to time. And Armand—who had once hesitated, who had once second-guessed himself—grew up overnight. He became composed, relentless in his pursuit of Mu Sicheng.

Whenever the thief appeared, Armand was the first to move, fast enough to nearly match him.

But he never shot Mu Sicheng.

Over time, he became the best in the department at retrieving stolen goods from Mu Sicheng’s hands.

Chasing him, Armand matured. He became steadier, more capable, more responsible.

He became Georgia’s second-in-command.

One evening, after dinner, Armand returned to his dorm to log the heretics he had recovered. But before he could sit down, he spotted something by his bed—a teaser letter.

[Lieutenant, no more chase games. Want a drink?]

Armand’s lips curled into a faint smile.

After carefully ensuring his brother wasn’t around, he slipped out through the back door of the Heretic’s Authority.

He knew where to go.

It was the clearing where Mu Sicheng had once swept him up in the wind. They had met there often—though neither of them could quite explain why. It had simply happened. Unspoken, understood.

The ground was barren, but if you looked up, the sky was dazzling.

When Armand arrived, Mu Sicheng was sitting atop a small hill, staring at the stars.

“Here.” Mu Sicheng greeted him lazily, tossing him a bottle of wine.

Armand caught it easily—habit, at this point. Then, as he glanced up at Mu Sicheng, he suddenly felt something was off.

His instincts screamed at him.

Something wasn’t right.

“…What’s wrong?” Armand asked, sitting beside him.

Mu Sicheng tilted his head back, taking a sip before exhaling heavily.

“That guy put me in charge of the smuggling line,” he muttered. “No more stealing.”

A silence stretched between them.

Then Mu Sicheng spoke again, as if brushing the moment aside.

“The next time we meet, we’ll both be shooting.” He glanced at Armand. “So ditch that fake gun of yours.”

Armand said nothing.

—Because if it had only been theft, it could’ve been a game.

But smuggling?

That wasn’t a game anymore.

It was life or death.

For countless people.

Armand rarely drank. But at that moment, he took a long, hard swig, wiped his mouth, and said, “I will.”

Mu Sicheng looked back up at the stars.

“I’ve played a lot of games. Some cruel, some horrifying. And one…” His voice softened.

“…One I’ll never forget.”

He lowered his gaze, not looking at Armand as he held out a hand.

“Thanks. For sparing me. And for keeping me company.”

Armand clasped his hand, serious. “It’s okay. We’re friends.”

Mu Sicheng froze.

For a long moment, he didn’t speak.

Then, finally, he snorted. “You know how my last friend died?”

“Killed by your own hand.”

Armand’s grip on Mu Sicheng’s hand tightened. His dark brown eyes burned with quiet resolve.

“But I believe you won’t kill me.” His voice was firm. “Or rather—I’ll make sure I’m strong enough that you can’t. I won’t let you die, and I won’t let myself die, either.”

He clenched his fist. “I’ll be strong enough to stop you.”

Mu Sicheng withdrew his hand, looking away with a squirming, reluctant expression—yet a small, stifled smile played on his lips.

“...Stupid brat,” he muttered. “Don’t get cocky just because you’ve caught me a few times.”

But perhaps neither of them could have imagined—

That would be the last time they ever looked at each other and smiled.

Three months later.

When Bai Six arrived to deliver a shipment, Mu Sicheng was spotted by Georgia during the handover.

The cargo was high-risk. A smuggled heretic shipment. If it hit the market, the consequences would be severe.

Georgia acted instantly.

His attack was relentless.

Mu Sicheng, left behind, struggled to hold his ground. Then Bai Six—who had already left—doubled back, returning to the port.

With Bai Six’s intervention, the outcome was sealed.

Mu Sicheng captured the captain of Zone Three on the spot.

And when he finally saw Georgia's face—

His pupils shrank.

Bai Six, lounging in his seat, didn't miss the shift in Mu Sicheng's expression.

His gaze flicked to Georgia, half-kneeling before him, unreadable.

"You know this captain?" Bai Six asked.

Mu Sicheng hesitated. "…I used to steal from his jurisdiction."

Bai Six turned to him, unimpressed.

"I don't like being lied to." His voice was calm, but cutting. "You know I meant more than that. You have feelings for him?"

"No!" Mu Sicheng denied it too quickly.

Bai Six observed him for a moment, then turned back to Georgia.

"Your reaction wasn't because of him," he mused. "It was because of someone who looks like him."

He crouched, tilting Georgia's face up. Examining his features.

"A relative? Immediate family?" Bai Six's gaze sharpened. "A male, similar in age."

Mu Sicheng's breath hitched.

His fists clenched.

Bai Six smiled slightly.

"—His brother, isn't he?"

Mu Sicheng's silence was answer enough.

Bai Six leaned back, folding his hands. "This kind of bond, built on opposing sides—"

His eyes met Mu Sicheng's.

"Was it fun?"

Mu Sicheng's hands trembled. His eyes burned red.

And then—he exhaled.

Lowered his head.

Knelt.

“…Please.” His voice was quiet, strained. “Let Georgia go.”

Bai Six’s expression didn’t change.

Mu Sicheng swallowed hard, forcing his words out. “I got carried away. I won’t let it happen again. Killing him now would disrupt the balance in Zone Three—complicate our plans—”

He faltered.

And then he fell silent, motionless.

Bai Six lowered his eyes.

“…Out of respect for you, and for the importance of our work this time,” he said finally. “I’ll let him go.”

Mu Sicheng looked up, stunned.

"Not next time." Bai Six cast a fleeting glance at Georgia. "But before that, there's something I need to show this Captain of Sector 3—just to ensure he won’t remember our smuggling routes."

Mu Sicheng exhaled sharply, relief washing over him. "A memory-erasing prop?"

"No," Bai Six murmured. "Something new I recently acquired—[Future]."

Georgia took one look at the object and went deathly still, as if his very soul had been drained. When it was over, Bai Six abandoned him in a barren wasteland—the same secret spot where Mu Sicheng and Armand used to drink together.

Mu Sicheng sent a quiet message, summoning Armand to retrieve his brother.

Armand arrived in a panic, gathering up Georgia’s lifeless form and carrying him away.

That was the beginning of the nightmare.

For a month, Georgia remained silent, lost in despair, teetering on the edge of suicide. Desperate and out of options, Armand finally snapped —he logged into the game.

He fought his way through the brutal trials, inching toward death with every step, until, in his last moments, he saw something on the massive arena screen—something that shattered him.

Mu Sicheng.

But not the one he knew.

On the screen, Mu Sicheng grinned wildly, drenched in sweat and blood, slaughtering without hesitation, treating human lives like disposable playthings. He wasn't alone. He followed another man, his movements precise, his hands deadly—no longer just a thief, but a weapon honed to perfection, a blade made for killing.

Armand stood frozen in the roaring crowd, watching the spectacle unfold.

So this is what Mu Sicheng meant by "the game"…

Was this…?

Mu Sicheng wiped blood from his jaw with the hem of his shirt, waving off the deafening cheers as he stepped off the field.

Bai Six, watching him closely, suddenly asked, "So, which game was more fun? This one, or that little 'game of friendship' with the lieutenant from the third district?"

Mu Sicheng’s pupils dilated, his bloodlust still simmering, his sharp teeth flashing in a wicked grin. "Is that even a question?"

"Of course, this game."

Armand felt like the world had gone silent.

As Bai Six’s entourage paraded through the arena, the crowd erupted into applause. Mu Sicheng, the highest-scoring killer of the match, trailed behind Bai Six, walking with careless arrogance—so carelessly that he bumped straight into Armand.

He didn’t even notice.

Armand, shoved to the ground, stared up at Mu Sicheng’s retreating figure.

Mu Sicheng glanced back briefly, meeting Armand's eyes—but there was no recognition, no flicker of familiarity. Just a fleeting look of contempt before he turned away.

Armand sat there, dazed, as Bai Six passed by.

Then Bai Six smiled, tilting his head slightly. His lips moved, forming a silent message.

"It's just a game."

—All of it. Just a game.

Armand barely remembered how he logged out. He stumbled back to his dorm at the Heresy Bureau, dug through his drawers, and found them—Mu Sicheng's old letters.

The teasing letters.

He tore them apart, shredded them into pieces, then burned them.

The drinks they had shared, the stolen heretics they had played with, the fake bullets in his empty gun—he erased it all.

Lying on his bed, he closed his eyes. But behind his lids, the memories wouldn't fade. He could still hear Mu Sicheng's quiet laughter, still see that endless, star-filled sky over the wasteland where they once sat together.

When he finally opened his eyes, they were empty.

Without hesitation, Armand replaced the blanks in his pistol with live rounds and sent Mu Sicheng a message.

He didn't know if Mu Sicheng would come.

He could only hope that, for once, the thief had enough patience to play their game to the very end.

Mu Sicheng showed up.

So Armand ended it.

With tears streaming down his face, he gritted his teeth and pulled the trigger.

The bullet tore through Mu Sicheng's throat.

Mu Sicheng staggered, his eyes wide with disbelief—as if he couldn't fathom that Armand had actually shot him.

As he collapsed to the ground, his body twisted, his arms shifting into the clawed form of a monkey's paw. He dragged himself forward, inching toward Armand.

Armand, thinking he was still trying to attack, fired again.

The shot hit his temple.

Mu Sicheng let out a ragged breath, his claws seizing Armand's wrist in a feeble grip. He wheezed, voice raw and broken—

"…Caught your brother. I'm sorry."

His trembling hand covered Armand's, as if he wanted to shake it.

His eyes, usually brimming with mischief, were clouded with something far heavier.

Even in death, he didn't ask why.

He just apologized.

For Georgia.

Armand's breath hitched.

Tears blurred his vision as he tried to speak—but no sound came.

His throat burned.

Only then did he realize—Mu Sicheng's claws had ripped through his vocal cords. He couldn't speak anymore.

His body grew cold. His heartbeat slowed.

The last thing he saw was a pair of black leather shoes stepping toward him.

A whip dragging against the ground.

A figure kneeling beside Mu Sicheng's body, cradling the thief's lifeless form with eerie gentleness.

With gloved hands, the man carefully shut Mu Sicheng's vacant eyes.

Then, in a voice barely above a whisper, he murmured:

"If this was your chosen game… then this is your [end]."

"But death is merely a long sleep for you. Your soul will always belong to me."

"And when you wake, we will meet again."

His tone was soft. Patient. Almost… fatherly.

Like a parent soothing a restless child to sleep.

Armand tried to lift his gaze, tried to see the man's face—but his body was shutting down.

His eyelids were too heavy.

The stranger's words felt like a lullaby, dragging him under.

Before his vision went dark, a stray thought crossed Armand's fading mind—

If Georgia were here, he'd scold him for being so reckless. He'd make him write a three-thousand-word report on his foolish attachment to an enemy. He'd demand it on his desk by morning.

A single tear slipped from the corner of Armand's eye.

His soul, like a butterfly caught in the wind, finally surrendered to the long sleep called death.

And within the enclosed battlefield, the storm finally ceased.

Chapter End Notes

> The author had to note down at the end of Armand's debut chapters that Mu Sicheng and Armand are not a canon couple in the novel.
> Like What!!! They have so much chemistry together.

The Game Pool

When Armand opened his eyes again, it was as if time had rewound to before the accident.

Or rather, it wasn't as simple as returning to the past. It felt more like he'd fallen into a parallel timeline—one eerily similar to his own, yet subtly different in ways that were almost imperceptible.

The Bureau of Heresy still existed.
The game was still there.
And most importantly—his brother, Georgia, was alive.

Armand could hardly believe it. His brother was safe. He hadn't been captured, hadn't been tortured into madness by Mu Sicheng. In fact, there was no trace of Mu Sicheng at all—no notorious monkey thief running a massive smuggling operation, no chaos wreaked upon the Third District. Armand had spent a month confirming it, over and over again, until the certainty left him breathless with relief.

And yet—beneath that relief, something gnawed at him. A strange, lingering emptiness.

For the first time in a long while, his world was peaceful. No one came to disturb him.

But why?

Had he truly returned to the past, or was this some cruel illusion crafted by hell to ensnare lost souls?

Armand's hand unconsciously drifted to his throat—the same throat that Mu Sicheng had gutted. But here, there were no scars. No evidence of what had happened. It was as if some unseen force had granted him a second chance, allowing him to rewind his life and attempt a more "perfect" future line.

But if even death could be undone—if his sins and mistakes could be erased like words on a page—then what was the meaning of his existence?

Armand didn't have an answer. He was too young to think about such things.

And young people—especially ones like him, who had spent most of their twenty years fighting a thief—weren't good at contemplating the nature of life.

Yet in a world where Mu Sicheng didn't exist, everything felt almost... absurd.

A bitter laugh escaped him as he recalled something Mu Sicheng had once said, disdainfully dismissing the world itself:

"It’s just a game—what’s the big deal?"

Armand had never understood how Mu Sicheng could so easily detach himself from reality, watching everything from above, treating lives like playthings.

And yet—after all the wanton destruction, the theft, the chaos—Mu Sicheng had once lain beside him on the wasteland, staring up at the endless sky, and murmured softly:

"Armand, the game’s no fun without friends."

He had said it so quietly, with his elbow over his eyes, that for a moment, Armand had felt as if the thief might start crying.

Mu Sicheng had been the one who chose to play.
He had been the one who refused to stop.
And yet, in the end, he was the one who seemed the most lost.

Armand took a deep breath, pushing the memory aside.

It didn’t matter what kind of world this was. Whether it was a second chance or a cruel trick, he knew one thing for certain—he had to protect Georgia.

He would not let his brother suffer again.

Armand brushed his long hair over his shoulder, tucking the golden-winged emblem of the Golden Dawn guild behind his ear. Georgia always nagged him to keep it neat—said he looked too unruly otherwise.

Unlike his brother, who always tied his hair back, Armand preferred to wear his loose. He hated the tightness. But because Georgia insisted, he kept it well-groomed.

He was heading to the play pool to train.

Georgia had forbidden him from entering the small TV area, claiming it was too dangerous—players couldn't log out at will. So Armand had never stepped foot there since waking up. He had no idea what was happening inside.

His knowledge of the game was still limited. He had spent most of his time after waking up training in the pool, fighting against other players.

If it weren't for the fact that he had secretly joined Golden Dawn behind Georgia's back, his brother might have tried to keep him out of the league entirely. Georgia always wanted to keep him in the safest place possible.

But Armand had signed up.

And not just that—he was good. Good enough that even Georgia couldn't ignore him. As the former vice-captain, he was too skilled to be sidelined.

Even so, Georgia hadn't forgiven him for it. The two were still locked in a cold war.

Which is why, when Armand stepped out of his dormitory and saw Georgia standing at his door—he was stunned.

Georgia met his gaze, his expression unreadable.

"Armand, I dreamt about you," he said.

His voice was distant, as if recalling something unpleasant.

"I don't remember the details. Just that you died… with a man. To protect me."

Armand's hands clenched involuntarily. He lowered his head, lips pressed together in silence.

Georgia sighed and reached out, ruffling his hair. His fingers ghosted over the corner of Armand's eye in an oddly tender motion.

"Sometimes, I wish you'd never grown up."

Armand froze.

"But you have," Georgia murmured, his gaze dropping to Armand's shoulder. A butterfly rested there, its wings gently fluttering.

"Your skill has changed. It used to be a bow—like mine. Now, it's a butterfly. That means your core desire has shifted."

"But no matter how many times I ask, you never tell me why."

Georgia's voice was quiet.

"Ever since we were kids, I could always tell what you were thinking. We even had the same dreams. You used to love that connection between us."

"But now… even when I dream of you, I can't understand what you're thinking."

"You have secrets, Armand."

Armand parted his lips, as if to speak—but in the end, he said nothing.

Georgia watched him for a moment, then exhaled softly, lowering his gaze.

"I can't keep you locked away in a safe place anymore."

His voice was heavy.

"A butterfly can't survive in a cage."

Armand looked up in shock.

Georgia met his gaze evenly.

"The team is patrolling the small TV area today. We're doing an exhibition match for the players who support us. If you're serious about playing in the league…"

"Then take it seriously."

"Pack your things and meet us there."

With that, Georgia turned on his heel and walked away.

Armand stood frozen in place, his mind blank.

Then, slowly, he reached up, touching the spot where Georgia had ruffled his hair. His fingers trembled.

A soft, breathless laugh escaped him, his eyes turning slightly red.

"Yes, Captain!" Armand called after him, voice steady and clear.

The butterfly on his shoulder fluttered its wings.

Small TV Area

Bai Liu's group rested against the side of the central hall, taking a break mid-training. No one dared to approach them, especially because of Tang Erda, and everyone watched in awe at these five players who had won thirteen games in two days.

Bai Liu squinted and pulled his sweaty hair back with his fingers as Mu Sicheng sat next to him, head bowed, panting.

Tang Erda crossed his arms and scolded them, "Three games and you can't last? Didn't you manage ten in a row yesterday?"

"It's because I managed ten games in a row yesterday that my body aches today," Bai Liu replied seriously. "It's too intense, Captain Tang, I can't keep up in an office like this."

Mu Sicheng exhaled a hot breath. "I can keep going, but the other two who didn't call out aren't holding up."

Tang Erda looked over at Liu Jiayi and Muke, both pale and out of breath. He had subconsciously expected everyone in the group to match the standards of future players, forgetting that Muke and Liu Jiayi—slightly weaker than the others—were struggling with the intensity of the training.

Despite their exhaustion, neither had asked to stop, gritting their teeth and enduring.

Mu Sicheng added, "The games you've picked are all quick monster-fighting rounds that don't even require decryption, and some of them we've already cleared. Of course, they're going fast for you, but we're struggling to keep up."

"Take it easy on yourselves, Captain Tang," Bai Liu said with a smile.

Tang Erda paused for a moment and then relented, "Rest for half a dimensional hour."

Bai Liu turned to Liu Jiayi. "Are you close to qualifying for the league based on the number of games you've played?"

Liu Jiayi tapped on the system panel to check and nodded. "Yes, two more to go."

"If you sign up for the league under our guild's name, you're officially quitting the King's Guild, right?" Bai Liu asked.

Liu Jiayi went quiet for a moment. "Yes."

Bai Liu met her gaze. "No regrets?"

Liu Jiayi rolled her eyes. "Did you give me a chance to regret? Now's the time to ask? Ridiculous."

"That's not true," Bai Liu admitted shamelessly, grinning. "But have you ever regretted it?"

"Yes," Liu Jiayi admitted without hesitation, but after a brief pause, she added softly, "... But, well, when you said outside the Heretics Authority that you wouldn't use Hearts' method, that made me feel a little less regretful."

Before she could say more, a commotion erupted at the front, drawing the attention of the crowd.

Bai Liu's group stood up and stepped back. Tang Erda, the tallest with the best view, glanced away from the crowd and frowned. "There's a guild war party out on patrol."

"What guild is this big?" Mu Sicheng asked, raising an eyebrow. "Top three, right?"

Tang Erda turned to Bai Liu and said quietly, "Golden Dawn."

Bai Liu's gaze shifted sideways to the approaching Golden Dawn team.

The Golden Dawn members, in full force, separated the spectators with ease, creating a clear path for the players to walk through. The crowd of onlookers, including many Golden Dawn fans and bettors, watched eagerly. They cheered loudly as they spotted two almost identical faces at the forefront of the team, both shining with excitement.

"… Who's this new player? Georgia's brother?!"

"The twins! This year's pairs will be a treat!"

"Golden Dawn's been keeping this quiet. Are they hiding a killer? What's the skill?"

“Gee, that face is going to cause a frenzy on the field. Georgia didn’t get a free pass on his face again, did he?”

The chatter grew louder, drowning out all attention on Bai Liu and his group.

Golden Dawn’s arrival overshadowed them, and occasionally, spectators would glance at Bai Liu with contempt, muttering insults.

“That’s just the regular team, nothing special… The big guild’s team still can’t compare.”

“Look at their rookie players.”

Of course, they wouldn’t dare insult Bai Liu directly, especially with Tang Erda standing right there. Everyone was too scared to provoke him.

Bai Liu, unfazed by the comments, had long grown accustomed to being mocked. But Mu Sicheng, already on edge from Tang Erda’s pressure about the training, couldn’t hold back. Now, these people were getting under his skin.

With a grim expression, Mu Sicheng rolled up his sleeves, ready to teach them a lesson.

When the players saw Mu Sicheng approaching, they didn’t expect a competitor to react so aggressively. Once Mu Sicheng grabbed one of them, the players were so frightened they nearly screamed. Only after Bai Liu intervened did Mu Sicheng finally release them, though they kept begging for mercy as they fled.

Mu Sicheng was still furious. He and Bai Liu stood in the inner circle, facing the approaching Golden Dawn team. As he turned, his eyes fixed on the players who had tried to pull him down. He glared at them, preparing to see who this newcomer was that had the crowd in such a frenzy.

At the head of the Golden Dawn team stood a man with a waist-high brown ponytail and striking brown eyes. His uniform—a silver and white ceremonial suit with gold-stitched boots—was impeccably groomed. Two shiny gold winged badges adorned either side of his ponytail.

Behind him, slightly to the right, was a player who looked almost identical, though slightly shorter, with darker brown eyes. His shoulder-length hair was pinned back by a gold winged crest, and a butterfly rested motionlessly on his right shoulder, as if a decorative accessory.

Though he looked young, there was a quiet majesty about him, like a leader who had been at the helm for a long time.

It really was like a big curmudgeon with a little curmudgeon.

Mu Sicheng's eyes narrowed mischievously as he focused on the newcomer, Armand. He rested his gaze on the winged crest behind Armand's ear, an itch forming in his fingers.

He hadn't stolen anything in a while.

The butterfly on Armand's shoulder suddenly fluttered its wings. As Armand walked by, Mu Sicheng—quick as a monkey—reached out with his "monkey paw" and poked Armand behind the ear.

Armand quickly turned, evading the poke with ease. But Mu Sicheng, quicker still, flicked the badge off the back of his head with a sharp motion.

With his long brown hair flowing behind him, Armand turned, his face half-covered. Only his dark brown eyes were visible, but they were clear and unamused.

The badge clattered to the ground with a crisp 'ding'.

Mu Sicheng bent down, scooping the badge up with his fingers, spinning it absently on his nails. He looked up at Armand with a mocking smile. "Is this the alertness of Golden Dawn's ace recruit? See?"

Armand's eyes reflected Mu Sicheng's smug face. His pupils tightened slightly as he stared back.

The butterfly on Armand's shoulder flapped its wings again, and suddenly, a gust of wind swept through, sending Mu Sicheng flying back. The onlookers scattered in fear, and Armand's freshly groomed hair was tousled by the wind.

Standing calmly, Armand retrieved his badge from the ground and pinned it back on his head, turning away without a glance, as if the wind itself was following his every step.

The storm had passed.

The Game Pool

When Armand returned to the group, Mu Sicheng, who had been knocked down by the wind, scrambled to his feet and tried to push forward again—only for Bai Liu to hold him back.

Bai Liu glanced across the crowd, locking eyes with Georgia in the distance.

Georgia's gaze lingered on the frustrated Mu Sicheng for barely a second before shifting to Bai Liu. The Golden Dawn captain studied him intently, his expression serious, as if he were trying to burn a hole through Bai Liu's face with his stare.

"Wow." Bai Liu smiled. "This Captain Georgia looks like he knows me."

Tang Erda's expression darkened. "…He shouldn't. If he remembered what you did, he'd be attacking by now."

"Georgia's the type to act first and ask questions later."

"Then why does Captain Georgia keep staring at me?" Bai Liu squinted up at Tang Erda. "Don't tell me he fell in love with me at first sight?"

Tang Erda blurted out, almost reflexively, "It's not impossible. He only met you once before he ran off with you, too…"

Bai Liu: "….."

Fortunately, Georgia didn't stare at Bai Liu for long. As soon as Armand rejoined him, he withdrew his gaze and led his team forward, acting as if Bai Liu had never existed.

The wind had thrown the onlookers into a brief panic, but their fear quickly gave way to cheers and excited screams—they had interpreted the chaos as part of a dramatic duel.

Armand was the clear winner of that exchange, and the fact that the striking newcomer had proven his combat prowess only fueled the enthusiasm of Golden Dawn's supporters.

As the gold-clad team passed Bai Liu and the others, the crowd's cheers hit a fever pitch, almost taunting in their intensity.

Mu Sicheng scowled. "Shit, so my skills are banned. If we could actually fight it out in a game—"

"Enough." Bai Liu cast him a lazy glance. "You've already given them plenty of free publicity today. Don't hand them any more—train."

"…Yeah." Mu Sicheng clenched his fist, realizing his own impulsiveness. His fingers shifted from clawed monkey paws back to human hands, and he fell silent.

Without another word, they turned and headed toward the boarding gate to begin the next round of training.

Two games later, Liu Jiayi's system panel lit up amid the swamp and the toxic fog, displaying a message:

[System Alert: Player Liu Jiayi has reached the required number of games to register for the league. Do you wish to register?]

Liu Jiayi glanced up at Bai Liu. Seeing the unwavering certainty in his eyes, she took a deep breath.

[OK.]

[Registration Guild Choice: Killer Sequence, King's Guild... Wandering Circus...]

Her gaze lingered momentarily on the King's Guild crown logo before she selected Wandering Circus.

[System Alert: You have officially registered as a player for the (Wandering Circus) Guild League. Please find your remaining four teammates as soon as possible...]

The moment her registration was confirmed, an image of her appeared at the bottom of the popularity poll announcement—a shot taken at an odd angle, capturing Liu Jiayi mid-battle. Her veil was half-blown by the wind, her stance decisive as she unleashed poison upon a towering creature. A faint, almost childlike smirk curved her lips, playful yet chilling in its innocence.

This wasn't a screenshot from a small TV; it was too close, not from a broadcast perspective. Someone had taken this photo while standing near her—too near.

Liu Jiayi froze, staring at the image. She remembered this angle. The person standing behind her during that game, covering her defense, had been... Hearts.

She recalled the moment clearly—after she had killed the monster, Hearts had smiled at her. Then, without hesitation, she had drawn a playing card and slashed forward. Liu Jiayi, caught off guard, felt the veil torn from her face, a sharp sting left behind where the edge had scraped her skin.

Shocked, she had looked up at Hearts, bewildered.

Hearts had crouched down to meet her gaze, smiling.

"This is your first lesson about the league," she had murmured. "Never trust your teammates so easily, even if they're standing behind you."

Lowering her eyes, she whispered, "You never know when the people around you will lose control. When they do, they'll betray you and attack."

"Teammates aren't reliable. The only person you can trust as a tactician is yourself—and your absolute control over your team. Even if they go mad, they must still be nothing more than weapons in your hands."

Liu Jiayi hesitated, then replaced the photo before stepping out of the boarding area, her head held high.

As her name lit up on the system's popularity bulletin board, electronic fireworks burst across her panel.

[System Alert: Player Liu Jiayi has joined the Wandering Circus team!]
[System Announcement: Player Liu Jiayi has permanently withdrawn from the King's Guild!]

Through the falling digital confetti, Liu Jiayi spotted a familiar figure standing near the exit.

Qi Yifang.

He was holding two boxes, his eyes red and puffy—he'd clearly been crying. But the moment he saw Liu Jiayi, he forced a smile, trying to put on a brave front like an older brother should.

"Congratulations, Little Witch, on making it to the league!"

Liu Jiayi halted mid-step.

Behind her, Bai Liu gave her a gentle push. "Go on. Say goodbye properly."

Slowly, she walked forward. Qi Yifang's smile trembled, and before he could stop himself, tears spilled down his face again.

"Ooooh, Jiayi, you're amazing, I'm so happy for you..."

He crouched down, wiping at his face with his sleeve. "I—I got into the official team, Jiayi."

Liu Jiayi gave him a look. "Isn't that a good thing?"

"Not at all, wooooh—" Qi Yifang sniffled loudly. "We've been training with a nun's player, and she's so strong. Liu Ji and I can barely keep up. The Queen calls me a loser every day. And now, when I think about having to go up against you later, I—" His voice cracked. "I'm terrified."

His words tumbled out in a miserable wail. "What if we win?! The Queen said she won't go easy on you!"

Liu Jiayi couldn't help but laugh, crossing her arms and tilting her chin up proudly. "Don't underestimate my new team. It's not certain who'll win."

"Stop crying!" She sighed. "Aren't you embarrassed wailing like that?"

Qi Yifang sniffled again, shoving the boxes into her arms. "It was supposed to be the new guild information officer delivering these, but he saw the system message that you joined the league and had a breakdown. He's crying worse than I am—everyone else is bawling in their dorms. I was the only one who could hold it together, so they sent me instead."

Liu Jiayi accepted the boxes in silence. Then Qi Yifang suddenly pulled out a pair of skates.

A very pink pair of skates.

There was a doodle of a doll and a tiny witch awkwardly holding hands on one side—clearly added later.

Liu Jiayi's eyes widened. "[Super Speed Ice Skates]? Where did you get these? I haven't seen a Level 3 dungeon drop these in ages."

Qi Yifang hesitated. "They're in the game pool, but the monster book requirements are insane. It took a whole team of us over half a month to farm this pair. Liu Ji got hurt grinding for them, but—he improved a lot from it. That's how he made it onto the official team."

The smile faded from Liu Jiayi's face.

Qi Yifang went on, "We wanted to get you a gift for when you made it to the league. You're not the fastest runner, and these will help. They'll keep you safe."

He gently pushed the skates into her hands. "Take them."

Liu Jiayi studied him for a long moment. Then, in a low voice, she said, "Half a month ago, I was part of the King's Guild. Now I'm not. I didn't join the league for you, so this isn't something I should—"

"But we are!"

Qi Yifang lunged forward, wrapping his arms around her in a fierce hug.

"We joined the team so we could protect you!"

Liu Jiayi inhaled sharply.

Qi Yifang choked out, "No matter which team you're on, we just want you to be safe."

His grip tightened. "The Queen said the league is brutal and fair. She said you're smart enough to know that if we held back to let you live, it would only make things worse. It would mess with your decisions, make you hesitate—and that hesitation would make you more vulnerable in the tournament."

Liu Jiayi clenched her fists.

Qi Yifang closed his eyes. "We're not as smart as you. We didn't know what else to do. After thinking about it for a long time, this was the only way we could protect you."

His voice hardened. "We'll fight you with everything we have, Jiayi. And you—you fight us with everything you have. If we come after you —run."

"Run as far as you can! Run until we can't catch up! Run until the game ends!"

"Just live!"

Liu Jiayi let out a quiet laugh, eyes misty. She pulled him into a firm hug. "Don’t make me sound like such a loser."

"Who’s running? We’re going to win!"

Qi Yifang wiped his tears and smiled through them. "So are we!"

Bai Liu watched as Liu Jiayi returned, two boxes and a pair of skates in hand.

Behind her, Qi Yifang turned to leave. But he didn’t make it far before breaking into another fit of crying as he ran.

Liu Jiayi picked up her pace, then broke into a run—throwing herself into Bai Liu’s arms, burying her face.

"Bai Liu, can we really... win?"

Bai Liu stroked her hair. "We will."

Her voice softened. "And the price?"

Bai Liu glanced toward Qi Yifang’s retreating figure.

"You’ve already paid your price. The cost of victory belongs to me."

The number [0] below Liu Jiayi's poster suddenly changes a little in the system's popularity voting panel.

[League player Liu Jiayi gets one vote.]

[League player Liu Jiayi gains access to the game pool].

The Game Pool

Three days later.

[System Alert: Player Mu Sicheng has cleared the game "Urban Strange Tales."]
[System Alert: Player Mu Sicheng has qualified for the league.]

Mu Sicheng glided effortlessly through the fire and smoke, seizing an invisible rope mid-air. He whistled on cue, his lips curling into a smirk.

Deafening, high-tempo music blasted in his headphones, and the flickering firelight cast an eerie glow on his exhilarated expression.

[OK.]

The moment Mu Sicheng's small TV flickered off, a new poster appeared at the tail end of the system's league registration. It depicted Mu Sicheng, one arm twisted into a monkey’s paw, his eyes unfocused, an ominous grin on his face. Behind him, a train teetered on the brink of explosion—a frozen moment from that game, the exact scene where Bai Liu had driven him to the edge of a mental breakdown.

A man stood before Mu Sicheng’s television, his gaze fixed on the screen. The butterfly on his shoulder fluttered its wings almost imperceptibly, and the breeze swept his long hair over his shoulder.

On the small TV, Mu Sicheng announced proudly to Bai Liu, "We made it. Now, we wait to win the league."

Armand lowered his gaze, his long lashes casting deep shadows over his face. A faint smile ghosted his lips as he turned away.

"Mu Sicheng, whatever game you're playing this time—"

"I'll be there for all of it, just like before."

"In our last life, we played half and half. We ended up in the same place."

"If you think beating me will be easy—"

"Think again."

The third-ranked player on the Nightmare Nova list, just behind Armand, was a figure in a crude, self-painted clown mask. Laughing shrilly, he fired indiscriminately at both monsters and players with a half-meter toy flare gun. Blood and minced flesh splattered across his mask.

In front of his small television, the audience was frozen in stunned silence.

"Holy shit. Is this guy crazy? He's still a rookie, right? How is he grinding so aggressively? This is the seventh time I've seen him on the Rising Stars list in the past two days—does he not sleep?"

"……I even saw someone from the Kabbalah Guild try to recruit him yesterday, but he killed them outright……"

"Weren't they hunting him today? He wiped them out instead……"

"What kind of skill is that? One shot and the Kabbalah Guild's reserve team couldn't even fight back. He's a newbie—how the hell does he have an attack damage value over 10,000?!"

Daniel emerged from the entrance of the boarding house, drenched in blood.

The players around him recoiled instinctively, making way for him in horror. He was the only survivor from the game.

It wasn't that the game had a low survival rate. It was that he had killed everyone else. Nearly beaten them to a pulp.

But Daniel remained unfazed by their fear.

From the first time he logged out of a game like this, he had fallen in love with the feeling—warm blood soaking his skin, wrapping around him. It made him feel alive.

Alive—before he met Bai Liu.
Before his dreams became nightmares.

Daniel crushed the bloodstained homemade mask in his hand and tossed it aside. As he turned, he found himself face-to-face with a man.

Half of the man's face was obscured by metallic armor, but his exposed eye was sharp, unwavering—watching him. Clearly, he had been looking for Daniel.

If this were a game, Daniel would have already pulled the trigger. But this was the game lobby. Instead, he started walking past the man, feigning indifference.

The man caught his arm with practiced ease.

"Want to join my guild?" he asked.

Daniel's lips twisted into an exaggerated grin, but his eyes remained cold. "The last guy who asked me that ended up as a bloodstain on my mask."

The man didn't flinch. He scoffed. "If I told you I could get Bai Liu to take you on, would you be interested?"

Daniel studied him for a long moment before finally asking, "What's the name of your guild?"

The man, as if expecting Daniel's eventual compromise, answered, "The Sixth Guild. The Deer Hunters."

Daniel scoffed. "I don't work with cowards who hide their faces." He gestured to the man's armor. "Take off the mask. Then I'll decide if you're worth my time."

The man remained unfazed, his voice turning sharp. "I thought you might prefer your masked counterpart. After all, there's no monster more afraid to face its own existence than you, Daniel."

He didn't wait for Daniel's reaction. Instead, he reached up and slowly removed the metallic covering.

A dusky hawk-like eye locked onto Daniel. The left side of his face, once hidden, was a black void—a hollow, gaping darkness that sent a chill down the spine.

"Cen Buming. President of Guild 6."

Six days later.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu and Player Muke have cleared the game "Daughter of the Mire."]
[System Alert: Player Bai Liu and Player Muke have qualified for league registration.]
[System Alert: The Wandering Circus team has gathered all five core players and has officially entered the league selection process. We wish you success in the league……]

Tang Erda scanned the team and nodded. "Looks good. Basic panel values are over 8,000. Let's get in the game pool."

The doors to the game pool slowly swung open. The dazzling colors of the screens reflected on their faces.

As the doors shut behind them, the number one player on the Nightmare Rising Stars list flashed onto a small TV—Daniel, wearing a wide clown grin.

"I'm off to play in the league, everyone. Please support me."

He bowed politely, lifting one hand in a perfect stage gesture. Then he looked up, revealing clear, apple-green eyes that crinkled with amusement.

"Otherwise—" he added with a laugh, "—I'll just have to kill any audience that doesn't."

At the same time, an announcement from the Deer Hunters' Guild flashed across the system—

[The player at the top of this Rising Stars list is one of our official guild members this year.]

In the real world, at the headquarters of the Bureau of Heresy Processing.

Cen Buming strode past Tang Erda's abandoned office, his uniform pristine. He slowed, glancing inside. His gaze lingered on the empty desk, then on the gun resting on its surface.

He was silent for a long moment. Then he snorted.

"So, is it a hunter's fate to be forsaken by the prophets?"

"No matter if it's the first generation or the second, the end result is the same—you become a monster for others to observe."

"……How pathetic."

He hooked the door shut with his toe and walked away without a backward glance.

On the desk, next to a transparent monocle, lay a classified file.

It seemed that before leaving, Tang Erda had hesitated—he had considered using the monocle to peek inside.

But in the end, he hadn’t.

A gust of wind flipped the monocle over, revealing the file’s title through its convex lens—

Heresy No. 0009
Heresy Name: First Generation Hunter—Cen Buming.

[..... Former deputy captain of the first detachment. Assumed prophet authority following the 0006 world line and carried out hunter tasks. With the complete degradation of the 0317 world line's spirit, the first riot broke out. Hunter status revoked. Prophet authority outlawed. Transferred to second detachment captain, then reassigned to the third detachment captain—the second-generation hunter, Tang Erda.....]

[..... No current intention to harm others. Signs of recovery. Remains on duty under observation.....]

Inside the Game Pool

The atmosphere here was entirely different from the small TV area outside. A massive screen was projected onto the ground, resembling an enormous pool, with a half-metre-high embankment enclosing its edges.

A strange, psychedelic glow bathed the entire area, shifting in shadowy, colored lights—evoking the feel of an underground dance hall from the 1980s.

The screen displayed countless game covers in a dazzling, rapid rotation, swirling like a school of carp bobbing in a pond. Players leapt in and out, adding to the surreal spectacle.

"The lights here... are so bright..." Muke murmured, rubbing his eyes. "I get dizzy just looking at them for too long."

"Obviously," Liu Jiayi shrugged. "The game pool’s lighting has a mental value-draining effect—it’s also a form of power-up."

Mu Sicheng shot her a glance. "Wait. Isn't this your first time here? How do you know all this?"

Liu Jiayi hesitated, then admitted, "Hearts had me use her skill card to impersonate her so I could train safely inside the game pool. The training here is way more intense, so I spent most of my time inside."

"No wonder I barely see you on the rankings outside." Mu Sicheng clapped his hands in realization. "I thought you'd died in some game and just hadn't shown up for ages."

Liu Jiayi: "....."

She decided to ignore him. This fool never thought before speaking.

Standing beside the massive floor screen, Bai Liu observed the shifting covers. "These fast-moving game posters—they're part of the training, aren't they? A test of dynamic vision and information intake?"

Tang Erda nodded. "Yes. Choosing the right game is crucial for newbie teams like ours. Some of the big guilds monopolize certain games for training. If we're not careful, we might end up running into them too early, and—"

Before he could finish, a wave of players burst out of the game pool all at once.

It wasn't unusual for players to log out, but these ones clawed their way out like they'd seen a ghost—faces pale, gasping in terror, cursing under their breath.

"What kind of rotten luck is this?! Randomly pick a game and step on a landmine!"

"Damn good thing I ran fast—otherwise, I'd have been whipped to death!"

"Wasn't the Assassin Sequence training in the Snowbound copy lately?! Why the hell are they suddenly in the Ice Age copy today?!"

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow at the drenched, trembling players dragging themselves out of the pool, then glanced at Tang Erda. "-That's what happens, isn't it?"

As he spoke, a long, pale, bony hand emerged from the pool's edge, gripping it tightly and pushing down. A man surfaced like a fish breaking the water—his upper body rising slowly into view.

He wore a simple black shirt and loose work trousers with multiple pockets. In his other hand, he gripped a long black whip that trailed across the ground.

Water dripped from his soaked hair, streaming over his eyes and down his legs. The temperature radiating from him was frigid—just as the fleeing player had said, he must have just emerged from an ice-field copy. The sheer cold kept others at a wary distance.

With one leg hooked over the pool's edge, the man vaulted out with a single fluid motion, landing smoothly in front of Bai Liu.

His gaze flicked over Bai Liu with the same indifferent glance he'd given the dozens of terrified players before him. Then, without another look, he strode forward, brushing past Bai Liu's shoulder.

At the moment they passed, Bai Liu abruptly reached out and seized his wrist. It was ice-cold—almost deathly so.

The Game Pool

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

As Bai Liu grasped Spades' wrist, the surrounding players—those who had just fled moments ago—stared in stunned silence.

Mu Sicheng and Liu Jiayi choked mid-breath, while Muke, who had never officially met Spades, remained oblivious but instinctively sensed that the man before him was not someone to be trifled with. Meanwhile, standing beside Bai Liu, Tang Erda's forehead twitched twice before he wordlessly reached out, attempting to pry Bai Liu’s grip off Spades.

At that moment, everyone was thinking the same thing: Why are you provoking him?

But before Tang Erda could intervene, Bai Liu released Spades' wrist, casually shaking out his hand behind his back. He took a small step backward, widening the distance between them, and smiled, composed and courteous. "Apologies for pulling you in so suddenly. I just wanted to introduce myself."

Spades turned slightly toward him, water trailing from his soaked hair down to his pale lips. He parted them slightly, his voice low and steady. "Spades."

"Bai Liu," he introduced himself in return.

Spades, his eyes obscured by damp strands of hair, seemed to assess him for a moment. Then, with a slight nod, he said, "I know you. You said on the forum that you wanted to put your name on me."

Bai Liu: "....."

He had completely forgotten about that.

An awkward silence settled over the scene. Bai Liu pursed his lips before asking evenly, "And? What do you think?"

"Just win against me." Spades’ tone was light, almost elegant. "I don’t mind your name. It sounds nice."

A collective gasp came from the onlookers.

Where the hell is this conversation going?!

Bai Liu's breath caught for just a second. The hand behind his back curled slightly, fingers clenching, though his face remained unreadable. He forced the conversation forward with a smile. "Can I put it anywhere on your body?"

Spades, unfazed, met his gaze with complete sincerity. "Anywhere. If you have a particular preference for any part of my body, you can let me know in advance."

Bai Liu: "....."

Onlookers: "....."

HELP!!! Should we really be listening to this?!

"All of that assumes you can beat me." Spades continued calmly. "But you don't have the strength to do that right now."

Bai Liu's eyes flickered, avoiding direct contact with Spades' unwavering gaze. He blinked once, then stated, "I'm going to beat you in this game."

Spades gave the smallest nod. "Then you can put your name on me all you want."

Bai Liu: "....."

He's really not built for this...

With that, Spades gathered his whip and walked away without a second glance. The players standing in his path instinctively stepped aside, making way for the cold and formidable presence that had just so effortlessly met Bai Liu's bold confrontation with what could only be described as... harmonious.

Liu Jiayi silently sidled up to Bai Liu, glancing at his face, then at his ears—pitying him. "You couldn't resist, could you? The moment Spades actually responded to you, you had to keep talking."

"That guy has no human common sense whatsoever. He's immune to provocations, flirtations, and any kind of sentimental theatrics. He doesn't even realize he's bouncing them back unconsciously—just look at you, getting completely reverse flirted by him..."

Bai Liu reached out and pushed Liu Jiayi's head down. "What did you just say?"

Liu Jiayi quickly corrected herself. "I meant—Spades totally broke out in a cold sweat at your provocation! You were amazing!"

Mu Sicheng couldn’t hold back any longer. "Seriously, why did you mess with him?"

Bai Liu looked in the direction Spades had disappeared. "To confirm something."

Muke hesitated. "And? Did you confirm it?"

Bai Liu suddenly smiled, easy and relaxed. "Sort of."

Apart from that person, there was likely no one else in this world who could shake him like that on their first meeting.

Why Spades didn’t remember him—that part wasn’t clear yet.

But that was fine.

Some memories... weren’t meant to be shared.

Bai Liu withdrew his gaze and turned back to the glowing game pool, the swirling lights reflecting in his dark eyes.

"Let the training begin."

"Yes!"

Day 7 of Training.

Charles sat down, folded his arms on the table, and leaned forward. "We're getting closer to the tournament. Your guild members and I are handling the support for now, so you don't need to worry about that. But I called you here today because there are two important things you need to decide personally."

He held up two fingers with a smile. "Team badges and weapon modifications. You’ll need a collective team badge, just like every other battle group."

He started listing them off. "The top-ranked guilds all have theirs. The first guild, Killer Sequence, uses a Reverse Cross. The second, King’s Guild, has a Crown. The third, Golden Dawn, has Seven Strings with Wings. The fourth, Kabbalah, is marked by the Leaves of Life. And the fifth—my own Gamblers Club—bears a Chip."

Charles flicked his fingers, and a silver-rimmed chip badge appeared in his palm. He placed it on the table, smiling as he continued.

"The Deer Hunters, ranked sixth, use a Deer Head. The Masons of Paradise, ranked seventh, have a Folding Cloak, and so on."

He glanced at Bai Liu. "Your guild's original badge was a Zombie Tusk, but let's be real—that doesn't fit your group anymore. So, after a week of discussion with the design team I hired, we've come up with something new."

Charles pulled a small valuables box from a nearby drawer, flicked it open with a gloved hand, and pushed it toward Bai Liu. "Take a look."

Inside, a gleaming circular medallion rested on dark velvet. A diamond-encrusted platinum hexagram framed a half-opened Werewolf's Eye, with a blood-red gemstone the size of a pigeon's egg set in the center.

Bai Liu studied it for a long moment before speaking. "The Hexagram is a symbol of Satan, and the Werewolf's Eye is commonly seen in Werewolf Kill game cards. It represents the Werewolf Card."

He lifted his gaze to Charles. "My team is called the Wandering Circus. Neither of those things have anything to do with us, do they?"

Charles chuckled, his smile deepening as his eyes flickered toward the Reverse Cross hanging from Bai Liu's collarbone. "You're good at uncovering hidden connections. But there was a better symbol for you—the Reverse Cross. Unfortunately, that's already the badge of Killer Sequence, so we had to pick something else."

Bai Liu's gaze lingered on Charles before dropping back to the glowing red badge.

"If you choose to accept this design," Charles continued, "it'll cost you 10,000 points—which translates to about—"

"—10 million," Bai Liu finished smoothly. He picked up the badge with a light smile. "Thank you, Mr. Charles. This will be the badge for the Wandering Circus."

Mu Sicheng, Muke, Liu Jiayi, and Tang Erda: "....."

You could have just refused! 10 million points, and you folded?!

Without missing a beat, Bai Liu gestured for Charles to continue.

"And," Charles steered the conversation back, "more important than the badge—weapon modifications."

He leaned back in his chair and snapped his fingers. A system screen unfolded in midair, void-projected. But, of course, that didn't suit Charles' taste, so he had the projection cast onto a deep wooden panel instead.

Liu Jiayi stared at the ridiculous setup. This guy even added a gold frame to the projection?!

On the panel, three-dimensional models of various weapons rotated—whips, playing cards, guns, bows—each one belonging to a major guild leader.

"There are two ways to modify your weapon in this game," Charles explained. "The first is through a change in one's core desire—like Muke's dagger."

His gaze flickered toward Muke before shifting to Liu Jiayi, his lips curling into a smirk.

"And the second—through someone else's skill."

He turned to Liu Jiayi. "Hearts gave you a skill-storing playing card. That's my ability at work. I can store someone else's skill into a physical object, allowing others to use it."

Liu Jiayi's head snapped up in surprise. She knew Charles' skill, Phantom Devourer, allowed him to store abilities—but she'd never realized that was how her playing cards had been created.

Because Hearts and Charles never got along. She wouldn't have willingly worked with him.

"My skill is well-suited for weapon modifications," Charles continued, "so you could say I'm something of a… subtle weapon craftsman. Let me show you."

He rose from his chair and walked over to Bai Liu, bending slightly as if performing a magic trick for an audience. With an easy smile, he extended a hand.

"For example—Mr. Bai Liu, may I borrow your skill weapon for a moment? Your old wallet?"

Bai Liu arched a brow but pulled out the battered wallet from his system panel and handed it over.

Charles bowed theatrically, took the wallet, wrapped his hands together—and flipped them over.

In an instant, the wallet had transformed into a pair of aged, yellowed leather gloves. Holding them between his thumb and forefinger, Charles presented them to Bai Liu.

"Wallet gloves," he explained. "Your soul notes are encased inside. They're more discreet than carrying a wallet and much easier for you to use in trade." He opened the glove's inner compartment to show Bai Liu. "Your primary weapon is a long whip. Gloves are a better match—they'll protect your hands during combat."

He placed the gloves back in Bai Liu's palm in an inviting gesture. "Try them."

Bai Liu slid them on. They fit perfectly—neither too tight nor too loose. Testing them, he easily pulled out a soul note and a points coin.

With a flick of his fingers, he hooked a coin from the inner compartment, making it appear as if by magic. And when he moved his hand, the gloves made handling the whip feel effortless.

Mu Sicheng and Muke watched in fascination—it was their first time witnessing a live weapon modification.

Liu Jiayi remained silent.

Tang Erda, however, stared at the gloves with complicated emotions. His gaze then shifted to Bai Liu's face.

He had seen this before.

Bai Six—from another timeline—had also used gloves made from a wallet. But his were different. Expensive. Polished black leather, sleek and refined. The Wandering Circus Guild spent millions of points each year maintaining them…

Bai Liu flexed his fingers, glancing at Charles. "I don't have to pay for this modification, do I?"

For a split second, Charles' smile faltered. But he quickly recovered. "For my chosen betting horse? Consider it a gift."

His gaze lingered on Bai Liu's battered gloves. With a sigh, he pointed out, "But—you really should take better care of your skill weapon. I've never seen one more worn than yours."

Bai Liu blinked. "How much does maintenance cost?"

Charles straightened. "It varies by guild leader, but the average for the top ten is around 630,000 points per year. The most expensive? Spades' Lizard Bone Whip. That one cost 1.26 million points last year alone."

Bai Liu paused. Then, incredulously—

"Is he seriously that much of a big spender...?"

Chapter End Notes

10 million = 10 000 points

"It's true that Spades' weapon is expensive to maintain." Charles, oblivious to Bai Liu's subtle shift in expression, continued, "But he's also a first-class fighter, and his weapons are well worth the cost. If it were me, I'd have no hesitation spending that many points on him."

Bai Liu glanced at Charles and replied nonchalantly, "Oh? Is that so."

Charles, failing to notice Bai Liu's cool gaze, went on, "Bai Liu, I can make minor modifications to your skills and weapons myself. But your whip, and your team's weapons—"

His eyes traced a slow circle around the whips, guns, monkey claws, and daggers. "—these heavy weapon types require a professional reformer. You'll also need a face-to-face meeting with them to discuss your combat habits and attack styles. They'll modify the weapons based on your input."

Liu Jiayi raised an eyebrow. "Weapon modifiers are rare in the game. The good ones are all hoarded by the big guilds. Where exactly are you planning to find one willing to work with us one-on-one?"

Charles leaned back in his chair and smiled at Liu Jiayi. "It's common knowledge that the best weapon modifiers and appraisers belong to the King's Guild. But, little witch, you and I both know that's just a gimmick Hearts cooked up. The appraisers in the King's Guild are indeed top-notch, but their weapon modifiers? Not so much."

Liu Jiayi fell silent.

Charles smirked. "But you're right—good weapon modifiers are usually controlled by major guilds. That's why the best ones in this game are actually with the Deer Hunter's Guild."

Liu Jiayi's eyes flicked up. "Guild rules forbid their weapon modifiers from working on external players' weapons."

Charles shrugged, absently twisting the ring on his finger. "Rules can change."

"As long as someone enters this game driven by desire, they'll always be willing to trade something for it. And I," Charles tapped his temple, "am very good at figuring out what they want."

Then, glancing at his watch, he said, "But I suggest you all get a good night's rest before meeting the weapon modifier. If you're not in the right mindset, it'll be difficult to get the best results. This is a rare opportunity—cherish it."

He waved a hand in dismissal. "That's it for today. Rest up, and come see me tomorrow before training. I'll introduce you then."

Bai Liu dipped his head slightly in farewell. "Thank you, Mr. Charles, for going through all this trouble for us."

Outside Charles' Office
As they left, Bai Liu glanced down at a tense Liu Jiayi. "What's wrong with the weapon modifier Charles found for us?"

Liu Jiayi hesitated, shaking her head. "Nothing, really. He's right—the best weapon modifiers aren't in the King's Guild. And for players like us, whose skills are already exposed, getting our weapons modified before the tournament is a good idea. It's just that..."

Bai Liu remained calm. "Just what?"

Liu Jiayi bit her lip. "I just don't know how he did it." Her unease was obvious. "Maybe I'm overthinking, but every guild guards their weapon modifiers fiercely. These people know every detail about their battle teams' skills."

She took a breath before continuing. "The Deer Hunter is a massive guild. Usually, only the president has the authority to lend out a weapon modifier. If Charles managed to pull this off, it can only mean one thing—"

Bai Liu picked up where she left off. "—the president of the Deer Hunter's Guild volunteered to let Charles use their weapon modifier on us."

Liu Jiayi nodded gravely. "But why? Lending out a weapon modifier is a huge risk. I have no idea what Charles offered the Deer Hunter's president in return..."

She trailed off, then added, "But that man always has ways to get what he wants. Just like how I still don't know when he started working with Hearts..."

Bai Liu pondered aloud, "So, while this weapon modification is beneficial to us, it also comes with potential risks. Is there a way to mitigate those risks?"

Liu Jiayi tilted her head. "The better the appraiser, the more likely they are to detect any issues in a modified weapon."

Bai Liu recalled something. "Charles mentioned earlier that the best appraisers are in the King's Guild."

"Yes." Liu Jiayi raked a hand through her hair in frustration. "Back when I was in the King's Guild, I had full access to them. Not anymore."

Muke hesitated before asking, "Isn't there a difference between a weapon modifier and an appraiser? Appraisers only identify modifications; they don't understand the internal structure of a weapon. Since the guilds aren't as strict with appraisers, aren't they allowed to take external commissions?"

Liu Jiayi stilled.

Bai Liu's eyes glinted knowingly. "—But only if Hearts is willing to let an appraiser take our request, even after we stole her right-hand woman."

Liu Jiayi rubbed her temples with a sigh.

After Logging Out of the Game
Bai Liu instructed the others to rest up before tomorrow's modifications. Risks aside, this was still an opportunity worth taking.

Later, Charles suggested he customize some team accessories based on the badge logo Bai Liu had designed—hairpins, brooches, headpieces—something flashy enough to make the audience remember them.

Based on Charles' logic, Bai Liu should have gone for gold-plated hairpieces or diamond-encrusted brooches. But those were far too expensive. Instead, lying on his bed, Bai Liu casually opened Poundland on his phone, filtering search results from lowest to highest price.

Thirteen minutes later—

A new group chat popped up. Bai Liu had pulled in Tang Erda, Mu Sicheng, and Muke.

[Music (Mu Sicheng)]: ?

[Music] changed the group name to [Stupid Bai Liu What's Going On Again?].

[Muke] changed the name to [Wandering Circus Without Monkeys].

[Music]: Shit??? Muke, you can't be serious!

[Tang Erda, leader of the third detachment] tapped [Music].

[Tang Erda]: Don't swear in the group.

[Muke]: @Bai Liu, what do you need?

[Bai Liu]: [Shared link to Poundland – Stainless Steel Dog Tag – Help me chop the price!]

[Music]: Bai Liu, why are you buying dog tags?? For a dollar and a quarter, are you getting a dog??

[Bai Liu]: No. They're for you guys to wear.

[Tang Erda]: ?

[Muke]: ?

[Music]: ???????? Say that again.

[Bai Liu]: This one can be laser-engraved. I'll wear it too.

[Tang Erda]: … This doesn't seem appropriate.

[Muke]: Yeah… I think we should reconsider…

[Music]: Bai Liu, please, have some basic human decency. Who the hell wears dog tags?! At least pick something a little classier!

[Bai Liu]: [Shared link – High-Grade Aluminum Dog Tag – 2.1 per piece]

[Bai Liu]: What about this one?

[Music]: THAT'S STILL A DOG TAG!!!

[Bai Liu]: It's 70 cents more expensive. Much classier.

The Next Day in the Game

Mu Sicheng stood in line, wearing his dog tag, staring blankly at the others. "…Why am I the only one wearing this?"

Bai Liu blinked innocently. "I was just joking last night to lighten the mood. You actually took it seriously?"

Mu Sicheng turned to Muke and Tang Erda, who both averted their gazes, barely holding back laughter.

Tang Erda coughed into his fist, his other hand quietly gripping the dog tag in his pocket.

He had genuinely thought they were going to wear them… so he'd planned to put his on later.

In the end, Mu Sicheng was the only one left in utter humiliation.

With a roar of frustration, he ripped the dog tag from his neck.

"YOU BASTARDS!!!"

The Game Pool

Finally, at Mu Sicheng's insistence, the matter of the badge was left for Bai Liu to handle on their own.

The highlight of this year's event was the weapons renovation.

Charles led them to an eccentric-looking weapons modifier. His unkempt, half-long hair was matted into clumps by dark machine oil, hanging in greasy locks around his disheveled beard. His face was so smudged with grime that it was impossible to guess his age.

The workshop walls were covered with knives, crosshairs, saw blades, and other oddly shaped tools and semi-finished products. The air was thick with the acrid stench of smoke and petrol.

In the center of the room sat a massive furnace, bubbling with molten lava. The modifier pulled down a welder's mask over his head and dipped a long hook into the lava, holding a weapon that had been burned beyond recognition.

A sizzling hiss filled the air as thick black smoke rose from the molten surface.

Two seconds later, the modifier pulled the hook back out—the weapon was gone, completely melted away.

"Tch." He grunted in displeasure. "Who the hell threw in a skill weapon with such a low melting point? It's gone in a single dip!"

The apprentice standing beside him looked at the lava pit, eyes welling up with tears as he jumped up in alarm.

"Master, you could've at least measured the melting point first! How are we supposed to get our weapons out of the pot now?"

"If you can't get it out, then forget it." The modifier tossed the hook aside with a snort. "If it can't even withstand the stone slurry boiled by my Samadhi fire, it's worthless. Utter trash."

Muke couldn't help but stare at the bubbling lava, gulping as they instinctively tightened their grip on their weapon.

The modifier, dressed in an old-fashioned worker's uniform from the '80s or '90s and wearing a thick felt apron, pushed his greasy hair back. He set a glowing welding gun against the wall before turning to Bai Liu.

“So, you’re the ones here for modifications?”

Charles barely resisted the urge to leave immediately but still nodded haughtily. “It’s them.”

He gestured toward Bai Liu.

“This is the best weapon modifier in the game—General Hua Gan.”

Hua Gan’s eyes, hidden beneath layers of grime and tangled hair, swept over them with sharp scrutiny. Without a word, he suddenly reached out, snatching Bai Liu’s gloves right off their hands before anyone could react.

“This is your skill weapon, isn’t it?” he asked, though he didn’t bother looking at Bai Liu for confirmation. Instead, he grabbed a pen-style spotlight magnifying glass from a nearby drawer, securing it over his left eye, while in his other hand, he deftly wielded a sharp-edged knife.

Without hesitation, he slashed it across the surface of the glove.

A hole appeared instantly.

“Hey! Don’t just start cutting things up!” Mu Sicheng shouted in alarm.

Hua Gan ignored him completely. His knife moved faster and faster, stripping the glove down in a few quick strokes. Then, he plucked a needle and thread from his tangled hair, licked the thread twice, and swiftly stitched the glove back together.

A few moments later, he tossed it back to Bai Liu, wiping his hands on a rag.

“Try it again.”

Bai Liu slipped the glove back on, raising an eyebrow. “It fits much better than before.”

The leather had been rolled inward at the knuckles, and a new slit extended from the glove’s end, neatly wrapping around the wrist—far more comfortable than the crude modifications Charles had done before.

“Worthy of being the best,” Bai Liu remarked, genuinely impressed.

Charles removed his hat and gave a theatrical bow, smiling as he stepped back. “Then I’ll leave it to you, Mr. Hua Gan.”

Hua Gan waved a hand dismissively.

Once Charles had left, the burly modifier got down to business.

“My skill is this furnace fire,” he said. “It’s called Samadhi.”

The apprentice muttered under his breath, “It’s called dissolving forging paste, Master.”

Hua Gan smacked him on the back of the head. “If I say it’s called Samadhi, it’s called Samadhi! I like ‘Samadhi,’ don’t I?”

The apprentice sighed. “...Fine.”

“Anyway,” Hua Gan continued, “weapon transformation has two stages. The first is shaping—that’s what I just did to your glove. After shaping, if you’re satisfied, we move to the forge fire to set and strengthen it.”

He leveled a serious gaze at Bai Liu.

“Only skill weapons that survive the forge fire intact can maintain their modified state and remain usable in the tournament.”

“However, during the forging process, you can incorporate rare materials to enhance your weapon’s attributes—boost attack, increase durability, that kind of thing.”

He gestured to Bai Liu’s gloves.

“For example, I could shape them with a layer of metallic satin on top and embed green goat sheepskin inside. That would add about 2,700 to their defense value.”

“But in exchange, they’d weigh 120kg—meaning you’d basically be carrying a 200-pound man at all times.”

Bai Liu: “...I think I’ll pass.”

Hua Gan shrugged.

“So, it’s up to you. Whether to add enhancements, what materials to use—it's your call. Charles already covered your forging fees, and I have all the materials you'll need."

With that, he held out a hand.

"Give me the gloves. It's time to cross the lava."

Bai Liu handed them over but hesitated.

"What happens if they don't pass and just melt away like that last weapon?"

Hua Gan smirked.

"Skill weapons are born from desire. The purer the desire, the greater their potential—and the stronger they become after being tempered by fire."

He secured the gloves onto a long hook.

"Weapons of low grade dissolve. That's all there is to it."

Bai Liu murmured under his breath, "If I give you my wallet, would you give everything—your skill, your soul—to forge my weapon?"

"You're my client," Hua Gan said, "and as long as your weapon holds up, I'll forge it to your satisfaction."

A faint smirk tugged at Bai Liu's lips.

Without hesitation, Hua Gan plunged Bai Liu's worn, frayed gloves into the burning, molten lava.

A sharp, crackling hiss filled the air.

As the gloves burned, faint traces of banknotes inside them ignited.

The others—Muke, Mu Sicheng, Liu Jiayi, and Tang Erda—slowly turned to stare at Bai Liu.

Liu Jiayi calmly reminded him, "Did you forget to take something out?"

Bai Liu blinked, then smiled guilelessly. "Oops. I forgot to take your money out."

He was definitely lying.

Mu Sicheng gritted his teeth, ready to throttle him, but Tang Erda held him back. Liu Jiayi covered her face while Muke stared, dumbfounded, at the lava pit.

Bai Liu's dark pupils reflected the cauldron's glow. Wisps of smoke curled from the surface, the scent thick and suffocating—like a soul burning away under the weight of desire.

His soul note was inside that wallet, too.

Something inside him was evaporating, impurities melting away, replaced by something more raw, more frenzied.

Hua Gan raised the hook.

And the gloves…

They had transformed.

Where the fabric had been frayed and torn, it was now smooth, pristine black leather. A ring of metal encircled the wrist, and on the back of the hand, a massive hexagonal groove held a molten, blood-red gem.

And the lava pot—

Was now nearly empty.

The apprentice gawked, stunned.

"Master... the lava... How did it—?"

Hua Gan sucked in a sharp breath, his face twisting in disbelief as he turned to Bai Liu.

"What the hell did you do?"

He had sensed something was off.

He hadn't been particularly wary of Bai Liu's team—after all, no one was allowed to use attack skills in the lobby, and Hua Gan's own abilities were overwhelmingly dominant.

But he had never imagined Bai Liu would go so far as to set him up during a crucial skill weapon modification.

Bai Liu rose unsteadily to his feet, retrieving his gloves from the hook and sliding them back onto his hands. Though they had just been submerged in molten lava, they were only faintly warm—completely intact, with not even a hint of damage.

As if the searing heat of the forge was powerless against a weapon born from Bai Liu's desire.

"A soul note is also a coin."

Bai Liu pulled a fresh soul note from the inner lining of his glove, holding it loosely between his index and middle fingers.

Printed on its surface was the unmistakable, furious face of General Hua Gan.

Bai Liu smiled. "The moment you took my wallet, Mr. Hua Gan, our deal was sealed."

Hua Gan's chest heaved with barely contained fury. His teeth clenched as he spat, "I've never seen a greedier skill weapon. Sooner or later, you'll be consumed by your own desire."

"Maybe," Bai Liu admitted easily, stepping closer. His gloved hand hooked Hua Gan's own away, then forcefully pushed him down into his chair, leaning in until their gazes locked.

"But before that, Mr. Hua Gan… tell me—what exactly did the President of the Deer Hunters offer you?

What kind of task was so important that it made the high and mighty master weapon modifier—who only ever served those within the guild—lower himself to accommodate me?"

Bai Liu lifted his gaze, shifting to the trembling apprentice. Mu Sicheng's claws tightened around the boy's throat in a suffocating grip.

"You can lie," Bai Liu murmured, voice deceptively calm. "But I imagine a good master wouldn't want to see his apprentice suffer the consequences of lying on his behalf. Wouldn't you agree?"

Hua Gan's pupils shrank to pinpricks.

In an instant, the roles of hunter and prey had reversed.

"You said the Deer Hunter brought in a newcomer that day to modify his weapon and planned to let him join the team—"

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow, a trace of surprise flickering across his face. "—but this newcomer claimed he could join the Deer Hunter team, on one condition: that you modify my weapon for me?"

General Hua Gan wiped the corner of his mouth. "Yes. This newcomer knew I was the best weapon reformer in the game and demanded that I modify your weapon—personally. He wanted it tailored to you, to drastically enhance your combat and defense abilities."

His gaze dropped to Bai Liu's hands. "The idea of turning your purse into gloves came from him."

"He wanted you to have a pair of black leather gloves—perfectly fitted, suited for the whip, and allowing easy access to your notes without risking injury."

"To recruit this newcomer, our president agreed to his outrageous demand."*"

As he spoke, anger flickered across his face, but he quickly suppressed it.

"The president negotiated with your investor, Charles, to fulfill the newcomer's request."

"This was a disgrace to the guild. A betrayal of the weapon reformers who have always served it exclusively!"

Bai Liu released his grip on General Hua Gan, stepping back. "But you still said yes."

Hua Gan let out a heavy breath, as if Bai Liu's words had pressed the air from his lungs. His head bowed in frustration. "……Yes. I cannot disobey the president's orders."

After a pause, he added in a low voice, "Even if you hold my soul, I will serve no one but the Deer Hunter's Guild."

Bai Liu glanced at Liu Jiayi, who sighed and shook his head—signaling that there was no point in pushing further.

—Just as General Hua Gan said, he would rather die than betray his guild.

Unlike the countless reserve team members or someone like Wang Shun, who worked with various players, the guild held a firm grip on its reformers. Even with his soul in Bai Liu's hands, breaking this iron-willed, single-minded man would be no easy feat.

Unlike players with ever-shifting desires, these reformers had long since refined theirs, forging them into something unbreakable. They didn't communicate with people—they communicated with weapons, red-hot and forged in the fire of their own longing. To them, weapons were more than tools. Weapons were everything.

And the guild was the only place where they could create their finest work. It wasn't just an organization—it was their forge, their purpose. That was why reformers like Hua Gan never betrayed it.

They would never betray the weapon.
And they would never betray the guild.

General Hua Gan, the best reformer of them all, was also the most unyielding.

If Mu Sicheng hadn't restrained his apprentice from the beginning, Hua Gan wouldn't have spoken a single word.

Receiving Liu Jiayi's signal, Bai Liu calmly shifted his approach. "I won't ask you to serve us. We just want to know why."

"You have to protect your guild. I have to protect my guild's players." Bai Liu smiled. "Can you give me some useful information? Like the identity of the newcomer who asked you to modify my weapon?"

This question didn't touch the guild's deepest secrets. After all, sooner or later, this player would have to reveal himself.

General Hua Gan hesitated for a long moment before finally speaking. "I don't know exactly who he was. When the president brought him here, he was wearing a mask—completely covered in blood."

"But his skill weapon was a very long, green plastic toy gun."

Bai Liu absently toyed with the long hook by the boiler. "Mr. Hua, that's hardly enough to send us off."

Hua Gan gritted his teeth and continued, "I won't tell you what his skill is, but I will tell you what happened during the modification."

"The gun was… strange. It looked like a cheap plastic flare gun, but the moment it touched the lava, it dissolved instantly."

Hua Gan frowned, recalling the moment. "I've modified countless weapons, but I've never seen anything like that. And the owner… he just sat there, completely unbothered. Humming."

"I kept feeding materials into the lava, trying to saturate it so the gun would precipitate out. I even sacrificed pieces of skill weapons to force a reaction."

His expression twisted. "Half the warehouse's materials were used up, and the lava still didn't react. That's when I realized something was wrong."

"The materials weren't dissolving." His voice lowered. "They were being devoured."

"No matter how much I threw in, the gun absorbed everything like a black hole—endless, insatiable. In the end, the president had to turn to Charles for more materials, and that's how they struck their deal."

Hua Gan exhaled. "Charles promised a massive supply of materials—for free. In return, I was ordered to modify weapons for your entire team."

His gaze darkened. "That day, I bet material after material into the lava, even using pieces of high-tier weapons. But that gun never surfaced."

"It just kept devouring. Desire. Souls. Everything."

His eyes drifted to the glowing red boiler, lost in thought. "I've never seen a weapon so… greedy."

Finally, he looked up at Bai Liu, his voice dry. "In the end, the president gave me a scrap of dirty leather from Charles—apparently a remnant of your original weapon."

"I cast it in."

"The lava boiled."

"And then, I saw it—"

"The dissolved remains of the gun gathering around the leather, stacking up like crystal formations in a saturated solution."

Hua Gan gazed at Bai Liu, voice hoarse. "The lava was on the verge of burning dry when a sniper rifle finally emerged from the bottom of the pot."

"That's when I saw it. And that's when I began to fear it."

"Forging your gloves made me feel controlled." His fingers twitched. "But forging that gun—"

"It felt like looking into an abyss so deep that just one glance would swallow my soul whole."

A sharp breath was drawn from the side.

Tang Erda, who had been silent until now, finally reacted.

Bai Liu dropped the long hook, running two fingers over the metal ring at the base of his glove. His eyes narrowed slightly.

General Hua Gan caught his gaze and sighed. "Looks like you figured it out."

"Yes. That metal ring on your glove—it came from that gun."

"And it's not just a residual scrap."

"It's the core material."

Bai Liu remained silent for a moment, then rose to his feet. "Mr. Hua Gan, I swear as Bai Liu that I will not use your soul for anything that violates your original intent. In return, I hope you will give your best efforts in modifying my team's weapons."

At his gesture, Mu Sicheng hesitated but finally released his grip on the apprentice.

The young man collapsed, curling into himself in fear.

Hua Gan, however, simply stared at Bai Liu in astonishment. After a long pause, he snorted. "Take a man's money, be loyal to him. Men are guilty—"

"Weapons are not."

His expression hardened. "Whatever you've done, your weapons are innocent. I won't take it out on them."

"I'll do my job."

Bai Liu nodded approvingly, then smiled. "Apart from that, I have another request."

"I want you to place an external order—to the King's Guild appraiser."

Hua Gan raised an eyebrow. "What do you want appraised?"

Bai Liu laced his fingers together, his gaze obscure. "These gloves."

A beat of silence.

Hua Gan understood immediately. "—And every weapon I've ever modified, correct?"

He shrugged. "Fine. I'll place the orders."

AWith that, as if nothing had happened, Hua Gan dusted himself off, helped his apprentice to his feet, and turned back to his work—completely unfazed.

Tang Erda, watching Bai Liu, murmured in a hoarse voice,
"…A clown."

Bai Liu exhaled. "I figured as much, but I don't understand why he's doing this for me. The clown shouldn't know me yet."

"But again, every move he makes feels like he knows me specifically…" Bai Liu half-closed his eyes. "If the Joker knows what my skills are and what I'd do, then his decision to have this reformer take the initiative to transform my actions seems like he's wrapped up this transformer as a gift for me."

Tang Erda spoke quietly, "The Joker knows you can use your skills to control this reformer."

Bai Liu tugged at the edge of his glove and pulled it off. He stared thoughtfully at the metal ring on the side of the glove. "And this material too... he took it upon himself to fuse the best materials to correct the situation, then just waited for me to come and receive it."

"I understand what he did," Bai Liu continued, "but the real question is why did he do it?"

Tang Erda replied, "If it were any other world line, I could see why the Joker would do it."

Bai Liu looked up.

"The best material, the best reformer…" Tang Erda sighed with mixed feelings. "In another world line, the Joker always offers you the best because, in his eyes, only the best is worthy of you."

The Game Pool

During the exchange between Bai Liu and Tang Erda, General Hua took out a measuring tape and carefully measured Mu Sicheng, starting from the tip of his left paw to the tip of the other paw, and then across the two shoulder crests.

"The arms are 2.17 meters long, the toes are 9 centimeters, the shoulders are 46 centimeters wide, and the upper limbs are about 77 centimeters long."

As his apprentice took notes, General Hua pressed down on Mu Sicheng's scapular bulge, then turned to say, "The upper limbs and height could be longer—let's make it 85 centimeters."

Mu Sicheng shifted uncomfortably.

The apprentice, looking at Mu Sicheng with some disbelief, muttered under his breath, slightly envious, "The hands are so long, it's like a monkey..."

Mu Sicheng shot the apprentice a fierce glare. "I'll grow! I'm still young! I can grow all over, even my chest can grow more!"

Apprentice: "..... = =....."

General Hua interrupted Mu Sicheng’s banter with the apprentice. "He’s complimenting you. Long hands are a good thing."

Mu Sicheng looked at him in disbelief.

General Hua continued, "Considering your build, you must have played a lot of sports, right? In sports like basketball, volleyball, and even table tennis, the longer the arms, the more desirable the athlete."

"You’ve been dominant in sports since you were a kid, haven't you?" Hua Gan gestured with a sweep of his arm.

Mu Sicheng hesitated and nodded.

"Longer arms give you a wider range of attack and defense. I’ve seen the footage Charles sent me of your games. Your reflexes are quick, and your dynamic vision is among the best I’ve seen. 90% of attacks that come within your range are neutralized before they even reach you."

General Hua put away the measuring tape and raised his eyes. "Do you know what that means?"

Mu Sicheng was still pondering, but Hua Gan didn't expect an answer from him. He turned around, put the tape away, and continued, "Your team lacks a player who can act as a [shield]."

"Your high movement speed and sneak attack skills make you more of a [roamer] or [attacker], but your arm length extends your defense range, meaning you could be a strong [shield] at arm's length."

Hua Gan sidled up to Mu Sicheng. "You cover your team's defensive weaknesses while also playing as a [rover] and secondary attacker."

"Having this versatile role allows tacticians to use you as a flexible point in their strategy, expanding their offensive capabilities and reducing risk."

Hua Gan then picked up a piece of armor and tried it on Mu Sicheng's body before handing it to him casually, as though instructing him to wash his hands. "Now hold this piece of iron and put your hand in the lava."

Mu Sicheng, caught up in the praise, was puzzled. "Okay... wait, what?! Why are you reaching in!?"

General Hua gave him an odd look. "Your weapon is a monkey's claw, of course you need to put your hand in the lava to temper it."

Mu Sicheng looked at the bubbling, fiery lava where the apprentice had just placed a glittering diamond. Within seconds, the diamond melted into nothing but smoke.

"Has the temperature of the lava increased again?" the apprentice slapped his forehead in distress. "Diamonds with a melting point of 4,000 degrees only make a base now. The cost of transformation just went up again..."

Mu Sicheng: "....."

This guy's arms would shrink to one meter in an instant if he touched the lava!

Mu Sicheng steeled himself, but Hua Gan turned dryly to Bai Liu. "Hey, your team members are resisting the transformation."

Bai Liu, who was talking to Tang Erda, poked his head out from the side. "What's wrong?"

General Hua pointed to Mu Sicheng, who had his hands behind his back. "I just told him to put his hands in the lava, but he refuses for some reason."

Mu Sicheng's eyes widened as he protested, "What do you mean 'just'? Try it yourself, damn it!"

Bai Liu raised his chin at Tang Erda. "Go help him."

Seeing Tang Erda approach, Mu Sicheng instinctively covered his chest and screamed in horror, "Hey! What are you doing? Don't come any closer!!! Ah—!"

Mu Sicheng froze as Tang Erda grabbed him by the back of the neck and forced his hands into the lava. "Eh, it doesn't hurt."

The lava gently licked at his monkey paws, and the metal in his claws melted like butter on an iron plate, slipping through his fingers and swimming slowly around the edges of his toe plating.

Not only was it not too hot, it was almost... comfortable.

Mu Sicheng regained his composure, proudly dipping his arm into the lava again. He glanced back at Tang Erda, kicking him away. "Get out of here. I can handle it myself..."

Before he finished his sentence, the lava splashed onto his pants leg, burning a large hole in it in an instant. The flames crept upward along the hole, making Mu Sicheng jump back.

Liu Jiayi, quick on her feet, doused the flames with a fire extinguisher.

She couldn't help but look at the large hole in Mu Sicheng's pants, just under 20 centimeters from his navel, with a pitying look. "This is lava. It's a bit special when quenching your weapons, but that temperature can burn you and your clothes too."

Mu Sicheng hung his head, a blanket over his legs (because Bai Liu insisted it was inappropriate to show his thighs in front of a little girl, so Mu Sicheng had to cover up).

He sat by the boiler, looking like a chastised bride, not daring to make a move, while tearfully washing his hands in lava.

The transformations of Liu Jiayi and Muke were much smoother than Mu Sicheng's chaotic process.

"I'm assuming the [control] aspect, but I'd like to expand it," Liu Jiayi said, pulling out a vial of poison and antidote. "The fragile glass container limits my potential. I need something more compact with a quicker interval, preferably with some offensive properties."

General Hua pondered for a moment. "There is a container that might work for you, but I'm not sure if it will fuse smoothly with your vial."

Liu Jiayi raised an eyebrow. "What container?"

"Wait here, I'll find it," Hua Gan said, burying himself in a pile of what looked like junk. He occasionally scratched his butt. "...Ah, I remember it being here! Found it!"

Liu Jiayi looked down at the two rusty cans in his hands, his mouth twitching. "A mace bottle?"

General Hua dusted off his hands. "I didn't say I'd use it for you, just offering it as a reference. This spray paint-like bottle could store atomized poisons and antidotes, maximizing their effect and extending the range."

"With this spray bottle, you can use your skills without worrying about cooldowns, as long as you calculate the proper dosage of the poison or antidote."

Liu Jiayi weighed the pepper spray bottle in his hand before tossing it back to General Hua. "If I use this, what's the maximum control range?"

General Hua took the bottle, "I can modify the nozzle to a range of 30 meters, but at that distance, the drug's effect will be minimal, basically just acting as a deterrent."

Liu Jiayi nodded. She understood—spray containers lose effectiveness with distance.

Hua Gan donned his welding helmet, pulled out a welding torch, and pointed it at the spray bottle, glancing at Liu Jiayi with a questioning look. "If you're certain about this container, I can make several nozzles for you with varying potencies. For example, a fifteen-meter nozzle for the highest concentration of the drug, then twenty-five meters and thirty meters for the weaker concentrations."

“Is it possible to make spray nozzles with different concentrations?” Liu Jiayi asked. “Like one with a needle-like stream for a high concentration, and another with a wider spray for more diffusion?”

General Hua Gan nodded sharply. “A small thing.”

Liu Jiayi simply replied, “Then that’s the one.”

The apprentice placed Hua Gan's modified spray bottle and Liu Jiayi's glass container into a funnel and submerged it into the lava.

Mu Sicheng, still washing his hands in the lava, peered in curiosity as he saw Liu Jiayi’s glass bottle slowly melt into liquid in the funnel. The molten liquid climbed, bit by bit, up the spray paint bottle at the other end.

Hua Gan casually tossed a pair of black daggers into the air and caught them with his index finger. He turned to Muke. “This isn’t your skill weapon. There’s no connection between you and these daggers.”

Muke responded honestly, “Yes, they were given to me by someone else.”

“Light, fast, and sharp,” Hua Gan said, running his thumb along the blade. He clicked his tongue, unimpressed, as blood appeared on his finger. He smacked the blade, momentarily lost in thought. “These are top-tier assassin’s daggers, though their only flaw is that they’re difficult to wound.”

Hua Gan lifted his gaze and scanned Muke. “This isn’t quite your style, is it?”

He continued, “You’re not outwardly aggressive, but your aggression is strong. The dagger you seek to create will be ruthless and venomous. Seemingly harmless, but deadly, just like this dagger whose blade remains closed.”

Muke smiled amiably, agreeing with Hua Gan’s assessment. “Is that so?”

“This isn’t your original weapon, so the alteration process is more complicated,” Hua Gan continued, “but I can handle it. The biggest issue, however, is whether you’ll still be able to establish a soul connection with the daggers after the modification.”

Muke raised an eyebrow. “What happens if it doesn’t work?”

“If it doesn’t, you’ll explode along with the dagger,” Hua Gan explained, flexing his fingers and tapping the dagger. “The safest way to alter it is to leave it untouched. If it’s safe, you’re safe.”

Muke lowered his long, slender eyelashes, exuding an air of fragile elegance. He looked like something precious, a delicate object meant for decoration.

“If it were before,” Muke mused, “I probably would’ve chosen the safer option.” He looked up with a faint smile, his eyes locking with Hua Gan’s before lazily drifting to Bai Liu, who was leaning against the wall.

Bai Liu watched Muke calmly, as though he already knew what choice Muke would make.

Muke turned his gaze back to Hua Gan. “Is there a way to make this dagger’s attack power reach its maximum in a single strike? Something that can kill in one blow?”

“I want to be the best assassin,” Muke continued, “and when I enter the enemy’s camp, I want to take out their tactician.”

Hua Gan nodded slowly. “Yes.”

“But,” he added, “assassins are best suited for [roaming]. But the destiny of an assassin is sacrifice. Saying you’ll take down the tactician in one hit—are you ready to sacrifice yourself for that?”

Muke didn’t hesitate. “I’m ready.”

Hua Gan stared at him for a moment, then turned his gaze to the daggers on the table. After a deep breath, he said, “You’re not suited for a short weapon like these daggers. They’re too small, too bloodless.”

“You’re better suited for a long weapon, something like a katana that sacrifices itself for its master.”

Muke didn’t take issue with Hua Gan’s words. He bowed politely. “Thank you, Mr. Hua Gan.”

Meanwhile, Mu Sicheng was still washing his hands in the lava when the apprentice approached with another funnel containing two daggers and a long, bloodstained knife. He hung it over the boiler and walked toward Bai Liu and Tang Erda.

The apprentice cast them a timid glance. “It’s your turn.”

Bai Liu and Tang Erda exchanged looks before walking over. Tang Erda drew his gun, laid it flat on the table, and pushed it toward Hua Gan.

General Hua Gan observed the weapon for a long while before removing a magnifying glass from around his neck and studying the gun closely. He turned to Tang Erda. “Your weapon doesn’t need any modification.”

He wiped the gun clean and returned it to Tang Erda. “This weapon suits you perfectly. Your desire has remained the same since you first entered the game. This may be the only weapon that doesn’t need fine-tuning.”

He glanced at the rose brand on the hilt and added, “It’s time to get a new brand for your weapon.”

Hua Gan gave Tang Erda a deep, knowing look. “It’s like giving your soul a new place to belong.”

Tang Erda was stunned, his fingers tightening around the gun. The rose brand on the handle pressed into his palm—cold, familiar—a mark that had followed him through countless world lines.

It was like Su Yang's gentle smile waiting for him, and the captain's call.

But the captain was now Su Yang, and he no longer had to wait for the evasive, irresponsible man who once led him.

Tang Erda gazed down at the gun for a long time, contemplating. Finally, a low laugh escaped him, and with a sense of relief, he muttered, "Change it."

The apprentice took another funnel, placed the gun and one of Bai Liu's gloves into it, and submerged it in the lava, hanging it next to the boiler.

Mu Sicheng, still curious, asked, "Wasn't Bai Liu's weapon modification already done? Why bring it back?"

The apprentice didn’t even glance back. "It's not to modify Mr. Bai Liu's weapon. It's to use it to change the branding on Mr. Tang Erda's gun."

"You're the last one left," Hua Gan remarked, eyeing the bone whip Bai Liu had put up. He raised an eyebrow, adding, "Don't you understand the rules of a reformer? Weapon modifications don’t apply to bone whips."

Bai Liu, hearing this for the first time, asked with amusement, "Why not?"

Hua Gan pushed Bai Liu’s bone whip back. "Because, in this game, the perfect weapon is the bone whip. Any reformer who has seen Spades use it knows no attack weapon can rival it." He paused as though recalling something, then added, "And I've seen it many times."

"I thought to myself that I couldn’t create a better weapon than the bone whip, so I made a rule to never modify one."

With an impatient wave, General Hua Gan declared, "Get your perfect weapon out of my sight!"

Bai Liu complied, taking the bone whip.

The renovation proceeded.

Liu Jiayi had asked the reformer to mark her contact lenses (Hearts had given her the pair) with the brand of the wandering circus. Meanwhile, Mu Sicheng carefully pulled his hand from the lava as the apprentice retrieved the funnels hanging from the boiler.

The dark brown flowing metal armor on the monkey's paws felt like animal leather—soft, tough, and cold. Mu Sicheng extended his long nails, their silver sheen catching the light. With a casual scratch, he tore through materials with a defense value of four thousand or less as if they were tofu.

"Whaaaat?!" Mu Sicheng jumped to his feet, eyes wide. "The attack value just skyrocketed!"

Muke drew his own long samurai sword from the funnel. Contrary to his appearance, the blade was a simple, short katana, about forty centimeters long. Its cold, snowy blade reflected Muke’s stoic face.

The two daggers in the middle broke apart, their hilts detaching and magnetically reattaching, transforming back into a long knife.

Muke stared at the knife silently. His breathing was shallow, his presence still as a deep, stagnant pool—no wind, no ripples. Even as the knife became part of him, his expression remained unreadable.

He gripped the hilt, his gaze snapping, and without warning, he swung hard at a diamond sitting on the table.

The diamond remained untouched.

Muke sheathed his sword and turned away, calm as ever.

A dozen seconds later, tiny cracks appeared at the center of the diamond, growing larger and more interlocking until the stone shattered into a puddle of fragments.

Liu Jiayi's glass bottles had been transformed into two paint cans—one purple, one white. They were light and handy, each about the size of an adult's hand, with a dozen spray nozzles of varying range and dispersion. Liu Jiayi tried them out, eyes lighting up as she used the poison to create an abstract design on the wall.

Tang Erda, however, remained more subdued. He examined his weapon—the hexagram and werewolf's eye symbol on the handle—fingers tracing it absentmindedly.

"I said…" Hua Gan interrupted the murmuring group, his voice tinged with frustration. "Enough. You can't use offensive skills on people in the system lobby. Try them out on objects, but remember: dead things and real people are not the same. Use them in the game."

Bai Liu gathered the excited group and thanked General Hua.

He was shooed away impatiently. "Out, out!"

Bai Liu led the team outside.

Mu Sicheng's headset now bore the six-man star and werewolf markings engraved by Hua Gan, though the design was mostly obscured by his hooked lips.

Liu Jiayi, perched on Tang Erda's shoulder, wore the contact lenses given to her by Hearts. Her pupils reflected a pattern of six stars and a werewolf's eye—the same ones she had requested General Hua to mark on them.

General Hua Gan had wanted to engrave the team's emblem on Muke's short sword, but Muke refused with a shake of his head. As an assassin, the lower his profile, the better—such a conspicuous emblem would only hinder his ability to blend in.

Muke raised his eyes and gazed, reverently and intently, at Bai Liu, walking ahead. His breath was barely a whisper.

He no longer needed an emblem on the outside. His life, his memory, and even his soul were already marked.

After adjusting the edges of his gloves and letting his hands fall naturally at his sides, the six-manifold symbol of flowing lava glowed on the back of his hands. Bai Liu lifted his eyes and took his first step forward.

"League match-up training officially starts tomorrow," Bai Liu announced. "We're looking for games with league players to train with."

"Yes!!!" Mu Sicheng answered eagerly, his voice full of determination. "We'll beat anyone we can tomorrow!"

Bai Liu turned back, smiling. "The killer sequence."

Mu Sicheng blinked in confusion. "?! What? Which guild?!"

"We're going to solo a copy of the ice field with Spades in it tomorrow," Bai Liu said, absently shaking the fishbone whip in his hand, his grin deepening. "To see the rumored perfect weapon for ourselves."

The Ice Age

8:00 PM, Real World - Heresy Authority

The uniformed team members methodically loaded each 40 cm x 40 cm box onto the transport truck, while Su Yang stood at attention, his gun gripped tightly, his focus unwavering.

Tonight, these Extraordinary Red Heretics were being shipped by plane to Zone 3 for secure confinement.

It was a routine, yet dangerous operation, but one particular heretic made this transport especially high-stakes.

Su Yang shifted his gaze to the end of the transport line.

The boxes at the far end were made of darker metal and appeared considerably heavier. Several team members struggled under the weight, their backs bent as they carried the boxes with careful precision.

Su Yang stepped forward to offer his assistance and asked, “Are you sure all the body parts we recovered from the Rose Factory are accounted for?”

The team member, pausing to catch his breath, nodded. “Captain Su, we’ve done the count. Everything’s here.”

Su Yang gave a curt nod, his expression serious. “These corpses are unlike the other heretics. They can’t be transported with the rest. They need to be handled separately.”

As the team carefully loaded the last boxes onto the truck, one of the members, now leaning against the side of the vehicle to rest, remarked, “Captain Su is being extra cautious this time. He even applied for a special transport route for this batch.”

A fellow team member, also taking a break, added, “You don’t know how dangerous this batch of corpse heretics is. The team members who went to excavate the bodies at the factory—they all came back mentally broken. Some are still undergoing treatment. I don’t know if they’ll ever recover.”

The first team member rubbed his hands together, incredulous. “It’s really that bad?”

The second team member rolled his eyes. “Why do you think Captain Su is taking such extreme precautions? If this batch somehow influences the other heretics… a whole plane could be wiped out in an instant.”

“But it’s still dangerous to send this heretic by itself, isn’t it?” the first member asked, looking concerned.

“Of course, it’s dangerous,” the second member replied with a mockingly casual shake of his head. “But when’s it ever safe in our line of work? The real question is why Captain Su is splitting this batch off. They’re trying to avoid a disaster, that’s all.”

The topic shifted with a sigh, the first member asking, “I get why Captain Su requested a special transport vehicle and plane, but a separate route too?”

It wasn’t unheard of for the Heresy Authority to escort highly dangerous heretics, like Bai Liu, but this was the first time they had gone to such lengths, including planning an entirely separate route.

The second member lowered his voice, glancing around to make sure no one was listening. “Su Yang’s application said this heretic couldn’t be stored in Zone 3 or anywhere near a populated area. Something would go wrong. This heretic has too much influence—it could cause widespread fatalities.”

“Finally, the Bureau approved the request yesterday,” he continued. “They’ve contacted a polar research station in Antarctica. The plan is to make an ice core of the heretic and bury it beneath the ice cap, where it will be kept under 24/7 guard for the next 365 days. It’s going to be the first heretic to receive this level of containment.”

The first member whistled. “365 days of constant supervision... That’s a big deal.”

“Big deal?” The second member shrugged. “Have you forgotten Bai Liu? Tang Erda used to take care of things like this, but now it’s all about guarding.”

The first member grimaced at the mention of Team Tang’s absence. “Right… so, where exactly in Antarctica are they sending this heretic?”

The second member paused, furrowing his brow. “I’m not sure… but I heard something about Ice Dome A, the highest point on the Antarctic ice cap. It's isolated, cold enough, and thick enough to keep this heretic contained."

11:30 PM, Out to Sea Port

The soldiers carrying another batch of heretics headed straight for the airport, while the vehicle transporting the body parts arrived at the port. The items were transferred onto a small cargo ship for further transportation.

The freighter would first dock at another port, where a special plane awaited to escort the heretics to Antarctica.

Five escorts were assigned to the transport—a minimum number Su Yang had calculated.

Su Yang stood on the shore, watching as the boxes were loaded onto the freighter, the gangway retracted, and the ship was tugged into the water, disappearing into the night.

The five escorts on the hatch cover saluted Su Yang before waving goodbye.

Su Yang stood there, watching the ship sail away, a growing unease settling in his chest as the mist thickened around him.

When the freighter finally vanished from sight, an overwhelming sense of dread washed over him. His breath caught in his throat, and for a fleeting moment, he envisioned the snow-covered bodies of his team members—five lifeless forms strewn across the ice.

After the Rose perfume incident and the excavation of the bodies at the factory, Su Yang had begun experiencing signs of mental degradation. Hallucinations had become more frequent, and his mind often wandered to dark places.

Su Yang, more than anyone, understood the danger these body parts posed. When he first laid eyes on the corpses, he, a man known for his stoicism and steadiness, was shaken to his core. Had he not held his composure and taken control, the team members who unearthed the bodies might have fought over them.

These corpses weren't just dangerous—they were catalysts for a spiritual decay that amplified one's darkest desires, eventually erasing the boundaries of human morality.

Realizing this, Su Yang insisted that the body parts be moved far from any crowded zones. He knew that if they remained near a populated area, something catastrophic—worse than the Rose perfume incident—would inevitably happen.

In the end, it was decided that the body would be sealed beneath Ice Dome A, the coldest and most inaccessible part of Antarctica, 4,083 meters above sea level and untouched by human hands.

It was the safest place Su Yang could think of.

But he also knows that...

Su Yang's light-colored eyes reflected the swaying waves of the sea. A heavy weight pressed on his chest, stacking layer by layer from the lapping harbor to his heart. He closed his eyes, feeling the long-awaited pang of powerlessness.

He knew, without a doubt, that there was no promised land in this world where one could escape their desires.

He simply hoped no more innocent people would die in the process.

But how could that be possible?

Human desire, whether good or bad, becomes a destructive force when taken to its extremes.

After Tang Erda left, Su Yang began to understand, just a little, what Bai Liu had said to him in the interrogation room that day.

The clean, fresh-faced young man had looked up at him with dark eyes that seemed to hold the weight of the universe, and softly spoken, "Team Su, the desire to be too close and protective can kill you."

Su Yang gripped the solid octopus-shaped team crest on his right chest. With what seemed like a sigh, he turned away into the icy night air.

The small cargo ship behind them sounded a clear whistle of departure and moved out into the darker night.

Game Pool

Bai Liu and his team had observed the Spades team a few times and figured out some of their routine. They usually visited certain subgroups regularly, but occasionally Spades would break away from the group and go off alone to work in one of the ice fields, much like Bai Liu had done during his last visit to the game pool.

Spades seemed to have a particular affection for this ice field, as if it had become his home—like a creature returning to its lair, bound to its biological rhythm of rest.

Bai Liu's target was this very ice field.

He wasn't so arrogant as to think that the Wandering Circus could take on the entire Killer Sequence battle group by itself. But with no lives at stake, Bai Liu believed they could attempt to team up and challenge a star player.

It was a risky move, but one with clear advantages.

For one, they could gather information about the star player, improve their own team, and if they were lucky enough to win, the victory would create a stir.

Shameless, but useful.

Bai Liu decided to test the waters with Spades first, driven by a curious instinct. He kept a close eye on the players coming and going from the pool, and when he spotted someone quietly entering—someone who had scared off a circle of players—he couldn't help but smile.

Spades walked over to the game pool, whip in hand, organizing the regulation bundle.

As the players around them realized it was Spades, they held their breath and backed away, not daring to enter the game for fear of picking the same one as this feared figure.

But Spades didn't seem to care about his surroundings. After a brief observation of the rotating posters in the pool, he simply selected one and dove in.

In that instant, Bai Liu wasted no time in hooking the whip around Spades' waist, pulling him and his team into the game behind Spades.

Spades cast him a cold glance—one as icy as water under thick ice—and was quickly swallowed by the game pool.

By the time the pool settled, the surrounding players stood in stunned silence, too shocked by what they'd just witnessed to approach the front for a long time.

It took a while before someone finally asked, “What... what just happened?”

Snow and Ice

Snow and ice filled the sky, and the wind howled.

Bai Liu choked and coughed as he came to his senses. Instinctively, he curled up, his skin quickly freezing until it went numb, leaving him on the verge of unconsciousness in minutes.

It wasn’t until a voice came from behind him that Bai Liu realized he wasn’t on the ground but in someone’s arms.

“You shouldn’t have come into this game with me,” Spades said, holding Bai Liu, whose skin trembled under his touch. “You’re scared of the cold.”

Bai Liu turned around.

Spades was so close that Bai Liu could almost feel the tip of his nose brush against his. The proximity made Bai Liu pause, his breath catching for a moment before he instinctively pulled away.

Spades seemed unfazed by the closeness. He stood up, lifting Bai Liu effortlessly, and expertly pulled a jumper from the wall, zipped it up, and handed it to him.

Once they were both fully armed, Spades opened the door and stepped out.

Bai Liu, with narrowed eyes, took the punching bag in his hands. “Aren’t you going to ask why I came in with you?”

He had his reasons for dealing with the situation—perhaps to rub the first star player’s nose in the heat of things, or for other purposes.

Spades, facing the powerful wind and snow, pushed open the door. His hair whipped across his forehead, but his eyes—black, pure, and emotionless—met Bai Liu's.

"You came in here with me to play games and try to win me over, didn't you Bai Liu?"

Spades pulled down his goggles and stepped out into the blizzard, his voice carrying strangely over the howling winds.

"Don't lie to me or to yourself. If you want to play a game with me, then play it well—and do your best to win, Bai Liu."

With those words, Spades closed the door. By the time Bai Liu opened it again, he had disappeared into the snow.

... This is probably meant to be a fair fight with him?

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow, closed the door, squeezed his frozen fingertips, gathered his rashers, and turned to see Tang Erda and the others.

Tang Erda, also dressed in a heavy rash jacket, exhaled a puff of white air as he spoke. “The power’s off in the house. We need to turn on the insulation system, or we’ll freeze to death.”

“Do you know how to fix it?” Bai Liu asked.

Tang Erda nodded. “I’ve trained in similar extreme conditions, and I can handle all the basic equipment. But I’ll need to go outside to check it. It’s so windy here that I’ll need someone to hold my safety rope, or I’ll get blown away.”

“I’ll go with you.” Mu Sicheng draped himself in protective clothing, his tone dry.

The two men quickly tightened their safety ropes around their waists, opened the door, and braved the fierce wind and snow, struggling to close the door against the gusts. Finally, they made their way outside.

A short while later, Mu Sicheng and Tang Erda returned with their safety ropes. Bai Liu, who had been guarding the door, immediately shut it behind them.

Mu Sicheng’s teeth chattered as he tried to remove the safety rope from the hook beside the door, but his hands were too cold to manage it. Muke helped him.

“It’s... so painfully cold!” Mu Sicheng exclaimed, shivering, his feet jumping, and he huffed into his hands in an attempt to warm up.

Bai Liu noticed that Mu Sicheng had been outside for less than ten minutes, yet his hands were already frozen, red and purple. His knuckles couldn’t bend, looking like gangrenous flesh.

Only when the lights came back on in the room could Bai Liu truly see their surroundings.

In front of them was a narrow, low ventilation tunnel. The walls were made of sturdy, assembly shed panels—typically used to build temporary accommodations on construction sites. Bright incandescent bulbs hung overhead, and the windows on either side of the walls were sealed around the perimeter. Through the half-frozen windows, they could see the howling snowstorm outside.

At the end of the tunnel, a sign was pinned to a crooked wall. It read: "Edmund South Pole Station."

Bai Liu stared at the sign for a few moments before lowering his gaze to open his system panel, where he found a sliver of notifications he hadn't checked yet.

[System Alert: Welcome players to the game Ice Age.]

[System Alert: Player has obtained the main game quest - Global Warming.]

[Game Background Tip: A year ago, a sudden and never-ending snowstorm swept across the globe from Antarctica, accompanied by lower temperatures, shifting ocean currents, and thickening cloud cover. Everywhere began to freeze over...]

[... The Antarctic ice cap seems to have turned into a pervasive force, spreading around the world. Meteorologists claim that humanity has been forced into a new ice age since the Fourth Ice Age, with massive food shortages and excessive cold weather causing large-scale fatalities...]

[All scientific research on Antarctica was suspended, and you, an explorer with insider knowledge, are told that everything is connected to a shady scientific campaign in the region. Eager to explore, you gather your team, funded by the United Antarctic Glacier Company, and travel to Antarctica to uncover the cold secrets hidden beneath the ice.]

[You arrive at the South Pole by plane but get lost in a blizzard. In an emergency, you find an abandoned observatory in the snow and force your way inside to escape the storm.]

[- Remember, players: You are great explorers! Be brave enough to discover the truth and warm the globe once more!]

[Current progress on main quest: 0%]

[Player's current location: Edmund Antarctic Polar Observatory Scientific Research Station.]

By the time Mu Sicheng finished reading the game's introduction, he couldn't help but comment, "What is this? Isn't the real world dealing with global warming? What's with this ice age?"

Liu Jiayi, more sensitive to the temperature than Bai Liu, had already wrapped herself in layers of clothing, looking like a ball.

She read through the game description and frowned, warning, "Bai Liu, the game pool simulates a league. In the game pool, the shop trading system is closed, so we can't buy anything. If this is the game's background, food and warm clothing should be our first priorities."

"Otherwise, we won't last more than a few days before we're forced to quit the game voluntarily."

Bai Liu couldn't agree more with Liu Jiayi. He nodded and issued the order. "Muke, search the warehouse for food stocks. Tang Erda and Mu Sicheng will overhaul the building and set up our base for the expedition. Jiayi and I will head to the control room to see if there's a black box or a diary to explain what happened here a year ago."

"Got it!" everyone responded in unison.

After giving the orders, Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi made their way to the base's control room. Fortunately, the base wasn't large, and they quickly found it.

However, the door to the control room was open, and snow had piled inside. The warm air system had just been restored, and the snow was slowly beginning to melt.

Liu Jiayi rubbed her hands together as she surveyed the frosty console. She sighed, "Looks like we'll have to wait for Tang Erda and the others to come check it out before we can get the black box working."

Bai Liu crouched down, put on his gloves, and took a chisel to pry open the drawers, which had frozen solid. The ice wasn't too thick in these areas, so after two chisels, the ice cracked and fell away.

Bai Liu pulled open the drawer, which wasn't covered in dust but in a thin layer of condensed snow. As he brushed the snow aside, he found several black notebooks.

Instinctively, Bai Liu knew that in horror games, such books usually contain important plot information. He was certain there was a diary or some other critical document among them.

But as he flipped it over, the book was sealed shut.

Liu Jiayi, who had been checking other drawers, noticed Bai Liu standing still with the book in his hands. She leaned over, curious. "This book seems interesting. What's inside? Why are you so quiet?"

As soon as Liu Jiayi saw the contents of the book, she paused too.

The book was neat and legible, printed entirely in English.

Bai Liu, accustomed to reading simple English in horror games, was faced with a challenge now. This was dense, professional research language, mixed with a lot of technical jargon.

He closed the book with a straight face. "Show it to Muke later. I can't read it."

Liu Jiayi, unable to read it either, simply nodded, though she found it odd. She understood that intelligence and language skills aren't the same, but there was something strange about it.

The Edmond Observatory wasn't large, with only four floors.

The ground floor housed the reserve area, where fuel, food, fresh water, and gear were stored in different rooms, all wrapped in plastic sheeting. The two helicopter hangars were exposed outside, simply sheltered by a shed.

The first floor was the living area, containing a sauna, a dining room, an office area, and a few old computers.

The third and fourth floors were dormitories, cramped with barely five square meters per room, two bunk beds squeezed into each space. The warmth from the body heat was the only comfort in the crush.

Judging by the accommodations, the base had once held around eighty to a hundred people. It must have been crowded, but now it was eerily empty.

Liu Jiayi's gaze swept over the frozen noodles on the table, the half-cut, moldy potatoes on the counter, and the gas switch, turned up to high heat.

"The people here must have left in a hurry," she concluded.

Bai Liu rounded the corner from the third floor, offering a correction. "Or they were tied up and had to leave in a hurry."

Liu Jiayi looked up, confused.

Bai Liu held up a pair of pants and socks. "I found these by the bed in the dormitory. No one would panic and run outdoors without even wearing these in this cold weather."

Liu Jiayi asked skeptically, "Is it possible these people were frightened by something and ran off without even getting dressed?"

"Not likely." Muke, who had finished checking the warehouse, approached from the ground floor and gave a glance to Liu Jiayi. "I just saw their showroom. The Edmond Observatory is staffed by professional mountaineers, firefighters, and well-trained scientific researchers, people who've been tested in extreme scenarios. It's hard to imagine something could scare them all into running."

He glanced at the half-moved food, shaking his head. "They would know that running out of here without taking anything would be a death sentence."

Mu Sicheng and Tang Erda came down from the fourth-floor rooftop, where they'd been overhauling the radio equipment.

Mu Sicheng was so cold that his cheeks had turned blue. When he came downstairs, he found a dormitory, huddled under the blankets, and began shaking uncontrollably.

Tang Erda looked slightly better, but when he removed his gloves, Bai Liu saw a bloody patch of skin stuck to his palm. The wound was exposed to the air, yet no blood had escaped—it had frozen instantly due to the cold.

Tang Erda noticed Bai Liu's gaze and explained, "The setup table was too cold, and I couldn't adjust the tight equipment through my gloves, so I had to take them off."

"—And then the skin stuck to the metal?" Bai Liu finished the sentence for him.

Liu Jiayi sprayed the antidote on Tang Erda's hand. The wound slowly began to heal, but Mu Sicheng, still shivering in bed, didn't show any improvement. He seemed more out than in.

The antidote healed the wound, but it couldn't fix the cold.

"I saw the thermometer outside," Tang Erda said, shaking his healed hand. He looked at Bai Liu, his expression hardening. "Fifty degrees below zero. We can't stay much longer in this extreme weather. We'll freeze to death soon. We need to exit quickly... this game..."

Just then, Muke, still holding the black leather book Bai Liu had handed him, turned pale and interrupted Tang Erda, his voice trembling. "This Edmond Observatory studies body parts sent by the Bureau of Heresy."

Tang Erda's heart skipped a beat, and he immediately denied it. "No way. The Heresy Authority's items are regulated by convention. No country can use them for research—only for internment! They wouldn't let anyone else handle Heretic Authority material!"

Muke exhaled a long breath, the vapor clouding his vision. His voice was soft and unreadable. "What if I told you the plane carrying the corpse heretics crashed on arrival at the South Pole, and all five of the escorts on board died violently on the spot?"

The Ice Age

Muke spread the black book for everyone to see, with a fax report clearly taped to its left side.

He pointed to the numbered code in the bottom left corner. "The number here represents the year, month, and day—a date you should be familiar with."

"0807," Liu Jiayi read aloud. Then, as if realizing something, she glanced at Bai Liu. "This is the date we entered the game."

Liu Jiayi, already vaguely familiar with this kind of formula, recalled the design of the last game and became even more certain of what Bai Liu had told her:

-- The designers behind the game are intentionally targeting Bai Liu, specifically by having copies of him log into the real world after he enters the game, or targeting the people around him.

The sense of being betrayed... Liu Jiayi pursed her lips in displeasure.

Bai Liu's gaze shifted to the fax report from a year ago. The English words on it were simple enough for him to understand.

The fax had been sent from another base called Tai Shan—clearly a Chinese name—so it must have come from a domestic observatory, directed to the Edmond base.

The content of the fax was roughly as follows:

"[I regret that this unfortunate incident occurred when our plane landed at an ice airport while transporting dangerous goods... The five escorts on board died instantly...]"

"[The outcome was tragic but not entirely unexpected. Surviving in the snow and ice has been a nightmare for everyone.]"

"[The only reason we exist here is to study past and future weather trajectories, to slow down the rate of global warming, and to fight for humanity's better harmony with nature until we die. That is the purpose of each and every Antarctic researcher...]"

"[During the search for the plane, the entire observatory was involved. However, when we took inventory, we found three sealed boxes missing from the plane's cargo, which didn't match the original count. Although I hate to speculate, in Antarctica, dark metal boxes disappearing in the vast whiteness without human intervention is no easy task...]"

"[I know that researchers in Antarctica, trapped in this endless isolation, often become curious about mysterious foreign objects. You always want to explore and analyze everything, thinking there's a key that can save humanity or slow global warming...]"

"[Edmond, I must seriously warn you that those boxes are dangerous, and I can't tell you anything more about them. It's classified, but all I can say is that they were supposed to be buried under the 'untouchable pole' and left alone...]"

"[Some things in this world are simply too dangerous to touch and study, no matter how much curiosity you have. Not everything is as obviously damaging as the weather...]"

"[If you find any trace of those three missing boxes, please let me know. I need to seal them up under Ice Dome A immediately.]"

The letter was signed, "Your friend, Tarzan Observatory."

Bai Liu scanned the contents and concluded, "This fax was sent to all observatories, not just Edmond. The three boxes must have been secretly hidden by researchers from other bases."

He continued, looking around at the group, "According to the main thread of this game, we're supposed to find these boxes first, then figure out what's causing global cooling based on them. The Edmond observatory is likely hiding one of them."

Bai Liu turned to Xiang Muke. "Muke, you and Liu Jiayi stay here at the original station and search for any other clues. Meanwhile, Tang Erda, Mu Sicheng, and I will gather supplies and head to nearby observatories to look for other boxes."

Everyone nodded in agreement and scattered.

Bai Liu then met Tang Erda's silent gaze. "Captain Tang, could you come here for a moment? I need to speak with you privately."

Tang Erda, about to turn away, hesitated before following Bai Liu into one of the cabins.

Bai Liu shut the door behind them.

In the small, five-square-meter cabin, there was an uncomfortable silence. Bai Liu, arms crossed, waited without speaking, clearly expecting Tang Erda to speak first.

Finally, Tang Erda broke the silence, his voice hoarse and his expression heavy. "I'm sorry for my poor judgment. I shouldn't have let you hand over the body parts to the Heretic Authority. I didn't think it would..."

Bai Liu took a moment before responding, his tone unhurried. "It's not entirely your fault. I made the decision myself."

Though Bai Liu acknowledged the inevitability of someone being behind the situation, he couldn't help but feel a little dissatisfied upon learning of Xie Ta's deteriorating condition.

Originally, Bai Liu had planned to keep Xie Ta's body for himself in the real world, but given the impact of the body and his own lack of proper housing, he and Tang Erda had ultimately compromised, leaving the body with the Heretic Authority.

It was a subtle form of Bai Liu selling out Tang Erda.

He hadn't expected it to backfire so quickly.

Tang Erda, clearly worried about the five escorts in reality, seemed to be regretting his decision. He muttered, "It's my fault. If I hadn't let you give them the body parts, the five escorts wouldn't have died..."

Bai Liu calmly interrupted him, "They're not necessarily dead yet."

Tang Erda's head snapped up, his eyes widening. "You have an idea?"

Bai Liu noticed the slight twitch of Tang Erda's ears and tail, a reminder of his canine nature.

It was easy to forget, given Tang Erda's stern demeanor during training, that Bai Liu himself had a similar animalistic edge.

Tang Erda, his fist clenched in shame, said, "It's fine. If you don't have a plan, I'll try logging out of the game to stop the plane from taking off..."

Bai Liu gently tapped the panel Tang Erda had opened, stopping him. "The plane has already mostly taken off. Logging out now will only speed up time. It's better to play through this route and figure out what's happening, then find a way to undo it."

Tang Erda slowly let the panel drop. "You have a plan?"

Bai Liu nodded. "Yes, but we're still missing some key information. The game seems to be based on a realistic setting, and you mentioned that you trained in Antarctica. You must have a solid understanding of this environment. Tell us what you know."

"Where should I start?" Tang Erda asked.

Bai Liu looked at him thoughtfully. "Start from the beginning. Why were you here for training?"

Tang Erda took a deep breath. "I came here for a year of duty and spent some time flying helicopters for the Zone 4 Project."

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. "The Zone 4 Project?"

Tang Erda explained, "It was a project to assess whether Antarctica could be used for a new heresy containment zone. The location was ideal—isolated and perfect for containing particularly dangerous heretics."

Bai Liu's tone was casual. "So why was it abandoned?"

Tang Erda sighed. "The scale of construction here was too large to keep hidden from foreign observers. Domestic authorities knew a bit about the project, but foreign ones didn't know about heresy. With over 5,000 residents in Antarctica during the summer, we couldn't risk revealing the existence of the heresy, so the project was abandoned."

Bai Liu asked, "Then why did the body parts make you restart the program?"

Tang Erda responded, "The data from the Zone 4 Project showed that this was the safest place to seal a dangerous psychotropic heretic."

Bai Liu shifted the topic. "Do you have any impressions of this Edmond Observatory?"

Tang Erda paused before answering. "No, there's no observatory by that name in the real world."

Bai Liu continued, "What about the Tarzan Observatory?"

Tang Erda shook his head. "That name doesn't match any observatory I know of."

Bai Liu nodded, recognizing the pattern. "It's similar to what happened in Bursting Last Train. They referenced reality but didn't fully follow it."

He then asked, "Do you remember any observatories near the poles?"

Tang Erda thought for a moment. "Yes, there's one from Country A, located here."

Bai Liu followed up, "Do you know what research they're currently doing?"

Tang Erda hesitated before answering. "Not exactly. From what I heard, they're studying the impact of special cryogenic animals on climate recovery. I was told these animals are both alive and dead..."

Before Bai Liu could respond, Mu Sicheng burst into the room, breathless, holding a book. "Bai Liu—look at this!" he exclaimed, thrusting the object into Bai Liu's hands.

Bai Liu glanced down at the package in his arms—a tarpaulin-wrapped object with a waterproof label attached.

The label reads in English: [Special Cryogenic Animal Remnant Sections (Cells Still Active) and Ground Temperature Change Study Fact Sheet].

The Ice Age

Bai Liu retrieved a cutter from a drawer in the dormitory, warming it in his hand for a few moments before smoothly snapping out the blade. He used it to cut through the tarp, revealing what was wrapped inside.

It was a stack of neatly divided lab report sheets.

The pages were filled with technical abbreviations, measurements, graphs, and the occasional black-and-white or color-stained section—complex and difficult to read for anyone without the proper knowledge.

Bai Liu flipped through the stack briefly, then looked up at Mu Sicheng. “Where did you find this?”

Mu Sicheng took a breath before responding. “In the basement. When I went to check the helicopter hangar, I discovered a sliding cellar door hidden beneath the docking bay. It led to a two-story basement full of experimental equipment, along with some pickled cabbage and radishes.”

“Were there any logs of experimental records or related papers in the basement?” Bai Liu asked.

The experimental reports were raw material, and Bai Liu needed at least some basic understanding to make sense of the data.

Mu Sicheng shook his head. “I didn’t look thoroughly. This bag was on the table, and I thought it was important, so I took it and brought it up here to show you first.”

Bai Liu nodded. “Get Muke over here. You follow Liu Jiayi and check the food supplies on the ground floor, prepare our share for the night. Muke and I will go down to the basement.”

Mu Sicheng turned to Muke, while Bai Liu glanced sideways at Tang Erda, handing him the document. “Can you read this?”

“I can make out some of it.” Tang Erda flipped through the pages briefly, then paused at a particular chart. “This chart... it’s made using dual-frequency radar echoes to measure the thickness of the ice beneath the surface, allowing for the detection of topography under the ice. It’s helpful for drilling through without hitting rocks or other obstacles."

Bai Liu noticed the change in Tang Erda's expression. "Is something wrong with this chart?"

Tang Erda hesitated, then pointed to a note on the chart. "This is a typical ice-sounding chart from the polar regions, but this one is from Dome A, or Ice Dome A."

"There are only domestic observatories near Ice Dome A. This is the domain of our research institutions," Tang Erda continued. "Although the relationship between the national observatories in Antarctica is relatively peaceful, their research areas are well-defined. Edmond Observatory has neither the capacity nor the authority to study Ice Dome A. In other words, it's impossible for Edmond Observatory to have any first-hand data on Ice Dome A."

Tang Erda furrowed his brow, flipping through more pages of the data. "But here they have numerous reports on ice soundings and ice core studies from Dome A. That's not normal."

"One observatory has classified research data from another," Bai Liu observed, scanning the information in Tang Erda's hand. "There are two possibilities."

Tang Erda looked over, waiting for Bai Liu to continue.

"One possibility," Bai Liu said, "is that the domestic observatory—Tarzan Station—shared its first-hand data with Edmond Observatory."

Tang Erda frowned. "That's impossible. It's a serious data breach."

Bai Liu smiled slightly. "Seems like Captain Tang prefers the second possibility—Edmond Observatory somehow managed to force its way into Ice Dome A's research data."

Tang Erda nodded reluctantly. "Or worse, Edmond Observatory might have eliminated the team at Tarzan Station and taken over their research."

Liu Jiayi appeared at the door, leaning against the frame with her arms folded. "I found Edmond's cabin. I have a feeling this guy wasn't just any scientist. Based on the remnants in his cabin, he seems pretty aggressive."

"Show us the way." Bai Liu stepped forward and took Liu Jiayi's hand, casually swapping his warmed gloves with her empty ones.

The researchers at Edmond Station were all tall, and their clothing was oversized for Bai Liu, let alone Liu Jiayi. Though she had layered herself with clothes, there were still gaps, especially in her gloves.

Liu Jiayi didn't like being taken care of, but the cold had left her hands almost frozen. She said nothing, nor did she show any signs of discomfort.

Bai Liu's glove swap was so natural, as if it was something he had always done, that the others didn't even react.

Liu Jiayi just shook her hand out of Bai Liu's, covering her face to exhale a breath of vapor. She looked calmer now, though still silently displeased. Despite her irritation, she didn't know why, but she accepted Bai Liu's actions without question.

She led Bai Liu around the corner to a small room, where the wind blew through a crack in the window seal, stealing all warmth from the room.

The seal was lined with drips of condensed, ice-prism-thin formations that glowed faintly in the dim light.

Liu Jiayi tucked her gloves into her pocket. "At first, I didn't realize this was Edmond's cabin because it was at the windward end. It would be the first to be hit by any storm, and it seemed too dangerous for a base manager to live here. He'd probably freeze to death in his sleep."

She kicked open the frozen door, which clicked and creaked as it slammed shut against the wind. On iron hooks inside the room hung a neat row of modified rifles, each around 70 cm long, their muzzles also covered in ice.

"I didn't find any signs of gunfire in the other rooms—mostly just books, computers, and supplies. But this room had guns and plenty of spare ammo," Liu Jiayi said, her tone colder.

She pulled a box from under the bed with a forceful tug and stomped on the neatly arranged rounds inside. "At first, I thought this stuff belonged to some military person. But under the box, I found purchase invoices in Edmond's name. So, this must have been his personal living space."

Tang Erda frowned. "The Antarctic Convention forbids firearms at the observatories, and the storage of such items is strictly prohibited."

Liu Jiayi shrugged. "But he used them. The invoices show the guns were bought after Edmond arrived in Antarctica, probably from the helicopter transport team under the guise of 'self-defense.'"

She added, "He lived alone here. There's no sign of anyone else. I suspect no one but Edmond knew about the gun."

Bai Liu glanced at the rifles and then stood at the room's entrance, holding an invisible gun in an empty pose. He half-squinted as if looking through a sniper sight.

"So, this Edmond," Bai Liu mused, lowering the 'gun,' "bought a rifle and bullets for 'self-defense,' chose to live in this cold, isolated room, and every day raised his gun. The only people he could point it at were the other residents of this cloister…"

Bai Liu's smile deepened. "It seems this Dr. Edmond, fearing some threat from others at the Observatory, grew so paranoid that he bought a gun to protect himself."

At that moment, Muke and Mu Sicheng arrived from the third floor, both with grim expressions. Muke handed over a stack of papers, explaining, "When we were preparing the food for your trip, we noticed a lot of fresh food rotting in the warehouse, and a lot of canned food sitting untouched. The seals hadn't been broken."

Muke paused, then continued, "We checked the consumption logs for food and medication here…"

He sighed, "It turns out the food listed wasn't actual food—it was mostly drugs. For example, 'bread' was actually lithium carbonate."

Bai Liu's expression hardened. Muke's voice grew more serious. "The people at Edmond Observatory are being fed drugs, not real food. Someone is forcing them to take these drugs daily."

Bai Liu asked, "Do you know what kind of drugs?"

Muke didn't hesitate. "Lorazepam, diazepam, chlorpromazine, olanzapine… mostly psychotherapeutic drugs for severe depression, anxiety, and manic disorders."

Muke swallowed. "The people here are taking so many of these drugs that they hardly eat real food anymore. If that's true, this place is more like an asylum, and the people here are still physically fit—just dangerously aggressive when they snap."

Bai Liu's gaze shifted to the box of cold bullets on the floor.

"I think I understand why Dr. Edmond bought the gun and bullets now," Bai Liu said softly. "He needed a way to control these dangerous patients."

"Muke and Liu Jiayi head to the infirmary on the first floor and check if there are any relevant medical records to explain why this group of people is ingesting such large quantities of drugs," Bai Liu ordered.

Bai Liu's eyes were deep with thought. "These people should have been in sound mind when they arrived in Antarctica. We need to find out what exactly caused their mental imbalance."

Muke nodded and led Liu Jiayi downstairs. Before they left, Bai Liu tossed them two guns and several boxes of ammunition. "Be careful."

Muke took the gun and bullets with practiced precision, loading them expertly and securing the weapon at his side.

Liu Jiayi struggled a little with the weapon, still adjusting to the modified gun. Though it had been shortened, it was still too long for her to handle comfortably, forcing her to lift her arm awkwardly to hold it. Still, she did her best to maintain a confident posture.

They had all grown proficient with firearms after the trials they'd faced. They weren't quite as skilled as Tang Erda, the sharpshooter, but at least they had mastered the basics.

Even Liu Jiayi, despite her smaller frame, had learned to handle automatic and semi-automatic firearms, though she preferred to avoid them due to their powerful recoil. But in this situation, there was no choice. The harsh cold made it better to rely on weapons and supplies than to waste precious energy.

Bai Liu, accompanied by Mu Sicheng and Tang Erda, gathered their own weapons before heading downstairs to check the basement under the helicopter hangar outside the observatory.

The two teams split at the first floor.

Bai Liu approached the front door and noticed the frost that had formed in just the past hour. A frosty white foam clung to the lock handle, giving it a hard, cold texture.

The temperatures were so low that the snow quickly solidified, nearly as hard as ice in his hand.

Bai Liu glanced at the wind gauge mounted next to the door, which displayed the temperature and wind speed outside.

[-55.8°C, wind speed 119 km/h, force 12, Category 1 hurricane. No going out.]

Mu Sicheng, who grew up in the south, had never experienced such extreme cold. The realization that they were in -50°C made him shudder. It felt as if a cold breeze had seeped into his very bones.

Although he wasn't used to low temperatures, Mu Sicheng knew a thing or two about typhoons. Looking at the Category 1 hurricane on the gauge, he muttered, "Is it really that windy? Here, on the coast, even trees that weigh tens of kilograms can be blown over..."

Tang Erda grimaced. "You can't fly a helicopter in this weather. It'll get blown off course and crash. If we need to go to another observation post, we'll have to use snowmobiles."

Bai Liu didn't comment on the weather and calmly pushed the door open.

The wind howled, sweeping in, and the outside world was pitch dark, obscured by dense snow. The faint shimmer of light far above was barely visible, swallowed by the storm.

The door rattled violently in the wind, and a thick layer of snow had already built up at the threshold, knee-high. The gusts were so strong that Tang Erda had to raise a hand to shield his eyes as the wind pushed him back.

"Put on your goggles and sledges!" Tang Erda shouted over the gale. "Tie your safety lines around your waist! Don't get blown away! Watch out for ice cracks beneath your feet! Don't fall in!"

Antarctic winds can reach speeds of up to 35 meters per second, strong enough to blow away objects as heavy as ten Tang Erdas. But what was truly terrifying weren't the winds.

The real danger was the ice crevasses. No one who had survived in Antarctica would be unaware of them.

The ice here wasn't flat. As temperatures fluctuated, the melting and reshaping process created crevasses, some over a hundred meters deep. Snow often covered these crevasses, making them invisible and hard to spot.

This meant it was easy to step off solid ground and fall into an unseen chasm.

Tang Erda remembered a story he'd heard while stationed here about a Japanese observer who went out to check some equipment. On his way back, a gust of wind blew him away, and he vanished. Four days later, the crew found him in a shallow crevasse, less than three meters from the entrance.

The man had been frozen alive, his face frozen with snow, his eyes wide open in despair as he stared up at the exit. His fingers were broken, nails frozen, and blood smeared where he had clawed at the ice. His teeth were half-broken from gnawing, his mouth filled with blood, and the ice was stained with the remnants of his desperate struggle.

The snow covering the crevasse hadn't been thick enough to prevent him from escaping, but the observatory crew had repeatedly compacted the snow with snowmobiles during their search, trapping him further.

The man had tried to claw his way out, but the snow and ice closed in around him, and he froze to death, trapped by those who came to rescue him.

From then on, the observatory crew reported hearing strange sounds near the crevasse—sounds of someone desperately pleading for help, the frantic scraping of nails, and the gnawing of teeth. Some crew members, feeling unsettled, claimed they heard something moving beneath the snow, and they couldn't shake the feeling that something was coming for them.

After several more disappearances, the Japanese team moved their base to a different observation post.

Tang Erda wasn't sure if he believed the story, but the memory of those ice crevasses had stayed with him, so he shared it with Mu Sicheng and Bai Liu as a warning.

After hearing this, Mu Sicheng grumbled, "Forget it, I don't want to go. You two should go."

Bai Liu calmly dismissed him.

The three men staggered through the hurricane, safety ropes tied around their waists, until they reached the helicopter hangar.

Fortunately, it wasn't far. Tang Erda pulled open the flap door, and they entered the basement.

Mu Sicheng, shaking off the snow, muttered, "Damn, the weather changed so fast. It wasn't this windy the last time I was here!"

Bai Liu glanced at him. "If you stayed outside a little longer without any safety gear, the wind would have blown you away. You might have ended up stuck in an ice crevasse."

Mu Sicheng sighed. "Ugh..."

"But this is a game pool. I can quit the game if I want!" Mu Sicheng retorted.

Tang Erda, his tone heavy with concern, added, "Not necessarily. If you tried to leave like before, it wouldn't work in this environment. The ice chasm here is over 100 meters deep, and temperatures can reach -89°C. You'd freeze unconscious in seconds—and you might not even get the chance to quit before you're frozen solid."

Mu Sicheng sighed, "What kind of game is this?!"

The basement had two levels. The upper level was used for light experimentation, with basic equipment like sensors and hydraulic hammers stacked around the room, and two vats of pickled cabbage in the corner.

Tang Erda lifted the cover of one vat and was immediately hit with a foul smell. "This stinks like rotten sauerkraut."

Mu Sicheng grimaced. "Yeah, it smells just like my grandma's failed sauerkraut."

Tang Erda set the cover down and glanced at Bai Liu with a thoughtful expression. "This sauerkraut is made Chinese style. The people at Edmond's Observatory wouldn't have known how to make it properly, so it must have gone bad."

"But they must have been guided by someone to store food like this," Bai Liu mused. "It suggests the relationship between Tarzan Station and Edmond Observatory might not be as strained as we thought."

He circled the vats, looking for something.

Mu Sicheng, confused, asked, "What are you looking for? It's just two vats of sauerkraut."

"I'm looking for a production date," Bai Liu answered quietly.

"Why would anyone write a date on sauerkraut?" Mu Sicheng asked, puzzled.

Bai Liu crouched next to the vat, wiping his hand over a dark spot. Beneath the grime, he uncovered a lab label: [10/8, 12.14kg radish].

Mu Sicheng's eyes widened. "How did you know it had a date on it?!"

Bai Liu stood up slowly. "This is a lab. Edmond is a scientist, and he's not someone who would just make sauerkraut for fun. He was conducting an experiment on the fermentation process. And like any scientist, he would have documented the experiment—like the date."

Tang Erda crouched by the other vat and found a similar label. "The date is also August 10th. But the crash happened on August 7th, and the fax from Tarzan Station about Edmond stealing body parts was sent on the 8th... But Edmond—"

"Doesn't it seem strange to make sauerkraut on August 10th?" Bai Liu interrupted gently.

Tang Erda frowned, but before he could respond, Bai Liu walked toward the sliding doors leading to the second basement level.

The second basement was separated from the first by another sliding door, which Mu Sicheng had cut open earlier. When Bai Liu opened it, a thick, rancid stench rushed out, followed by a cloud of dust and smoke.

Between the first and second basement levels, there was also a sliding door, which appeared to be frozen. However, Mu Sicheng had cut through it earlier when he came down.

The moment Bai Liu opened the door, he immediately understood why Mu Sicheng had grabbed the information and fled.

A thick, pungent stench, strong enough to seem as if it could overturn the sky, rushed out. It was accompanied by a cloud of dust and light smoke that poured through the air.

As the heating returned, the ice prisms at the top of the second basement began to melt. Drips of murky liquid fell from them like stalactites, flooding the floor in dark grey mud and water. On its surface floated slides of unknown creatures and some plastic sealing material.

All in all, it was an unpleasant sight.

Mu Sicheng saw Bai Liu descending without saying a word and urgently warned him, "There's water down there! There are rubber boots and gloves by the stairs. Get changed before you go down!"

Bai Liu changed into the rubber boots, pulled on the gloves, grabbed a plastic file bag to protect his head, and walked deeper into the second basement.

As he descended, the eerie stench intensified, like the foul odor of fish freshly hauled from the ocean's depths—slippery, slimy, like a sea serpent swimming around Bai Liu in the dim, dusty air.

The water on the floor was shallow enough to reach the soles of his shoes. Bai Liu moved through it with ripples, bending down to collect some slides and materials floating on the surface.

He vaguely recognized a few slides—killer whales, lesser theropods, and several penguin species.

These slides were essentially fat and epidermal pressings of the polar animals, and most of the floating materials documented research findings on these creatures.

At the center of the basement was a wide, heavy desk, cluttered with four microscopes, a box of overturned slides, and two small test tube racks.

Inside the racks, small test tubes were neatly arranged, their surfaces slightly frozen from the cold but slowly thawing as the temperature returned. The biological tissue inside the tubes had taken on a peculiar pink color after staining.

As they warmed, the edges of the tissue grew darker, and some of it began to writhe, as if coming to life.

Bai Liu examined the labels on the tubes. Each one read: [Penguin (killer whale, etc.) + unknown organism X free cell mix culture].

Amid the writhing, darkening flesh, Bai Liu noticed a piece of tissue that remained still. Before and after thawing, it retained the bright red color of freshly cut flesh.

He could even see the capillaries on the slices, oozing blood and dissipating into the fixative.

He walked over, gently lifted a test tube from the rack using two fingers, and noted that this one had a different label: [Unknown Creature: X].

As soon as he removed the test tube, the tissue inside the other tubes seemed to react. The mouth of one tube erupted with sharp vapors, and the formaldehyde liquid evaporated instantly.

The pieces of flesh inside the test tubes began to divide and grow in an unknown direction. They crawled out, sticking together, and in the blink of an eye, formed a basketball-sized, tentacle-covered, slimy black ball of flesh.

The ball had the smooth skin of a penguin or killer whale, sharp carnivorous teeth, and newborn tentacles tumbling over fleshy wings on either side, pulsing as they grew.

The tentacles twisted together, sinking into the body and soon diverging into new tissue—fishtail-like webbed feet.

The grotesque ball of flesh screamed and hurled its tentacles at Bai Liu. Tang Erda, standing at the entrance, quickly leaned back and raised his rifle to his shoulder, aiming and firing.

"Bang! Bang!"

Two clean shots, and the ball of flesh lay motionless in the muddy water.

Tang Erda lowered his rifle, breathing heavily, and gravely warned, "I triggered the monster book. This is one of the creatures in this copy, called Unknown Creature X Contaminant. This is likely a biochemically contaminated area, so be careful not to run into the source of contamination."

"Okay," Bai Liu replied softly, slipping the small test tube into his fanny pack.

Bai Liu finally found what he was looking for in a locked safe. He had Tang Erda break the lock with his gun.

Inside, there was a chronological diary of experiments.

After obtaining it, Bai Liu emerged from the underground lab and followed Mu Sicheng, who was reluctant to go down.

Behind them, unseen by them, the pile of creatures Tang Erda had 'killed' began to shift. Like molten asphalt, their grotesque, inhuman forms fused together, reshaping and twisting. Slowly, faces emerged—features taking shape, limbs reforming—until they resembled something disturbingly human.

The creature seemed to be adjusting its appearance, constantly shifting between three different forms. At one moment, it had a slightly more robust human body; at another, it appeared elegant and clean; at another, it sported a shape reminiscent of a monkey's headphones. Occasionally, eyes emerged from the "asphalt," looking on in pure curiosity.

Eventually, it seemed to settle on a form, shedding its snake-like black shell in the muddy water. Its thin white arms and legs exploded out of the shell.

A naked Bai Liu stumbled to his knees in the water, his eyes wide with clarity, letting out a high-pitched, whale-like cry, calling for a companion.

Scattered across the water, the photocopies Bai Liu hadn't taken with him were filled with the following notes:

"Cetacean tissues after mixed suspension culture of unknown organism X cells exhibit plant-like recombinant regenerative properties with minimal regression of differentiation, which can be induced to re-differentiate..."
"Cells possess high levels of intelligence for individual species, and the differentiated 'basketball tentacle-like lower organisms' (later referred to as basketballs) exhibit differentiation across biological categories, including humans, birds, fish, and even ferns and ancient microbes..."
"Whale cells begin to play a dominant role, producing whale-like habits, growing a smooth epidermal layer around the 'basketball.' Cell differentiation gradually returns to normal, but after a week, the cells begin to die..."
"Whale-like habits emerge before death, leading to molting. After molting... my god! It reborn! It shows learning traits! It begins to control its differentiation... Oh my god! After multiple molts, it started to differentiate toward a human form!!!"

"No! I must stop the experiment! This is ethically unacceptable filth, and it will contaminate the human genome!"

The Ice Age

Bai Liu handed Muke the diary as he stepped out.

The Joint Experiment Data Report, a series of texts retrieved by the Observatory, and a basic textbook Muke had taken from one of the graduate students' cabins—all of these were essential for understanding the rest of the material.

Bai Liu asked, "How long will it take you to finish?"

Muke looked at the thick pile of books and the various specialized materials in front of him. It was essentially asking him to study an entire subject from scratch. After assessing the workload, he answered seriously, "About three or four days."

Bai Liu nodded knowingly. "How much food is left at this observatory?"

Muke replied, "After discarding the expired and spoiled supplies, there are about seventy kilograms left. At an estimated consumption rate of one kilogram per person per day, that's around fifteen days' worth of food for one person."

"Then we'll have to leave before you finish translating." Bai Liu thought for a moment before deciding, "We can't take a snowmobile—the speed is too slow. Tarzan Station is over a thousand kilometers away, and a snowmobile averages only thirty to forty kilometers per hour. A round trip would take over thirty days, which we can't afford in terms of food and fuel. A helicopter is our best option."

Tang Erda frowned. "But flying a helicopter in these conditions is dangerous."

"I know." Bai Liu cast a glance at him. "Don't forget, our game identities are [avid explorers]. We're not supposed to choose the safest way—especially if it wears us out more."

Tang Erda paused, falling silent. His instincts were more pragmatic, fitting for an observer rather than an explorer. But this was a game.

Reality didn't matter here.

Bai Liu scanned the room. "Any objections?"

No one spoke.

"Good." Bai Liu gave his orders efficiently. "Mu Sicheng, load food and fuel onto the plane. Tang Erda, repair the helicopter and the snowmobile. Muke and Liu Jiayi, prepare a week's worth of food for the observation post and store it near the cabin. Also, stock a week's worth of supplies in the snowmobile. If we're not back within a week, drive to the nearest observation post. Keep your guns in the car and the cabin."

He paused, then added, "If things go south… escape."

"We'll bring a satellite phone and keep in contact," Bai Liu continued, shaking the device in his hand. "But given the way these games usually go, there's a ninety-five percent chance we'll lose it. So we need separate contingency plans for different scenarios before and after we're cut off."

One hour later.
Bundled in thick winter gear—down liner, waist and knee pads, and spiked shoes for traction on ice—Bai Liu leaned over the edge of the helicopter, waving to Liu Jiayi and Muke below before shutting the outer door.

Tang Erda sat in the pilot's seat, adjusting the dashboard instruments. Food parcels were stacked high in the back, where Mu Sicheng, wedged between them, struggled to stretch his limbs. He had to use his firearm just to carve out a little space for himself.

The rotor blades whirred to life, the engine roaring against the silence of the snowfields. Bai Liu withdrew his gaze from outside, flexing his cold-stiffened fingers and exhaling a frosty breath.

"Put on dark goggles," Tang Erda warned from the front. "Snow blindness is a real risk. And if any part of your body goes numb from the cold, cover it immediately. Otherwise, the prolonged exposure could cause blood clots, leading to limb stiffness and—if it gets bad—amputation."

Mu Sicheng shivered violently, rubbing his hands together in desperation. "Wait—didn't I bring Liu Jiayi's antidote? Can't she cure frostbite?"

Liu Jiayi had, in fact, prepared a bottle of antidote for each of them.

"She can," Bai Liu acknowledged. "But only after your vitality has dropped from the cold enough for the antidote to take effect. By then, you'd likely be unconscious."

Mu Sicheng's face twisted in horror. "I hate Antarctica."

The plane was forced to land twice in the middle of an endless stretch of snow due to the strong winds.

Fortunately, Tang Erda had the foresight to replace the helicopter's landing gear with a sled-type system, reducing the risks of landing and taking off in such conditions.

But the greatest challenge with helicopter landings and take-offs wasn't the landing gear—or even the wind. The real danger lay in the ice.
Crevasses were the biggest threat.

If the helicopter had stopped atop an ice crevasse, the risk of fatalities would have been high. Yet, strangely, Bai Liu's luck held—neither of their landing sites had any visible crevasses. Thanks to that stroke of luck, they made it within half a day's reach of Tarzan Station.

With only a dozen kilometers left, Bai Liu requested a third landing. Once again, no ice crevasses were found—not even after Bai Liu personally stepped out, walking around at random to check.

Tang Erda had previously assured him that ice crevasses weren't so common that one could just stumble into them. However, there was one crucial factor he had overlooked—this was a game, and Bai Liu was a player with a zero luck stat.

By all logic, ice crevasses should have been everywhere for someone like him.

Yet, since entering the game, he hadn't encountered a single one.

Bai Liu tilted his head, raising his binoculars. Through them, he could see Tarzan Station perched far ahead, its silhouette rising above the shimmering, snow-covered horizon. Faint lights flickered through the observatory windows, while wisps of smoke and heat curled from the few chimneys on the roof.

He narrowed his eyes.
"There's someone at Tarzan Station."

Tang Erda glanced at him. "Is that why you decided to land here?" He asked, waiting for further instructions. "Should we go straight in, or —?"

"No. First, check for ice crevasses around here—especially the places I walked over." Bai Liu lowered the binoculars and looked down at the snow beneath his feet. The reflection in his goggles darkened.
"Captain Tang, if there were originally crevasses in these areas, is there any way to make them disappear?"

Tang Erda blinked in surprise. "If it was done artificially, you could fill them with snow and then pour water on top to solidify it into ice. But the process is extremely labor-intensive. Filling a 20-meter-deep crack would take hours, and in these freezing conditions, people wouldn't survive outside that long. Not to mention the wind—no one would even attempt it—"

"What if the thing filling these crevasses isn't affected by the cold at all?" Bai Liu asked casually, crouching and pressing his fingers lightly against the ice. "We brought sensors that can map hundreds or even thousands of meters beneath the ice, right?"

Mu Sicheng and Tang Erda retrieved the hydraulic hammer and sensors from the helicopter. Following the translated instructions Muke had provided, they set the equipment in place several hundred meters around the landing site.

The sensors began beeping softly. Slowly, images of the ice's cross-section materialized on the visual display, growing deeper with each scan—until suddenly, an alarm shrieked.

The next image sent a chill down Mu Sicheng's spine.

Scattered throughout the ice were human silhouettes—twisted into grotesque, unnatural positions.

Some had limbs broken and bent backward. Others had their heads and necks crooked at impossible angles. Their torsos were folded in on themselves, twisted nearly 180 degrees—like dissected frogs pinned open for experimentation, their spines severed and splayed apart.

These people had been thrown into the ice crevasses—discarded like failed experiments. The chasm beneath them wasn't just a natural formation. It was a mass grave.

Even without clear images of their faces, Mu Sicheng could imagine their expressions of agony.

Among them, several bodies were relatively intact. Their silhouettes suggested they had still been alive when they were thrown in—arms and legs frozen in climbing positions, as if they had desperately tried to claw their way out.

But they never made it.

Fifteen meters from the surface, their struggles had ended. They had frozen to death mid-climb.

Mu Sicheng shivered and instinctively pulled his jacket tighter around himself, shifting closer to Bai Liu.
"...Do you think these were the Taishan Observatory crew?"

Bai Liu's gaze remained on the display.
"Not necessarily."

"What do you mean?" Mu Sicheng asked uneasily.

Bai Liu gestured toward the screen. "The numbers don't add up."

He nodded at the distorted silhouettes. "There are over a hundred bodies here—far more than the entire crew of Tarzan Station."

For a moment, he studied Mu Sicheng's expression before continuing,
"And there are still people inside Tarzan Station. That leaves us with two possibilities—"

"The first possibility," Bai Liu said calmly, "is that, much like at Edmond Observatory, a scientist with a gun and extreme paranoia decided that the others had become mentally unstable and dangerous. They might have executed the rest of the crew—along with anyone who later came to Tarzan Station seeking help—and disposed of the bodies here."

Mu Sicheng swallowed hard. "And the second possibility?"

Bai Liu's eyes flicked back to the dashboard.

"The other possibility is that everyone in Tarzan Station is already dead." His voice was steady, almost indifferent. "That some thing—some kind of monster—conducted gruesome experiments on them, then discarded their remains here. And that those monsters are still inside Tarzan Station, running it in their place."

Mu Sicheng inhaled sharply. "But if there are over a hundred bodies here, didn't you say that's more than the entire crew? What about the extras? Who were they?"

Bai Liu's answer was immediate.
"The monsters themselves, of course."

Mu Sicheng froze. His mind took a full two seconds to register the implication before a deep, creeping horror settled in.
"…Wait, you mean—"

"Yes," Bai Liu interrupted smoothly, "these monsters can turn into people."

Mu Sicheng felt his skin prickle as he stared at Bai Liu.

Bai Liu, on the other hand, simply observed the readout with detached curiosity.
"It seems the creatures we're facing this time are not only highly adaptive, capable of learning and differentiating between their environment, but also cunning enough to mimic humans—to deceive and trap their prey."

A slow smile curved his lips.

"And they even have a tendency toward superiority and self-destruction…"

His voice carried a note of amusement.

"How fascinating. It almost sounds like an evolved version of humanity."

The Ice Age

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Mu Sicheng was nearly dumbfounded—he couldn't handle this kind of biohazard horror at all!

Tang Erda, however, remained calm. "Do we go straight in now, or should we call Muke and the others first?"

"The phone stopped working as soon as we landed." Bai Liu turned on the satellite phone and showed Tang Erda the screen—it displayed a weak signal and couldn't make calls.

Tang Erda frowned.

The entire way here, no matter how bad the weather got, the satellite phone had always maintained a stable connection. Why was it suddenly malfunctioning now that they had reached Taishan Station?

"This must be an important spot in the game," Bai Liu remarked, tilting his chin toward the aircraft. "Grab your weapons—we're going straight in."

Tang Erda took off and glided forward, sending a signal to Taishan Station to indicate their approach. Shortly after, the station responded with its own signal—flashing lights confirming their landing request.

"Something at Taishan Station knows how to communicate with us using this kind of technology..." Mu Sicheng muttered, suspicion creeping into his voice. He elbowed Bai Liu. "That means it's probably a person, right?"

"Or maybe the monsters have learned enough to use this method to lure us in," Bai Liu said casually.

Mu Sicheng shivered, rubbing his arms as goosebumps rose on his skin. He wisely chose to shut up—there was no point trying to get reassurance out of Bai Liu. That guy loved scaring him.

As the aircraft hovered above the station, Tang Erda glanced down. A figure stood below, waving a red flag—a signal that the landing area was clear. He turned to Bai Liu for approval, and when Bai Liu gave a slight nod, Tang Erda began steering the aircraft down.

The helicopter touched down, its sled-style landing gear settling into the grooves of the snow.

Through the transparent side door, Bai Liu and the others caught a glimpse of the man waving the red flag. He was dressed in an orange penguin ski suit, stabilizing himself in the fierce wind with ski poles planted firmly in the ground. Most of his face was hidden beneath a thick woolen hat, but even from a distance, his excitement was evident as he gestured toward them.

His enthusiasm sent a shiver down Mu Sicheng's spine. He shrank behind Bai Liu's shoulder. "Shit… is he a monster or a human…?"

"We'll find out once we get down there," Bai Liu said. Without hesitation, he pushed open the helicopter door and hopped down.

The man stepped forward instinctively, as if to catch Bai Liu, but Tang Erda—who had jumped down from the other side—quickly waved him off. "I got it. Thanks."

The man pushed his hat up, revealing a face reddened from the cold. His breath came out in visible puffs as he spoke, his Mandarin fluent and tinged with relief.

"I'm from the Taishan Observatory—I've been stranded here! You're from the outside, aren't you? Oh my god!" His voice shook with emotion, his body bouncing slightly as he spoke. "This is the first time in a year I've seen anyone from home besides the people at the observatory! You definitely haven't been parasitized! You must be human!"

"Get inside!" he urged, glancing around warily. He clutched a gun, sweeping it over their surroundings as if expecting something to emerge from the snow at any moment.

Bai Liu and Tang Erda exchanged a glance but remained silent. They followed the nervous man toward the station.

As they neared the entrance, several other personnel stood at attention, dressed in the same penguin ski suits. Rifles rested at their feet, their posture rigid, as if they were standing guard.

The 'sentries' eyed Bai Liu's group coldly. When they got a good look at their faces—clearly domestic-looking—their tension eased slightly.

But just as quickly, their wariness returned, and they reached for their weapons again.

The man leading them hurriedly introduced himself. "I'm Fang Xiaoxiao, a meteorology graduate student. I went out to guide the helicopter in. They're from outside Antarctica—can I take them inside?"

The sentries remained unmoved. One of them spoke coldly. "Everyone—including you—must undergo a cellular activity test before re-entering the station."

Fang Xiaoxiao turned back to Bai Liu with an apologetic smile. "You probably don’t know yet, since you just arrived in Antarctica. Every time someone leaves, we have to check their cellular activity before letting them back in. It’s for everyone’s safety."

A sentry pulled on gloves and carefully scraped a small sample of mucous membrane from Fang Xiaoxiao’s mouth with a cotton swab, placing it in a test tube.

Then, three new swabs were taken out, and a sentry gestured for Bai Liu’s group to open their mouths.

Mu Sicheng tensed, his fingers twitching toward his gun. But Bai Liu subtly pressed down on his arm, stopping him. Without protest, Bai Liu removed his hat, stepped forward, and opened his mouth slightly. The sentry scraped a sample from the inside of his cheek.

Mu Sicheng and Tang Erda followed suit, though Mu Sicheng’s grip remained tight on his weapon.

Fang Xiaoxiao reassured them, "The test doesn’t take long. If everything checks out, you’ll be allowed inside within ten minutes. Just hold on a little longer."

Bai Liu, ever calm, asked, "What exactly happened here that made everyone so wary?"

Fang Xiaoxiao sighed, his breath misting in the cold air. "It started about a year and a half ago… around August. It was during the summer shift at the poles…"

"Summer shift?" Bai Liu asks.

Fang Xiaoxiao explains, "The crew at the polar observatory rotates annually because of Antarctica's extreme conditions. The four-month-long polar night, from April to October, can severely impact mental health, leading to T3 syndrome, which causes paranoia, hallucinations, and violent outbursts. To prevent this, the crew stationed here over the winter departs in the summer when an icebreaker brings in a new team to take over."

He gives a bitter smile. "But we've been here for three winters now."

Bai Liu raises an eyebrow.

"We were supposed to be rotated out the summer before last," Fang Xiaoxiao continues, "but no one ever came. No replacements. No supply drop. We were running out of food..."

His voice falters, the weight of an unspeakable truth tightening his throat.

Bai Liu takes the moment to speak, his tone neutral. "You managed to survive on a year's worth of supplies for this long. That’s impressive."

Fang Xiaoxiao closes his eyes, and a single tear leaks from the corner. The two sentries beside him grow solemn, one clapping him lightly on the shoulder.

"Survival," one mutters.

Just then, the cell test results return—normal.

Fang Xiaoxiao exhales in relief, his energy lifting slightly. "Come on, I'll show you to your accommodations. You must be exhausted from your journey. Get some rest first."

As he leads them deeper into the station, Bai Liu notes something—Fang Xiaoxiao assumes they’re the long-awaited relief crew. Instead of correcting him, Bai Liu plays along.

"You’re stranded here. Why didn’t you try contacting the outside world?" he asks.

Fang Xiaoxiao's bitter smile returns. "We tried. For a year and a half, we tried everything—radio, satellite phones, internet. But the signals never got through. The outside receiving stations stopped responding completely. We've been waiting... and waiting… and nothing."

His voice turns distant. "We even attempted to fly out ourselves, sending biplanes and helicopters. But as soon as they left Antarctica's range, the radar jammed. The magnetic field interference made navigation impossible. Every aircraft crashed on the glaciers."

Fang Xiaoxiao's hands clench. His gaze is unfocused. "If you hadn't arrived, I don't think we'd ever reintegrate into society. Another polar night and we'd all go insane..."

Mu Sicheng, watching Fang Xiaoxiao's haunted expression, leans in to whisper in Bai Liu's ear. "This NPC's got it rough… He doesn't even know the whole world's frozen over. He thinks the receiving station just stopped working, but… let's be real, those people are probably long dead."

Bai Liu says nothing, merely observing. He has no intention of telling this fragile NPC that the "outside world" he's waiting for has long since turned into an endless, frozen wasteland.

His eyes flick to Fang Xiaoxiao's open jacket pocket—two small vials of medication. Bai Liu recognizes them immediately. Antipsychotics. The same drugs Muke mentioned. Medications for severe mania and depression.

"How did you stretch one year's worth of supplies into two and a half?" Bai Liu asks, his voice light, but laced with curiosity.

Fang Xiaoxiao hesitates, rubbing his temple. "Solar reserves are just enough if we conserve energy. Fuel was the real issue..."

He exhales shakily. "I know the Antarctic Convention forbids harming wildlife, but… the krill population exploded last year. The Ross Sea turned orange in October from their sheer numbers."

"The penguins, seals, whales—everything that feeds on krill—reproduced at unnatural rates. Their populations doubled within a year. And… they're all rich in oil."

Fang Xiaoxiao swallows hard. His face twists in something between guilt and justification. "You know, the early Antarctic explorers… when they ran out of food, they hunted penguins and seals to survive..."

Mu Sicheng, unimpressed, claps him on the shoulder. "You had to survive. Eating animals when there's no food is normal."

But the moment the word food leaves his mouth, Fang Xiaoxiao visibly flinches. His expression turns pallid, his body going rigid.

Bai Liu, watching closely, speaks flatly. "You didn't eat them, did you?"

Fang Xiaoxiao's breath catches.

Bai Liu continues, tone even. "In early Antarctic expeditions, seals and penguins weren't primarily food sources. Their bodies were burned as fuel." His eyes bore into Fang Xiaoxiao. "You weren't hunting for sustenance. You were harvesting oil to keep the observatory running, weren't you?"

A strangled noise escapes Fang Xiaoxiao's throat. He bites his lower lip. "The oil… can't be used directly, but with modifications, it can be burned for electricity..."

His voice cracks. "We didn't have a choice."

"Yet, food and fuel don't seem to be in short supply anymore." Bai Liu remarks.

Fang Xiaoxiao's eyes flicker with desperation. He steps forward suddenly, gripping Bai Liu's wrist tightly. "We're running out of psychiatric meds. Everyone here has T3 syndrome. They're losing their grip on reality. They can't control themselves. If we don't get more medicine—"

His grip trembles.

Bai Liu stays perfectly still. His voice remains cold. "So if you didn't eat the seals and penguins… where does your food come from?"

Fang Xiaoxiao freezes. The color drains from his face. His hands snap back as if burned. His breath turns shallow.

Bai Liu watches him carefully. "Let me guess—your food is stored outside. Frozen in the ice crevasses."

Fang Xiaoxiao's pupils shrink.

"After experimenting on the bio-monsters that evolved from humans, you discarded the failed ones. But with no food left, you decided to make use of them. You repurposed your waste. Kept them preserved in the natural freezer outside."

A pause. Then, softly—

"Your food is human, isn’t it?"

Fang Xiaoxiao's entire body convulses. He stumbles back, eyes wild, and lets out a raw, broken scream.

"THEY'RE NOT HUMAN!" he shrieks, voice cracking with hysteria. "They're monsters! They're animals! THEY'RE NOT PEOPLE!!!"

Chapter End Notes

> Polar T3 syndrome is a condition found in polar explorers, caused by a decrease in levels of the thyroid hormone T3. Its effects include forgetfulness, cognitive impairment, and mood disturbances. It can exhibit itself in a fugue state known as the Antarctic stare.
> Dissociative fugue, referred to as a fugue state or psychogenic fugue, is a rare psychiatric condition characterized by reversible amnesia regarding one’s identity, often accompanied by unexpected travel or wandering. In some cases, individuals may assume a new identity and be unable to recall personal information from before the onset of symptoms.

The Ice Age

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

After screaming, Fang Xiaoxiao seemed to realize he had lost control. He took two unsteady steps back, slumped against the wall, and shoved a handful of pills into his mouth, swallowing them mechanically.

A few moments later, his breathing steadied, but his body remained tense. Hot tears slipped down his numb, cold face as he muttered, "They're not human. They're really not. I didn't eat them..."

His shoulders trembled as he buried his face in his knees, muffling his choked sobs.

"Sorry... sorry..."

Bai Liu crouched down and held out a soft cloth napkin.

Fang Xiaoxiao took it without a word and wiped his face.

Bai Liu's voice softened. "What kind of monsters are they?"

Fang Xiaoxiao gripped the wall and pulled himself to his feet, his voice hoarse. "...Highly intelligent monsters."

"When they first appeared, we were terrified. They looked exactly like the dead members of the observatory crew. We thought they were ghosts. But later, we discovered they were biochemicals—anomalies from the Edmond Observatory."

"They observe their surroundings and mimic the most adaptable species. At first, they just watched us, learning how we survived. Then, they must have realized how much we mourned our lost team members... so they took on their appearances, thinking it would help them blend in."

His breath hitched. "But that only terrified the sentries. They shot them on sight, dragged the bodies back to base, and started researching them."

"During the study... they molted a second time. And this time, they became even more human-like."

"They were incredible learners. By listening to us and watching our habits, they perfected their imitation. After that second molt, they spoke like us, moved like us... aside from a few missing memories, it was as if the dead had come back to life." His voice trembled. "It was horrifying. So we killed them again. This time with knives."

Fang Xiaoxiao's eyelashes fluttered. Teardrops fell onto the scarf clenched in his hands.

"No matter how we killed them... their cells were too active. As long as one survived, it would differentiate on its own—forming embryonic stem cells, then growing into another human."

His voice dropped to a whisper. "...The only way to stop them was to burn their bodies first, to char the epidermis and halt cell regeneration. Then we had to soak them in strong acid or alkaline chemicals to destroy them completely. But the observatory didn't have enough fuel. Or chemicals. Or options."

"At first, we had no way to deal with them properly. Even knowing how dangerous they were, we could only cut them open and freeze them in the ice chasms to keep them from regenerating. But soon... very soon..."

Fang Xiaoxiao's voice caught. His throat moved, but no sound came out—only silent tears.

Bai Liu finished for him, his tone unnervingly calm.

"But soon, you realized that fire and acid—used to neutralize them—are the same processes humans use to cook and digest food."

He tilted his head slightly.

"And it just so happened that you were starving."

His words lingered in the air, quiet but merciless.

"Consuming them would both dispose of the bodies and keep you alive. Why not kill two birds with one stone?"

Fang Xiaoxiao's hollow eyes flickered. His chest rose and fell sharply. Then, as if the weight of those words had physically struck him, he staggered back, turned away, and clamped a trembling hand over his mouth.

"I—I'm not feeling well," he choked out. "You should rest first."

Without waiting for a response, he fled.

Bai Liu watched him go, then turned and stepped into the cabin. Mu Sicheng and Tang Erda followed in silence.

Tang Erda locked the door and pressed his ear against it, listening for a long moment before turning to Bai Liu. "The soundproofing is good. You can't hear footsteps even at close range. Say whatever you need to."

Mu Sicheng, still reeling from what he had just heard from Fang Xiaoxiao and Bai Liu, sat stiffly on the edge of the bed. A chill crept down his spine as he turned to Bai Liu.

"What the hell is going on? Are you saying the people at the observatory ate the monsters?"

"Not necessarily," Bai Liu said, lounging lazily against the bed, resting his chin on his hand. "The most likely scenario is what I said earlier—either there are real humans here, or all of them are anthropomorphic monsters trying to deceive us."

Mu Sicheng frowned. "That doesn’t make sense. If they’re monsters, why go through all this trouble to deceive us? What’s the point? If they wanted to kill us, they could just attack. You heard what Fang Xiaoxiao said—these things are practically immortal. They could fight us head-on!"

"Why would they voluntarily tell us their own weaknesses?"

Tang Erda nodded. "I just updated my monster book with the weak points, and what Fang Xiaoxiao said checks out. Blazing fire combined with chemical corrosion is their confirmed weakness."

Bai Liu smiled and suddenly changed the topic. "Have you heard of the Turing Test?"

Both Mu Sicheng and Tang Erda nodded.

Mu Sicheng hesitated. "What does that have to do with this? Isn’t the Turing Test used to determine if an AI has human intelligence?"

"There are parallels," Bai Liu said smoothly. "AI and the monsters here are both artificial beings. If we compare these creatures to AI, how do you think they would test whether they truly possess human intelligence?" He turned his gaze to Mu Sicheng. "Remember the famous hypothesis from the Turing Test?"

Mu Sicheng's breath hitched as realization dawned on him.

"—If an AI truly has human intelligence, wouldn't it try to deceive humans in order to pass the test?"

Bai Liu's voice remained calm. "Now, assume that the people here are actually monsters—monsters that have worked relentlessly to imitate humans. If they've developed intelligence on par with the scientific crew, wouldn't it be entirely possible that they would conduct their own Turing Test? To see if their performance is convincing enough, if they can truly integrate among us?"

His gaze darkened. "And we, a group of outsiders, are the perfect test subjects to determine whether their deception is successful. Everything [Fang Xiaoxiao] just told us could simply be a simulation —something they crafted based on their knowledge of human behavior, designed to make us believe they are human."

A heavy silence filled the room. Tang Erda said nothing. Mu Sicheng curled his fingers into his palm, a cold sweat creeping down his back.

"Of course," Bai Liu continued, his tone light, "this is just my theory. It's entirely possible that the people here are human and I'm just being paranoid."

Tang Erda's expression remained unreadable as he asked, "Then how do you plan to verify your theory?"

Bai Liu spread his hands and smiled.

"Simple. Tonight, when they're all asleep, we go to the ice chasm and see if the [bodies] inside can still come back to life."

Midnight.
In February, the Antarctic sun lingers long into the night. By the time darkness finally falls, it's already early morning. Inside the observatory, most of the personnel are asleep, leaving only two sentries posted at the entrance. But avoiding them is simple enough—no one expects anyone to willingly go outside in Antarctica.

The observatory maintains strict entry and exit protocols, but movement within the station itself is more lenient. After all, in a place like this, who in their right mind would risk stepping into the frozen wasteland voluntarily?

Bai Liu and his group slipped out through the back door of the first-floor kitchen, where the station's garbage was disposed of. From there, they circled around to the helicopter landing site, gathering the drilling equipment stored inside.

Thanks to the relentless Antarctic winds, which reduced visibility to no more than thirty meters, they moved unseen. Snow and darkness swallowed them whole, their figures blurred in the storm as they pulled the heavy equipment behind them.

Under Tang Erda's leadership, they hauled several hundred kilograms of gear on sleds to a location they had previously scouted—more than ten kilometers away from the station.

By the time they arrived, Mu Sicheng was drenched in sweat, panting hard. Bai Liu, as usual, seemed unaffected, mostly because Tang Erda had carried the brunt of the load himself.

Sweat glistened on Tang Erda's skin, running from his face to his collarbone. His taut, muscular frame flexed under the strain, but his breathing remained controlled, only slightly heavier.

Mu Sicheng, on the other hand, was gasping like a donkey. His eyes were glazed over as he stared at Tang Erda in disbelief.

Shit! What the hell is Tang Erda? A sled dog? How is he pulling this much weight like it's nothing?!

Oblivious to Mu Sicheng's envious glare, Tang Erda set down the sled and immediately got to work. Following Bai Liu's instructions, he positioned the drill over the area where they had previously detected a figure beneath the ice.

Layer by layer, heat and pressure melted through the frozen surface. As they neared their target depth, Bai Liu raised a hand, signaling Tang Erda to stop. Tang Erda shut off the drill and carefully extracted the ice core.

Inside the two-meter-long, one-meter-thick prism of ice was a small, narrow figure. Limbless.

It was exactly why Bai Liu had chosen this site.

The human trapped in the ice had a frozen expression of terror, as if they had died mid-scream. Their limbs had been severed with clinical precision—no signs of decay, no jagged edges—just clean, surgical cuts, as if made by an impossibly sharp blade.

Bai Liu methodically poured fuel and hot water over the ice core, watching as the solid mass began to thaw.

Tang Erda, observing the rate of melting, frowned. "This isn't natural ice. It’s filled snow," he concluded. "Real ice wouldn’t melt this fast or this cleanly."

Before long, the ice had fully dissolved, leaving the corpse lying motionless on the frozen ground.

Mu Sicheng, already chilled to his core, instinctively took a step back.

Then, before their eyes, the body began to change.

From the cleanly severed stumps, flesh started sprouting—weak, trembling at first, then writhing like worms. The grotesque growth twisted and coiled, regenerating lost limbs in mere moments.

Slowly, the figure rose to its knees.

It was no longer a question.

This thing they had unearthed—it was a monster.

Tang Erda reacted instantly. Before anyone could blink, he had kicked the creature back and pressed the muzzle of his gun against its throat. His expression was cold, merciless, ready to fire.

Bai Liu stopped him just in time, stepping between them. "Wait."

Tang Erda’s jaw tightened, but after a moment, he lowered his weapon slightly.

The creature trembled. Then, in a broken, hoarse voice, it spoke.

"I... I am the real Fang Xiaoxiao."

Tears spilled from his eyes the moment he uttered the words. He collapsed into a kowtow before Bai Liu, his voice cracking.

"The real personnel of the Tarzan Observatory—they're all buried down there. Please save them!"

Bai Liu helped him up, his voice calm, almost soothing. "We will. But first, tell us what happened."

Fang Xiaoxiao shivered violently as Bai Liu guided him to sit on the sled.

"You've seen the monsters in the observatory, haven't you?" His voice was hollow.

Mu Sicheng, frowning, boiled a cup of hot water and handed it to him. Fang Xiaoxiao hesitated before shaking his head with a bitter smile.

"Thank you, but… I don't need warmth anymore." His fingers twitched as he stared at the steaming cup. "I still have a human conditioned response to cold, so I shiver… but my body doesn't actually need heat."

Bai Liu placed the cup firmly in Fang Xiaoxiao's lap.

"If you still have a human reflex to the cold," Bai Liu said softly, "then you're still a person who needs warmth. That means you do need this. So take it."

For reasons even he couldn't understand, Fang Xiaoxiao's shoulders trembled. A moment later, silent tears streamed down his face.

Tears welled in Fang Xiaoxiao's eyes as he looked at Bai Liu. Finally, he took the cup of hot water, his voice choking with emotion. "Thank you, comrade… for reminding me that I'm still human."

He took a few sips, steadying himself before speaking.

"A year and a half ago, in August, we received instructions to store a highly dangerous biochemical corpse here in Antarctica. At first, the head of Taishan Station refused—according to the Antarctic Treaty, no contaminated research material should be brought here."

"But after extensive discussions, the station chief finally agreed. We never knew what was said in those negotiations, but when he returned, he was deeply troubled. He told us… that the last untainted land on Earth would no longer remain clean."

"To protect the outside world, to preserve a civilization driven by endless desire, even this final pure land was to be defiled."

Fang Xiaoxiao exhaled deeply. Bai Liu noticed something unsettling—there was no condensation in his breath.

"We were supposed to retrieve a plane carrying the remains, but something went wrong. While flying over the Ross Sea, it crashed—not near our observatory, but by Archibald Station, on the southern coast of Ross Island. That's where Country A's research base is."

"We launched an immediate search, but three of the cargo containers were missing. All five escorts on the plane were dead. We repeatedly tried to contact Archibald Station, pleading for the return of the crates. That night, we even approached their station chief directly."

"But soon after, they stopped answering our calls. They shut their doors, refused our visits. Then, in the dead of night, we spotted a helicopter flying from Archibald Station to Edmond Station, transporting something in secrecy. We strongly suspected it was the missing cargo."

Fang Xiaoxiao's fingers clenched around his cup, his teeth chattering slightly.

"Edmond Station is another research base of theirs, located near the South Pole. It's heavily guarded, nearly inaccessible, and equipped with military-grade security. They ignored all our calls, forcing us to communicate through fax instead."

"The head of Edmond Station is Professor Edmond Allen. He's been in Antarctica for over 30 years—an honorable man, always willing to share his research with us. The observatory was even named after him." Fang Xiaoxiao's voice faltered, his expression twisting in pain.

"Eventually, after much persuasion, Professor Edmond relented. He wanted to smuggle the crates back to us, take all the blame himself."

Tears slipped down Fang Xiaoxiao's face. "But the politicians and military of Country A wouldn't allow it. When they discovered his intentions, they persecuted him—subjected him to psychological torment, medical experiments, and mind-altering drugs. They drove him insane…"

His voice broke. The formal "Professor" became the more intimate "Teacher."

“They mutilated a great man! They used the corpses to conduct biological experiments on him!”

“They forced him onto this twisted path…”

“With those remains, Teacher began breeding new lifeforms—hybrids of human tissue and low-temperature-adapted Antarctic creatures. Predators, engineered for survival in these extreme conditions. And all those who tormented him… were devoured.”

Fang Xiaoxiao trembled violently, covering his head with his hands, his voice slipping into a haunted whisper.

“But then… it spiraled out of control.”

“These creatures… they became intelligent. Teacher raised them, so they absorbed his curiosity, his drive for scientific discovery. They began imitating human behavior.”

“They started experimenting—on us.”

Fang Xiaoxiao let out a bitter, almost hysterical laugh. “They dissected us. Dismembered us. Preserved us like biological specimens, sorted us by gender, geography, and function. But the station wasn’t stocked with enough food to last the winter, and soon, we were all starving.”

“They didn’t want us to die of simple malnutrition, so they forced us to eat. Seals, penguins… and their own flesh.”

“Their flesh fused with ours. It was like grafting new branches onto a tree—foreign parts embedding themselves into our bodies in grotesque ways. Eventually, we transformed. We became just like them. Impervious to the cold. Stronger. Less… human.”

A tear slid down Fang Xiaoxiao’s face, his expression dazed.

“But once they had fully unraveled the secrets of our flesh, we were no longer useful. The failures, the rejected experiments, were sealed beneath the ice. And then… they moved on to the next phase.”

“They wanted to study human cognition. Communication. Psychological manipulation.”

“They needed fresh subjects. But no new humans had come to Antarctica for a long time.”

“So… they simulated human survival scenarios. They recreated conflicts. They staged betrayals. And then, they would 'kill' each other, freezing the bodies of the fallen."

Fang Xiaoxiao's lips curled into a chilling, lifeless smile. "Of course… those 'bodies' weren't actually dead. They were just playing their parts, pretending to be victims of some desperate struggle. Frozen beside us, waiting."

Silence fell.

Bai Liu patted Fang Xiaoxiao's shoulder. "Rest. We'll get everyone out of Taishan Station." He turned back to his equipment, resuming the drilling.

Tang Erda remained behind with Fang Xiaoxiao.

Mu Sicheng, still rattled, edged closer to Bai Liu. "Shit… you were right. The monsters at the observatory are really running a Turing test! The real station members are trapped under the ice!"

Bai Liu adjusted the instrument, his expression unreadable. "How do you know that these 'people' in the ice aren't just another stage of the test? A scenario these creatures constructed to manipulate us?"

Mu Sicheng's breath hitched. "Wait… you're saying this Fang Xiaoxiao could be one of them? That he's testing us?!"

Bai Liu's gaze darkened. "Not necessarily. He could be human."

"But who said a Turing test only has one variable? Social experiments like these are usually conducted across an entire system."

His eyes swept over the frozen wasteland. "For all we know, this entire Antarctic region is part of their experiment."

Mu Sicheng's blood ran cold. "You mean… we're the test subjects?"

Bai Liu smirked. "Think of it like this: if you wanted to study an alien monkey's intelligence, you wouldn't just observe it in isolation. You'd place it in a controlled environment—one filled with both real and artificial monkeys. Then, you'd analyze how it interacts. Who does it trust? Who does it follow?"

His eyes flicked to Fang Xiaoxiao. "For example… what happens if you cut off the alien monkey's limbs? Does it seek help?"

Mu Sicheng's skin crawled. Without thinking, he removed his monkey-shaped headphones.

Bai Liu shrugged. “That’s how humans study other species.”

Chapter End Notes

The psychological warfare is making my head hurt.

The Ice Age

Over by the sled, Tang Erda was speaking with Fang Xiaoxiao.

As the former head of the Heresy Bureau, Tang Erda had a natural wariness of suspicious NPCs like Fang Xiaoxiao—or monsters, for that matter. His tone was sharp, interrogative.

"How did you know we went to the observatory and saw another Fang Xiaoxiao?" Tang Erda asked coldly. "You seem awfully good at being dug up."

Fang Xiaoxiao didn't appear surprised by the interrogation. Instead, he let out a bitter smile. "Because this isn't the first time I've been unearthed. These monsters don’t just test alien humans—they also test how we react to others of our own kind."

"In the early days, when we were first thrown into the ice chasm, the snow hadn't yet buried us."

"They were running an experiment on human survival in extreme conditions with limited resources. They told us that within three days, they would begin gradually filling the chasm with snow. Anyone who managed to fight for resources and escape in that time would be released. Those who couldn’t… would be frozen here forever."

As he spoke, Fang Xiaoxiao closed his eyes, his breath shuddering. Tears slid down his face.

"In an attempt to mislead the monsters, to make them believe that humans naturally turned on one another and were doomed to extinction, we staged a brutal battle for resources, pretending to kill each other."

His hands trembled as he raised his cup and took a sip of hot water. Tang Erda noticed the dried blood stains between his teeth—jagged remnants of something far more sinister than mere survival.

"We... gathered what little we had and gave it to the youngest members of our team, letting them escape. Three days later, the snow buried the rest of us alive."

His face twisted suddenly, his voice breaking into a hoarse, wounded roar.

"We thought that was the end! That the experiment was over!" He sucked in a sharp breath, shaking. "But we didn't expect them to have marked the ones who escaped. They had been monitoring them all along. And when those kids couldn't control their emotions and turned back to save us, the monsters found a new research angle."

"They manipulated them... led them to dig up another ice chasm."

Fang Xiaoxiao shuddered violently.

"They set up a controlled experiment. Two monsters took on the appearances of the young crew members who had escaped and began digging us out. Meanwhile, the real young crew members were tricked into digging out another ice chasm—one filled with creatures that had taken on our forms."

"Their goal was simple: to determine whether human survivors were more likely to believe the 'defeated' people they saved were real humans, or whether the 'defeated' were more likely to trust the 'victors' who rescued them."

Tang Erda hesitated. Seeing Fang Xiaoxiao's vacant expression, he softened his voice.

"...And what was the result?"

Fang Xiaoxiao didn't answer right away. When he finally spoke, his tone was eerily detached, his lips curled into an ugly, rigid smile. Tears streamed silently from his empty eyes.

"We, the ones who were rescued, identified the [victors] who saved us. But the children... they didn't recognize the [losers] they had dug out."

"They lived with the monsters they saved for two months. Two of them even… had intimate relationships with them." His breath hitched, voice cracking. "Then, one day, the monsters revealed the truth."

"The kids went mad. They doused themselves in fuel, set themselves on fire… and then threw themselves into acid to end it."

His body trembled. "And I know—one of the monsters that deceived them… took on my face."

For a long moment, Tang Erda said nothing. Then, his voice was quiet, measured.

"How can you be sure that we—the ones who dug you up—aren't monsters?"

Fang Xiaoxiao's gaze flickered, dull and empty. After a long silence, he murmured, "Because these creatures can only mimic humans they've already seen. They can't generate completely new ones. I've never seen you before in Antarctica."

"And... they've already tested this scenario. They won't repeat it. If they were the ones digging us out, they wouldn't bother taking human form anymore. They'd just come as they are."

Not far away, Bai Liu, who had been working on excavation, waved his hand, signaling for Tang Erda to come over.

Tang Erda lingered for a moment, staring at the motionless figure sitting on the sled. Even though he knew this graduate student was just an NPC, something in him hesitated.

Finally, with a reluctant sigh, he reached out and patted Fang Xiaoxiao's shoulder.

"Rest here. And don't wander off."

With that, he turned and jogged over to Bai Liu, ready to report everything he had just heard.

Mu Sicheng couldn't stop the goosebumps from rising on his skin and rubbed his arms vigorously.

Bai Liu paused for a moment, then smiled in a way that sent chills down Mu Sicheng's spine. "Looks like this is a bit more complicated and interesting than we thought. I think I know what Mr. Edmond is up to, but I'll need to check with Muke to see if he's found anything, like the old professor's diary, to back up my suspicions."

Mu Sicheng looked confused. "So... are we still digging?"

"Dig," Bai Liu ordered flatly, a faint smile on his lips. "Dig it all up and bring it back to Tarzan Station. We'll face it together and see who the real monster is."

Mu Sicheng: "!!!"

Edmond Observatory

Muke and Liu Jiayi went through almost every book and piece of material in the Observatory, carefully sorting them by name. Liu Jiayi handled the lighter reading, while Muke focused on the specialized texts, which he would then pass on to Liu Jiayi for consolidation and translation.

Fortunately, the graduate students lived at the Edmond Observatory, and there were numerous primers in the dormitories. This made it slightly easier for Muke to navigate the experiment data and use the available toolkit for research.

"Mostly, it's books on meteorology and biology, along with quite a few on sociology," Muke said, rummaging through the bookshelves he had dragged out of Edmond's cabin. He skimmed through the books quickly, mainly looking for annotations.

He suddenly paused, brows furrowing as he thought for a moment, then spoke again. "It seems Professor Edmond is quite critical of the politics and authorities in Country A. He wrote some rather damning remarks in their book on recent history, praising the emancipation of human rights."

Liu Jiayi leaned over to read aloud: "—The parallel exploitation of labor is the primary human right of capital. (Note 1)."

Muke flipped through the pages again. "Here it is, right next to an account of the Bachata War, which Country A waged based on another side's private development of biological and chemical weapons."

Liu Jiayi read slowly, word by word: "—Order without freedom, and freedom without order, are equally destructive. (Note 2)."

Muke continued searching throughout the Observatory and eventually found a criminal records file in the archives. Inside was a private fax correspondence between Edmond and the Tarzan Observatory, sealed with a yellow "forbidden" stamp reading: [Copy of Edmond's Evidence of Treason].

Muke and Liu Jiayi exchanged glances and, without hesitation, tore open the envelope.

The fax records were dated and straightforward.

1 October
"You were right, my friend. I've tested these corpses, and it's true—they cannot be used in any scientific research. They are ethically wrong, spiritually contaminated, and go against my fundamental ethical code as a human scientist.

I understand why it was sealed here. It really shouldn't be out there, and I'll try to convince the 'robbers' who took your boxes to return them to you intact (well, maybe not intact).
You've done something dangerous and great. In a hundred years, humanity should honor you with a Jie Fang tablet! (Wasn't your warrior's honor roll called the Jie Fang monument last time we spoke?)
Congratulations on your founding!"

7 October
"I'm sorry, but I may not be able to return your boxes for a while.
It's a bit strange to say this, but this is the first time I've been forced to implement my own research on myself.
Now, it feels like I've lost all sense of taste or warmth. I find myself stumbling and falling over for no reason—my cerebellum has been modified. (Though, before the modification, I was always clumsy as an old man.) Other than that, it's fine. It feels like I'm turning into a small warm whale. Maybe I should go to the sea and have a 'face-to-face kiss' with a real one?
After all, I'm no longer afraid of the cold, and I'm no longer human. Being a whale in the deep sea might not be such a bad option.
I rather enjoy how they rub against the rocks while molting. It's just like when I, as an old man, can't reach my back and rub against the wardrobe.
Don't worry about the box. They still need me for research, and I'll find a way to return it to you."

17 October
"Oh my God, am I scaring you guys?
The boy named Xiaoxiao Fang, who I remembered from his meteorology studies (I even supervised his thesis), was crying his eyes out as he hugged my broken leg.
I have to say, it was a really bad paper—the images didn't even have units in many places, and the formatting for citations was a mess. I don't know how this kid got into grad school and ended up in Antarctica (no offense to his supervisor).
They dragged me through the snow with a snowmobile, chained to my neck, as punishment for another failed attempt to steal the box—or perhaps just as another test of my ability to withstand their experiments. After all, I'm their most successful transformation and a criminal; I'm now their most exciting subject for experimentation. It's a tradition in our country.
Though my limbs ended up rolling off like a rusty pencil, it was painless. The cold and stiffness made it bearable enough to stop the boy from crying.

The look on his face as he howled while chasing my scattered limbs really made me sad. He called me ‘teacher,’ and God, that was the happiest thing I’d heard in a month.
It’s been so long since anyone called me teacher after I was branded a criminal.
Don’t worry about me. I’ll figure out what to do with the box. The fax contact is still discreet, and the paper material makes them think I won’t be so bold. I’ll let you know if there’s any progress."

17 December

"It seems they've discovered that I've been secretly faxing you, so I had to suspend it for the last two months.
Perhaps I was too arrogant and underestimated the intelligence of this group. The fax, indeed, wasn’t safe.
This may be the last time I maintain the will to send you a fax, my friends. So, please allow this old soul to ramble on about my life. I hope you won't grow tired of me, as I truly can't find anyone else to talk to.
I came to Antarctica thirty-three years ago, before the place was called Edmond Observatory. I don’t remember what it was called back then, but it wasn’t as well-known as it is now.
The man who put me on the icebreaker Polaris was a veteran of the Peninsular War (though he wasn’t really old at that time, he looked ancient to me, and I always teased him about it). He was one of the few friends I had.
After all, a nerd like me couldn't really find anyone else willing to talk to me in those adventurous gold rush days.
Fifteen years after I arrived in Antarctica, he left me forever, a victim of the disabilities and hardships caused by the war. Before he died, he returned every penny of the money I sent him each year to live on (he insisted it was a loan).
The doctor told me he had voluntarily given up treatment because, after the war, he was constantly tormented by pain and haunted by memories of bloodshed, which is common for many soldiers.
But I know it wasn’t just that. My friend died because of another war.
The only reason he entered the war was to end it.
He had been taught, deceived, and used by public opinion and politics. He went to war believing it was just, thinking that every knife he stabbed and every shot he fired was to save more innocent people held hostage and suffering because of the war.
But he eventually realized that the people he had killed were as innocent as he was. The pain was unbearable. The only thing that kept him going was the slogan of the time—“Let this be the last war we experience. Let us end this chaotic and unjust world.”

He believed that would be the end, but wars continued, and it seemed like the world he hoped for would never come.
It wasn’t until the war fifteen years ago—a brutal act of aggression initiated by a country he had trusted—that he was utterly destroyed. He knew then that he had been doing something unjust all along.
It was disgusting, filthy—the very thing he had always despised.
He realized that he had become nothing more than a politician’s whitewashed executioner, and he couldn’t live with that. So, he told me he couldn’t go on any longer.
I didn’t know how to respond. I had always been the one to read, never the one to act. The only brave thing I had ever done in my life was to run away from everything and come to Antarctica.
Many people in Antarctica protested against the war in the bitter cold (Note 3). I stood among the crowd, my hands trembling as I held a "No War" sign, staring up at the approaching polar night, the cold snow almost burying me.
All we could do was protest. Of course, it didn’t help in the end.
As I read through his last letter, I came across what he wrote to me: “It must be nice in Antarctica, although it's bitterly cold and never sunny, there must be no war there. It is a pure land. I hope you will not bring your memories of me, an ugly war criminal, to this pure land to pollute it.”
But it wasn’t really like that. Antarctica was as cold as he thought, but not as pure as he imagined.
Everyone who comes to this pristine land has grand ideals of saving humanity and alleviating the global crisis.
We’ve carefully recorded data, tagged whale skins, and marked penguin anklets, only to watch as their populations have dwindled to less than half of what they once were. We've observed a thousand feet of glacier melting into the sea in an hour and spoken at every meeting, raising alarms like a scheduled alarm clock: Harsh climate, global warming, human crisis.
But they always listen carelessly, half-asleep, then go on to raise flags in righteous pride, while continuing to ambitiously plot wars that will pollute on a massive scale.
Inside and outside, it’s never about right or wrong—only about their tenure and personal interests.
I can guarantee that none of them could even name the rise in global temperatures from last year.
You, my friend, are probably tired of reading and think I’m a long-winded old man. But please, allow me to continue, weary as I am.
I was born in a country known for its individual freedom and democracy, where everyone's freedom of action was supposedly respected.

Making sacrifices for the group is what individual heroes do; most people just spend their lives chasing personal self-interest.
But, my friend, I know, as well as you do, that humanity continues as a species, as a group. No species can pursue freedom in isolation, and freedom means nothing when the group doesn't exist.
We are the only "heroes" who can't.
The values we seek are not recognized by society, much like the lone whale that strays from the herd. It sees an impending volcanic eruption, a tsunami, but can only warn the others with a strange frequency that they don't understand and don't care to heed.
They are chasing after fish, a clump of krill, while volcanoes and tsunamis don't matter to them. That's for the heroes to worry about.
It feels like I'm living in Sarto (Note 4), a land of absurdity, where entertainment leads to death, narrow-mindedness thrives, and disintegration is inevitable.
The Observatory's funding faced the possibility of another budget cut last year, simply because our current leaders refuse to believe in global warming and the greenhouse effect."

....

"Many times, I've found myself in a trance, questioning whether what I'm doing is some grand act of saving humanity or just another piece in the political game—just like my friend.
I envy you, my friends. You are not alone in this fight. Your community understands the responsibility you've taken on and has not hesitated to share it with you.
You are not heroes, but vanguards.
Every young man at Tarzan Station who sought my guidance had a bright, shining vision of their country, and I envied them for it. How beautiful that vision was. The snow in Antarctica wasn't even as pure as that. It reminded me of my friend, the one who sent me aboard after watching Titanic. He was smiling and waving, yelling, "Don't hit the iceberg! Watch out for my Ruth on the boat!" His eyes were just as bright.
Species eventually go extinct, and humans, too, will perish. My friend, I am certain that we both know, beyond any doubt, that this is the fate of all living things, just as all humans will eventually die.
But it is up to us to decide when, where, and how we will meet our end.
I would like to envision a future where we die together, frozen in each other's arms in the cold, or where the last two people on Earth drive spears into each other's hearts in a desolate wasteland, fighting over their prey.

Forgive me, my friends, for choosing you in my despair, for doing to you what the arrogant God has done to mankind.
The body holds energy capable of turning the world upside down. It's as though it was created for my desires, and when broken down into particles, it can have an unprecedented impact on the climate and biological systems. Rather than let it fall into the hands of others, I will write the endgame myself.
For the first time, I've used my knowledge in such a sinister way—to turn the globe cold and extinguish the human race.
I might truly be mad.
Still, I've left a margin for my madness by researching creatures capable of adapting to this environment. I selected you, added your genes to theirs, and allowed them to test you to see if you could be the ones to carry on the Starfire.
Feel free to resent me, my friends. I took up my rifle as somberly as if I were raising a glass of vodka, and I drove those paralyzed by my commands into the ice and snow, ordering them not to take any clothing or food with them.
It's ironic, but despite all the inhumane torture I've endured, my request for the freedom to defend myself with a gun was respected. In the eyes of the guards, asking for a gun wasn't a big deal. They didn't think I, a weak scientist, would have the courage to resist, so they granted me the right to defend myself.
This is perhaps the only good thing freedom has granted me, though it has broken the rules of Antarctica.
I held my gun, and the creatures I had taught crouched next to me in the snow, silently waiting with me for these humans to succumb to the cold, as I knew they would.
Now, I return to my room to write this fax to you, to place the final nail in the coffin of this dreadful plan I've been plotting since August 10.
Soon, the creatures will reach your territory…"

(Addendum: I made sauerkraut the way you taught me, but it failed. God, your cooking is harder than a biochemistry experiment! I was hoping to prepare a strategic winter reserve for you, but I wouldn't recommend taking the two vats of sauerkraut for safety reasons.)

Your friend,
Edmond

The Ice Age

After reading all the faxes and lab reports, Muke's expression grew increasingly serious. He turned to Liu Jiayi and asked, "Is it possible they can't be reached by satellite phone?"

"I couldn't get in touch with them," Liu Jiayi replied, her expression grim but calm. "With Mu Sicheng and Tang Erda with him, it won't be easy for Bai Liu to encounter those monsters. You stay here and keep watch, I'll go outside to deal with the monster in the basement."

The lab report indicated that this monster couldn't be killed with a gun, so the one in the basement must still be alive.

Bai Liu had left a barrel of fuel by the basement, and she had her own corrosive poison. She wondered if combining the two would do the trick.

Muke nodded, "Once we deal with it, we head for Tarzan Station. They need to be informed."

As the door opened, three weathered men hurried in from outside. Mu Sicheng exhaled heavily, stamping his feet to shake off the cold. Tang Erda removed his gun and placed it by the door, and Bai Liu walked in front, snowflakes clinging to his eyelashes, his gaze scanning the room.

"We're back," Bai Liu said.

Without hesitation, Muke raised his gun, and Liu Jiayi brandished her poison, eyeing the sudden return of their teammates with suspicion. They stepped back, maintaining some distance as they whispered, "What are you doing back here?"

Bai Liu shifted slightly to make room for a ragged group of Tarzan Station members behind him—freshly dug out from an ice crevice.

The group had been walking through the snow for so long, uncovered and shivering, that they should have frozen to death. Yet, they were only blue in color, their vital signs stable but their faces dull and lifeless, as if they had endured some unspeakable ordeal, their souls seemingly drained.

"We found this group of Tarzan Station crew members buried in the ice crevice," Bai Liu explained. "We were planning to take them straight to Tarzan Station to confront the crew, but we found that their mental states were in question. They couldn't communicate properly. One of them was slightly more mentally sound—this one, Fang Xiaoxiao."

A man stepped forward from behind Bai Liu, offering a strained smile. "Hello, I'm Fang Xiaoxiao."

"He told me these team members needed psychiatric medication, so he took them back first to retrieve it," Bai Liu continued, glancing at Muke. "That's why we're here."

Muke's blackened gun was pointed directly at Bai Liu, his voice cold. "I don't believe you. Pull up your system panel and show me."

"You can't see my system panel," Bai Liu replied calmly. "That was a clever verbal trap, though."

Due to the league format in use, players' system panels were not only missing the shop function, but they were also kept secret from each other. This meant that even if one player displayed their system panel, the other could not see it.

Muke gave Liu Jiayi a suspicious look, but at her subtle gesture, he lowered the gun, though he kept his fingers near the handle, ready to raise it at a moment's notice.

They stepped aside, and Liu Jiayi tucked her poison away, her voice soft. "Come in, first."

The Other End

Bai Liu led the ragged crew, recently dug out of the ice crevasse, toward Tarzan Station.

Less than five hundred meters away, they spotted another helicopter parked in the hangar beside their own. Its markings matched theirs exactly.

"It's another helicopter from the Edmond Observatory," Tang Erda recognized it immediately, his brow furrowing. "How did it get here? Muke, are they coming?"

Bai Liu glanced at the aircraft, narrowed his eyes at something, and then turned to Fang Xiaoxiao behind him. "You guys stay outside and find a place to hide while we handle some team business."

Once the team had obediently moved out of the way, Bai Liu exchanged a look with Mu Sicheng and Tang Erda. Both raised their guns in silent agreement.

Mu Sicheng's grip on his gun faltered slightly as he swallowed nervously. "Holy shit! They're not monsters, are they? Where are they? The monsters didn't take over their homes, did they?"

Tang Erda, walking behind Bai Liu with his gun in hand, kept his eyes on their surroundings. Bai Liu, however, walked as if at the entrance to Tarzan Station, without a gun, his posture calm.

The sentry at the gate let them through after a brief extraction of their oral mucosa. Although they were questioned about their whereabouts the previous night, Bai Liu easily muddled their responses.

Though the sentries were aware of his evasiveness, they didn't press further. There were more pressing and exciting matters for Bai Liu to address.

As they turned down a ventilation shaft, the high-pitched, excited voice of Fang Xiaoxiao from Tarzan Station reached them from the cabin where Bai Liu and the others had briefly stayed the previous night.

"Oh my God! How did you find all this information on Mr. Edmond?"

"With this first-hand information about the climate anomalies and those creatures, we can work on a solution to the dilemma at hand!"

Bai Liu opened the cabin door to find Fang Xiaoxiao sitting cross-legged on a bunk bed, tearfully holding a paper document. He read it aloud in a choked voice.

The document header read [fax record], a term Bai Liu recognized.

Liu Jiayi stood close to the door, smiling politely. Muke was sitting on the top bunk, his eyes flickering with recognition when he saw Bai Liu, but his expression quickly cooled. He jumped down from the bunk, moving swiftly to stand behind Liu Jiayi, gun ready.

The two team members seemed to have suffered from the cold, with frostbite still visible on the tips of their noses and lips, though it had mostly healed, likely due to Liu Jiayi's antidote.

When Fang Xiaoxiao saw Bai Liu and the others enter, her face shifted slightly. He reluctantly put down the fax. "The person you're looking for is back. Let's talk first, and we can discuss the information afterward."

Once Fang Xiaoxiao had left, Tang Erda, Mu Sicheng, Muke, and Liu Jiayi exchanged a brief, intense gaze before drawing their guns toward each other's vital points.

Bai Liu remained seated, calm, in a small blank compartment surrounded by the two teams, all aiming guns at each other.

Both sides tacitly avoided him, allowing him to comment on the scene. "Seems like we suspect each other of being monsters and not real people."

"Why don't we see which one of us can convince the other first?" Bai Liu turned slightly to look at Liu Jiayi. "Why did you bring Muke here?"

Liu Jiayi pursed her lips. "Because Edmond Station was overrun by monsters."

"We rummaged through Edmond Station and found fax records that I'm sure are important game clues. But since the satellite phone can't reach you, and the system panel is blocked between players in the game pool, we decided to bring the fax records to you at Tarzan Station after we burn the monsters in the basement."

Tang Erda frowned at the flaw in Liu Jiayi's story. "But you and Muke don't know how to fly a helicopter. I'm the only one on the team who does."

Liu Jiayi met his gaze. "We don't, but we knew you would."

Bai Liu gave a small, meaningful smile. "Nice plan. You're holding his clone hostage?"

"Exactly." Muke took a deep breath and added, "But when Jiayi was about to go out and burn the monster in the basement with fuel and poison, the door opened. You came back with a team from Tarzan Station, saying you wanted to pick up medicine. We suspected it was your duplicate, so we made a false move on them."

"But the mistake was that both Muke and I were underpowered, while these three imitators of you were half as strong and even managed to imitate your skills."

Liu Jiayi's face darkened. "After killing [Mu Sicheng] with fuel and poison, we tried everything to kill [Bai Liu]. It was so cunning that we had to settle for the next best thing. We used poison to force [Tang Erda] into a helicopter, making him escape and leave the base to them."

Mu Sicheng's hair stood on end as he heard the words. "What about Tang Erda?"

Liu Jiayi shrugged. "After we reached Tarzan Station, I shot him dead in the pilot seat of the helicopter and doused him with fuel-burning poison to prevent him from scamming us. That's the creature's weakness. My monster book lit up."

Tang Erda's eyes narrowed as he noticed the bloodstains on Liu Jiayi's vest from wiping.

At the Edmond Observatory

Once inside the observation post, Tang Erda and Mu Sicheng quickly drew their guns, aiming at Liu Jiayi and Muke, who armed themselves with poison and firearms in response.

Bai Liu walked leisurely to the center of the standoff, observing the four men comparing weapons. "Wow, looks like we've recreated the scene from Tarzan Station. You suspect us of being monsters too?"

His dark eyes locked onto Muke and Liu Jiayi. "I suspect you as well. That little trick you pulled to win my trust by using the game's hidden settings was clever."

"Unfortunately, you've already used it once at Tarzan Station, Muke."

Muke raised an eyebrow. "What are you talking about?"

Mu Sicheng spat out a mouthful of blood, blood still oozing from his gums as he grimly turned to look at Muke and Liu Jiayi, baring his teeth in a bloodied grin. "I fucking hate this copy."

"We already encountered [Liu Jiayi] and [Muke] at Tarzan Station,"

Bai Liu continued. "They said they were there to deliver information to me and had already fought the monster at Edmond Observatory, holding the monster Tang Erda hostage before escaping."

Bai Liu smiled coldly. "But we found out they were nothing but simulations meant to deceive us. That's why we flew back with the remaining Tarzan Station crew in the Tarzan Station helicopter after killing them, to see what was going on here—and—"

He raised his eyes, his tone dropping to a chilling softness, his gaze empty and deep as the night.

"—Where the hell did my real team members go?"

He lowered his eyes, his fingers moving with deliberate slowness, and ordered in a tone that betrayed no emotion. "Strike and kill."

Mu Sicheng and Tang Erda raised their guns with expressionless faces, the bright red of the bullets faintly visible in the chamber, ready to fire.

The Ice Age

Tarzan Observatory

In the small space surrounded by four guns, Bai Liu's demeanor was relaxed as he looked at Liu Jiayi. "So, you took the clone of Tang Erda hostage and chose to meet us at Tarzan Station, but then decided to strike first because you weren't sure if we were monsters?"

Bai Liu leaned back in his chair, lifted his gaze, and smiled softly. "Now that you've got us under control, what's next? How do you plan to distinguish between us—monsters or your real teammates?"

Liu Jiayi's lips were pressed into a thin line as she twirled the gun in her hand. The oversized gloves, which had once been warm from Bai Liu's touch, now felt cold, and her fingertips tingled from the chill.

"I have a way to tell the difference between you and the monsters." Liu Jiayi's breath formed a white mist in the air.

The young girl's grey eyes shot up to meet Bai Liu's gaze through the hazel goggles. There was a harshness in her expression, forced upon her, but it softened when her eyes locked with his calm ones.

She seemed unable to name the cruel solution she had in mind, even though she had used it successfully twice before.

Bai Liu kindly spoke up, "Monsters have a weakness, and you can use it to tell the difference. Earlier, at Edmond Observatory, you used fuel and poison to burn [Mu Sicheng], and after determining that it was their weakness, you used the same method to hold [Tang Erda] hostage."

"[Tang Erda] is a monster, afraid of these things. So it was held hostage just as you intended." Bai Liu looked straight at Liu Jiayi. "But [Bai Liu], I suppose it wasn't because it was cunning that it was let go, was it?"

Bai Liu said this while holding Liu Jiayi's gun with his gloved hand, his chest pressed against the muzzle as he slowly stood up. He took a few steps back from her, looking down at her with a pitying expression. "Jiayi, you can't do anything to [Bai Liu]."

Liu Jiayi had no way to test Bai Liu's authenticity in such a cruel manner, so she let the [Bai Liu] go, even though she knew there was a 99% chance it was a monster.

But what if it wasn't?

She didn't want to kill him, or resort to this method.

Not to mention Muke, a man who could slice through the skin of any monster with a Bai Liu face and still scream first.

Liu Jiayi's lips turned blue as she stared at Bai Liu for ten seconds before taking a deep, dry breath. She holstered her gun and pulled out her poison. "Yes, that's what you said last time, so fuck off. I'm going to identify the other two."

"There's no need to test; we're both real," Bai Liu smiled. "I'm sure I'm the real Bai Liu, so you must be the real Liu Jiayi."

Liu Jiayi looked up in disbelief. "How did you recognize me?!"

Bai Liu patted her on the head. "It's a controlled experiment. We've heard the observatory version."

Liu Jiayi frowned. "What experiment?"

Bai Liu explained the experiment the monsters had conducted on them, smiling with growing interest.

"Don't you think it's similar to our current situation? It's a group of people who know each other well. One of them leaves and then turns back halfway, while the other waits to be rescued. Then, they have to identify each other as human or not in the experiment?"

As Bai Liu spoke, Mu Sicheng rubbed his chin, put down his gun, and thought deeply. "Hmm, seems like it."

Then, he suddenly reacted, as if struck by a realization. "Wait a minute, according to this experiment, someone from our side should be real, and someone should be fake too!"

"No, no, no." Bai Liu stopped the alert Mu Sicheng, who had raised his gun to Liu Jiayi's forehead. He smiled as he explained. "This time, it's an experiment where one side is all real, and the other is all fake."

Mu Sicheng was confused. "Why?!"

Liu Jiayi couldn't help but roll her eyes, muttering under her breath, "Stupid, or maybe just college students."

Muke lowered his gun, leaned back against the top bunk with a long, exhausted sigh, and turned to Mu Sicheng to explain.

"If, as Bai Liu says, it's a low-reproducibility social experiment, then the experiment conducted earlier couldn't be replicated because they already had results from Fang Xiaoxiao's situation. So Fang Xiaoxiao's situation isn't going to be repeated with us. We've become part of another experiment."

Bai Liu raised a finger, his smile deepening. "In short, we're the control group for Fang Xiaoxiao's experiment. By extension, we can conclude that because we're real, Muke and the others who came to us must also be real."

Mu Sicheng's eyes glazed over. "What... What does all this even mean? Why are we jumping to this conclusion?"

Liu Jiayi tilted her head, gave Mu Sicheng an exasperated look, and then yawned as she climbed into the bunk. She took off her bloodstained coat, curled up, and declared, "I'm going to sleep."

Soon, Liu Jiayi's breathing evened out, her hands clutching Bai Liu's gloves, like a cub finding its nest, and she fell asleep.

Muke stepped in front of the bed, his voice soft. "Jiayi's been using poison to deal with monsters all the way here. Although she has a stamina restorer, she's still mentally exhausted, like a child."

Tang Erda glanced at the blood splattered across Muke's body and his tired, weathered expression. He could tell Muke had spent a lot of time reading and processing his memories, then forced Liu Jiayi to fight through a pile of monsters.

"You should rest too," Tang Erda said, offering comfort.

Muke nodded, removed his clothes, climbed into the top bunk, and soon fell asleep, his hands hanging over the side.

Tang Erda sighed, gently tucking Muke's hand back in. "Looks like they've been through hell to deliver our message. Tough on them."

Mu Sicheng scratched his head and circled around Bai Liu, lowering his voice. "How on earth can you be sure these two aren't monsters?"

They hadn't been burned or doused with strong acid, and none of the weaknesses used to distinguish players from monsters had been tested.

What's going on with Bai Liu? What's he hiding?

Bai Liu smiled. "Really curious, huh?"

Mu Sicheng nodded vigorously.

Bai Liu pulled out a piece of paper and a pen, placing them on a small desk in the middle of the cabin. He bent over to explain to Mu Sicheng.

"Remember the experiment Fang Xiaoxiao told you about earlier?"

"Yeah," Mu Sicheng shuddered at the memory. "That was when a group of them let a few escape the ice chasm outside Tarzan Station. Then, the others tried to rescue them, but they ended up running into fake versions of them."

Bai Liu lowered his gaze. "What do you think the purpose of that experiment was?"

Mu Sicheng froze, then began to think hard. "I think it was... trying to find out how humans in the same group can tell the difference between monsters and humans in extreme conditions?"

He remembered Fang Xiaoxiao saying this to him.

"Exactly. It's an experiment to explore how well humans in a group can distinguish between what's real and what's fake." Bai Liu wrote the four labels—[A1], [A2], [B1], and [B2]—on the page and continued.

"Imagine we're the monsters, A is the human group, A1 and A2 are two separate groups within A that we've forced apart, and B is the monster group. [B1] and [B2] are mirror-image hybrid creatures created by the monsters to mimic [A1] and [A2]."

Bai Liu set these four labels in a 2x2 table. "So, based on this experimental purpose, there are four exploratory experiments: A1 meets B2, A2 meets B1—those are the experiments Fang Xiaoxiao and the others conducted."

"Since group A1 has a memory of the experiment and group A2 couldn't bear the results and died, we can't replicate the experiment with them again. We need a completely new group of humans to complete the remaining two experiments."

Bai Liu looked up slowly, locking eyes with Mu Sicheng. "That means A1 meets A2, and B1 meets B2—two control experiments. That's the experiment we're conducting."

"So, if we're real, then Muke must be real."

"Of course," Bai Liu added with a flat tone, "we can't rule out the possibility that we're all fakes. But if both sides are fake, it doesn't matter to me what's real."

Mu Sicheng stepped back, looking warily at the experiments on the paper. A chill spread through him, deeper than the freezing temperatures outside—this feeling stripped away his sense of self, reducing him to a mere collection of bones and flesh, powerless against something greater.

As humans do to other creatures, life had become meaningless, reduced to symbols on paper—A1, A2, B1, B2.

Mu Sicheng's lips trembled as he faced Bai Liu, uncertainty clouding his mind. "What if we're fake?"

Bai Liu looked at him flatly. "Then we kill the real one and take its place."

The Ice Age

After letting Muke and Liu Jiayi rest for two or three hours, both of them woke up with a strong sense of self-management.

Liu Jiayi sat on the edge of the bed, rubbing her eyes as she put on her shoes. Meanwhile, Bai Liu adjusted her new rash guard, a better-fitting one since her previous outfit had been soiled with blood.

Liu Jiayi slipped her right arm through the sleeve of Bai Liu's shirt, while her other hand tossed back the long strands of hair pinned at the back of her neck. She then jumped off the bed, jacket in hand, landing firmly on the ground.

Bai Liu released his grip on her jacket, his eyes scanning the consolidated fax record Muke handed him, quickly skimming the lines.

His gaze paused for a moment on the five words Muke had highlighted in the translation before he continued reading as though nothing unusual had caught his eye.

"It looks like the boss we're dealing with this time is a scientist named Edmond," Bai Liu said, handing the file to Tang Erda beside him. He then turned to Muke. "What about the lab reports and diaries? Did you filter out anything valuable?"

Muke's face flushed with embarrassment. "I'm sorry. I've only managed to get a rough understanding of the contents, but I'm not sure what it all means yet."

"It’s fine," Bai Liu reassured him. "What does the lab report say?"

Muke looked up, his expression a mix of frustration and fatigue. "The main part of the report is split into two sections. The first covers temperature measurements—daily data from various Antarctic surface sites and marine zones, all recorded up to the last month."

He rubbed his forehead in discomfort. "The data is massive, and I don't know what’s useful right now."

Bai Liu flipped through the temperature statistics, filled with dense numbers, histograms, pie charts, and graphs that went on endlessly. The sheer volume was overwhelming.

Muke stared helplessly at the thick stack of charts.

Even with a strong memory, he struggled with the complexity of the scientific material. After reading non-stop for an entire day and night, he felt as though his mental faculties had dropped significantly.

"Edmond Observatory has launched numerous weather balloons throughout the Antarctic interior to monitor temperatures," Muke continued. "They've also deployed positioning buoys in surrounding waters to measure sea temperatures."

He exhaled deeply. "Since Edmond specializes in building weather models from temperature data, the experimental data is extensive. They've set up nearly six hundred sites across Antarctica for temperature measurements."

"Edmond believes these six hundred sites are crucial for understanding the region's shifting climate. They reflect the effects of ocean currents, solar radiation, stratosphere, and even tectonic movements on the temperature. These need to be monitored and updated constantly, so each site has been measured three to five times a day for the last thirty-three years, up until about a year and a half ago."

Muke glanced at the massive pile of reports in Bai Liu's hands, his frustration clear. "It's just too much... I haven't finished reading it all."

Mu Sicheng, listening from the sidelines, was astonished.

Thirty-three years' worth of data—only someone as stubborn as Muke would have tried to read it all in a single day.

Give Mu Sicheng thirty-three years, and he still wouldn't manage to finish it.

Bai Liu ignored the comment and asked, "What about the second section of Edmond's lab report?"

Muke straightened up. "The second section contains biochemical experimental data on an unknown creature X. The experiment ran from August 7th of last year to December. There was a brief gap in the records during the first two weeks of October, but things picked up again after that."

Muke leaned forward and helped Bai Liu turn to the section in the lab diary from early October.

"The temperature records are normal, but the biological experiment logs are blank," Muke explained. "The media wasn't photographed, and the cultures weren't incubated at a constant temperature. The growth status of the biological tissues wasn't recorded—they were essentially abandoned during this time."

He pointed to one section of the report. "But by November, the number of cultures had skyrocketed from ten to three hundred. Cells from other organisms, like emperor penguins, seals, and whales, were being mixed into the cultures."

"And—" Muke's finger hovered over a particular column in the table, his eyes darkening, "—67 human cells."

Bai Liu's gaze lingered on the column. "These would be the cells of the researchers at Tarzan Station."

Muke nodded, his expression tight. He slid his thumbnail across the report and began explaining the details in a clear, structured way, translating the findings from the English text.

"Yes, Edmond used these monsters, grown from human cells, to conduct basic exploratory experiments—such as cell division and reproduction, tissue cutting and reculturing, as well as testing their resilience to death and destruction," Muke explained.

His sharp eyes scanned the notes. "Once Edmond established that these monsters exhibited strong learning capabilities and began diverging from humans, he reported this to the Observatory's political and military leaders in early October, demanding that the research be halted on ethical grounds."

"But the authorities, citing military interests, insisted that he continue. They ordered him to find a way to mass-produce and control these creatures, giving Edmond a new research direction: undead soldiers who would be fully controllable and highly effective in combat."

"Edmond strongly resisted and denounced the idea, even resorting to going on strike."

"On October 3rd, Edmond was caught trying to steal equipment for the first time. His superiors punished him severely, dismissing his concerns about the experiment's dangers. They mocked him, saying, 'If you fear this experiment so much, prove to us that it could lead to humanity's extinction.'"

Muke paused, taking a deep breath. "The following day, they forced Edmond to consume the biological tissue he had cultivated himself. By then, these tissues had differentiated into a human form—specifically, that of an infant."

"Edmond suffered severe psychological trauma after this, and I found him in the infirmary, repeatedly requesting antidepressant medication. His doctor's records show that Edmond developed symptoms of drug dependency as his experiments progressed, fueled by increasing doses of medication."

"On October 15th, Edmond attempted to steal the case again, but this time, one of his own colleagues betrayed him."

"Once again, he was caught and brutally punished by the sentries. His superiors deemed him less than human and ordered, 'There's no need to show mercy to someone like him. Torture him using the same biological experiments he's so fond of!'"

Muke spoke rapidly, his voice tinged with bitterness. "The torment seemed to have driven him further. On October 28th, Edmond was 'acquitted' after two weeks of brutal torture."

"On October 29th, after a long and closed-door discussion with his superiors, Edmond's antidepressant dosage increased significantly."

"According to the infirmary's diagnosis, Edmond began showing symptoms of schizophrenia and multiple personality disorder. He would occasionally slip into delusional fantasies, claiming to be from Tarzan Station, and beg for someone to rescue him. He even cursed the Observatory, saying he didn't belong in such a 'sinful place' named after him."

"But it seems he came to a grim realization and started obeying his superiors. He began to devise a way to make these creatures obey commands, while also ensuring they were brave enough to charge into battle."

Muke tapped a file marked with a bright red, double-stamped "Top Secret" header. "This is the result of Edmond's research: the memory hypnosis experiment."

He turned to Bai Liu. "Take a look—this experiment is the most valuable information I've found."

Bai Liu glanced down at the document Muke was pointing to.

The memory hypnosis experiment stemmed from one of Edmond's earlier hypotheses: What distinguishes humans from other humanoid intelligent species?

In the long, 300 million-year history of human evolution, why have humans developed to their current scale, while other species with similar developmental potential have not? Why did those species go extinct, and what allowed humans to survive?

And, if there is a species that has not gone extinct, one with intelligence equal to or surpassing that of humans, which has developed in the shadows, what sets them apart from us?

Edmond's conclusion was that humans have an inherent tendency toward civilization and community.

"It is the fear and reverence we feel for those who have passed in our tribe, the compassion we share with those struggling alongside us, and the ability to support one another that has allowed us to survive to this day. We have been endowed with the subconscious urge to create civilization as part of our survival instinct."

This theory had been the basis of an older paper by Edmond. In his later research, he added a second conclusion:

"I apologize for my earlier rash conclusion that our survival instincts also contain the subconscious drive to destroy civilization. Unfortunately, this awareness is far stronger than the other."

"I will use hypnosis to give these newborn creatures both subconscious minds."

"But if these two subconscious existences are not framed within a rational, realistic memory structure, these newborns will go mad from the self-contradiction. They are 'born' to create and destroy, and no creature but humans has such a conflicting purpose."

"My superiors told me that if I could produce the soldiers they wanted, they would meet all my demands. This included allowing me to implant the memories of a person's entire life into the brains of these monsters, then using this information to make them believe they were humans fighting for a cause, defending their country, and living and dying for justice."

"This reminds me of my friend..."

It was then that Edmond realized: the friend he had lost, who had died in pain and repentance, had been one of the subjects of these high-ranking officials' experiments. Edmond was about to become what his friend had despised most—leading innocent beings who thought they were creating the future, only to lead them to the abyss of destruction.

The back of the experimental report described how the memories of humans were implanted into the creatures' brains. Most importantly—
"These monsters don't realize they're monsters," Muke said with a bitter smile. "That's why we can't be sure if we're truly monsters ourselves."

Mu Sicheng wrapped his arms around his shivering body. "No, how did they get our memories?!"

"Mental suggestion and hypnosis," Bai Liu said, flexing his fingers and tapping the paper. He lowered his gaze, his eyes growing distant. "It's likely that when we came into contact with this monster, Edmond, we unconsciously absorbed memories from him. This is probably one of his abilities."

Mu Sicheng looked confused. "But we've never met this Edmond monster, have we? My monster book didn't even light up a new page —"

"Wait—when did it light up?!" Mu Sicheng exclaimed, suddenly stunned. "I swear I just saw it still dark! How is it lit now when I open it?"

Muke quickly opened his own monster book and blushed upon seeing it. "Mine just lit up with a new page too, and its skills are... mental suggestion and hypnosis."

"I guess we'll have to realize it ourselves to break free from this hypnosis," Bai Liu said, casting a faint glance at Mu Sicheng. "And while it's true we haven't met this mysterious Edmond, did you forget that the monsters here can shape-shift?"

Mu Sicheng froze, muttering, "Right, they can transform... but who would he become?"

Bai Liu, still looking at the document in his hand, scratched the tip of his pen on the paper thoughtfully.

"There's another odd detail in this experiment," he continued. "The human cell suspension X cells started to be cultured in November. By that time, Edmond was imprisoned in the basement, working on experiments, with very limited access to the outside. How did he manage to get these cells from the Tarzan Station team and bring them back for his experiments?"

Muke didn't hesitate. "Could it be that someone at Tarzan Station was secretly meeting with Edmond and stealing the cells for him?"

Bai Liu shook his head, deep in thought. "There must have been someone on Tarzan Station helping him, but I don't think it's likely that cells were simply stolen."

"A group marked by betrayal would seem like a stained white cloth to Edmond—something that doesn't fit with his ideal of mutual trust and cooperation."

"If there was indeed someone at Tarzan Station stealing cells for him, Edmond might have just killed everyone there instead of sparing them as a 'spark of human continuity,'" Bai Liu added.

Muke frowned. "But how could Edmond have taken the cells from everyone at Tarzan Station without help from someone on his side?"

"Could it be that Edmond transformed into someone from Tarzan Station, infiltrated the Observatory, and used the opportunity to steal the cells?" Liu Jiayi suggested.

"I considered that," Bai Liu said, his expression contemplative. "But by that time, the Tarzan Station team had been isolated in the polar regions for a year and a half, facing each other daily in a confined space. They were so familiar with each other that even a small difference—like missing a day of shaving—would be noticed."

"Even if Edmond transformed into one of them, without the daily memories of the team, he wouldn't have been able to pass himself off as one of them, especially since the team knew Edmond was conducting bionic human experiments," Bai Liu continued.

He paused, then added softly, "Unless he had fused memories, a perfect 'Tarzan Station crew,' to help him blend in back in November."

Liu Jiayi's expression hardened. Bai Liu was right.

She frowned and retorted, "But the timing doesn't add up. According to the lab report, it takes at least a month to grow a mature body. Edmond made his first completed body with human memories in December, and all the experiments before October had been destroyed."

Bai Liu flipped through the lab report, his eyes settling on a specific page. "There's still one monster he hasn't destroyed."

Muke, thinking he had missed something, asked reflexively, "Which one?"

Bai Liu looked up. "Himself."

"I suspect Edmond started fusing his own memories in early October," Bai Liu mused. "This is likely when his mental issues began. By November, when the fusion was nearly complete, his psychotic symptoms worsened. That's when the doctors diagnosed him with multiple personality disorder."

"But it wasn't multiple personalities—two sets of memories were just fighting for dominance in his mind. He couldn't tell who he truly was," Bai Liu explained calmly. "And Edmond used these fused memories to transform into someone from Tarzan Station. He infiltrated the station and stole the cells from the rest of the team."

"He used these stolen cells to manipulate us, hiding in the body of this team member, silently engaging with us, hypnotizing us, taking away our memories, and swiftly continuing his experiments."

"What a highly capable researcher," Bai Liu muttered.

Mu Sicheng swallowed nervously. "So, who did he turn into?"

Bai Liu gave him a sharp look. "Isn't the answer obvious? There's only one person at Tarzan Station who's been in contact with both you and us."

Liu Jiayi suddenly remembered the overly enthusiastic graduate student who had greeted them upon arrival. "Fang Xiaoxiao?"

Outside Tarzan Station, amidst a fierce snowstorm.

Fang Xiaoxiao's face bore the marks of age and change. He glanced away from the brightly lit observation room, and in the next moment, his expression smoothed back into an untroubled one.

He turned, looking behind him at the battered Tarzan Station crew, their faces muddy, their bodies aching. Tears welled up in his eyes as he led the weary test subjects deeper into the ice fields.

The polar night was closing in.

The Ice Age

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Bai Liu left Tai Shan Station and headed to the site where they had been stationed, only to find that Fang Xiaoxiao—whom they had rescued from the ice crevice—had disappeared.

"Fang Xiaoxiao took the rest of the team with him," Tang Erda said grimly.

Mu Sicheng looked at Bai Liu. "So, are we going to find them next? Where could they have gone?"

Bai Liu exhaled a cloud of white breath, his gaze fixed on the sparse snow stretching toward the edge of the Antarctic continent, shimmering under the gray sunlight. "I think I know why Edmond left and where they're headed."

He gave a relaxed, almost teasing smile. "It seems the other player put a lot of pressure on Professor Edmond—the boss at the bottom of the level—to abandon his experiments on us and leave to deal with this player instead."

Liu Jiayi, always quick to react, turned to Bai Liu. "Was it Spades? What did he do?"

"He's going after the game's main quest," Bai Liu replied, looking back at her with a slight, plaintive expression. "To make the globe warmer."

Pure white stretched out next to the Ross Ice Shelf.

In the waters around Leah Land, the salinity is so high that the freezing point of the water dips below zero.

It is the coldest time of the year when the Antarctic waters meet the warmest currents before the polar night. In these frigid waters, it only takes fifteen minutes for a person to succumb to hypothermia if they fall in.

And yet, the sight of a human body sinking like a whale in the fluid ebb and flow of the ocean is undeniably captivating.

A tent-like structure made from stacked snow blocks stands haphazardly on the shore, containing tins of food, rashers, neatly arranged socks, and a sled car.

A drying rack is propped up on top of the sled, with a pair of oversized boxer briefs hanging in regular intervals, drying over two burning solid alcohol lamps.

It appears they didn't want to wear the underwear they found in the observatory, so they decided to dry their boxers out and reuse them instead.

On top of the snow 'tent,' a small red flag flutters violently in the sea breeze. The material glows faintly with a peculiar fluorescent light, standing out against the coming night.

The man in the sea floats and sinks twice, swimming at an unnaturally fast pace—faster than even the seals and orcas, which are feeding heavily in preparation for winter.

As the two predators tentatively approach him, he barely moves, effortlessly turning in the water and darting under their jaws in the blink of an eye.

Bubbles of air spill from his lips—the only indication that this is a strange human, not some cold, humanoid creature born in the icy depths of the sea.

Even the seal that attempted to hunt him likely wondered, internally, why this prey didn't radiate any heat.

Like ice. Even colder than ice.

Before they could puzzle over this, the elusive 'prey' swept past their fangs again, kicking his legs and opening his eyes slightly as he dove deeper into the invisible sea.

Ten minutes later, Spades emerged, dragging a tide gauge weighing several hundred kilos to the surface.

He strode barefoot across the ice, his left hand dragging the large orange-framed instrument, leaving a long trail in the snow. The water on his eyelashes and hair froze before it dripped down, which he wiped away with his right hand.

This is dangerous—easily capable of causing severe frostbite and eye injuries.

But the damage seemed to have no effect on Spades.

To him, such damage and temperatures—deadly to normal humans—were so insignificant that he didn't even bother to remove the shards of ice stuck in his eyelashes and hair.

Like small, unpolished diamonds, the fine ice fragments hung loosely on his smooth, tight body, refracting light at certain angles, glistening against his cool skin.

He wasn’t overly muscular, but he was lean, and when his shoulder blades tensed, it became clear that his bone structure—from shoulders to waist, stomach to ankles—was perfectly proportioned. His muscles, thin yet strong, covered each bone and joint with calculated precision, creating a form of both strength and proportion.

His skin, rather than being green from seawater exposure, had a glazed, polished marble-like glow—a translucent white.

It was as though a sculpture had been refined seven billion times and was still not perfect. It would likely drive sculptors mad trying to perfect such a half-naked masterpiece.

The only flaw was that most of his face was covered by hair, leaving only a jawline that seemed to fit flawlessly with the rest of his sculpted form.

Spades dragged the heavy equipment forward with steady steps, as though he couldn’t feel the cold, the glistening ice, or the gravel beneath his feet, slowly melting them with his body heat and gaze.

And so, this brilliant light vanished into the blizzard, unnoticed by anyone in the storm.

Spades casually slammed the several hundred-pound apparatus aside with one hand, knelt on top of it, bent forward, and found the inner lining. Without hesitation, he pulled out a whip, gripping its handle backhandedly as though it were a dagger, and stabbed it into the equipment.

Only after he had stabbed it did he realize something was wrong and slowly opened his mouth. "Ahh."

[This is a whip, not a dagger!!! Not a long knife!!! Nor is it an awl or a crutch! It can only be thrown! You can't stab, stomp, or slash with it!]

Spades reflexively recalled the new teammate who had just joined, with the Inquisitor against God's voice breaking down in his ears.

[Use the whip properly! Stop trying to use every strange method with it! Show some respect for the weapon you're using! Do you know how many points the guild spent last year maintaining your whip?]

The teammate had accused him bitterly.

[Stabbing around with the handle of the whip without care, doesn't it bother your conscience? Do you know how expensive the material is that's inlaid on it!?]

It's true—Spades didn't know. He just won the game and never cared about anything other than winning.

He remembered how he had answered the new teammate when they returned to the Slayer sequence.

-- [It's okay to win.]

He seems to be highly skilled with various weapon forms, and it's unclear why the weapon form fixed at the end of his personal skills is a whip.

Spades wasn't particularly fond of the whip. He preferred a short blade or awl, but he made do with the whip. Although he uses it, he can also employ it to deliver a powerful attack with other weapons if needed.

In the end, the whip often serves his core goal: to win the game. He never really cared much about the specifics, but his league teammate this time, the Inquisitor of the Reverse God, was deeply concerned about it.

No matter how many times the Inquisitor warned him tearfully, Spades continued to use the whip in his own way. So, the Inquisitor unleashed his skills and prophesied Spades' future, wickedly threatening, "Spades, if you don't master the whip, you'll lose the league to a player who's even better with it than you!"

Spades, interested in winning, finally took a moment to listen.

Since entering the game, Spades had been a moderately skilled whip user—not flawless, but not terrible either. However, when the moment came, he managed to poke the liner of the tide gauge straight through with the whip's handle.

The annoying new team member wasn't there to witness the scene, so Spades only paused briefly before continuing to pry open the steel casing of the instrument with the whip and digging out a thermometer wrapped in waterproof plastic.

He tore away the tarp to reveal a small metal box inside, vibrating erratically with high-frequency irregularities. In Spades' hands, the box emitted a sharp, high-frequency sound that could shatter bones just by holding it.

Spades closed his fingers around it, leaving a clear fingerprint on the metal surface. He crushed the box instantly, pressed his thumb against its side, and flexed his fingers, creating a hole in it.

Pressing his fingertips against the hole, Spades turned and took the box back to the snow block tent.

Despite the dust inside the box pressing against his fingers and the blood congestion in his nails, Spades felt no pain—nothing more than a slight discomfort.

He bent down to unhook the dried boxer briefs and rummaged around the tent with one hand. He found a bottle of strong acid in a glass bottle and held the box over an alcohol lamp.

His eyes remained fixed on the alcohol flame, his breathing light as the warmth of the fire reflected in his gaze. The rigid cold of his skin began to thaw under the heat.

The metal box in Spades' hand grew warmer, heating to such an extreme that its outer surface faintly reddened. As it did, the sound of evaporating ice filled the air, but Spades didn't seem to feel the heat at all—he continued to hold it without concern.

The dust inside the box vibrated faster as it was exposed to the heat, causing Spades' entire arm to shake uncontrollably.

After an uncertain amount of time, Spades' arm slowly stopped trembling, as if the particles inside had been burnt out by the heat. He then opened the hole in the box that he had been holding down and poured the strong acid from the bottle into it without hesitation.

The acid reacted violently, and gas spilled from the hole in the box, while the surface of the box reacted with a dark oxide film.

Spades glanced down at the box just as his system announced:

[System Alert: Congratulations to player Spades for destroying the Particle Weather Reactor (521/600)]

[The game is nearing its end, so please keep up the good work!]

Chapter End Notes

Is Spades naked

The Ice Age

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Spades placed the metal box filled with strong acid over the alcohol lamp, loosening his thumb from the pressed hole.

Inside the box, the particles corroded, turning into a viscous black liquid that flowed down his fingers like dark blood.

The "blood" dripped onto the outer flame of the alcohol lamp, reigniting it and creating a peculiar, flame-colored reaction.

The original orange-red hue of the flame shifted to an unsettling greenish-purple, flickering restlessly as the liquid dripped from the box.

The dull green light from the fire cast Spades' shadow on the tent, which danced unnervingly, as if a monstrous spirit was lurking within him, ready to burst out during the burning of these particles.

The liquid extinguished the alcohol lamp three times as it dripped, but Spades simply relit it each time, waiting until he was sure all the liquid had been burned out of the box. Once satisfied, he took the burning solid alcohol block in his hand and extinguished it.

After packing the remaining alcohol and acid into the package, Spades changed his clothes, knelt down to lace up his snow boots, casually gathered his jacket, and stood up to gather the rest of the supplies: mostly leftover acid, fuel, solid alcohol, and some food.

—These supplies were purchased by Spades from an outside shop.

The shop system was disabled in the game pool, but Spades typically didn't need to carry food or a change of clothes. He was always a quickie; in the words of his new teammate, the Inquisitor of the Gods, Spades preferred to finish the game violently—effective but also problematic, as it often disrupted the integrity of the game.

Usually, when Spades entered a game, the monsters barely had time to wait for him to eat before he had already won.

This is why, in the later stages of the training process, the judges of the Revolt Gods were becoming increasingly anxious.

The Killer Sequence, last year's championship team, had an undeniably strong individual fighting force. They were a dark horse, and it was clear none of the five players were easy to beat, especially not Spades, whose skills shattered all expectations.

The long whip he wielded swept through the air in all directions.

Even the deer hunter, a high-minded reformer, had to admit—gritting his teeth—that Spades didn't need any weapon modifications.

The weapon was merely an accessory for Spades, an optional tool. Regardless of what weapon he wielded, Spades himself was the most formidable force on the league field.

No reformer had the audacity to claim they could improve Spades' weaponry.

Because Spades was already the best.

This was common knowledge among all players in the game—an unshakable truth, as fundamental as the fact that the Earth is round and revolves around the sun.

However, the Killer Sequence, despite their success, had a significant weakness: all five players were main attackers.

No shield, no control, no roaming abilities, and most alarmingly, no tactician.

Last year's victory was due to Spades' sudden and overwhelming performance, which caught the other teams off guard.

But after a year, this one-man strategy had become less effective in group battles, as other guilds began to counter it more effectively.

Because while Spades was perfect, his teammates were not.

After a year of study and research, nearly every guild team had developed tactical strategies based on the skills of Spades and his teammates, as well as each player's habits.

The Hearts of the King's Guild openly revealed their strategy against Spades—backup nurses plus double control.

This tactic wouldn't defeat Spades outright, but it was enough to make life difficult for the other four.

Just as all the guilds were gearing up to challenge the newly determined Killer Sequence in the next tournament, Spades pulled off a move that once again stunned everyone—he poached the Deer Hunter's tactician, Inquisitor of the Gods.

The game's forums erupted in chaos for an entire week, with players everywhere questioning the announcement of the Killer Sequence's acceptance of the Inquisitor of the Gods.

What kind of player was Spades?

Anyone who had seen him play understood his "uniqueness." He was the quintessential main attacker: setting traps, sweeping lines, pushing bosses, and defeating opponents with lightning speed—boasting an outrageous 1 against 5 record in the semi-finals.

Without a tactician, Spades was the heart of the team.

But despite being the centerpiece, Spades was notably distant—barely communicating with his teammates during games. When other guilds analyzed his replays, they couldn't help but admit that Spades seemed to need little interaction with his teammates.

When he did communicate, his teammates often failed to follow his lead. So, he simply stopped trying.

Here was a man who, during a 32-to-16 match, would ignore a teammate's desperate cry for help, shoot them a look, strike them with his whip, then apologize without sincerity before rushing off to hunt monsters. And this man, who could act with such disregard, decided to poach someone else's tactician?!

Despite the disbelief, Inquisitor of the Gods officially joined the Killer Sequence as the team's only non-main attacker—a tactician—in this outlandish combination.

For the other guilds, this was the last thing they wanted to see.

They knew just how much the addition of Inquisitor of the Gods would strengthen a team already boasting players like Spades.

The skill of Inquisitor of the Gods was prophecy, and he was the best tactician in the game.

The powerful synergy between the best tactician and the best main attacker made all the guilds desperate.

But soon, this despair began to dissipate.

They were delighted to discover that, together, the two best players didn't mesh well at all.

After Inquisitor of the Gods joined, a new training program was quickly developed. So far, it was... working... sort of.

It wasn't all bad—more like a shambles.

Inquisitor of the Gods instructed Spades to follow his commands and refrain from attacking monsters or opponents until given the order. Spades appeared to listen, so the tactician, relieved, carelessly threw him into the game pool.

Spades was like a fish out of water. The moment the game began, he vanished in the blink of an eye.

Inquisitor of the Gods spent half a day searching, convinced Spades had fallen for the game's trap.

In the end, he found Spades amidst a bloody battlefield.

Spades, whip taut in hand, strangled a monster's head, then dropped it and casually hid it behind him. Turning to face the tactician, he said with an unfazed expression, "Sorry, I saw the monster, and my body acted on its own. I killed it—didn't affect your training plan, right?"

Meanwhile, the other four teammates received a system notification:

[System notification: Congratulations to player Spades for leading the team through the game! Game over!]

Spades, relaxing, muttered, "Ah, so that's a win?"

The other three teammates: "..."

"Are you laughing right now? You're laughing because you won, aren't you?!"

"Do you want to win all by yourself?! Show some team spirit!"

Over the next few months, as they trained in the game pool, Inquisitor of the Gods was repeatedly frustrated by Spades' definition of group play.

Spades in a group fight was like chaos incarnate.

He fought monsters, walked the main game line, and every second, any time his teammates looked away—he was gone!

By the time the group scrambled to find him, there was usually a system announcement that the game had been cleared.

Inquisitor of the Gods was tormented to the point of exhaustion.

Most of his efforts in the game were spent not predicting opponents' movements or focusing on the main game line, but rather searching for Spades.

Spades was like a child whose attention was always wandering—a child who fought like a champion, moved with speed, and was fiercely competitive yet outwardly obedient.

And Inquisitor of the Gods was the exhausted parent, unable to control the child, spending sleepless nights searching for him like a cheap GPS locator, broadcasting through the game:

"[Spades! Spades, where are you?]"

"[Spades, come out! I won't make you work with your teammates this time! I didn't consider your feelings as the main attacker wanting to win on your own! You're a great attacker, it's all my fault!]

"[Come out! We're going home! Let's stop playing games, okay?]"

After many such moments, Inquisitor of the Gods weakly declared that he needed a break and left Spades to wander—or rather, to train outside. He took the other three players to train first, leaving Spades as the lone "wanderer" to cool off.

It was disconcerting to see such an invincible ace benched by his new tactician, but Spades took it well, and actually listened this time, training alone.

Spades was known for his intuition as a main attacker, a fact recognized by the audience, his teammates, and even the tactician.

And the personal training ground Spades chose to hone his instincts was the Ice Age dungeon.

Spades had a vague sense that something in this dungeon called to him, as if some deep mission was embedded in his being, urging him to bring total destruction to the evil forces hidden within this icy world.

Chapter End Notes

> Okay, so, here are all the names for the same person :
> Inquisitor of the Gods
> Inquisitor of the Reverse God - Also The Reverse God
> Judge against the Gods - Also The Judge
>
> The author likes to change it in the novel, so be warned.

The Ice Age

Killer Sequence Guild, Lounge

The Inquisitor of the Gods slumped on the sofa, guzzling water like a maniac, while next to him sat a man who looked completely drained, surrounded by a pile of empty bottles—mineral water, stamina restorers, and mental boosters scattered around his feet.

"It's really hot in the desert," said a man sitting on the far left. His cheeks were flushed from the heat, and his eyes were glazed over as he hugged a bottle to his chest. "The game pool banned shops, so we couldn't even buy water. I thought I was going to die of thirst in that instance too."

"We were careless," the Inquisitor of the Gods muttered, rubbing his brow. "I didn't expect to get trapped. We didn't coordinate well enough, and we didn't bring enough supplies."

The man suddenly sat up straight, glancing around with a puzzled expression. "Where's Spades? He's usually here in the lounge by the time we finish the game. Why isn't he back today?"

"Bought a bunch of strong acid fuel and went into the Ice Age instance," the Inquisitor of the Gods replied, smiling slightly. "He's going for the [true end] line."

The man immediately understood, slumping back down and sighing long and dramatically. "How many times has this happened? He still hasn't given up?"

The Inquisitor of the Gods shook his head, a hint of amusement on his face. "I don't know. It's happened a lot. Every time we'd get a poster for Ice Age before entering the game pool, Spades would glance at it twice. It felt like if anyone missed it, Spades would just jump in and leave us behind."

"He's already hit the [normal end] of Ice Age," the man said, confused. "Doesn't Spades stop paying attention to games he's already won?"

"What is it about this [true end] line that keeps pulling him in? It's not just about collecting corpses—why does he insist on fighting through it every time, running aimlessly?"

The Inquisitor of the Gods opened another bottle of water, tipping it over his head and letting out a long, satisfied breath as if he'd been revitalized. "I remember that Spades' corpse collection mission in Ice Age always lacked one piece. I recall the piece I was missing was the heart piece. I searched for it countless times but never found it."

"Well, you know how Spades is. If he can't find something, he won't stop searching for it," the Inquisitor of the Gods continued with a smile. "Let him be. It's good for his mindset."

The man's expression turned contemplative as he absentmindedly chewed on the bottle's mouthpiece. "Spades still has a lot to refine in his mind. Don't you think it's time to send him back to the furnace for a reset?"

The Inquisitor of the Gods gripped his bottle tightly and didn't answer.

The man fell silent as well.

That comment had crossed a line. The Inquisitor of the Gods was the tactician, the one who controlled the team's strategy. It wasn't a player's place to question his decisions.

Perhaps it was because the man had only been with the team for a short time, and his temperament wasn't as sharp as the other tacticians. He was less extreme, blending well with the group, which often made the players forget his position as the tactician.

But a tactician is still a tactician, and they wouldn't tolerate players questioning their authority.

The man nervously spoke, "I'm sorry."

"It's nothing," the Inquisitor of the Gods waved it off, smiling broadly and shifting the conversation. "You've been working with Spades for a year now. Can you tell me which match left the biggest impression on you?"

This wasn't the first time the Inquisitor of the Gods had pulled a teammate aside for such a conversation, asking their thoughts on Spades' performance after he failed to mesh with the team.

The man thought for a moment, holding the bottle in his hands like a contemplative bear. "I remember every game, but the one against Russell Cemetery was the most memorable."

The Inquisitor of the Gods nodded as the memory hit him. "Ah, that one. It was a disaster."

The man chuckled ruefully. "More than miserable. It was the worst game of last year. I honestly thought I was going to die at the end."

The Russell Cemetery vs. Killer Sequence match ended with a 16-8 score.

By that time, Spades' strength had become undeniable, and many guilds were curious about the new player. The most prominent among them was Russell Cemetery, which made it their mission to uncover Spades' secrets and exploit his weaknesses.

Russell Cemetery was ranked 12th the previous year, but unlike other infamous guilds, they didn't have any standout players. They had constant roster turnover, and their new members often seemed timid. Nothing about the team stuck out.

The one thing Russell Cemetery was known for was forfeiting matches, even in singles and doubles. The name "Russell Cemetery" had come to symbolize their habit of entering matches and surrendering twice to ruin the field.

Yet, this team had a surprisingly solid style of play, capable of hitting the ground running in some games, winning decisively and even taking down star teams.

Last year, Killer Sequence nearly lost to Russell Cemetery.

Spades almost died in that game. Russell Cemetery's tactician had tailored a strategy specifically to counter Spades, using a player with skills designed to limit him, and temporarily took on the role of tactician for that match.

It was a brutal strategy.

As soon as the game started, Russell Cemetery's team took aggressive action, sacrificing one of their own players to activate a powerful skill.

The tactic involved turning the ground beneath Spades into a massive mud puddle. This skill could nullify all of a player's attacks and slowly devour them, a tried-and-true move with the only drawback being that it required a teammate's sacrifice to activate.

The stronger the player being consumed, the slower the mire's effect.

Spades lasted seven days in that mud, unable to attack and forced to switch from [Attack] to [Shield], grinding his opponent down until they were cornered in a game shock map.

But eventually, the mire began to swallow Spades whole.

Half of his face was stuck in the mud, and his teammates did everything they could to free him—digging with their bare hands, fighting off enemies as they tried to pull him out.

The scene was so grim that it stayed with the audience for a long time.

Grimaces, fury, fear, and dread mixed on the faces of the Killer Sequence team, their expressions contorted with emotions that words couldn’t capture. Muddy tears streaked their faces, and a low, desperate hiss emerged from their throats—pure, unadulterated terror at the impending death.

They all knew that if Spades died there, they would definitely lose the game.

But Spades wasn’t afraid. He simply looked calmly at his teammates, the mire swallowing him bit by bit, and said, "You can run."

Still, no one ran. Some of them tore themselves apart in desperation, fighting like madmen to hold off their opponents and save Spades.

In the end, Spades won that game.

The team's collective surge of fear pushed back Russell's advancing line. After one of their members broke free and severed the opposing tactician's arms, disarming him and rendering him incapable of using his staff, the mire skill trapping Spades was finally lifted.

Once Spades was able to attack, victory was inevitable.

The crowd erupted in cheers as Spades emerged from the bottomless swamp, whip in hand, covered in mud and blood. Standing tall, he became the demon who had clawed his way out of the abyss.

From head to toe, Spades was drenched in filth, his body marked by the grueling seven-day struggle. Horrific wounds and broken bones jutted out, sharp against his skin, while blood and clotted mud solidified on his exposed bones.

Despite his battered appearance, no one doubted that the final victory would belong to this relentless figure.

Ten minutes later, Spades stood before the defeated Russell Cemetery team. His face was gaunt, his bloodied whip hanging loosely in one hand, the game's central prop—a symbol of his triumph—clutched in his right hand, mud dripping from his jaw and knuckles.

The Russell Cemetery team trembled before him, begging incoherently for mercy, their voices quivering.

Spades, also a newcomer, watched them silently from the distance that separated victor and vanquished, from the gap between life and death.

It was a game of life and death, and they had resorted to desperate measures to backstab Spades, fully aware that he could kill them for revenge.

The crowd roared with excitement, some shouting, "Kill them!"

"Kill them!"

The Russell Cemetery team shut their eyes in despair, having sacrificed their teammates for victory, only to now face the same fate themselves.

They believed they were doomed. Everyone thought they were doomed.

Finally, Spades spoke.

His mud-covered forehead hid his eyes, but his voice rang clear: "You inflict death on your teammates, and our teammates avoid my death out of fear of their own."

"But when you place your lives on the backs of others," Spades continued, his gaze sweeping over them, "don't you see that your fates are tied together?"

The team stared at him, wide-eyed, unable to comprehend.

Spades waited for a response.

The tactician with both arms severed finally spoke, his voice strained: "That's not how it works. One death, and we all survive. It's our tactic, and it works. Didn't you get stuck at the beginning, even with Spades?"

He continued, tearfully and fervently explaining, unsure whether he was trying to convince them or himself. "This was done to protect the team! One death will save so many!"

When he finished, Spades nodded slowly, as if accepting his answer. "I see," he said calmly. "You cannot see your own fate."

"I will not kill you," he added, his voice devoid of emotion. "Your death is not mine to give. You will die in your own mud."

The tactician watched Spades, who had already turned away in quiet dismay, tears welling in his eyes.

Spades didn't kill them. But soon after, the Russell Cemetery team attempted their deadly tactic again, sacrificing a teammate in their next league match. This time, they were killed by the enemy captain, Fang Wu.

The tactician drowned in the mire skill he had sought to unleash.

The man sighed as he recalled the match. "I couldn't understand what was going through Spades' mind then. I would've killed them out of pure rage."

"But I think it's because of this," the man said, turning to the Inquisitor of the Counter-God, his voice earnest. "Spades finally understood the importance of the team, which is why he recruited you this year."

The Inquisitor of the Counter-God thought for a moment before replying, "I actually asked Spades why he chose me to be your tactician."

The man, curious, asked, "How did he answer?"

The Inquisitor of the Counter-God smiled. "He said that he saw my fate—I'd be your tactician and then die on the field."

The man was taken aback. "He said that directly to your face? That's... too blunt."

"Threatening death in front of a prophet like that... True to form, Spades!" he chuckled.

"Actually, my skill isn't prophecy," the Inquisitor corrected with a shrug. "It's called [Listening to God's Only Words]. Sometimes, I can't even tell if I'm the prophet or if Spades is. His intuition is so accurate it’s almost like prophecy."

"For example, the [Ice Age] copy—we've all been there, and that unknown creature X’s derivative, the one that turns into a human, is particularly troublesome. Even I have trouble distinguishing who’s real and who’s a monster. We couldn’t even move in that copy because we couldn’t find the target of our attacks."

The Inquisitor of the Counter-God looked across at his team member. "But do you remember how Spades handled that copy?"

The team member paused in thought. "He killed all the replicas except for us once he entered...”

The Inquisitor nodded. "Yes. Once Spades was inside, he quickly identified Edmond hiding in Fang Xiaoxiao’s body, killed him, stopped his plan to use a particle device to affect the global climate, and completed the main global warming quest."

"That’s the [NORMAL END] of the game," he continued, spreading his hands. "From the moment we entered to the point we found Spades standing beside a pile of replicant corpses, he cleared the game in less than thirty minutes."

"Isn’t that curious? How does Spades always know who’s human and who’s a monster so easily? The monster anthropomorphism in that game is so convincing that even we couldn’t tell who was real."

The man rubbed his chin in contemplation. "Yeah, how did Spades do that?"

The Inquisitor of the Counter-God sighed, a hint of helplessness in his tone. "I asked him."

The man leaned in. "And what did he say?"

The Inquisitor let out a deep breath. "He said it was just intuition—he recognizes them purely by instinct."

"As much as I hate to admit it, Spades’ instincts are spot on. He never lies," the Inquisitor said, rubbing his forehead. "But that makes it harder. If Spades is going to fit in with the team, he’ll need to trust my tactics over his instincts."

"His instincts are so accurate, though. I don’t know how to convince him to follow my tactical plans instead."

The man furrowed his brow. "Is there a way for us to work with Spades' instincts?"

The Inquisitor of the Counter-God took a deep breath, pondering. "I thought about it, but there's no way. Spades can't even articulate his instincts to us. It's a split-second feeling he acts on, and by the time we react, he's already miles away."

The man grimaced, recalling the exhausting chase after Spades in-game, and slumped on the table. "He just leaves us searching in circles."

"Yeah, it's mostly a communication issue. Spades can barely say more than a few words before he's off again. I can't even get his attention with a gong," the Inquisitor lamented, propping his head in his hands, eyes distant. "Is there anyone who can teach Spades how to communicate with us?"

Inside the game, by the Ross Ice Shelf,

Spades gathered his belongings and strapped his walking gear to his sled board, tying the safety rope around his waist before dragging it forward. He looked down, removing the map from the lining of his punching bag. The fierce wind had crumpled it, but he scanned it quickly, confirming his next destination.

After visiting the buoy point in the Ross Sea, Spades had checked dozens more off his list. Now, only a few locations remained.

His eyes skimmed over the map, landing on the inland point of the South Pole. He exhaled a slow, white breath.

Edmond Observatory.

He remembered that this had been the location where the player Bai Liu had logged in with him.

Having identified his target, Spades drew his whip from behind his waist, adjusted the skis fixed to his feet, and leaned forward, knees slightly bent. He gazed across the unrelenting blizzard, locked onto a direction, and flung his arms to either side, sending his whip crashing into the ground.

The whip slammed into the snow, raising a thick layer around him.

Spades used the whip like a snowball, leveraging the tremendous reaction force from the quick swing to glide across the snow—almost like an orange-red bolt of lightning against the white landscape.

If the Inquisitors of the Gods were present, he would no doubt hiss at Spades for using such an expensive whip as a sled dog to propel himself forward.

But he wasn't there.

So Spades, his black goggles on, bent forward and swung his whip from side to side, gliding smoothly. Soon, he disappeared into the swirling snow and wind.

Tarzan Station.

Bai Liu had only stopped briefly at Tarzan Station before taking advantage of the situation. In a quick, decisive move, he and his team hijacked a helicopter parked outside and flew off before the Tarzan Station crowd even noticed.

The wind howled outside the helicopter, and flying in such weather, with visibility barely reaching thirty meters, was like dancing on the edge of death. The threat of disaster was ever-present.

But Tang Erda, the pilot, knew better than to disobey Bai Liu. Their tactician’s eyes gleamed with the excitement of an imminent, multi-million-dollar find. Even his breathing quickened, and his slender fingers tightened, whitening as he gripped the backrest of his seat.

"Where to?" Tang Erda hissed.

Bai Liu answered, "Edmond’s Observatory."

The Ice Age

The helicopter stumbled over the long white snowfields, forced to make two emergency landings due to gusty winds.

By the time Tang Erda's group arrived at the Edmond Observatory, it was nearly early morning on the third day.

The helicopter landed several kilometers from the Observatory.

With the wind and snow now calm, the Edmond Observatory appeared to be buried under a thick blanket of snow from a distance. However, oddly, the ground at the entrance had been cleared, revealing an open space beneath, and the door was half ajar.

Tang Erda immediately sensed something was wrong. "Someone's inside."

"Shit!" Mu Sicheng rubbed his arms, grimacing. "It's not our clones still holed up in there, is it?"

Bai Liu crouched by the flap door to the basement opening, beside the helicopter hangar.

A pungent smell of cold ash and strong acid wafted out from the basement's flap door.

The snow had been cleared from the door, which stood wide open. The two barrels of petrol Bai Liu had left before leaving were gone, and the basement inside was dark, with a little warm air spilling out.

From Bai Liu's perspective, the walls were covered in soot from incomplete fuel combustion, and the steps were slick with liquid and snow, showing that the fire had been recent and hadn't had time to freeze over.

Liu Jiayi, noticing the anomaly, crouched down beside Bai Liu. "It looks like after we left, the clones burned the monsters in the basement and poured strong acid to corrode them."

As she spoke, her gaze swept over the liquid covering the basement floor. She frowned in disbelief. "But I cleared out Edmond Observatory's supplies with Muke before we left, and I don't recall this much acid being stockpiled here."

Strong acids were a rare commodity, even in research stations. Liu Jiayi had been meticulous, taking care to clear out the acid before they left. Even then, she had to be cautious and calculating to deal with the monsters and make their escape.

Liu Jiayi crouched down, pulling out a piece of metal to catch two drops of acid dripping down the steps.

The metal quickly began corroding, and she frowned. "This guy's been pouring acid into the basement in buckets. Where did he get all this acid?"

The person who had cleared the basement had used the acid recklessly, spreading it across the walls and steps with a sense of wastefulness, as if they had no appreciation for the scarce resource it was.

"Then there's only one possibility." Bai Liu's eyes fixed on the slowly freezing acid.

Liu Jiayi snapped to attention. "Someone who played this game brought the acid themselves—Spades was here?!"

Just then, Mu Sicheng shouted from the first floor of the Observatory, "Shit! What the hell's going on?!"

Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi exchanged a look before drawing their weapons and heading for the door.

When they entered the observation post and ascended to the first floor, Liu Jiayi stayed alert, walking in front of Bai Liu with her gun ready. "What's wrong?"

Mu Sicheng turned toward them, his face streaked with blue and white. His trembling hand pointed toward the restaurant, his voice shaky with terror. "You... you guys, see for yourselves..."

Bai Liu moved past Mu Sicheng, looking toward the restaurant, then raised an eyebrow slightly.

He understood the horror on Mu Sicheng's face.

The seats in the dining room had been roughly shoved aside, and broken tables and benches were piled in scattered corners, leaving a large, open space in the center.

This clearing had been smashed by something, leaving behind a square-shaped hole.

The hole penetrated directly through the first-floor dining room floor, exposing the ground floor below.

A dense ring of bloody handprints marked the floor around the edge of the hole, indicating that a group of people had tried to climb their way up from below.

On the ground floor, directly beneath the hole, was a huge glass tank of water, which appeared to have fallen from the roof. It was now filled with thick acid so viscous that it barely flowed, gurgling and bubbling in reaction.

The tank contained various charred and broken bodies, as if they had been discarded like trash.

Most of these bodies were still reacting in the acid, their bloodied, writhing forms making strange, corrosive bubbling noises as they slapped their palms against the pool, occasionally shaking off their half-dissolved eyeballs.

What made Mu Sicheng shriek was the appearance of the bodies.

The people who disposed of the bodies had been crude, careless, and several faces had not been fully burned by the fuel, leaving them clearly identifiable.

These bodies had the faces of Bai Liu, Mu Sicheng, Tang Erda, Liu Jiayi, and Muke.

A group of charred corpses, bearing their own faces, struggled painfully in the thick acid, their skin, muscles, and bones slowly being devoured by the corrosive liquid.

Even knowing these were not people, but monsters, it was hard not to feel a shudder of empathetic discomfort.

Mu Sicheng took two steps back, distancing himself from the bloodstained hole. He swallowed nervously and spoke in a raspy voice. "Someone killed all the monsters that turned into us at Edmond Station."

"And they did it fast." Tang Erda crouched at the edge of the hole, touching the lingering bloodstains with two fingers. He looked up with a stony expression. "The blood hasn't even clotted yet."

Bai Liu's gaze shifted from the bloodstains to Muke's face. "I thought you said these monsters, the ones that turned into us, had skills?"

"Yes." Muke looked shocked. His pupils were slightly constricted, and he seemed to struggle for a moment before answering Bai Liu's question. "We confronted these monsters before we left, and we almost got held hostage by them."

"But they weren't as strong as us. I think it's because they're still developing. Their abilities are only about half of ours." Liu Jiayi added, looking down with a heavy sigh.

"But there's not just one version of us here at Edmond Station," she continued. "There's a whole bunch of them."

"They took control of a group of monsters with abilities roughly similar to ours and subdued them quickly," she explained. "Then they smashed the floor with a whip, made an acid pool, and disposed of the bodies there."

Liu Jiayi's face hardened. "Spades' ability... it's too strong. He's even stronger than he was last year."

"We can't win against him, even as a group. So what do we do now?" She tilted her head, looking at Bai Liu, awaiting his thoughts.

Bai Liu crouched on one knee at the edge of the cave, staring for a moment at the [Bai Liu] submerged and dissolving in the acid pool below.

As the charred corpses with their own faces disintegrated into bones and then into bubbling particles and debris, Bai Liu stood, withdrawing his gaze and turning to the others.

"Search the entire observatory to figure out why Spades is here."

Half an hour later, the group had reconvened on the ground floor.

Muke, who specialized in memorizing and searching maps, was the first to report his findings.

"I've searched a lot of places, but it looks like they were searching for something specific. However, the searches were sketchy—not like they were looking for written information or small objects."

"Spades hasn't been found to have taken anything so far, so whatever he's looking for isn't here yet."

"He didn't even touch the rifles and bullets scattered around the fourth floor," Tang Erda added. "They're in the same condition as when we left."

Bai Liu sat down at the table and pulled out a piece of paper. Calmly, he summarized the situation. "First, we can be sure of one thing: Spades has repeatedly entered the game searching for something. It's most likely related to the main game line."

"Spades and I logged in together at Edmond Observatory at the beginning, but instead of searching the place, he left and went outside. From that, we can infer that at that time, Spades didn't think Edmond Observatory held what he was looking for."

Bai Liu paused for a moment, tapping the tip of his pen on the paper. "But now he's back."

Liu Jiayi soon realized why. "Spades didn't find what he was looking for outside, so he came back to Edmond Observatory to try his luck. He must have come across the replicas we left here, killed them, searched again, and still didn't find anything, so he left again."

Bai Liu's eyes narrowed, his pen thoughtfully tapping on the paper. "The real question is: What is Spades looking for, that he keeps coming back for it?"

"The main quest of this game is global warming, and Spades is probably looking for something related to that," Muke mused. "Is it possible that the boss at the end of the level is Edmond? According to the general design of the game, if you defeat the boss at the bottom of the level, you can clear the game and reach the [normal end]."

"I don't think Spades would be interested in just reaching the [normal end], given his abilities and how many times he's been in the game," Bai Liu countered.

The tip of his pen paused twice on the paper before he wrote the word [corpse].

Bai Liu looked up. "I think Spades is probably looking for a particle weather device made from a [corpse]. He's likely aiming for the [true end] of the game, to eliminate the possibility of global cooling at its source."

"In Edmond's method, he likely placed the particle weather device at one of the six hundred locations where he believed the Antarctic had an impact on the world's climate."

Muke was puzzled. "But the six hundred locations were marked on the map. If Spades wanted to find them, he could have just followed the map. There was no need to come to Edmond Observatory—there's no particle weather device here."

Bai Liu wrote down [600] and [Experimental Sample Preservation] on the paper, placing a question mark next to them.

He looked up at Muke. "That means Spades isn't looking for body parts among the six hundred particle devices. He's looking outside of them."

Muke repeated softly, "The corpse beyond these six hundred particle devices..."

As realization dawned on him, his eyes widened. "It's Edmond who hasn't done the experiment to turn it into a particle device corpse, right?!"

Bai Liu nodded lightly. "Edmond is an experienced researcher. He doesn't consume all the experimental material at once. He usually keeps some as samples. That's what Spades is after."

"Look through the lab report. Which of Edmond's preliminary pieces was left untouched?"

Muke quickly flipped through the report, his fingertips tracing the obscure entries until he found a word.

"Found it!"

"Among the three body parts Edmond acquired in the early days were the left hand, the hind ankle, and a whole heart with preserved arterial vessels and veins derived from it."

Muke looked up, excitement in his voice. "I found records of experiments on the left hand and hind ankle, but nothing about the heart. Edmond most likely kept it as a sample reserve!"

Bai Liu donned his gloves and hat, pushing open the door. "This heart is what Spades is looking for. It's the key to unlocking the [true end] of the game. Let's go."

The wind and snow swallowed Bai Liu's dark, deep eyes, carrying his calm voice into the dusk.

"We have to beat Spades to it by finding the heart before he destroys it."

The tide rises and falls along the ice-strewn shore, and the brown earth and white snow stretching inland are marked by a little Mu house of great age.

The house, an old-looking Little Mu cottage, has peeling paint on the door frame and floor rails, leaving leper-like stains on the exterior. Its roof is stacked precariously on decaying, load-bearing walls, held in place by planks arranged horizontally.

In front of the entrance, a sign resembling a tourist location plaque reads: [Scott's Cottage], followed by [Built in 1912].

This century-old cottage, now a heritage site, emanates warmth from within, as though someone is resting inside, roasting by the fire.

The fire crackles under the mantelpiece as an old man sits squinting on a wooden bench nearby.

He wears a pair of faded, gold-rimmed glasses, humming a song off-key, tapping his feet in time with the rhythm. His arms and legs are hunched, as if he's endured much over the years.

The firelight reflects off his pale, wrinkled face, casting shifting shadows against the walls.

From the dark shadows, Spades steps forward, standing at the edge of the firelight, his long whip in hand, his long eyelashes and hair dusted with snow that hasn't yet melted.

He looks at the old man, his voice clear and slow: "Edmond."

The old man opens one eye slightly, gazing over at Spades with a touch of helpless amusement. "There you go again, young man. You seem to enjoy coming to my place."

Edmond smiles amiably. "You've killed me many times... for that heart you can't always find?"

"Is that important to you?"

Spades opens his mouth to speak but instead answers the question,

"You shouldn’t remember that I killed you."

Edmond removes his glasses and looks at Spades with a soft smile. "Because I’m just an evil NPC in a game where every time this copy is supposed to start over with your departure, and I forget everything, right?"

Spades nods.

Edmond smiles. "Maybe I’ve lived too long and done things so cruelly that God won’t forgive me for remembering what I’ve done. I do remember you killing me so many times. You’re the most frequent visitor in this game. I almost want to be friends with you."

His gaze lingers on Spades' dripping whip for a moment. "Surely it would be nice if you didn’t strangle me with it as soon as you enter the game. The choking is always painful. I'd rather be burned, if you’ll let me choose how I die."

Spades agrees without hesitation. "Yes."

Edmond laughs loudly. "Son, I believe you really can't understand people's jokes anymore."

"That group of your teammates has been having a headache over you, right? That guy called [Inquisitor of the Reverse God] has been so distressed he couldn't resist pouring out his troubles to an NPC of mine. He said he didn't know what to do with you."

Edmond surveys Spades playfully. "He looked so sad he almost cried. It's a funny and troubling thing to have a friend like you."

Spades doesn’t judge others' definitions of him; he always speaks and acts straightforwardly. "Are you still not going to tell me where the heart is this time?"

Edmond's eyes reflect the firelight. Though he’s an old man, his eyes remain clear, almost as pure as the snow that fell 30,000 years ago beneath the Antarctic ice, a pale blue that is nearly icy.

"I can't, my boy." Edmond’s expression becomes distant, and he shakes his head. "You can kill me again, but I will never tell you where I hid the heart."

"That is my original sin, and only God knows where it hides."

Spades purses his lips into a straight line, clearly unhappy with the result. A subtle depression forms in the movement of his fingers, snapping the whip.

Edmond looks at him with the same friendly smile, a knowing look in his eyes. "You found all six hundred of my particle devices this time, too. I rarely see a player find them all without freezing to death. You're good."

"But there is one device that is ineffective." Spades looks at Edmond. "The device under Ice Dome A isn't filled with corpse particles, and I can't gather all six hundred corpse particles."

"But you've already won this game, haven't you?" Edmond shakes his head fervently, raising a finger for emphasis. "Your friend, the Reverse God, tells me you only care about winning and losing. You've got what you want, so why not let my secret remain just a secret forever?"

Edmond looks at Spades with a smile on his lips and his ice-shattered, light blue eyes glinting in the dusky campfire light. "Why are you so attached to a heart that doesn't belong to you? It's not romantic."

Spades pauses briefly—it seems he doesn't know the exact answer to this question, either.

"Intuition. I had to destroy the heart and all the body parts."

Spades raises his eyes. "Every man has his predetermined destiny, and I can see that the destiny of this heart is linked to me. It should be destroyed by me."

"Neither it nor I should exist in this world."

Edmond's smile fades, and he mutters, "You're self-destructing, son..."

"Hmm," Spades replies calmly, then asks, "What was the original sin you were trying to hide?"

Edmond's face loses its smile, showing the weariness that comes with age. He holds his forehead, letting out a long sigh, unable to hide the tired trance in his movements. "My original sin was the one thing I never realized I should repent for."

"I resented the things that persecuted me, hated the students who betrayed me, and pitied the friends I once aspired to." Edmond takes a deep, slow breath, exhaling like he's smoking, his gaze far away through the fire at his feet. "I've never done a single thing worth repentance, but there is one thing that made me realize that there's more to my ugliness than that."

Edmond's hands tremble as they rest on the side of his chair. He closes his eyes, tears falling into the deep lines of his face, his voice hoarse and heavy. "Those are the body parts."

"That's not some corpse; that's the dismembered limb of a living creature—one who is conscious, who feels, who knows what I'm doing to him."

Edmond opens his eyes. His clear ones finally cloud, and he chokes out, "And I didn't know what I'd done until I saw the heart that kept beating."

"I'm abusing a living person."

Edmond turns his head to look at Spades, who seems to have aged in an instant.

"The plot of the game you speak of is, perhaps, my destiny. I'm drawn by this fate, by the unseen gods' threads, towards the abyss of self-destruction, forming a cycle that supplies the entertainment of others who come and go. I thought I could escape this terrible game myself."

"But after escaping, I found that I was only in a larger cycle of destiny again, always a toy in the hands of the gods who set my fate. Humans are always destined for self-destruction because of uncontrolled desires—a fate the gods gave us. They wanted to see this."

Edmond's eyes shake with tears. "All of us deserve to be punished for the cruelty we've been given by fate, but I know that in the eyes of the unseen god, the undue punishment I inflicted out of anger was just one piece of his calculated destiny."

"Everything I do is just... games."

Spades looks at him without a ripple of emotion. "But you can decide how you die this time."

"I will burn you as I wish, and it will be no game for you, nor for me."

Edmond smiles through his tears. "I know."

"It's... the victory you want, and the fate I want."

The other end.

Bai Liu was on the ground in a helicopter, having passed three points marked on the map—one of the six hundred locations.

But none of the results had been as promising as hoped.

The buoys on the surface had all been pulled out and destroyed. They didn't even need to sink to find them; the remains of the apparatus lay directly on the edge of the shore. The metal box had been casually dropped in the device, and the particles inside had been destroyed cleanly.

The particle devices on the ground had been released into the sky, tied to weather balloons.

Bai Liu's team had already seen several punctured balloons buried in the snow on the ground—just like those on the coast. The particles in the metal box had been destroyed.

The further they ventured toward the locations marked on the maps, the worse things became.

At the sight of the hollowed-out device next to Ice Dome A, Bai Liu gave the order to abort. "All six hundred devices should have been checked by Spades. Edmond wouldn't have hidden the heart in any of these six hundred locations."

"And where could he have hidden it?" Muke shouted over the gale so Bai Liu could hear him, "These six hundred locations include all the significant places to Edmond—Ice Dome A, the South Pole, Tarzan Station, Scott's hut. Could he have hidden the heart anywhere else?"

"There is." Bai Liu turned to Muke. "Do you remember what the main quest of this copy is?"

Muke nodded. "Global warming."

"If global cooling was Edmond's punishment for everyone—including himself—when their desires got out of hand, then global warming is an opportunity for him to transform." Bai Liu's breath turned to frost in the cold air.

As they spoke, Tang Erda steered the helicopter toward a new landing site.

Bai Liu stepped out onto an open snowfield, the helicopter landing steadily behind him.

This was a new, untouched site—no footprints, no traces left behind. There were no devices placed here, no signs of anyone visiting. It was far from any observatories, and it didn’t even have a unique geographical name.

A strange, featureless location, no matter how you looked at it.

It was the spot Bai Liu had chosen for Tang Erda to land.

Muke jogged after Bai Liu, breathing heavily. "Bai Liu, do you think this is where Edmond hid his heart?"

He almost asked why Bai Liu thought this was the place, but Muke, having blind faith in him, thought he'd first dig in on his own.

However, someone else asked, and Mu Sicheng turned to Bai Liu, puzzled. "Why would Edmond hide his heart here? I don’t even know where this place is, and I haven’t seen it in any of Edmond's faxes or lab reports."

Bai Liu put on his anti-friction gloves and started helping Tang Erda carry the equipment for the ice excavation.

Mu Sicheng stepped forward to take over, watching Bai Liu with curious eyes.

Bai Liu leaned over, pulling a pile of lab reports from the back seat of the helicopter and handing them to Mu Sicheng. "Read and explain as you go—just as I said earlier, global cooling is Edmond’s punishment for humanity in his anger, but before that, global warming was also a punishment—a punishment mankind brought upon itself."

Mu Sicheng couldn't help but exclaim, "What have I done wrong? Why am I being punished for both the cold and the heat?"

Bai Liu chuckled softly. "Yes, it’s a Christian idea—being born with original sin and living is the process of atonement. If you view Edmond’s whole process as him asking humanity to atone for their sins, it becomes much clearer."

"He felt others were guilty, so he punished them. He thought Tarzan Station was sinless, but even this sinlessness was a sin in a sinful environment, inviting bullying. So, Edmond was determined to sharpen Tarzan Station so they could survive as humans on Noah's Ark."

"Deep down, Edmond knew what he was doing was wrong and sinful. His own process of atonement," Bai Liu's eyes grew deep, "was to hide the heart that he himself had never touched—to protect the first innocent person he was forced to mutilate under various oppressive circumstances. He saved the heart both to preserve the experimental samples and to preserve his own 'original sin.'"

Bai Liu looked at Mu Sicheng. "What do you think—why would Edmond keep his original sin?"

Mu Sicheng shook his head honestly.

Bai Liu smiled. "The day he made up his mind to commit his crime, of course. And it took effect."

Mu Sicheng's eyes widened with questions. "What day was that again?"

"The tenth of August—the day he began pickling sauerkraut for the men of Tarzan Station." Bai Liu looked at the empty space in front of him, a smile curling on his lips. "And this location is the coldest place in the Antarctic on August 10th, according to Edmond's accumulated thirty-three years of temperature records."

"There is no better place to store a beating heart than this."

The Ice Age

Mu Sicheng looked down, flipping through the thick pile of temperature records Bai Liu had handed him from the past thirty-three years. He found the coldest spot on the tenth of August the previous year.

The records clearly indicated the latitude and longitude of this location—it was exactly where Bai Liu and his team were now.

Tang Erda moved the radar detector onto the ice, exhaled a hot breath, then straightened up and turned to Bai Liu. "The usual—probe first, then drill?"

Bai Liu nodded.

Tang Erda moved the weighing hydraulic hammer onto the ice. After carefully checking that there were no ice crevices in the vicinity, he climbed into the helicopter and began operating the instrument.

Liu Jiayi followed him back to the helicopter.

The wind was so fierce in this part of the world that it almost felt like it could flatten her, forcing her to return to the helicopter.

Liu Jiayi leaned her hands on the driver's seat, her feet perched awkwardly, straining to see the radar screen on the dashboard.

The instrument scanned layer by layer, and finally, at over a thousand meters, it detected a regular metal object. This discovery made her frown. "That deep? How long will it take to dig?"

"A conservative estimate is over six hours," Tang Erda replied, rubbing her frozen hands from carrying the instruments. "It’s a bit of a problem. It's so cold here that even if we work in shifts, the others won't be able to warm up. The fuel is running low too."

"It would be dangerous to force the excavation."

Liu Jiayi glanced at the thermometer hanging near Tang Erda’s hand and looked up at him, asking, "But it’s not that cold here. It’s only about -30°C. Haven't you worked in -50°C conditions at Taishan Station before? Why is it more dangerous to work here?"

"Because of the wind," Tang Erda explained, his tone stony. "In Antarctica, the wind is colder than the snow."

"Cold temperatures only slowly take away heat from a person. But high-speed winds can strip away body temperature much more quickly. If we're working in this kind of wind with imperfect equipment and warmth, we'll lose heat far too quickly and risk freezing to death from the wind."

Tang Erda glanced over at Bai Liu and the others outside the helicopter, stabilizing the equipment.

Within minutes, Mu Sicheng and Muke had turned purple from the cold. They kept moving lightly on the snow to stay warm. Tang Erda showed rare concern. "I'll go down and replace them."

"But you won't last long in these gales. You'll freeze just like the rest," Liu Jiayi said sharply. "Even if we take turns digging and forcing our hearts to continue, it's just a matter of time before we freeze to death. We're out of supplies to warm up, and the fuel is nearly gone, right?"

Liu Jiayi paused, struggling to hold back her words, but eventually spoke out.

"We don't need to keep playing Spades for now. We can't win against him at this stage. We should convince Bai Liu to log out first."

"Both this task of excavating a heart a kilometer down and beating Spades are too much bravado for us!"

Liu Jiayi was clinging to the side of the helicopter, her eyes red with faint tears. Her voice, almost lost in the snow and wind, sounded like that of a helpless little girl.

"Spades... he's really terrifying. I saw Hearts face him, and she asked me if I could save her from Spades. I didn't answer her then."

"But I can tell you the answer now—it's no. I can't save any of my teammates from Spades." Liu Jiayi stifled a sob, her thin white fingers clutching the side of the helicopter. "I don't want to see Spades kill Bai Liu, like when he threw [Bai Liu] into the pool of strong acid before."

"He's bound to lose, and I can't save him."

Liu Jiayi cried softly. "But I'm not sure I can persuade Bai Liu to leave the game. He trusts you more—can you help me convince him?"

Tang Erda looked back at the little girl, her eyes glistening with tears. There was a fragile, pleading look in her face, one that made him realize—this little witch, who had once been bloody, cruel, and incredibly clever, was also afraid.

The scene she witnessed at Edmond Station earlier still haunted her.

Despite the fact that the frightened girl had shown no sign of it since boarding the plane, she had remained so calm, waiting for Bai Liu to leave before attempting to conspire against him.

Tang Erda paused slightly as he stepped outside, then turned back to the helicopter, tilting his head toward Liu Jiayi at the door. The wind blew the animal fleece around the edge of his hat.

Liu Jiayi was right, but Bai Liu was the tactician.

This was an unquestionable fact.

"Are you questioning the tactician's decision?" Tang Erda asked in a hushed voice.

Liu Jiayi bit her lower lip, silent.

"Never question the tactician's decisions," Tang Erda said firmly, looking straight at Liu Jiayi. "The moment he made the decision, he was ready to give his life for victory. Bai Liu understands the consequences of all this better than you do."

"But for the tactician, winning the game is all that matters. Your job, as his player, is to execute his decisions and win the game."

Liu Jiayi's voice was hoarse. "Even if Bai Liu dies for this victory, it doesn't matter, does it?"

Tang Erda replied calmly, "Yes, it doesn't matter."

"Because that's what he wants."

Tang Erda finished and turned to leave, making heavy footprints in the snow.

Liu Jiayi stood by the door, staring down at the footprints for a moment. She took a deep breath, rubbed the tears from her eyes, then turned back to the door and began rummaging through the boxes for maps and information.

She gritted her teeth, her thoughts hardening. Let's survive. Let's get through this and retrieve the heart first.

We can't freeze to death here!

By the time Bai Liu and his team were rotated back in by Tang Erda with the drill, Liu Jiayi had expertly set up camp in the snow and brought out heating equipment to keep the three men warm.

Mu Sicheng, shivering with a cup of hot water in his hands, could barely speak through his chattering teeth: "Shit—ah—it's—too—cold!"

Liu Jiayi handed Bai Liu a small plush blanket. He took it and wiped the ends of his hair. "Thank you."

"We're running out of fuel," Liu Jiayi said calmly once the group had settled down. She then outlined their dilemma. "There's just enough fuel for the helicopter to fly, but not enough to last for six hours."

Bai Liu thought for a moment before offering a solution. "Are there any other observation posts nearby? We can check the map and see if there's fuel and supplies to replenish."

"Yes, I thought the same thing," Liu Jiayi said, pulling out a map and laying it between them. "But after checking it carefully, I found only one place where there might be a stockpile of supplies."

She pointed to a small symbol on the map. "This is the Scott Hut, a relic left by early explorers who came over in 1912."

Muke poked his head around, breathing into his palms. "But would a historic building like this, made of wood and highly flammable, really have a large reserve of fuel?"

"Yes," Liu Jiayi replied, nodding confidently. "I looked through Edmond's books, and there's a tourist brochure that mentions this Scott Hut. The Little Mu house is still maintained and refurbished, and people live near it, so there's a fuel reserve."

Bai Liu nodded. "It's not far from here. We can head straight to the Scott Hut first."

He gave his orders. "Muke, Mu Sicheng, and Jiayi, come with me. Take a small amount of fuel and supplies, but leave most of the rest for Captain Tang. He's hardy, has helicopter piloting skills, and knows Antarctica better, so he should focus on drilling and digging here."

"We'll give him a satellite call once we reach the hut. If there's fuel, have him come over to refuel. If not, we'll keep him where he is."

Bai Liu looked around the room. "Any objections?"

Muke and Mu Sicheng answered in unison: "No."

Liu Jiayi pursed her lips, remaining silent.

Bai Liu studied her quietly.

After a moment, Liu Jiayi raised her red eyes to meet his. "Do you really have to win against Spades?"

Bai Liu smiled. "I have to."

Although she had expected this answer, Liu Jiayi couldn't help but scold him. "Does it not matter to you if you die?"

Bai Liu smiled again as he stood up. He patted Liu Jiayi's head, then gently wiped away the tears she was holding back with his thumb before pulling her into a hug. "I promise I'll beat him before I die."

The group left Tang Erda behind and set off toward Scott's Hut with their sleds.

Scott's Hut was indeed close, and they walked for only a short while before seeing the nostalgic building on the coast.

A faint light glowed from the Little Mu room, and a warm heat greeted the group after their journey through the snow and wind. The warmth was so comforting that Mu Sicheng couldn't help but relax, his shoulders easing as the cold left him.

Bai Liu set aside his sled, removed his snow boots, grabbed his whip, and entered Scott's Hut.

Inside, an old man sat on a creaking wooden stool, his eyes half-closed as he warmed himself by the fireplace. He was dozing, his arms crossed over his belly, his beard twitching as small snorts escaped the corner of his mouth in his sleep.

The sound of Bai Liu's footsteps entering and the wind chill breaking in through the door woke him. He blinked his sleepy eyes, then saw Bai Liu standing just a few meters away.

The old man didn't seem distressed by the unexpected visitor. Instead, he raised an eyebrow in surprise. "Look what we have here."

Edmond's gaze fell on the whip in Bai Liu’s hand, and he smiled. "Another new guest who likes to use the whip."

"The other guest with the whip left for the time being, saying he'd give me the death I wanted when he found the heart."

Edmond gazed at Bai Liu calmly, almost peacefully, a smile playing on his lips as though he had been expecting this moment. "But I know he won't find it. It's not his heart; it's yours. You found where I hid it, didn't you?"

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow, turning a wooden stool around to sit, his gaze fixed on Edmond with mild interest. "You don't seem like a simple NPC. How do you know?"

Edmond removed the charming glasses hanging from his ears. Beneath them, his eyes, cold and encased in floating crushed ice, seemed to hold an endless depth of sorrow.

In a trance, he gently touched Bai Liu's hand with his withered knuckles. "I've seen you, in someone's prophetic dream."

Bai Liu frowned. "Who's in the prophecy?"

"[The Judge Against God]," Edmond murmured softly, his eyes lidding lazily, "a man who betrayed God. I absorbed his memories, so I saw the truth of everything—everything about the future and the prophecy concerning you."

"I was awakened by it," he continued, a faraway look in his eyes. "I could no longer forget what happened, nor could I fade into death, because it wasn't real. I knew I would come back to life."

"In the end, I had to punish myself, over and over, at the hands of players like you, just to keep myself from vanishing."

"Only God—only God can completely erase my sins and destroy the existence of this game-like, evil world."

Edmond's unfocused eyes met Bai Liu's as his lips trembled. "I saw in the prophecy that you could do all of this."

"It was a prophecy of both hope and despair, a destiny that belongs to you—and to God."

Edmond's voice took on a distant, almost holy tone as he recited the prophecy.

"The evil god boasts that there will be those who drift in his shadow. The man in the shadow is fourteen years old. Then the evil god gave this man a spine, a heart, and a divine emblem. It boasts that this person will be its only believer. The man in the shadow is twenty-four years old. Then the evil gods fell in the snowy plains, and the dead faithful drifted into the deep."

"The backbone, the heart, the divine emblem—shattered."

Edmond's gaze fixed on Bai Liu, his words like a curse. "The evil gods change, the gods die because of you—because evil lives forever."

As he finished, Edmond arched his back and coughed violently, as if struck by some irresistible curse. He quickly pulled a bloodstained silk scarf from his pocket and covered his mouth, coughing up blood with a hoarse, rasping sound.

He tilted his head as if he could barely breathe, his face twisted in pain as he gasped for air, clutching Bai Liu's hand with a death grip.

"Only the game that God has tread upon is real," Edmond gasped, his voice thin and strained. "Only the game that God has rejected is destroyable. Only the monster that God has slain will never exist again."

"Bai Liu," he choked, his bloodshot eyes staring at him intensely, "the moment you enter this game, it is real in every dimension."

"If Spades truly destroyed those corpses, Tawil would no longer exist in any place, at any point in time."

"It would crack, weaken, like all the monsters you've faced before. It would disappear completely, forever—erased from all the worlds that can perceive it, leaving no trace that it ever existed."

"It is not invincible, my son. The death you've dealt is its only weakness."

Edmond's face turned a suffocating shade of pale, his voice barely audible as his eyes welled up with tears, as though an invisible hand was throttling his throat, preventing him from speaking further. "I'm sorry, I'm sorry."

"I know it's important to you, but my son, no one can escape their fate

—not even God."

"The price for defying fate is more than you can imagine."

When Edmond released his grip on Bai Liu's hand, it felt as though the invisible grip around his throat loosened as well.

He staggered off the stool, gasping and coughing weakly, before pulling a small tin bottle of vodka from his fanny pack. He tilted his head back, taking two quick swigs to catch his breath.

Bai Liu's face remained expressionless, his hands still resting on the table in Edmond's firm grasp. His dark eyes were unwavering as he stared across the table at the older man.

"Since there's a price for defying fate," Bai Liu said calmly, "it's simply a trade."

Edmond's cheeks flushed red as he met his gaze. "It was indeed a bargain, but the price was too steep. The god who bargained with us for our fate was too greedy—a man no one could redeem from his hand."

Bai Liu's tone remained even. "Since we can't trade, let's kill him and make someone else a god."

With those words, he stood and casually pushed away from the table, as though nothing had transpired. Edmond shook his head and waved his hand in resignation.

"I know what you're here for," he muttered, his voice still hoarse. "The fuel is at the back of the house. You can take it."

He took another sip of the vodka, muttering to himself, "Just save a barrel for me... I'll use it to burn myself."

"Everything... is almost over."

Without a word, Bai Liu turned and left.

The group took the fuel and headed back. Edmond seemed to have known they were coming, already strapping the fuel to the sleds. There was no need to call Tang Erda to fly a helicopter over to pull the load.

Everything was going smoothly, but the mood on the way back was unexpectedly heavy. Silence fell over them, and the atmosphere was filled with a sense of unease.

Mu Sicheng wanted to ask about the prophecy, but the overwhelmed look on Liu Jiayi's face stopped him from speaking up.

Bai Liu handed over the fuel to Tang Erda with an air of calm, then returned to the helicopter to record the data. He sent the others to the tent to warm up before preparing for Tang Erda's turn later.

Everything seemed to be running without a hitch, but instead of going into the tent to warm up as Bai Liu had hoped, Liu Jiayi climbed into the helicopter.

Shivering with cold, her grey eyes red from the wind, she spoke in a hoarse voice, struggling to hold back her emotions. "Bai Liu, what do you want?"

Bai Liu, sitting in the driver's seat, didn't turn around to answer her. It was a rare occurrence for him to remain silent.

Though he appeared authoritarian, ever since Liu Jiayi had spoken to him, Bai Liu had been asking everyone's opinion before making decisions. He wasn't the typical hard-nosed tactician, but rather someone who listened and never shied away from talking to his players about their concerns.

Liu Jiayi's hesitation was unexpected, as it was a challenge to Bai Liu's usual style. Yet, his silence confirmed her suspicions.

Bai Liu… was really going to do something out of the ordinary.

Liu Jiayi asked again, her voice trembling, "Bai Liu, can you look me in the eye and tell me what was going through your mind when Edmond said Tawil would disappear?"

Bai Liu still didn't turn around but finally spoke, "I'm trying to figure out how to beat Spades."

"Without destroying Tawil's heart, right?!" Liu Jiayi's voice was almost shrill now.

She struggled to remain calm. "Bai Liu, wake up! Spades already played the [true end] line. Most of Tawil's corpses have been destroyed by him. You have to destroy the heart if you want to pass the game."

"Even if you can beat Spades and force him out of the game, if you protect Tawil from destruction and prevent this game from ending, then you'll have to stay here forever—"

"- With this heart, in this snowfield," Bai Liu finished her sentence in a flat tone. "As long as there's one player trapped in the game, it will never end. The game's ending can't be loaded into reality; time will stand still. Tawil will always exist, even with just one heart left."

Liu Jiayi burst into tears, her voice shaking as she cursed, "What the hell, Bai Liu! You're crazy! You'll freeze to death out here!"

She tried to stay composed, but the words came out harshly. "Bai Liu, the system shop and warehouse in the game pool are closed. We can't put any game into the pool for reincarnation until the game ends. If you stay here and force us out, no one will ever find you again. Even if you use soul notes, you won't be able to contact us."

"You'll be left here alone, watching your supplies dwindle, until you starve and freeze to death!"

Liu Jiayi could already guess what Bai Liu would do next. He would force them out. She knew him too well.

But Bai Liu didn't deny it. Instead, he smiled at her. "I won't. I can eat the flesh of monsters, become a monster, and survive..."

Before he could finish, Liu Jiayi, in a moment of frustration, stepped forward and raised her hand to slap him.

Bai Liu deflected the blow with ease.

"You're a beast, Bai Liu." Liu Jiayi's voice trembled with tears as she glared at him, her cheeks flushed from crying. "What happened to you? You need to tell me what the hell is going on with you."

Knowing what Bai Liu was going to do, knowing that he'd always done things his way, that he was unstoppable and determined—Liu Jiayi couldn't stop him. She could only guess his actions and watch him carry them out.

Unable to hold back any longer, Liu Jiayi's tears flowed freely as she cursed, "Bai Liu, you're a real piece of work. I must be blind to be on your team."

Bai Liu lowered his gaze, feeling the sting of her slap, a small five-finger mark on his face. "I’m sorry."

Liu Jiayi turned away, her shoulders shaking as she sniffled.

Since joining the team, Bai Liu had never apologized to anyone. Yet, here he was, apologizing to her twice. But it didn't change anything. He still cared more about others than himself, always focused on the bigger picture.

Who cared if he apologized? He just didn’t understand. He didn’t know...

Liu Jiayi’s mind was in turmoil again, and she wanted to slap him once more. But in the end, she simply collapsed back into her seat, exhausted. The seat felt too wide for her, and she hugged herself, curling into a ball.

In a soft, disoriented voice, she asked, "Is Tawil really that important to you?"

Bai Liu, looking out the window of the helicopter, didn’t answer right away.

The snow and wind outside had stopped, and the rare Antarctic daylight shone brightly across the snowy surface. The light refracted through the glass, casting a soft, pale glow on Bai Liu’s face.

He was smiling—gently, almost like the snow melting on his face.

"Yes." Bai Liu turned to Liu Jiayi, his voice the softest it had ever been.

His brow arched slightly as he repeated, "Yes."

"He’s very, very important."

The Ice Age

"So, what are you going to do with... us?" Liu Jiayi shrank back into her seat, burying her head in her knees. "You're going to throw us out of the game, and then what?"

"I'm not going to throw you out of the game. You still have things to do for me," Bai Liu replied, looking at Liu Jiayi.

Liu Jiayi raised her head slightly, her eyes red as she met his gaze. "What is it?"

"Because no one has cleared Ice Age yet, no [end] line has appeared. That means the game's counterpart to reality is stagnant. The subplot hasn't been loaded into reality, so there's still room for things to change in reality."

Bai Liu continued, "I need you to leave the game and stop that plane from crashing in the Antarctic."

Liu Jiayi sat up, realizing there was still a chance to act. She frowned and asked, "But the way this game loads into reality, the plane is probably already over the Antarctic. As soon as we log out, time will start flowing normally in reality, and it won't be long before it crashes."

"We can't stop a plane that's about to crash, especially not in the Antarctic."

Bai Liu smiled. "No, someone can."

Liu Jiayi tilted her head in confusion. "Who?"

Bai Liu replied, "Du Sanying."

Just then, Tang Erda knocked on the helicopter's hatch. "I can already faintly see the outline of the metal box."

He exhaled a white breath, frost hanging from his brow and hair. But his scowl was even more chilling than the cold. "It's a box from the Bureau of Heresy."

Reality, over the Antarctic.

The five escorts aboard the biplane sensed something was wrong as it neared landing. They hadn't received the long-dialed communication signal.

Exchanging uneasy glances, a sense of foreboding settled over them.

"Aircraft—zzzz—calling ground comms—zzzz—encountering heavy cloud and turbulence, come in..."

The radio remained silent. The air currents, now stronger and bumpier, hit both wings, causing the escorts to take a deep breath, bracing for the worst.

"What's up ahead?"

"The Ross Sea."

"Prepare for a forced landing."

Antarctica, open area in front of the observatory near Ice Dome A.

A group of observers in bright red rash suits rubbed their hands and stomped their feet as they anxiously looked up at the sky, whispering among themselves.

"I thought we were supposed to line up the ice fissures to facilitate the plane’s landing today. Why aren't we there yet?"

"I don't know. I just came out of the observatory. The liaison officer inside said they hadn’t been able to contact the pilot for a while. The satellite phone's been used every way possible, but there's no signal..."

"Nothing’s going to happen, is it?"

Bureau of Heresy Handling, Region I.

Su Yang, looking exhausted and tense, walked through the long, dimly lit corridors in a captain’s uniform that was slightly too big for him. He rounded a corner and entered a mechanical room.

The room was cluttered—coffee cups were strewn across tables, and several ground communicators, haggard with exhaustion, stared at the big screen.

These men, with black and blue eyes, looked as though they could collapse at any moment.

Captain Su's high-priority task of transporting body parts had kept everyone on edge.

Since the escort had left port and crossed the Antarctic, the ground communicators had been working non-stop, doing overtime for days without rest.

But even with such vigilance, just as the plane was about to reach the South Pole, something went terribly wrong.

By some means, they could no longer establish contact with the five escorts on the plane.

One of the communicators turned to Su Yang with a grimace. "Captain Su, what should we do?"

Su Yang hadn't closed his eyes since sending off the escort. He stared at the pure white surface of the Antarctic snow displayed on the big screen, his mind momentarily blank, overwhelmed by the blinding color.

A wave of helplessness washed over him. No matter what they did, it felt like nothing could stop the inevitable.

"Is that why [the prophet] has supreme authority in the Heresy Bureau?" Cen Buming appeared beside the disoriented Su Yang.

Su Yang, still in a daze, turned to him. "Captain Cen..."

Cen Buming crossed his arms, his hawk-like yellow eyes scanning the snow before he turned to Su Yang. "Because [seeing] is far more important than [doing]."

"Fate has its own path, and we, the men of the cards, can only obey."

Without another word, Cen Buming brushed past Su Yang, his footsteps resolute. "Prepare to collect the bodies of the five escorts."

"Captain Su, what should we do?"

"Captain Su, are we still in touch?"

"Captain Su..."

"Captain Su..."

Su Yang closed his eyes, leaning heavily on the edge of the table. His voice was hoarse, but firm. "Live and let die. Tell the Antarctic team to prepare search and rescue crews... and body bags."

"Bring me back the man, no matter what."

In-game.

Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng took over from Tang Erda to continue the work. The wind had calmed down, replaced by the harsh, direct rays of the sun and intense UV light.

Mu Sicheng, sweating, felt the temperature on the ice rise, creeping uncomfortably closer to his core.

"Tch, what's going on?" Mu Sicheng muttered, adjusting his collar as heat and sweat rose together. "Why is it suddenly getting so hot? Could it get any more miserable here?"

Bai Liu crouched down, inspecting the ice, which was visibly starting to melt. "It’s not that the weather has suddenly gotten warmer," he explained. "It’s because we have to dig out the heart and complete the main quest, so the globe is beginning to warm up."

Tang Erda peeked out from the helicopter and shouted, "Bai Liu, the temperature is rising abnormally. It's above zero now!"

He jumped out of the helicopter, walking up to Bai Liu. "At this rate, the ice will melt quickly."

Bai Liu shook his head. "I don't think it’s just a rapid melt. The heart is likely the core part of Edmond’s device for global cooling, and it’s the final piece in the [true end] line."

"If it's taken out, I suspect this global warming will cause the entire Antarctic ice cap to melt."

Tang Erda frowned. "Wouldn't that turn Antarctica into a vast ocean?"

Bai Liu looked up at him. "There's more trouble than that."

"If the ice cap melts completely, the size of Antarctica would shrink drastically. The loss of ice and snow would lead to dramatic climate changes, and the extreme weather—like blizzards—would subside, making it easier for us to be tracked on such a map."

Bai Liu paused, then added, "It will increase the speed at which Spades finds us."

His meaning was clear: if they didn't hide the heart, it was only a matter of time before Spades came looking for it.

Tang Erda frowned. "But where can we hide it? Spades is fast and has incredible movement speed. He can scout all of Antarctica at any time, anywhere. You can't just hide the heart somewhere safe."

He sighed sharply. "Apart from his lack of skill in decryption, this guy is the perfect lead attacker."

Bai Liu smiled. "That’s exactly it. Let’s make a puzzle for him."

Tang Erda blinked. "A puzzle?"

Bai Liu grinned. "Hide the wood in the forest."

Scott Cottage.

With the rapidly rising temperatures, the snow around the hut melted, revealing a muddy mess that stained the wooden boards.

When Bai Liu arrived again, Edmond was stunned. "You’ve dug up the heart?"

"Yes," Bai Liu replied, handing Edmond the metal box. "There’s something I need you to do for me."

Edmond took the box, growing increasingly suspicious. "Is this the box for the heart? Why are you giving it to me?"

Bai Liu smiled. "Please, Professor, do me a favor and hide this heart from Spades."

Edmond let out a bitter laugh. "Son, Spades is the most frequent player here. He probably knows the terrain better than I do. I’m not sure I can find a place to hide the heart in Antarctica where Spades won’t find it."

Bai Liu remained calm. "Maybe I have a place in mind where Fang Ke can hide it. Of course, it’s not perfect and there's a chance it could be found. But for now, in the Ice Age game, it’s the strangest place for Spades to look."

Edmond raised an eyebrow. "What place?"

Bai Liu locked eyes with him. "In my body."

Edmond chuckled, teasing, "How can you hide another heart inside you when you already have one? You can't use two hearts when it comes to love."

Bai Liu replied, completely unfazed, "Just cut out my heart, and there it is."

Edmond froze, realizing Bai Liu wasn't joking.

He stared back and forth between Bai Liu and the box in his hands, incredulity creeping across his face.

"Are you crazy? You want me to take your heart and put this one in its place?!" Edmond sputtered.

"You'll turn into a monster!" Edmond's voice was filled with disbelief as he held up the box with the heart. "You're a real person, with a real life. You're nothing like the product of a game like me."

"Do you understand what this means?!" Edmond hissed, trembling. "If I put the heart inside you and it merges with you, you'll become... a complete monster!"

Bai Liu tilted his head slightly, glancing at the box in Edmond's hand before lowering his gaze to meet his eyes.

"I've always been a monster."

Edmond staggered back a couple of steps, staring at Bai Liu for a long, silent moment. He then collapsed back into his chair, clearly exhausted.

"But even if you hide the heart in your body, it's not enough," Edmond finally said, looking up. "Spades might still find it. After all, he's good at everything, except decryption..."

Bai Liu nodded. "I know. That's why I have a puzzle for him."

"Professor, is there any way you can create a large number of [Bai Liu]s and perform the same heart surgery on each one, inputting my memories from before the surgery and then hiding me among them?"

Edmond looked at Bai Liu, wide-eyed. "Are you trying to... create a multiple-choice question for Spades about hiding wood in the forest?"

"Exactly." Bai Liu lowered his gaze. "And it’s a multiple-choice question with no answer."

"Every [Bai Liu] will think they’re the real one, and they’ll believe the hidden heart is the real heart. Even I won’t know if I’m real or not, and I won’t know who the mystery is."

Bai Liu met Edmond’s eyes. "Just keep making [Bai Liu]s. You’ll dilute Spades’ chances of finding the right one. It’s a puzzle no one can solve."

"We’ll grind it out until he quits the game, and I win."

Edmond sat quietly on the wooden bench, deep in thought.

"Do you know what I see on your face?" he whispered. "I see the me before the experiment—the frenzied madness of doing whatever it takes to save what I love."

Edmond looked up, tears in his eyes. "I’ll help you, son... even if it’s wrong."

Bai Liu nodded, sincerely grateful. "Thank you, Professor Edmond."

The coastline rose higher, and the ice melted smoother under the sun’s rays, continuing to soften until the last sliver of daylight disappeared over the horizon.

Yet, the temperature kept rising.

"It's almost ten degrees." Tang Erda removed his rash guard, scanning the surroundings with a furrowed brow. "Why hasn't Bai Liu returned yet? Didn't he say he'd take the heart to Edmond's to unlock the final episode and destroy it to clear the game and leave?"

Tang Erda hadn't gone with Bai Liu to Little Mu House, so he didn’t know what Edmond had said to him. He also didn’t know the outcome of destroying the heart.

Liu Jiayi pursed her lips, remaining silent, while Muke glanced at her.

Mu Sicheng echoed Tang Erda’s concern: "Yeah, how long has it been?"

"If he doesn't come back soon, the water level is going to rise over us."

Tang Erda looked at the ice floes, now in tatters. "Get on the helicopter—NOW!"

Before Tang Erda could finish his sentence, a jet-black whip shot through the air with unstoppable force, wrapping around the helicopter's landing gear and pulling it back. The sudden motion sent Tang Erda tumbling off his feet.

"Shit! It's Spades!"

Mu Sicheng reacted instinctively, using his skills to open his hands like claws, trying to catch the black whip.

The whip, light yet vicious, struck his palm, and a searing pain shot through his hand, as if every bone had been shattered. Before he could warn the others, the whip flung him beneath the thick ice.

Blood welled up in his mouth as his chest caved in from the impact.

Without hesitation, Tang Erda drew his gun and fired rapidly at Spades, who emerged from the mist, whip in hand. Spades moved with a cold, unflinching expression, flicking his wrist and sending the whip dancing in front of him in an impenetrable streak. The sound of bullets striking the whip rang out in sharp cracks.

Tang Erda's aim was precise—he shot at Spades' shoulder and the hand holding the whip. His intent was clear: disarm Spades.

Though Spades was wounded, blood dripping from his shoulder, he didn't stop. Instead, he continued to close the distance.

Tang Erda backed up, an overwhelming sense of pressure mounting. He shifted into his monster form, [Rose Hunter], and switched to his extended revolver, firing faster.

Spades took several more shots, blood soaking into his clothes, but still, he didn't stop. His focus wasn't on the group—it was on the helicopter.

With relentless precision, Spades smashed the helicopter several times, using his whip to drag its wreckage across the ice, as if searching for something.

When he didn't find what he was looking for, he dropped his whip and turned toward Tang Erda. "Don't you have the heart?"

It dawned on Tang Erda then: Spades wasn't interested in attacking them. He fired two more shots, testing Spades' reaction, pretending that his gun couldn't fire.

Spades was struck, but instead of retaliating, he simply looked at Tang Erda, waiting for an answer.

"The heart isn't with us," Tang Erda replied.

Spades nodded and, without hesitation, lashed out with his whip twice. He looked up, a cold glint in his eyes. "I knew you could've stopped earlier. Here's your two shots back."

Tang Erda: "..."

Spades turned away and walked off, seemingly satisfied.

Mu Sicheng, helped to his feet, spat blood in confusion. "He just came to ask questions? Why'd he hit me?"

Had Spades been present to hear that, he might've simply thought: better to deal with Mu Sicheng first, or he'd get annoying later.

But since Spades wasn't there to explain, Mu Sicheng was left to wonder.

Muke gazed anxiously at Spades' retreating figure. "He's probably gone to find Bai Liu."

"Bai Liu will be fine," Liu Jiayi said, her voice steady. "All he has to do is destroy the heart, and then we're done. We need to exit the game before he clears it so time freezes in reality and we can go fix things."

Tang Erda's eyes snapped to Liu Jiayi. "Bai Liu told you how to fix things in reality?"

"He did," Liu Jiayi responded.

Tang Erda exhaled in relief, a rare smile forming. "He always has a plan. Let's log out of the game."

Mu Sicheng relaxed and scolded with a grin, "Why didn't you tell me sooner? You scared the hell out of me. I thought something had happened to him."

"Honestly, what could happen to Bai Liu, the dog, in the game?" he added, chuckling.

Liu Jiayi clenched her fist, a quiet resolve in her eyes.

No one questioned Bai Liu's decisions, and no one doubted his abilities.

He was always omnipotent—he could do no wrong, had no weaknesses.

That's what Liu Jiayi believed, and that's why she always... wanted to wait a little longer.

Maybe Bai Liu would pop back in, smile, say everything was handled, and they'd all log out of the game.

But with Spades' appearance, the illusion of peace shattered. Immediate plans needed to be made.

She had to prepare for Bai Liu's defeat and get the team out of the game before Spades returned.

Bai Liu's smile, fake yet warm, appeared in her mind.

"[Jiayi, you're a smart girl. You know what to do. I'll leave the team to you for now, while I'm away.]"

"[You were always meant to fill the second tactician position, and now I see you've got what it takes.]"

He smiled, praising her: "[Because no one is more suited for this than you, Jiayi.]"

Liu Jiayi gritted her teeth and, with steely determination, ordered, "Log out of the game. Now."

Scott's hut had been completely submerged, and Spades, who had arrived on an ice floe, looked down at the abandoned structure bobbing beneath the water.

Spades unzipped his heavy punching suit and spiked shoes, then leaped into the water. He swam toward the Little Mu House, weaving through the submerged area until something unfamiliar caught his attention. Instinctively, he veered his head to the side, and a pure white bone whip stabbed out from behind his ear.

Bai Liu, dressed in a white shirt and trousers, looked up at him from underwater with a smile, delivering a second jab without hesitation.

Spades flung his hand open, noticing blood oozing from Bai Liu's chest. Without thinking, Spades reached up, grabbed the collar of Bai Liu's shirt, and yanked it open. The buttons burst in the water, suspended in all directions. Bai Liu's pale chest revealed a long, fresh scar running along the entire right side, still bleeding as though it had only just been made.

Spades stared at the scar for a moment, then glanced up at Bai Liu. As Spades approached, he grabbed Bai Liu by the neck, squeezing with lethal force.

The [body] sank downward.

Spades opened his mouth, bubbles spilling from the corners of his lips as he muttered, "Poor quality."

He emerged from the water, tumbling onto the shore, and frowned in frustration. "What a pain in the ass…"

This Bai Liu had multiple replicas hidden beneath the water. These imitations were difficult to kill, especially in a map like this, where the Antarctic was rapidly melting and the environment was flooded. Killing the weaknesses of these monsters, whether through fire or strong acid, was nearly impossible.

To make matters worse, Bai Liu had hidden his heart within one of these bodies. But as soon as one Bai Liu was defeated, another would quickly resurface. Even if the real Bai Liu were captured among the many, with all the replicas possessing the same memories, it was unlikely Bai Liu would even be able to identify which one contained the true heart.

It was a game designed to be unsolvable.

Spades didn't like this game of whack-a-mole, so he sat on the ice, water dripping off his chin, empty eyes staring out into the distance. He wasn't good at dealing with situations like this, just as he wasn't good at handling tacticians.

This Bai Liu had been a pretty good tactician, the first to actually trap him using his own body. Usually, it was the tactician who struggled with Spades, both in and out of the game.

Spades sat for a long while before standing, his gaze lingering on the calm waters for a while longer.

There is no such thing as an unsolvable game in this world.

A voice whispered in his ear, a chuckle accompanying the words. The speaker leaned over his shoulder, his dark eyes filled with both malice and innocence.

But Spades couldn't remember what the person looked like, or who they were. He only remembered the words spoken to him.

A game is designed, then deliberately presented to someone, hoping they can solve it. That's why there's no such thing as an unsolvable game in this world.

You're bound to win my game, and no one else is playing it except you. You're the only player I have.

In other words, my game is designed to give you victory.

Spades plunged into the water, pulled by some primal instinct. He dove deeper and deeper into the cold, murky depths of the sea, where the bodies of Bai Liu's replicas were scattered and sunk.

Occasionally, one of the Bai Liu replicas would resurface, but it would soon sink again, suffocating. These Bai Liu's seemed to have an aversion to the water, their movements awkward as they surfaced and dove.

Finding the right one among so many identical versions felt like searching for a [needle in a haystack].

Spades swam through the icy waters, dodging and being chased by the replicas, until his eyes finally settled on one Bai Liu buried beneath layers of other bodies.

This Bai Liu hadn't attacked him.

It lay peacefully at the bottom of the sea, its eyes closed, the wound on its chest visible through the torn shirt.

There was something strange about this Bai Liu—a hybrid of monster and human, as if it were a transitional form in the process of transformation.

Spades felt a strong, inexplicable gut instinct. This Bai Liu was hiding a heart.

He quickly snorkeled down and, as his fingers brushed against the body, Bai Liu's eyes snapped open.

Bai Liu exhaled bubbles from his lips, then swam swiftly through the water. A swarm of other Bai Liu replicas surrounded him, encircling him in a chaotic mass. The one Spades had targeted vanished among the crowd in mere moments.

But Spades soon locked onto Bai Liu once more.

It was as if he had a device to track Bai Liu, allowing him to find the one he recognized, despite the indistinguishability of the others, and chase after him without hesitation.

Shifting waves of blue water glistened under the melting remains of the world's largest ice shelf. Ice floes drifted in large chunks away from the land, with the lower sections of icebergs resembling islands suspended in the sky above the water.

Spades and Bai Liu danced around each other, dodging and chasing across the cold, white islands.

No matter how Bai Liu tried to escape, how he covered his tracks, or used every trick in the book, Spades always found him among the millions of identical Bai Liu replicas in this icy, hellish underwater world.

Under the melting Ice Dome A, at the bottom of the darkest sea, Spades finally caught Bai Liu.

Spades gently slid his hand into Bai Liu's unhealed wound.

The blood vessels twitched in response to the heart, warm blood spilling over Spades' fingers as he gripped the cold heart beating out of place in the warmth of Bai Liu's body. He looked down at Bai Liu, now fully under his control.

For a brief moment, Spades experienced a feeling of déjà vu. He recalled the tactician who had almost trapped him long ago—Bai Liu, gazing up at him from beneath the water with calm, resigned eyes. It was as if Bai Liu hated him, binding his rotting ankles and burying his body beneath the water, trapping himself in the process.

Spades slowly closed his palm around the heart. As it shattered at his fingertips, he bent his body around Bai Liu, resting his jaw on Bai Liu's shoulder and whispering the word, sorry.

Bai Liu's eyes fluttered closed as a great mist of blood burst around him, his consciousness drifting into nothingness.

Tawil, Xie Ta...

Do not be afraid of the dead me, or the living me.

I will always stay in the winter where I belong and wait for you.

No matter what choice I make, you'll leave me, won't you?

Yes.

The Ice Age

The moment Spades' hand passed through Bai Liu's chest, the heart Bai Liu had secured to his veins slipped out of his back.

Bai Liu's eyes were half-closed. He knew it was pointless, but he couldn't stop himself from reaching for the heart that had disappeared into the deep blue-black sea.

His slender fingers opened and closed weakly in the cold seawater.

Spades grabbed Bai Liu by the ribs and lifted him upward for a moment before turning and chasing after him into the depths, clearly intent on retrieving the heart and destroying it.

Bai Liu spread his limbs in a dazed manner, passively floating upwards under the force of Spades' lift, toward the surface where a fine phosphorescent glow glimmered.

The sun hung silently below the horizon, its faint, silvery frame gilding the edges of the vast, endless waters.

Glaciers and ice floes—remnants of a planet that had both cooled and warmed, or rather, wreckage—grazed the perimeter of Bai Liu's suspended form, carried away by the currents.

Above him, the pure black sky remained cloudless, the stars flowing through it like jewels, glowing with a mesmerizing brilliance—dazzling, almost like crushed diamonds or strings of pearls scattered across velvet.

This beauty, like all precious things, broke apart in an instant—blossoming into heartbreak and wild, mad beauty.

But that beauty was soon overshadowed by the green glow of the aurora borealis, shimmering from the southeastern sky, its fluorescent hues floating like a cheap curtain in the early stages of a dream.

Bai Liu's eyes were half-open, his vitality waning so much that the sound of Edmond's mournful voice seemed to echo in his ears.

"[Child, never test your beloved with truth or falsity. I did that too, and though I endured that experiment, the only conclusion I reached was—]"

"[They can tell the difference.]"

"[Even if they have the same memories, the same body, the same structure, like another version of us in parallel time and space—they are still not us in the eyes of those who love us.]"

"[What exactly separates them from us?]"

"[The experiment I initially wanted to conduct was to explore whether these creatures could become indistinguishable from humans by passing the Turing test, and how they differ from us.]"

"[If we are the same, are we truly human?]"

"[Perhaps we're just another type of monster placed on this planet, in this game, carrying memories injected into us by others—creatures bred for war and self-destruction, just as my superiors intended with these monsters.]"

"[I understand all the misfortune that has followed me, my friends, and everyone around us. It's because we're born this way, subject to a higher power—perhaps 'God'—who has determined that the fate of the world must be this cruel.]"

"[If we are different, where do these differences come from, when our bodies, cores, and memories are all the same? And how can anyone recognize the real us, when we can't even tell the real from the fake?]"

"[The people at Tarzan Station gave me the answer, and in you, I've confirmed it once again. But I still don't understand why.]"

"[Where does this difference come from?]"

"[Before you arrived here, there were many guests whom I experimented on. Some left in the middle of the process, while others stayed forever. Beneath every ice fissure here lies the 'corpses' of those guests' failed experiments.]"

"[Time and time again, the people at Tarzan Station erased their memories, reviewed their files, and restarted the process, but they still recognized each other no matter who the guests were. And sometimes, the guests themselves could recognize each other.]"

"[But why?]"

"[Why can some people recognize each other, and others cannot? Why is it that the people at Tarzan Station are always recognizable, yet the guests who come here can't seem to recognize each other with such certainty?]"

"[I couldn't figure out what was affecting the results, so no matter how many times I ran the experiment, the results remained elusive—until I met Spades.]"

"[He was the fastest guest I've ever seen to identify a teammate; he was willing to talk to me and gave me the answer—intuition.]"

"[That's the strangest experimental variable I've ever heard of. If my student had handed me a lab report with those two words on it, I would have made him jump into the Ross Sea in shame.]"

"[I saw you, Bai Liu, in the memories of Spades' friend, the Reverse God. And you would make an experiment a thousand times more extreme and insane than anything I've done so far—creating an insurmountable game with thousands of copies of yourself, just to test another person's perception of you.]"

"[I know you would, and I'm sure you know the consequences, but you want to see it again, as I do, to verify that result once more—]"

"[These Bai Liu copies have the same appearance, memories, and core as you. You've even become one of these monsters yourself—so can Spades still find you?]"

"[Thank you for finally answering this unsolved puzzle.]"

"[I always thought that it was the human side that identified the monster side, but it wasn't quite like that. It was the monster side that couldn't return the special emotions that the human side wanted.]"

"[Though you are a monster, you love him, Bai Liu.]"

"[So you can't hide Tawil's heart in another 'Bai Liu' body, because it's a heart that belongs to you.]"

"[Your response reveals you.]"

"[Love turns you from a monster to a human. Love gives you a weakness, makes you clutch his heart and float in the deep. Love makes you stand out from the millions of monsters, making you the most special one for Spades.]"

"[So he found you.]"

"[But do not grieve, child. It is not fate that leads you to your destiny; it is love.]"

"[Love has kept you apart, but it will bring you back together in the end.]"

The ice melts away in large chunks, and the pale, frozen "body" of the monster drifts across the surface, mixing with the broken ice as it floats past Bai Liu. His eyelashes are coated with fine ice particles, glowing fluorescent green under the aurora borealis, while the water rushes through the empty cavity of his chest.

Someone emerges from the water, and Spades wraps his arms around Bai Liu's waist and knees, lifting him—seemingly unconscious—toward the shore. In his hands, he holds two hearts.

One is crushed and torn, but still faintly beating, while the other is frozen in a block of ice, so fresh it looks as though it was just removed from a chest. This heart, Spades reveals, was taken from a [Bai Liu].

Spades moves carefully to thaw the heart.

"This is your real heart," he murmurs, looking down at the motionless Bai Liu. He places the newly thawed heart inside Bai Liu's body. "Back to you."

Bai Liu's body, altered by Edmond, rapidly reacts. His heart's pulses unite with the new one, and the muscle and skin of his chest heal instantly. A faint beat begins to emerge in his otherwise cold and stiff chest.

Spades turns away, retrieves fuel and acid from his supplies, and without hesitation, begins to work on the second heart—the one still faintly beating in his hands.

The heart is consumed by flames and the corrosive hiss of acid.

Bai Liu's frozen fingers twitch slightly, his dark eyes reflecting the beautiful night sky and nothing else.

His chest, which had resumed its slow rise and fall, stalls briefly as the second heart is processed. Finally, it stops beating altogether.

It's as if his heartbeat ceased with the final destruction of the other heart.

[System Alert: Player Spades has destroyed the last corpse, achieved the true end line achievement. All players have passed the game. The copy will close soon...]

As the snowfield collapses behind him, Bai Liu's system panel vanishes, and Spades sinks to his knees beside the ashes, glancing up at the melting ice world.

Only when Bai Liu disappears in a puff of light at his side does Spades stand up, preparing to exit the game. He understands now why he had to wait for Bai Liu to leave before he did.

It feels like a deeply ingrained, intuitive habit.

Spades senses as if he's watched this man exit the game countless times, as a point of light, only to fall into a long darkness, waiting to see him again at the start of the next game. So, he does the same this time.

It's like a subconscious instinct: a need to destroy all the corpses.

Spades has a vague feeling that whoever designed the game intended to trap Bai Liu forever, leaving him cold and alone in the snowy plains as a monster for the rest of his life.

This is a highly likely scenario, and Liu Jiayi even feels relieved that Spades is the one they entered the game with.

Because no one else could stop Bai Liu from going mad.

If Bai Liu had logged in with another player, and discovered that the main quest was to destroy the corpse, the [true end] line would trigger as soon as a player found and destroyed the corpse.

Even if they killed the other players and Edmond, the game would not end.

The game would continue on the [true end] line until the final act—destroying all the corpses.

Bai Liu could quit the game, but that would only trigger the game in reality.

Upon exiting Ice Age, Bai Liu would enter a real-world copy of the game, essentially the same as staying inside.

And once in the real world, with the method of destroying the body parts known, it would be inevitable that the particle weather devices would be destroyed.

The body parts would face their end—completely destroyed—and countless people would strive to make this happen by any means necessary.

Bai Liu knew he couldn't be an enemy of the world forever, which is why he chose to stay in the game.

In this way, he prevented the game from reaching its true end and being brought into the real world.

The game was a trap from the very beginning. The moment Bai Liu stepped into it, he had only two choices:

— either remain a monster forever, trapped in the snowy plains.

— or destroy Tawil's heart, erase the only emotion—love—and weakness in his psyche, and become ruthless, cruel, calculating, and unscrupulous, to pass the game as a winner.

To transform from Bai Liu into Bai Six.

This was the ultimate aim of the ones behind the curtain.

Liu Jiayi felt a deep sense of gratitude that the player they encountered in this game was Spades.

Other players couldn't have stopped Bai Liu from doing whatever he wanted, but Spades had the ability to defeat him. And as long as he won, Bai Liu wouldn't need to choose.

As soon as Spades destroyed the heart, Bai Liu would have to emerge from the snowfields.

Liu Jiayi wonders where Spades' obsession and instinct to destroy this heart originated, and who gave it to him.

Though Spades' intuition was cruel to Bai Liu, destroying the heart of the person who mattered to him, he had saved him in the end.

By obliterating Bai Liu's only weakness, the man behind the game would no longer be able to exploit it.

Reality

Reality

Liu Jiayi took Tang Erda out of the game as soon as they logged out and had him call Su Yang to ask about the plane.

"Contact was lost while crossing the sea over the Antarctic," Su Yang's voice tightened. "Captain, you've... seen it again, haven't you?"

It was a question of whether Tang Erda, like before, had foreseen this future.

"Sort of," Tang Erda replied, rubbing his brow in exhaustion. "But this time, when I saw it, it was too late. Sorry."

"You don’t need to apologize to me, Captain." Su Yang’s voice carried a bitter smile. "It's my fault."

Liu Jiayi jumped up, grabbed Tang Erda's phone, and spoke into it urgently. "Captain Su, things may not be turning around."

Su Yang’s voice suddenly became sharp. "Is there anything I can do?"

Liu Jiayi spoke quickly, "Help us find out if there is a Du Sanying, or the parrot in Mirror City."

"Okay, that's a rare name. Don’t hang up, I’ll check right away."

The sound of Su Yang's hurried footsteps echoed, and he soon returned, panting. "There’s no Du Sanying in Mirror City. Should I widen the search?"

Liu Jiayi frowned. She realized that Du Sanying had likely changed his name in the game.

Finding a player who didn’t know his original name was like looking for a needle in a haystack in the real world.

Su Yang understood this as well, and his voice grew more urgent. "Is there any other special information about this person? We'll do everything we can to help you."

The plane over the Antarctic could make an emergency landing at any moment. Every second counted, as each moment was as valuable as five lives.

But unfortunately, Liu Jiayi pursed her lips and said, "This man does have special points."

Su Yang pressed, "What special point?"

Liu Jiayi replied, "He's very lucky."

---------- --

Bai Liu left the pool, quickly logging out of the game as soon as he stood up, still wet. He immediately went to meet Liu Jiayi's group, who were searching for Du Sanying.

The meeting place was Bai Liu's house.

Bai Liu appeared as normal as ever, though his shirt had some wrinkled creases on the collar and cuffs. He was in the best condition of the group.

Bai Liu glanced at Liu Jiayi and said with a sudden realization, "He changed his name, didn't he? Then it's going to be troublesome to find him now."

He spoke of the trouble, but there wasn't a trace of concern on his face. His expression remained relaxed and at ease.

And that ease gave Liu Jiayi an indescribable sense of dissonance.

Bai Liu had logged out of the game, which meant that the heart was disposed of...

She knew what that heart meant to Bai Liu—he wasn't normally in this [relaxed and comfortable] state.

But there was no way for her to ask, as Bai Liu soon directed her thoughts elsewhere.

Bai Liu looked at Liu Jiayi. "What's your next plan for finding someone?"

"Find people around us who are relevant." Liu Jiayi's face was stern. "As you said, based on what you know about yourself, that is, [Bai Six], if a character like [Du Sanying] existed with 100 percent luck, you would never let him go."

"He was quite outstanding and valuable."

“Yes,” Bai Liu lifted his eyes and smiled at Tang Erda. “So now, we’ll ask our Captain Tang to patiently remember if there was such a cute and lucky character in a wandering circus in other times and places?”

Tang Erda quickly realized what Bai Liu was getting at. He furrowed his brow in thought, and after a long pause, he spoke.

“The Wandering Circus, for the most part, consisted of you and four others. I rarely saw anyone else outside of those four on the league field or around you.”

“But... there is one, though not exactly part of the Wandering Circus. He was a supernumerary associated with it.”

Bai Liu gave Tang Erda a knowing look, urging him to continue.

Tang Erda thought hard, trying to recall the low-profile character.

“He rarely played, but you... Bai Six, you took him often, but took him...”

What to do?

The image of the boy, who appeared sporadically on the field, sitting on the bench with his head down, was completely blurred in Tang Erda's memory.

It was strange because Bai Six never took people who weren’t valuable, and this boy had left no impression on Tang Erda—mainly because Bai Six never put him on the field.

It was as if Bai Six was deliberately pampering him...

But what value does a reserve player have if not on the field?

Why did Bai Six bring him to every game...?

Suddenly, Tang Erda jolted as a brief moment resurfaced—a memory of the boy standing timidly in front of Bai Six, helping him draw the hostile cards from the box.

Drawing hostile cards was a crucial part of the league.

The league is divided into three segments: pre-season, mid-season, and post-season.

The pre-season is a mixed competition, also known as the rookie tournament. It features teams that didn't finish in the top thirty-two the previous year, along with new teams registering for the league for the first time. Only two teams emerge from this round, and they gain direct access to the playoffs.

Mid-season games are also called star games. Teams that placed before 32nd in the previous tournament compete here. These teams are strong, and most have star players, making this the most exciting round of the tournament. The eight teams with the highest points advance to the playoffs.

The playoffs are split into a challenge round and the main competition.

The challenge round is for the two winning pre-season teams to randomly challenge two of the eight playoff teams. If they win, they replace the other team in the playoffs. If they lose, their journey ends.

The main event is the single-elimination final for the remaining eight teams. The winner advances, and the loser is eliminated, making this the most thrilling part of the tournament for both players and spectators.

By this point, the crowd is usually wild, and fights often break out after a match.

Card draws are essential in both the pre-season and post-season challenges. In these rounds, teams randomly decide their opponents by drawing cards from a box.

If your team is lucky enough to draw a weaker opponent, it's a huge advantage.

This kind of luck happens often with Bai Six—but this guy is a 0-luck player!

Tang Erda's account confirmed Bai Liu's suspicions.

Since Du Sanying had been seen near Bai Six in other worlds, there must be some connection to Bai Liu in this world.

After all, the entity who wanted to change Bai Liu back to Bai Six—or rather, God—wouldn't give up trying to modify any differences between them.

This god had directly sent Du Sanying to him before, but Bai Liu didn’t control Du Sanying, likely due to the unique nature of Du Sanying.

With 100 percent luck, it was too easy for this guy to escape Bai Liu, the unlucky one.

But in that case, [God] must have placed Du Sanying somewhere within Bai Liu’s reach, so that Bai Liu could use the reserve team member God had prepared for him at any time.

Over the years, Bai Liu had lived in various places due to work and other reasons, constantly changing rental properties. However, there was one place that remained relatively permanent for him.

But that place had been demolished and rebuilt.

Bai Liu narrowed his eyes. “Have Su Yang check the patients, caregivers, and doctors at the nursing home that was built after my orphanage was knocked down and rebuilt.”

Tang Erda dialed the number, and Su Yang answered. “What kind of person do you need checked?”

Shrine.

The man in the hood opposite the prophet snorted in boredom as he propped his palms on the table, gazing at the werewolf card before him. He shook his head slightly, regret flashing across his face. "What a shame. I thought I'd watch Bai Liu corrupt the heart himself."

The prophet responded, "Bai Liu will not do that."

The man raised his eyes, amused, as he met the seer's gaze. "But my purpose was still achieved, nonetheless."

He continued, "You see, Bai Liu is no longer repelled by water. Now, he dives in willingly, using it to his advantage to deter his opponents. He no longer lingers over a fading heart, and even—"

The prophet interrupted sternly, "That was not his heart!"

The man calmly finished the sentence, "-and he would even offer to take the 'lucky man' I had prepared for him."

He smiled. "What a transformation. Bai Liu’s eyes no longer see those around him as human. His emotions have been stripped away with the death of that heart, his flesh alienated alongside those corpses. All he sees now is the league and his ultimate desire for money."

He paused. "How beautiful, he's only one win away from Bai Six."

The man's tone shifted slightly, a touch of disappointment. "Although the process wasn't quite what I expected, I had planned to sever his last emotional ties when he turned fourteen, using Xie Ta's death as the catalyst. Unfortunately..." He lowered his gaze, brushing his index finger over the red eyes of the werewolf card. "It doesn't matter. He'll soon become what I want him to be."

The prophet stood motionless, his petrification deepening. His chest rose and fell weakly. "What you do is not the way of God."

The man laughed. "That's right, because I'm an evil god."

"Playing with humans, gaining profit, and enslaving them—this is what I enjoy most."

He casually flicked a card onto the table. "Like this idiot card. I'm not a fan of these 'pure good' cards, ones that wolves can't even use for tempo. But this one seems interesting and valuable for a Bai Six team."

The card depicted a boy in a hospital gown, scowling slightly as if afraid of someone. Freckles dotted both his cheeks and the base of his nose, and he wore a pair of boxy, flat glasses.

The man stared at the card with downcast eyes and folded his hands. "An idiot with 100 percent luck. A nice setup. All the Bai Six in this world line would love him. I'm sure the Bai Six in this world line do too."

The prophet's voice was hoarse. "Because he saved Bai Six."

"Saved?" The man smiled, shaking his head slightly. "I prefer to call this process destiny."

He extended his fingers and casually tapped the idiot card. His gaze drifted as he spoke. "During a conflict with the Heretic Handling Bureau in reality, the mad hunter used a weapon with targeted skills and attacked Bai Six in a suicide attack, leaving him seriously injured."

He continued, his voice almost indifferent, "The Wandering Circus ringmaster, in his misfortune, had to hide out after a car accident."

"And the only one to survive that crash was Du Sanying, the lucky one."

"He was too lucky to have survived a crash that killed everyone else instantly," the man mused, folding his fingers carelessly. "But his good fortune must be paid for with the misfortune of others. He must invite the misfortune of those around him."

He looked up at the prophet with a smile. "For God is fair. Misfortune and fortune should remain balanced."

The prophet was struck silent, his voice barely a whisper. "Du Sanying's father, mother, sister, and older siblings all died in that crash."

"It was the Quan family's trip to celebrate the end of his senior year. And you let them all die. In front of Du Sanying. Even this young boy knew they died because of his luck."

The man shrugged. "One should always be aware of the price paid for their good fortune, or they won't appreciate it."

He smiled lightly. "It is a blessing from God. And the price I charge will only get higher."

The prophet glared at him. "But he has already paid. You made him save the wounded Bai Six. Isn't that enough?"

"No, no, no," the man shook his head slightly, a smile lingering in his eyes. "I didn't make him save anyone."

"It was Du Sanying who chose to save him."

"Du Sanying's life was surrounded by people who paid for his good fortune, and he seemed incredibly fortunate to have a good family and brothers."

"But Du Sanying couldn't stop the tragic fate of anyone connected to him—even if he caused it."

The prophet's voice was cold. "It was caused by you."

"One could say the same." The man raised his eyes, smirking. "And Bai Six, a man with a luck value of zero, is the only one whose misfortune wasn't caused by Du Sanying."

"Bai Six's misfortune is innate. It has nothing to do with Du Sanying, whose presence will only bring him luck. So, Bai Six is the only person in the world that Du Sanying can protect with his luck, preventing his misfortune."

The man under the hood smiled, his voice dark with amusement. "So, Du Sanying will undoubtedly put his life on the line to help Bai Liu, to save him, and even become the most obedient pawn, without needing to trade souls."

"Du Sanying is desperate to protect the Bai Six he meets at the center of the crash in every world because he no longer knows the meaning of his existence beyond protecting the Bai Six he can save."

The prophet interrupted, "Provided Du Sanying remembers what has happened to him."

"He'll remember soon enough," the man lowered his eyes to the idiot card on the table, a grim satisfaction settling over him. "His destiny has come."

Within five minutes, Su Yang returned the call, speaking rapidly.

"We should have found the person you're looking for—his original name is Du Ying. He's the third child in his family, with an older brother, an older sister, and a younger sister. His family belongs to an ethnic minority, so they're not subject to the family planning restrictions, which means it's a large family."

"The family has always been relatively stable, but strangely unlucky. For instance, Du Ying's father, a lawyer, has often found himself in dangerous situations. However, whenever Du Ying visits him, a major confrontation follows, and Du Ying's father ends up injured, while Du Ying himself remains unharmed."

"Du Ying used to enjoy waiting for his father to finish work, but after realizing the trouble he caused, he stopped going."

"In primary school, Du Ying's class was attacked indiscriminately by vengeful people. All the children sitting in front of and behind him were stabbed to death—except for Du Ying, who miraculously survived."

"After that, no one dared to befriend Du Ying. He ended up sitting alone in a corner of the classroom, next to the trash bins, with no one sitting beside him."

"When he reached junior high, his class teacher, Mr. Ren, turned out to be a paedophile who had been eyeing Du Ying for some time. But one day, Du Ying's sister volunteered to pick him up from school and was seen by Mr. Ren, which led the teacher to abandon his plans."

Su Yang took a deep breath. "Du Ying's sister was almost sexually assaulted after being stalked for a period, but Du Ying discovered it just in time."

"Du Ying had a heated physical confrontation with the teacher and was forced to transfer to another school. After the transfer, he severed contact with his family, feeling that he was in trouble. He moved out on his own."

"The family, however, felt this was all a lie. They believed Du Ying had saved his sister and didn't want to give up on him. They kept trying to reconnect, even his sister would reach out to him."

"She thought her brother was brave, blaming the teacher, and felt that their father had used the law to get her justice. The incident left her unharmed and spared her brother from disaster."

"It was a fortunate turn of events—I found a text message that his sister had sent to Du Ying."

"Eventually, Du Ying began to reconcile. He moved back home in his senior year and decided to study law, wanting to become a lawyer like his father to bring justice to the misfortunes that had plagued his family."

Su Yang exhaled deeply. "Du Ying excelled in the entrance exams, scoring extremely high marks and ranking number one in the city. However, his grades were usually average, which made the Quan family very happy."

"After completing the application form, the family decided to celebrate Du Ying's success with a graduation trip."

"But on the way there, their car was involved in a series of crashes on the motorway. None of them survived, except Du Ying, who emerged unscathed."

"Du Ying developed a peculiar mental illness called amnesia, which caused him to only remember the events of the last week, forgetting everything prior to that."

"A year ago, he was unable to live a normal life due to the worsening memory loss, and his doctor recommended hospitalization. Du Ying entered a nursing home, where he now resides in room 906."

"This is all from his medical records."

Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi exchanged glances—this was the same nursing home room where Bai Liu had stayed in Love and Welfare.

It seems that, from that time onward, those behind the scenes had already planned for Du Sanying to take Du Ying’s place.

Reality

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Su Yang arranged for a car from the Bureau of Heresy to take Bai Liu and his group to the sanatorium. He had already spoken with the director, who was waiting for them upon arrival and led them inside.

The building was surrounded on all sides by a well-maintained garden. In the quietest corner of the grounds stood a more upscale structure. Near the main entrance, a small pond with lotus flowers and fish enhanced the building's appeal, making it look more impressive than the others.

"The patients in room 906 are housed in the innermost building," the director explained.

As they walked through the small garden, the director spoke quickly, "We collaborate with two nearby hospitals, and sometimes there aren't enough rooms available. Those hospitals aren't as comfortable or spacious."

"Some patients, particularly those who can afford it and don't want to stay in a ward, choose to transfer here. They cover the cost of nursing home accommodations themselves."

"The patient in room 906 was transferred under such circumstances."

The director continued, "The doctor told me that the patient's condition isn't an emergency. No organic issues were found; it's purely a psychological matter."

"The doctor mentioned that the patient is unwilling to remember the events of the past week, rejecting those memories. The medication isn't very effective, and the patient needs a more relaxed environment to heal. That's why he was referred to us."

The director looked up at the building, hidden among the trees, his expression complicated.

"For this patient, though, it might be a blessing to have forgotten it all," he murmured.

Bai Liu turned to the director. "A long stay here must be quite expensive, right?"

The director nodded. "Yes, the patient in 906 has lost both parents and relatives. He inherited a large estate, enough to stay here for decades."

"He has a dedicated bank card to pay for his expenses here, and we transfer money into it every month."

"And it seems he's involved in some sort of business, though I'm not sure exactly what it is—perhaps online gaming. Every week, there's a significant amount of money deposited into his account. When asked where it comes from, though, he's confused and says he doesn't remember."

The director added, "Because the patient can only remember the past week, he's unsure where the money comes from each time."

Bai Liu nodded, understanding.

Once a week—that money was clearly the points Du Sanying earned in the game, transferred into his account.

The director led them to the elevator. "Since this patient only retains a week's worth of memory and has cognitive issues, he can become frightened by unfamiliar surroundings. Please be quiet and friendly when you meet him to avoid startling him."

When they reached the ninth floor, the director guided them through the corridor, around a corner, and stopped in front of room 906.

From inside the room came an oddly accented flick of the tongue. "Someone's coming! Someone's coming!"

Mu Sicheng frowned. "Is that... a bird call?"

"Oh!" The director exclaimed, tapping her head. She turned to Bai Liu, apologizing, "I almost forgot to mention that the patient in room 906 has a parrot."

"???" Mu Sicheng was baffled. "Why does he have a parrot?!"

The director explained, "Because the patient has only a week's memory, he often tries to record what he did earlier. However, we don't provide sharp objects to mental health patients to avoid self-harm, so he can't use a pen."

"He got a parrot to teach it key phrases as reminders of his activities from a week ago."

Mu Sicheng was still confused. "Why not just provide him with electronic devices, like a phone or something? He could use a memo app."

"We do provide electronic devices," the director spread her hands. "But this patient forgets his phone's unlock code after a week. He won't remember any information."

Mu Sicheng blinked. "..."

The director sighed, looking a bit helpless. "We're a professional nursing home, so we're not allowed to record passwords for patients—it's an invasion of privacy. Also, with a violent restart, all the data on the phone is lost. We've also suggested alternatives like tape recorders or electronic drawing boards, but the patient's reduced cognitive awareness means he doesn't trust those devices. He doesn't believe they contain records of what he did a week ago."

"Patients tend to trust their pets more than electronic devices," the director added with a resigned sigh.

"We weren't allowed to have a parrot either," she continued. "But after consulting with the doctor, who thought having a pet might help improve his cognitive condition, we agreed."

"The parrot is kept outside, on the balcony, so it's fine."

The director knocked softly on the door. "May we come in?"

There was a long pause before the parrot's strange, polite reply came, "Come in."

The director opened the door to an empty ward. The balcony window was open, and the screen billowed in the breeze. The parrot stood proudly on one foot on the bar, but there was no one on the bed or in the open bathroom.

Mu Sicheng spun around, confused. "Where is everyone?!"

Both Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi's eyes were drawn to the edge of the bed.

The director sighed again, kneeling to look under the bed. "Mr. Du Sanying, don't be afraid. We're not bad people; we're just here to see you."

Mu Sicheng bent down incredulously and, as expected, found Du Sanying hiding under the bed!

The skinny boy cowered in the corner, clutching bedding and pillows. Half of his face was hidden, his knees drawn tightly to his chest, and only one wary eye peeked from the edge of the quilt. His glasses were pushed up to his eyebrows.

"I don't know you guys," Du Sanying said softly.

He shrank further into the corner, making it clear that he wasn't about to come out easily.

The person in charge slapped his forehead, clearly frustrated.

Bai Liu bowed slightly and thanked him. "Please, could we have a moment alone with him?"

The man nodded reluctantly. "Call me if you need anything. Don't scare him too much—his memory was just wiped recently."

Once the person in charge left, Mu Sicheng's eyes lit up. Rolling up his sleeves, he prepared to pull Du Sanying out from under the bed.

Mu Sicheng still held a grudge against Du Sanying for his unbelievable luck in overpowering him, stealing his loot, and constantly playing innocent. Despite feeling a bit sorry for him, Mu Sicheng couldn't resist taking action.

As soon as Mu Sicheng's hand reached under the bed, Du Sanying let out a startled "ahh!" The bed collapsed into the corner, the broken frame pressing against Mu Sicheng's hand.

The IV stand beside the bed tipped over, threatening to plunge directly into Mu Sicheng's throat.

Tang Erda, quick on his feet, steadied the frame just in time.

Mu Sicheng let out a dismayed scream, quickly pulling his hand back. He jumped to his feet, blowing on his bruised palm.

Staring in horror at the broken bed, he exclaimed, "Can this guy break things too?!"

Liu Jiayi, with pity in her eyes, replied, "Du Sanying is 100% lucky.

Do you really think you can just drag him out from under the bed?"

She glanced at the bed. "As long as he doesn't want to come out, Du Sanying will be just fine under there—even if an earthquake hits."

Mu Sicheng shook his injured hand in disbelief. "Why didn't you tell me that earlier?"

Liu Jiayi shot him a sidelong glance. "You had to verify it yourself. You looked so sure."

Mu Sicheng: "..."

Bai Liu crouched down, his hands resting on his knees, level with Du Sanying, who was still trembling under the bed. After a brief pause, Bai Liu gripped the bedrail and leaned in.

"!!!" Du Sanying, startled, scrambled deeper into the bed, screaming, "Don't come any closer! You'll get hurt!"

Bai Liu lay calmly beside him, smiling sideways at Du Sanying. "So, you're not hiding under the bed because you're afraid, but because you're worried that someone nearby will get hurt, aren't you?"

Du Sanying stared blankly into Bai Liu's black eyes. Slowly, he loosened the blanket around himself, as if shaken by something beyond his comprehension. He looked Bai Liu up and down, stammering in disbelief.

"…You're okay?!"

Bai Liu extended a hand with a friendly smile. "Perhaps I should introduce myself first. Bai Liu."

"—A gamer you've met once."

Du Sanying stared at Bai Liu for a moment, as if making sure that being close to him wouldn't cause harm. Tentatively, he extended a finger, lightly tapping Bai Liu's hand before quickly withdrawing it and whispering in response.

"…I'm called Du Ying, according to the patient sign above my bed."

Instead of withdrawing his hand, Bai Liu turned fully toward Du Sanying, moving a little closer. He smiled gently, whispering, "You helped me once. Can we go out and talk?"

Du Sanying looked at Bai Liu suspiciously for a long moment, as if ensuring that nothing bad would happen to Bai Liu by getting too close. Slowly, he placed his hand on Bai Liu's palm.

"Okay... good."

Bai Liu pulled on Du Sanying's hand, helping him out from under the collapsed bed.

Once free, Du Sanying instinctively distanced himself from Bai Liu. He turned his head awkwardly, clasping his hands to his chest, hunched over, and scowled, his entire posture rigid and defensive.

It was clear that he hadn't interacted with anyone in a long time.

Bai Liu took a considerate step back, giving Du Sanying more space, and said, "This isn't our first meeting, but I don't think you remember me. We met in a game, and you helped me a lot."

Du Sanying turned toward Bai Liu, his eyes widening in surprise. "…I helped you?"

Bai Liu smiled. "Yes, you did me a great favor. And now, I've come to ask for your help again."

He gave Du Sanying a nostalgic look, his smile softening. "I hope that, since we've been friends before, you'll lend a hand."

Du Sanying's eyes went wide. "…You're my friend?"

"Of course." Bai Liu smiled lightly, creating a sense of familiarity. "If you hadn't forgotten about me and ignored me back then, I would've chased you all the way to the game."

Bai Liu dropped his gaze, as though lost in thought, and sighed with a hint of regret. "Unfortunately, you forgot about me after a pleasant game, and we never had the chance to meet again."

"We could've been soul-best friends."

Mu Sicheng: "Pfft!!!"

God's! Soulmate!

Du Sanying looked deeply apologetic for forgetting his supposed soulmate. He loosened his arms from his chest, wiped them against the seam of his hospital gown, and glanced at Bai Liu.

"Sorry…" Du Sanying blushed slightly in embarrassment. "Bai Liu, I forgot about you. I don’t even remember what games we played…"

Just then, the parrot on the balcony squawked loudly, having picked up a key phrase. It flapped its wings frantically, repeating, "Bai Liu, Bai Liu, bad guy, bad guy, encounter, run! Run!"

Du Sanying: "…"

Bai Liu: "…"

Tang Erda: "…"

Liu Jiayi: "…"

Mu Sicheng: "Pfft—!!!"

Chapter End Notes

> There's no direct translation for 魂挚友的 in English.
> The phrase "魂挚友的" can be roughly translated as "soul's closest friend" or "soul's dearest friend"
> So I put Soul best friend.
> Because if Du Sanying gives his Soul to Bai Liu, they will be best friends.

Reality

The flush faded from Du Sanying's face as he took two cautious steps back, arching his back and eyeing Bai Liu warily. "Who the hell are you?"

Why did you know so much about me if you're not a friend...?

"I used to use you," Bai Liu said, not hesitating to be blunt. "That's why you didn't want to see me."

Bai Liu looked steadily at Du Sanying. "But I didn't force you. You followed me of your own free will. Your luck and intuition told you to stay with me, so you ended up on my team."

He paused, his eyes narrowing slightly. "So, what about your instincts now?"

Du Sanying froze, slowly straightening up. The man was right. His fortune had led him to trust Bai Liu, which is why he'd been so obedient at first.

But why did the parrot tell him to stay away from this man?

Bai Liu's eyes flicked towards the parrot outside the window with an amused glance. "Do you know why you chose the parrot to record your memories?"

Du Sanying shook his head, unsure.

His mind was clouded, and much of what he did was driven by a lingering sense of fortune-guided instinct. For example, he knew that anyone who got too close to him would meet an unfortunate end—like the parrot’s warnings.

And Bai Liu—he should follow him.

"Because there’s no other way to record your memories in this world," Bai Liu said calmly. "You're in a dangerous game, but you can survive on your own luck—even if that luck sometimes harms others."

"You reject these memories, so you wipe them clean every week. But even then, you have to keep suffering in order to stay alive in this game."

Du Sanying couldn't help but ask, "Why? Can't I leave this game?"

"No," Bai Liu replied flatly. "Because you still have unfulfilled desires."

Bai Liu raised his gaze. "You want to make up for the misfortunes caused by your good fortune. You want to revive your parents, your siblings, your friends—those who died because of you. You want to put an end to this cycle of misfortune and redeem the wrongs you've caused."

"And this game gives you the hope to do that."

Du Sanying's hands shook involuntarily as his head spun. He tried to refute Bai Liu's words, but no sound came out. He couldn't remember anything.

Bai Liu continued, "You can't reveal this game to anyone. Paper can't record its details, and electronics can't store its information. Even if you try to confide in someone, their memory will be wiped after seven seconds."

Du Sanying opened his mouth to argue, "But the parrot remembers the game! It remembers you!"

Bai Liu's eyes shifted to the parrot with a knowing look. "If I'm right, the parrot was a game prop you won, created to fulfill your core desires. You brought it into reality as a vessel for your memories."

Mu Sicheng, standing nearby, suddenly understood. "So that's why the parrot can remember things from the game."

Bai Liu extended a hand to Du Sanying, his dark, mirror-like eyes reflecting Du Sanying's hesitant image.

For a moment, Du Sanying seemed lost in the reflection, his thoughts scattered like leaves on a breeze.

"I may be a bad person," Bai Liu said softly, "but I've never harmed you. And more importantly—"

He took a step closer. "You can't hurt me. My bad luck is my own, far worse than the misfortune you bring. And the luck you despise is something I can only dream of."

Bai Liu gazed up at Du Sanying and stepped closer still.

Du Sanying stood frozen, unable to retreat, as Bai Liu's eyes seemed to pierce through him. They were like a cold wind, filled with the sting of ice and the smolder of fire. The clarity in those eyes was fleeting, vanishing like smoke in the air.

Between the destruction and chaos in those eyes, Du Sanying saw something—like a fading memory, a broken soul.

It was as if Bai Liu's heart had been shattered, leaving only fragments behind ..... a man with a broken heart.

"I ask you, help me." Bai Liu said softly, "Use your good fortune to save a person who is important to me."

Du Sanying was quiet for a moment before he lowered his head and asked in a whisper, "..... If I go, can I really save people? I won't harm them?"

"No." Bai Liu looked at him and smiled lightly, "When one's life is unfortunate enough, the misfortune you bring may just be a way of presenting luck."

"To me, to the man I am trying to save and for the five escorts on the plane, you won't do any harm to them."

Bai Liu lowered his eyes, "Because they have no more unfortunate ending than this."

Du Sanying gritted his teeth. He took a deep breath and clutched Bai Liu's hand, "Okay, I'll go with you. What do I have to do to save them?"

Bai Liu quickly told Du Sanying about the current situation.

Du Sanying was a bit confused: "The plane is already over the Antarctic and is going to crash, what can I do?"

"You can be teleported to this plane and use your luck to see if you can bring the plane down early to land in the sea instead of on the ground, thus mitigating the extent of the crash and trying to save the people and items on the plane." Bai Liu said.

Du Sanying was horrified: "Teleport me onto a plane that's going to crash?!"

Bai Liu held him down and said calmly, "I'll be with you."

Du Sanying's face was pale with fear, but he managed to maintain his composure. He grabbed Bai Liu's arm and asked weakly, "How do you teleport?"

Bai Liu's eyes rested on the parrot who was standing on the balcony: "Using game props."

Du Sanying entered the game about a year ago, just as his family was involved in an accident, so it is reasonable to assume that the core desire that spurred Du Sanying to enter the game was related to the accident.

For example, the core desire to instantly teleport the whole family from the scene of a traffic accident.

And the parrot is a game prop that meets Du Sanying's core desires, brought to reality. Coupled with the careful design of the people behind the scenes…

Bai Liu has good reason to suspect that the parrot's true function was a teleportation tool.

Tang Erda caught the parrot off the balcony by pressing down on its wing joints under the direction of Bai Liu.

The parrot hissed loudly with its neck stretched out and its wings fluttering: "Bai Liu! Bad! Bai Liu! Bad!"

Du Sanying, apprehensive and uncomfortable, could not resist adding a weak reminder: "Be gentle, it's not comfortable."

Bai Liu took the parrot from Tang Erda and handed it to Du Sanying.

The parrot quickly climbed onto Du Sanying's shoulder, tilted its head and rubbed against him, blinked its green bean eyes. It moved its claws against Du Sanying's ear, and muttered as if whispering a tip-off: "Bai Liu, bad, run."

Du Sanying didn't know whether to laugh or cry as he raised his hand to touch the parrot's head. He hesitated and covered the parrot's eyes: "…… Using props won't hurt it, will it?"

"No." Bai Liu looked at him, "but it will require you to figure out how to use the prop."

Du Sanying frowned bitterly, "…… But I really don't remember."

"It's obviously a voice-activated prop." Liu Jiayi prompts, "Have you devised some sort of keyword for the parrot to use it, like Bai Liu or something like that?"

When the parrot heard the word, it twitched its wings again, tilted its neck and called out, "Bai Liu, bad-!!!"

Du Sanying calmly covered the parrot's beak: "Let me think."

"If you and your family were involved in a violent traffic accident, what keyword would you choose to teleport everyone out?" Liu Jiayi says.

Du Sanying looked up hesitantly: "A traffic accident?"

"Yes, a rather serious traffic accident, the remains of which had not been searched for a week. The remains of the passengers were all fused together in an indistinguishable mess of flesh and blood due to the burning of the petrol and the violent impact." Bai Liu recounts in clear terms.

Du Sanying's pupils constricted slightly as he ducked his head evasively and began biting his nails nervously, his voice low: "It sounds …… so serious."

Bai Liu: "You try to separate your family from the others and piece together their remains for a separate burial, but you can't do that, and neither can anyone else. If you must do it, it's going to take a lot of DNA identification."

"…… After the families of the eventual victims deliberated, a mass accident cemetery was set up and everyone was buried together. On the day of the tribute to the victims, you, the only survivor of the accident, became the talk of the town."

Du Sanying's breathing began to quicken.

"The families of the victims who came to the memorial service asked how you survived, some were concerned and comforted you. Many showed their sympathy for you, relieved that you were lucky to have survived, and there were even two families who said they wanted to support you through college – because in their minds, you are also a victim, the only one left."

"But you know you're not, you feel like the perpetrator, and you know their loved one died because of your luck."

“And they want to help you.”

Du Sanying covered his head and kept shaking, his eyes lost in thought, as if he had been transported back to that scene by Bai Liu’s words.

He kept apologizing mechanically, his eyes wide and tearing unconsciously.

“I’m sorry, I’m sorry, I didn’t mean to do it……”

Bai Liu took Du Sanying’s hands in his and forced him to look into his eyes as he continued brutally, “- When the mass cemetery burial took place, you disappeared and everyone was so worried about you that they looked for you everywhere. They eventually found out that you had actually buried yourself in the cemetery, but luckily, you were found again.”

“Because a child was playing in a part of the cemetery that hadn’t been built yet, and was killed directly by a falling monument. That’s how everyone found you buried under the cemetery.”

“That child was the child of one of the two families who expressed their desire to help you; his father died in the accident. He liked you very much and called you brother, so his mother became compassionate towards you and wanted to help you, not realizing that she had brought such bad luck for herself.”

“Does he remind you of your own sister?”

Du Sanying began to tremble as he struggled to pull his hand back, tears streaming down his face, almost wailing, “- stop talking!!!”

Bai Liu did not stop, but looked closer at Du Sanying’s tear-filled eyes.

“What were you screaming as you crawled out of the grave to hold the body of that child on your knees, as you held the broken bodies of your dead parents, sister and brother at the scene of the accident?”

“Why did your memory malfunction after that and refuse to remember anything?”

Du Sanying slid to his knees, unable to stop his tears sliding down his face, his head tilted back and his voice full of hoarse despair, as if his heart and liver had been ripped out.

“Help!!! Somebody help them!!!”

“Let me die!!! Let them live!!!”

Du Sanying cried hoarsely, his back arched and his head hung low, tears falling one by one on the floor.

“- I don’t want to be lucky to live, let me die unhappily.”

The parrot’s crown of hair stood upright as it drew out its song, “- Let me die unhappily!!!”

A dazzling white light descended on Du Sanying’s shoulders, enveloping him and Bai Liu.

After the white light, the two men disappeared into the same place.

Reality

Mu Sicheng and the parrot left on the ground stared blankly at each other for a long time before he turned to the other three, spreading his hands: "…..So we've been left here by Bai Liu?"

"It's not just as simple as leaving us here, it's causing us a big problem." Liu Jiayi's ears twitched and she looked towards the door, "The head of the sanatorium is here."

Mu Ke concentrated: "It seems we need to find a good reason to explain to the director why his patient has disappeared."

"Or Bai Liu will have another lawsuit on his hands for abducting a mental patient." Tang Erda rubbed his brow in pain, "He was a bit too impulsive this time."

"He's already under the watch of the Heretic's Authority and if you add in the police station's watch…… the more ordinary people around Bai Liu who monitor him, the more difficult it will be for him to enter the game."

Liu Jiayi sighed: "Yes, so this guy left us to take care of the aftermath."

Mainly because it was useless for them to go to the Antarctic, where the Du Sanying's destructive power was visible to the naked eye and only Bai Liu was spared.

Might as well leave them where they are.

The director pushed open the door and stared in disbelief at the collapsed bed, the mess of duvets on the floor, and the parrot standing next to it.

The parrot jumped and bounced, screaming: "Bai Liu, bad, bad…! He makes the owner cry cry cry!"
It spread its wings wide open and hovered around the roof, flicking its thin tongue, its voice sharp and penetrating.

"They're hugging and going to heaven! Together they go up to the sky and jerk off!"

Director's pupils quaked : "…… what are you shooting?!"

The parrot raised its wings back and stretched its neck to repeat, "-jerk off!"

Liu Jiayi, Mu Sicheng, Mu Ke, Tang Erda: "……"

[Shoot the plane down for a safe landing] should not be reduced to [jerk off] ah!!!

Do you speak human language or not, you parrot!

Tang Erda jumped up, pinched the parrot's wings and pointed beak and at its violent struggle, turned around stiffly, and carried it out onto the balcony, tucking it into its cage to feed it water: "……The parrot hasn't had any water for too long and is squawking nonsense, so I'll take it out on the water to drink some plane ……"

Liu Jiayi snapped her eyes shut in despair.

Tang Erda was so weak that he couldn't even speak clearly.

The hand of the director holding the door handle trembled slightly as he looked at the group in utter horror, "……What have you done to the patient of 906?!"

Mu Sicheng closed the ward door as quickly as possible, blocking the escape route of the director.

Mu Ke took a deep breath and stepped in front of the director, holding his hands calmly, "We can explain."

The director, who had been attacked from both sides, was scared to tears: "I- I- I-, you guys, let me go! I haven't jerked off with a guy in a long time since I graduated from college!"

Miles away, over the Antarctic, in the Ross Sea.

On the deck of the shaking plane, Du Sanying and Bai Liu, who had just landed, were rolling around in the cabin, unable to stand up. Bai Liu grabbed a metal pole and pulled Du Sanying to keep them steady.

Bai Liu kicked the back of the seat and instructed Du Sanying to pull the seat rail down and rummage under the seat to see if the oxygen mask and parachute were still in place.

Du Sanying was so dizzy that he pulled a seat and pressed it, and a parachute and oxygen mask popped out, even with two thick winter suits.

Bai Liu's eyes dropped – He was truly lucky.

Most of the usable equipment on the entire plane should have been plundered by the five escorts at this time and the rest should have not been able to be taken away.

Du Sanying was extremely lucky to get it on the first shot.

Bai Liu raised his chin and told Du Sanying to get his gear on and sit in his seat to secure his harness, before letting Du Sanying hold him in place to put on his gear.

It was only then that Du Sanying caught his breath, covering his oxygen mask and breathing heavily: "- where are the five escorts you said were on the plane?"

Bai Liu covered his face with the oxygen mask and reached for the seatbelt on the seat.

"In an emergency like this, the escorts are either in the cockpit or in the cargo hold."

Bai Liu wrapped a parachute around his head to avoid being hit by a hard object during the bumpy ride, and gestured to Du Sanying's forehead to show him to do the same.

Du Sanying replied loudly from his oxygen mask, his voice muffled, "- I don't need to! The debris can't hit me!"

As he spoke, he reached into the plane's gallery and a spanner flying from the side of a fire hydrant threatened to break Du Sanying's arm, but in the nick of time, the plane lurched up and down in a strange way.

The spanner grazed the back of Du Sanying's hand and crashed into the steel plate, denting it deeply, but leaving Du Sanying's soft forearm unharmed.

"Just watch!" Du Sanying kept speaking very loudly and desperately to make sure Bai Liu could hear him, "It's okay if you hide behind me, you don't have to wrap your head!"

As they spoke, the red warning lights on either side of the end of the aircraft corridor turned on and a loudspeaker above the red lights played a mechanical automatic alarm.

“The aircraft is experiencing unusual weather with unidentified cloud constantly pushing upwards on both wings, causing the aircraft to lurch, please prepare for an emergency landing – zzzzz -“

Soon this mechanical sounding announcement was cut off and turned into a human announcement, spoken in a fast and panicked voice:

“There was a crew member passed out on this side of the freighter bay, knocked out by me. Those five body parts, once exposed, would be so close they would make people mentally descend. It’s impossible to parachute out with the metal box and carry them at all.”

“A direct parachute landing with the body parts won’t work.”

The radio buzzed and buzzed and it wasn’t long before another voice changed, “But those five metal boxes are specially made and are just too heavy, so if landing alone or with us won’t work, we’ll have to consider either dumping them in the sea or crashing with the plane on land.”

Bai Liu and Du Sanying looked at each other – this would be the five escorts’ intra-team communication and radio frequencies linked together to keep each other informed in such extreme situations.

The radio continued to broadcast.

“Definitely not in the sea. The water is so fluid that once the metal box is deposited for too long and corrodes to expose its contents, the body parts can contaminate the world with the help of seawater!”

“But crashing on land can contaminate the Antarctic belt just as much if the box is damaged during landing ……”

“You can wrap it in a cotton woven item like a winter jacket, right?”

“No, have you forgotten the dried rose leaf? This corpse can alienate anything, even plant-based items like cotton. Captain Su has repeatedly warned us not to wrap the holding box in plant-based items.”

“But there simply aren’t many chemical-based fibre cushions on the plane, and there’s no cushioning effect, ah, under such a high airflow impact, unless we make human flesh cushions for the box – a layer of high-density bone and muscle might cushion the impact of a rapid descent……”

“Even if landing on land pollutes the Antarctic, polluting the land is more manageable than polluting the ocean! The population density of the Antarctic is so low, even if they are sacrificed ……”

“SHUT UP!!!”

A stern rebuke interrupted several arguments, and there was a moment of radio silence before saying, “If we take sacrifice as a trade-off and a matter of course, then what’s the point of being a member of the Heretic Authority instead of being ordinary people?”

“We, as members of the Heretic Authority, are here to avoid the sacrifice of any ordinary person.”

There was silence on the radio for a few more seconds, only the sound of zipping electricity.

“How many boxes are there?” The man enquired.

The man in the cargo hold replied, “Captain, eight in all.”

After another moment of silence, the captain said in a mute voice, “All crew, listen to this order. The plane’s forced landing location is Antarctic land, each person is responsible for a metal box. Wrap them in flesh to cushion the box, to avoid it breaking when landing and contaminating the Antarctic, posing a threat to the ordinary people living there.”

There was a long interval before someone returned very softly, “Yes, Captain.”

Someone asked weakly, “Captain, but what about the three other boxes?”

The radio was quiet for a few more seconds before the captain spoke, “Later you will divide me into four pieces and wrap the box with the muscles and bones of my upper limbs, lower limbs, and back.”

“This part of the abdominal cavity has the strongest rib frame cushioning, this part should save one and the other three ……”

The captain paused in exhaustion, the energy in his voice was all gone at this moment, and his tone was as light as if he was muttering to himself: “……We have failed in our duty, we have failed Captain Su and failed to protect…… “

"-boxes and ordinary people."

Reality

Bai Liu walked on the turbulent deck of the plane towards the cockpit, Du Sanying at his side. Objects were flying from the sides of the plane, automatically avoiding them.

In front of the cockpit, Bai Liu knocked on the door and the men inside pushed it open with great effort. They looked at the two extra men on the plane with dismay and almost instantly drew their guns from their sides and pointed them at Bai Liu's head, saying sternly.

"Who are you guys?! Did you follow us here by hiding on the plane?!"

Bai Liu was wearing a thick down hat and an oxygen mask that covered most of his face, so the team member didn't recognise him as the Bai Liu who had caused so much unrest in the Heresy Bureau.

"I was sent here by Tang Erda, former head of the Third Branch of the Bureau of Heresy Handling, to deal with the current situation." Bai Liu exhaled a white breath and raised his eyes to look directly at the team member, "He saw this coming."

The team member retracted his gun: "Are you Bai Liu, the living heretic that Captain Tang is following? Did Captain Tang send you here?"

Bai Liu nodded his head.

The team member gritted his teeth and turned to let Bai Liu into the cockpit: "Come in and talk."

The captain sat in the pilot's seat with bloodshot eyes, his hands flying over the dashboard that kept ticking with alarms, and asked in a cold voice without looking back, "- what can you do?"

"As you know I am a living heretic, so I will not be alienated by the body parts." Bai Liu spoke calmly, "Open the cargo bay door for me so I can take the body parts with me and parachute down alone."
The captain's eyes rolled for a moment as he finally glanced at Bai Liu with his peripheral vision: "- you're asking me to leave a high-risk heretic like the corpse in your custody?"

His attitude was aggressive, even a little harsh: "- what if you run off with the body, or try to do something else with it?"

“A little leak from this heresy can kill thousands of people, do you know how precious human life is?”

“I know that human life is a superficial thing to you, not as valuable as money.” The captain moved his eyes back, his face expressionless, “But it’s not in my eyes, and I can’t afford to take responsibility for so many lives in Antarctica.”

“It’s not as if you don’t have a previous conviction like that on you, and the third detachment of the Rose Factory has yet to settle its score with you.”

“I won’t let you take the body parts.”

The co-captain’s crew could not help but admonish somewhat, “Captain, this is one way to go!”

Another member of the crew followed in anxiety, “Captain! Do you have to let yourself die in four pieces?!”

The captain scolded sternly, interrupting them, “Alright, wait and find parachutes and communication equipment for these two, drop them off and just tell them to get the hell back on their own. No need to waste any more words!”

“My mind is made up!”

Bai Liu exhaled a calm white breath, “The lives of the people you want to save are lives, but the lives of these team members and your own life are not, are they?”

“Who gave you the right to trade your own life, the lives of these team members, for the lives of what you thought were ordinary people?”

“Shut the fuck up!!” The captain clenched his back teeth and tightened his cheeks, his eyes were red and filled with a light layer of tears, “Get off the plane!!!”

Bai Liu continued indifferently, “They are human, but you are not?”

“Or do you feel that you and these members of the team are inherently inferior and should be given priority to sacrifice when it comes to anything, and die so that others can live – aren’t you afraid to die anymore?”

Both the crew and the co-pilot were breathlessly silent.

Bai Liu lowered his eyes, “But I’m not human, I’m a living heretic, a monster who has made mistakes and has no moral compass or human emotion – and you were just right, Captain, human life doesn’t have as much value in my eyes as money does.”

“So there is no need to deal with me as a human being in your eyes.”

“In such a critical situation, it is logical in the human worldview for you to use my life to save the greater good, both for emotional and ethical reasons.”

Bai Liu’s voice was light and steady, “I am the one who should be sacrificed, not you.”

“As for your claim that I would use the body parts, there is no denying that I have a tendency to use everything, but you must have some means of controlling a high-risk heretic like me when you bring high-risk heretics on board, right?”

Even the team member from the Third Branch, who has always hated Bai Liu, couldn’t bear to shake his head at this point, and he decisively refused: “But that one is for remotely monitoring the corpses mental contamination and preventing riots by driving regulatory metal mechanical clasps into the bones of each body part…… “

Bai Liu interrupted him and replied gently, “Just use it on me.”

The team member looked up sharply as he retorted incredulously, “But you’re a living person! Because it’s for a corpse, we don’t have any anaesthetic facilities with us, there are thirty rings in total. You’ll die from the pain if we put them in forcefully!”

“But the corpse uses this too, right?” Bai Liu looked up at the crew member with a very light smile on his face, “I’ve always been the same kind of monster, or rather, heretic, as it is.”

“Isn’t it normal to use the same thing for control?”

The captain snapped, “- even if you are a fucking heretic, I will not approve of this being used on a living person, Bai Liu, get your ass off the plane -“

“Captain.” Bai Liu interrupted calmly, “There is no two ways about this, I get hurt once or you five die, you have to choose one.”

The captain’s back teeth were grinding one at a time, his eyes were dark underneath. The whites of his eyes were bloodshot, and the muscles on his cheekbones were shaking from the clenching of his teeth.

Bai Liu suddenly stepped forward and half bowed, his tone sincere: “Captain, you have people you want to save and I have a monster I want to save.”

“And I hope you will understand and fulfil this dream of mine.”

The captain rose from the pilot’s place and gave up his own seat to the crew member who was keeping watch beside him. He turned to look at Bai Liu, who still maintained his bowing stance and exhaled a long, deep breath, his fingers opening and closing feebly for a moment from the long hours of manoeuvring.

His gaze moved slowly from the haggard faces of the two crew members still manning the dashboard to the white haze of clouds outside the window and let go for a brief moment.

Then he closed his eyes and said in a hoarse voice.

“…… You come over here, just put four rings on, wrists and ankles to control the limbs.”

Bai Liu got up and thanked the captain sincerely, “Thank you.”

The captain waved his hand wearily, “……If it hurts, say so if you can’t help it.”

Bai Liu was taken to the infirmary, and Du Sanying stood anxiously outside, expecting to hear some sort of scream or, at worst, a little moan – the rings were not anesthetized, and it sounded painful.

But eventually the only sound that came from the infirmary was a click that sounded like a stapler stapling a book, which came four times, followed by Bai Liu’s steady thanks, “Is it done? Thank you, Captain.”

Du Sanying was about to push the door open, but he stopped – he heard the sound of someone kneeling inside, knees hitting the cold floor with a thud.

“You are a heretic, a monster without fear. The Heresy Authority, and we in the Third Branch will certainly monitor you for the rest of your life and will not give you any chance to do evil or harm.” The captain gritted his teeth in hatred.

Bai Liu gave a steady hmm, “I know, that’s your position, I understand.”

The captain was breathing heavily, he seemed to be crying, his voice choked with sobs, and then there were two heavy, hard, kowtowing sounds, “But this time, I take back all the personal comments I made about you before.”

“Thank you for saving the rest of the team, and thank you for saving me.”

The two men emerged from the infirmary, Bai Liu gently rubbing his wrist, a yellow mark of iodine sterilisation remaining on the back and some odd deformation of the bone protrusion – this must be where the ring clasp was driven in.

The captain, his face still streaked with roughly wiped tears, nodded to Bai Liu, “I’ll open the cargo door for you, go ahead.”

Bai Liu led Du Sanying, who had not yet recovered, all the way to the bottom cargo hold.

Once inside the cargo hold, a glance revealed the metal crates in which the body parts are stored, neatly arranged about two or three metres apart in a circular pattern, with a lot of foam and air cushions stuffed between them to separate them. Some of the air cushions had been punctured during the bumps and were spread out absently on the floor.

Bai Liu told Du Sanying to stand at the door of the cargo hold, not to approach and preferably not to look, to avoid being mentally contaminated, while he went in alone to deal with the body parts in the box.

Du Sanying stayed honest to his word at the door of the cargo hold, his back straight as a sentry.

Actually, Bai Liu didn’t have to tell him to not look at the contents of the boxes – they somehow gave him a very unlucky feeling and gave him the creeps.

Less than ten minutes later, Bai Liu emerged with the body wrapped in cloth and a cold suit, deliberately separated from Du Sanying.

Bai Liu: “Go and contact the captain and tell him to prepare to abandon the plane and try to find a place to land with a parachute.”

–Following the path of the game Ice Age, the odds are that the plane will not be saved and will most likely crash, so run as quickly as you can.

Apart from the captain and co-pilot, who were still in the cockpit, the remaining three members of the crew were already waiting at the cabin door of the aircraft.

They were sent over to show Bai Liu how to skydive, and one of them would jump in to give Bai Liu an aerial demonstration.

To avoid being mentally contaminated, they stood far away from Bai Liu and spoke only by shouting in the gale.

“If landing on the sea, the parachute comes in a matching package with a kayak, which we have enchanted with heretical modifications. It can withstand very low temperatures and can be used as a temporary landing site on the sea after instant expansion. The kayak can not carry much weight, so don’t put anything too heavy on it.”

“Make sure that neither you, nor the corpse ever falls into the water!”

“The water here is so cold that a fall would be life-threatening, and the body parts would cause pollution of the waters and alienate the creatures here.”

“If you land on land, there is a tent and some dry food in the package to last you about a week. Find a safe place and take it with you in the meantime. You have our Heresy Handling Bureau latch on you with a locator system and we will use all our efforts to find you within a week.”

The three players yelled until their voices were dry and pointed at Du Sanying: “And Bai Liu, what is this man you brought up here for?”

“Are you going to take him with you on the jump? Is this man a heretic like you and he won’t be disturbed by the body parts?”

Bai Liu looked over at Du Sanying, who was shivering in the cold wind, and turned his head, “I took him because I’ve always had bad luck and the unexpected happens in everything I do.”

“But this time I didn’t want any surprises, so I took him with me to avoid any subsequent accidents."

The team wondered, "What unexpected situations?"

Bai Liu raised his eyes, "- like, the body parts falling into someone else's hands."

Three minutes later.

The side and rear doors of the aircraft were finally opened on the captain's instructions.

With the cold wind howling, the team was ready with parachute parcels, oxygen and breathing masks, and cold protection.

The bumps were getting more and more violent, to the point of being out of control. Du Sanying, standing in the wind, was almost blown off his feet and had to hold on to the handles to steady himself as he tried to put on his package.

While dressing, the team instructed Du Sanying on how to follow the jump.

"Normally a tandem jump would be you strapped in with him, but you and Bai Liu are both new so it's unsafe to tandem jump. Besides, he's already got a body strapped to him, so you'll have to jump with him and try to land in the same place as him."

"But the weather on this side of the Antarctic is not suitable for skydiving in all aspects – the only successful jumps I know of over here so far have been spot jumps, not high-altitude jumps."

"Because the view is all white below the high jump and the wind is unpredictable, it's hard to locate and find the landing spot. So don't force it as it's fine for you to find each other after you land."

"I was going to take you on a double jump, to be safer." This team member let out a long sigh, "But you wouldn't agree."

Du Sanying, who was awkwardly adjusting the chest strap, gave a slight, unnoticeable pause and looked up with a forced smile, "I'll be fine on my own, I'm lucky."

–but not necessarily the person who would take me.

Bai Liu is the only one who has survived around him so far.

The team member squarely thanked him, “But whether you are a human being or a living heretic like Bai Liu, please be safe.”

“Thank you so much for saving us.”

With that, the team member was ready to reach out and help Du Sanying adjust the mixed up chest straps.

Du Sanying answered in a whisper, turning his shoulder sideways to avoid this team member, his head lowered almost to the point of his heart, “…… I’ll do it myself, please just stand away from me.”

This crew member jumped first as a demonstration, exited the cabin, glided, opened his arms and in moments disappeared into the dense cloudy haze.

“This visibility is bad.” One team member frowned, “It’s too difficult to follow the jump, best to get someone to follow you.”

“No need.” Du Sanying squeezed the cord of his jump bag and whispered, “…… It’s okay, I’m lucky, I’ll be able to keep up with Bai Liu.”

Parachute jump begins.

Bai Liu leapt from the hatch through thick clouds and icy fog, the cold air slicing through his heart and lungs like a million freshly sharpened blades, freezing his limbs and paralysing him so much that even the wounds from inserting the ring clasp didn’t hurt as much.

He felt like a camera falling down from a height. The clouds, the mist and the sea seemed to fill Bai Liu’s field of vision with a sense of dynamic motion as if he was constantly switching between high frames.

Beautiful and ethereal, like the money-filled CG opening of a big game that cost a fortune.

It gives a trance-like, unrealistic coldness, like the frost on Bai Liu’s face at the moment.

Under Bai Liu’s feet were 14 million square kilometres of ice, in the sky is a plane about to crash, its tail beginning to burn. Embracing his heart is his only friend and his lover, who was now broken into pieces.

Then who will he be in his future?

[Future] didn't tell him the answer, so Bai Liu gave one to himself.

In that narrow orphanage, every child yearned day and night to be taken away by a strange man and woman – just as they yearned for loving parents, caring friends, brothers and sisters to grow up with.

They long for a family that they can only see in fairy tale books.

But Bai Liu was never a part of the process of being selected and taken away.

So Xie Ta asked him: [Don't you want a father?]

Bai Liu said: [No.]

Xie Ta asked: [Don't you want a Mother?]

Bai Liu said: [No.]

Xie Ta said: [Sister or brother, don't you want to have them?]

Bai Liu said: [What's the use of having them?]

Xie Ta, as if confused: [It seems to be a necessary component of family needs].

Bai Liu asked rhetorically: [Is there any use for families?]

Xie Ta thought for a moment and shook his head honestly: [A family seems to be a venue formed after two people have decided to be together, bound by law, morality, and some emotion called love, to be together with each other forever].

[Everyone seems to yearn for family].

Xie Ta asked Bai Liu: [If you had a family without these essential components, is there anything you would like to put into the family?]

Bai Liu didn't answer at the time because he felt he would never need something like [family].

It's too boring for two people to be tied together forever.

But two monsters …… seemed to be okay.

Now Bai Liu and Xie Ta have met all the requirements to start a family, so …… if Bai Liu had a [family], then Xie Ta is his only family.

He hoped that if there was a future, a future with Xie Ta in it, it would be nice if Xie Ta would love him forever and be Bai Liu's family …….

That's enough.

An unreasonable gust of wind blew violently the moment Bai Liu opened his parachute.

Reality

The colourful rectangular curved parachute swung up and down in the swaying wind, tugging at Bai Liu, who was hanging from the parachute cord below, and throwing him from side to side.

Land was finally close, and below was a base with vaguely flickering lights – the same base from which the body parts were stolen in the game.

Bai Liu had already avoided landing at this base, but a sudden gust of wind pulled him there unreasonably.

–Like a mysterious and inexorable destiny.

Bai Liu glanced around through his goggles, pinpointing an out-of-the-way depot in a part of the base. He reached for the parachute cord, leaned back at the waist and adjusted his landing site.

He calmly adjusted his descent, already thinking of a strategy for when he lands – there was a knife in the package, designed to cut the accidentally tangled parachute cord.

Not long, or very new, but very sharp.

But now, if, as in the game, the body parts were found by the Edmond Observatory and were to be taken by force, Bai Liu felt that the knife would be of some use beyond cutting the parachute cord.

In the context of the game, Bai Liu remembered that the first people to find the body parts and turn them in to the Edmond Observatory were supposedly a group of ordinary Observatory researchers without weapons or attack power.
Bai Liu's mind wavered as he thought – I should be able to kill them all and destroy the bodies.
Although this undermines the legal boundaries that Lu Yizhan has always set for him.

But he can.

The huge base is immersed in the hazy, dim night.

The nights in Antarctica are always long and cold, and few residents have ever gone out into the night, except for cameramen who like to admire the Aurora Borealis.

But the native Antarctic dwellers, who have spent a lonely winter here, were clearly tired of the natural phenomenon of the Aurora Borealis and were now lying quietly under their warm blankets at home, unaware of the colourful parachute that had fallen from the sky.

There were exceptions to this rule, however, as the sheriff on routine patrol, with his lookout lights on, half-awake, saw the parachute landing next to the depot. Instantly awake, he scrambled to inform his superiors at the base, the management of the observatory.

The ground, freshly snowed in, was so white that Bai Liu made heavy footprints on it. He landed in the spacious, open snow next to the warehouse, rolling several times to stop the impact of the landing and the wind.

Bai Liu choked and coughed out the broken snow he had sucked down his throat, and squinted his eyes amid the howling wind at the dim lights of the base in the distance.

That was the only thing he could see clearly about the base.

The blizzard had not yet stopped and visibility was poor, only a vague glimpse of snow piled up in front of a warehouse door not far away. A large drum full of fuel had been blown to the ground at the back door, carrying a skull and crossbones sign next to it – a sign for dangerous chemical products.

This warehouse would most likely contain strong acids and fuel oil.

He can't stay here, these two items could destroy the body parts.

It seems that whoever is behind this is really scheming and trying to put options in front of Bai Liu, constantly urging him to destroy his weaknesses.

— If you don't destroy your weakness, you can be controlled. If you don't want to be controlled, you have to kill the person who wants to control you.

Bai Liu, what will you choose?

God smiled and said, "Bai Liu, whichever way you choose, you will become Bai Six."

In the knee-deep snow, Bai Liu had little ability to move with the body parts and the pile of stuff, and if his suspicions were right, the investigating scientific team would be coming soon.

Bai Liu only thought for a few moments before taking off his bundle where he stood without hesitation and heading away from the base with the cold body on his back.

Bai Liu found a snow pit and buried the body parts in it.

The snow instantly buried Bai Liu's footprints at the edge of the snow pit.

After hiding the body parts, Bai Liu breathed heavily, pausing to frown and cover his heart – which had been aching vaguely since he quit Ice Age.

This pain is now becoming more intense.

But this pain was quickly held at bay by Bai Liu, who regained his calm demeanour and walked back to where he had taken off his bundle earlier. He rummaged through it and retrieved the knife that had been used to cut through the parachute cord.

Bai Liu gripped the hilt of his knife without a trace of emotion on his face, the clasp on his wrist bone sliding prominently with the movement, a very shallow heat coming from his breath.

Then he stood up, took the knife and walked towards the warehouse and quietly posted himself behind the door, waiting for the right person to come.

Bai Liu chose the second path.

He was determined to prevent everything by killing these ordinary people who knew nothing with his own hands.

The prophet above the pantheon closed his eyes in resignation.

"He could have stopped them without …… killing them," said the prophet, his voice hoarse.

The man hiding under the hood smiled as if he knew this would happen.

He retorted softly, "No, as long as Bai Liu doesn't kill them, and as long as one of them survives and goes back to report this, the body parts will be taken."

“Even though the group didn’t know what was going on or what this corpse had to offer, they just did what they had to do to report this unknown corpse.”

The man under the hood smiled as if in pity as he leaned forward to look closer at the prophet’s expression.

“But tragedies still happen, because there is no end to the desires of man.”

“As long as it is known that such things exist, there will be people who are desperate enough to give everything to get the corpse and fulfil their desires and wishes, to abuse others to satisfy themselves – people live on social superiority.”

“That’s why Bai Liu’s approach to killing them is so clean.” He appreciated Bai Liu’s approach, “- it’s only by killing the first person to discover the gold mine that people will think it doesn’t exist.”

” Bai Liu can monopolise this gold mine.”

The man said with amusement, ” Bai Liu is really clever, he has already guessed my existence. Although there were still many intermediate paths that could be taken without killing anyone, they were high in latent risk, and there is also a me who can interfere with his plans at will, so in the end – “

“- Bai Liu understood what I wanted to see him become, so he showed it to me.”

The werewolf card on the tabletop had a sinister red glow in its eyes. It lurked and moved towards the card representing the civilians on the tabletop, quietly baring its long teeth – a werewolf’s omen to kill.

“This is the first time the werewolf card has killed a civilian in this world line.”

The prophet returned nonchalantly, “Isn’t that what you want to see?”

The man looked up at the seer with a pleasant expression: ” Bai Liu let me have my wish and by doing so prevent me from manipulating fate.”

He took his hand off the tabletop and with a courteous brush of his hand towards the table, he spoke with a smile, “- if Bai Liu is willing to manipulate the world the way Bai Six does, then I would indeed be happy to cede control of the world to him."

The man beneath the hood gracefully retreats from the tabletop and stands looking at the various character cards he has moved around on the table.

"He is my chosen heir to the evil god, and this is what he deserves."

The man lifted his head, smiled at the seer whose petrification had progressed to his heart, bent slightly and sighed regretfully.

"You've lost again, prophet."

The moment the petrification progressed to the prophet's neck, it abated downwards again in a bizarre manner, and the man raised his eyebrows in slight surprise, looking down at the table.

The moment the character card representing the werewolf bared its fangs, instead of biting into the civilian, its head turned and bit down hard on the [Idiot card]!

"The Idiot werewolf with full luck points cannot be taken away." The man sat back down, all expression on his face quickly disappearing, " Bai Liu What's up?"

Outside the windy and snowy warehouse.

Du Sanying's perfect luck score once again came into play as he landed precisely in a spot not far from Bai Liu.

But visibility was so poor in the snow and wind that he searched for a long time but could not find Bai Liu, only his parachute.

What Du Sanying didn't know was that Bai Liu was already hiding on the other side of the warehouse, waiting for the observation team to come.

Du Sanying's luck came into play when a group of men with torches approached the warehouse and they first found Du Sanying, half frozen to death.

The moment the group tried to rescue Du Sanying, Bai Liu sprang up from behind him and stuck a short knife to his throat, saying sternly, "Don't come any closer! I'll kill anyone who comes near!"

Du Sanying almost went into cardiac arrest due to Bai Liu's performance as a vivid gangster.

So his true expression of panic instantly moved the scientific team members who had come, and they spoke nervously in English to dissuade him.

Finally, someone suggested that the two men looked Asian. They tried again in clumsy Korean, Japanese and Chinese, and then introduced a researcher of Asian descent who stumbled over to communicate with Bai Liu.

“H-Hello.” The team member looked warily at the knife pressed to Du Sanying’s neck and motioned downwards with both hands, “Can you put the knife down first? What are you doing?”

Bai Liu replied in English, “I’ve been laid off and I want revenge on society, so I’m going to blow up the whole of Antarctica, and I want all you high-end talents buried with me!”

When he finished, he also kicked the fuel drum next to him in a manic manner, with a very hostile expression.

Du Sanying was completely baffled as he asked in a small voice, “…… Bai Liu, what are you doing?”

“Distracting the group.” Bai Liu acted like he was sick in the head, but his voice was calm, “-the one behind the curtain has limited influence on the [real world]. He has no way to impose random events like in the game, he can only use external factors like weather, people, and heretics to control this world that is not fully contaminated.”

“And all of these factors play a limited role in the Antarctic, where the weather is inherently extreme, there are no heretics and very few people.”

“In other words, here in Antarctica is not a good map for him. It is indeed a good place to store body parts – and I believe the man behind the scenes understands that, otherwise he wouldn’t have done it during the transportation of the body parts.”

Bai Liu whispered close to Du Sanying’s ear.

“Your luck is 100 percent. Now I’m holding you hostage, and in order for you to be rescued, either the other five escorts land here or the domestic observatory comes and takes over.”

“…… As soon as someone comes along and moves the body parts near the supervisory range Ice Dome A, things are under control.” Bai Liu’s breath hitched twice from the stabbing pain in his heart, but he quickly squashed it again.

Du Sanying was a bit confused, but vaguely understood what Bai Liu was talking about, so he dutifully played the role of an innocent hostage.

The isolated group of researchers, having seen two Asians killing each other and one Asian about to blow up the base, quickly contacted the domestic observatory after determining the nationality of the two Asians and requesting that someone be sent over to deal with the problem.

–Otherwise, not many people here know Chinese and even communication would be a problem.

What is more urgent than finding out why two unknown men landed here is clearly the situation at hand.

The domestic observatory was rushing over and Du Sanying had just breathed a sigh of relief when he saw a sudden gust of demonic wind on the ground where strong wind was already blowing.

The wind whirled like it was digging into the ground and blew several pale body parts from a distance, spreading them out before the men as if on display.

The body was covered only with a thin winter jacket – Du Sanying recognised it as Bai Liu's winter jacket.

Everyone's breath stopped as the men looked at the body parts without turning their eyes, wearing expressions as if they were bewitched, trying to pick them up.

Bai Liu put the knife to Du Sanying's neck and took a few steps forward, forcing the men back, his voice so cold it was almost frozen: "Get out of here."

As they moved away from the body parts, the men barely regained a glimmer of consciousness. They backed away in fear and asked in a low voice, "What is this? Whose body parts are these? Have you already killed a man?"

There was no emotion in Bai Liu's eyes: "Yes, I killed him."

"I split him up and hid him in the snow, so if you don't want to die, get out of here. I'm going to blow up the base."

The group was eventually deterred by the sense of threat posed by death. Bai Liu swayed and slid unsteadily on his feet, clinging to Du Sanying's back.

Du Sanying rushed to steady him, and dizzying visions began to appear before his eyes – he was too close to the body parts.

"…… go and open the warehouse door, you can do it." Bai Liu pushed Du Sanying hoarsely, "Let's go in, there's a lot of fuel in there. It's an explosion hazard, they wouldn't dare come in easily."

Du Sanying staggered up to the warehouse door and actually found a key on it that hadn't been pulled off – it was frozen and he had to cover it for a while before he could turn it.

When he opened the warehouse, he turned his head to shout at Bai Liu to come over, but his voice suddenly hit a lump in his throat, becoming smaller.

Du Sanying saw Bai Liu kneeling on the ground, carefully picking up the body parts in the cold-weather suit, patting the snow off them and covering them with his own cold-weather jacket.

Bai Liu wrapped up all the body parts and, clutching them to his belly where it was warmest, staggered to his feet and headed for the warehouse.

The scene was somehow familiar, and Du Sanying felt as if he had been on his knees a long time ago, picking up the body parts of his family and wrapping them in his arms, pretending they were still alive, weeping helplessly.

Once inside the warehouse, Du Sanying immediately locked the door behind him, and Bai Liu sat in the corner with his head hanging, his face pale and his lips dark and bloodless from the cold.

Du Sanying was anxious but afraid to go over – the pile of body parts in Bai Liu's arms was too heavy for him.

He wandered around the house in a hurry and was lucky enough to find the not-yet-abandoned hot air conditioning switch. Du Sanying turned it on with a sigh of relief and sat slumped against the wall, his hands hanging on two large, red-painted cans of chemicals.

Looking at the markings on it, there was fuel, harmful substances and some corrosive liquids such as strong acids.
Bai Liu sits in a corner away from the jars, the bruises from the cold slowly fading from his face.

Everything seems to be looking up.

But ten minutes later there was the sound of a key turning in the door of the warehouse – the group was coming again.

The group who had seen the corpse had gone amiss as they turned the key outside the door while muttering rapidly and in low tones, "-corpse, corpse-"

Du Sanying jumped up in a hurry and leaned against the warehouse door, only to hear a click as the key outside the door broke halfway in the keyhole.

The warehouse door was completely locked.

But before Du Sanying could breathe a sigh of relief, the men outside did not give up, they shifted positions.

The small, high window at the back of the warehouse was wiped clean, and a constant stream of people peered in with wide, unseeing eyes tilted to one side, staring dead at the body in Bai Liu's arms in the corner.

They began to smash the window with hammers, trying to climb in through the window, which was less than the size of a cake box.

Du Sanying climbed breathlessly to the small window and sat with his back against it to block it.

Once again his luck played out and the men outside began to fall as they tried to climb up and push him away.

Du Sanying gritted his teeth and strained to hear the sound of the man outside falling into the snow while he folded his hands in a prayer of apology, "I'm sorry, I'm sorry-"

After the window climbing activity, the people outside subsided slightly for a short while before the sound of louder snowmobiles pushing snow came through.

Du Sanying rushed to look out of the small window.

Not far from the warehouse, a neatly arranged row of snowmobiles shined with their headlights on, the sleds in front of them pushing out. The tyres ploughed and splashed through the snow like a pack of wild dogs ready to attack, with glowing green eyes and saliva ready to strike at the throat of their prey.

–This bunch of psychos actually tried to push the warehouse directly with a snowmobile!!!

Are they crazy!!! The whole warehouse will explode!!!

Du Sanying was so frightened that he tumbled down from the small window and knelt far in front of Bai Liu, shouting at him: ” Bai Liu! Bai Liu! Wake up!!!”

“The warehouse is going to explode!!!”

Bai Liu’s eyes were slightly closed, as if he had fallen into a deep sleep from exhaustion and did not want to wake up.

Du Sanying was so anxious that he wanted to shake Bai Liu awake, but he couldn’t get near him because of the body parts in his arms.

“Bai Liu, wake up!” Du Sanying shouted in a squeaky voice, “I won’t die if the warehouse explodes, but you will! Get up and run!!!”

Du Sanying was so desperate that he threw things from the warehouse at Bai Liu, trying to wake him up.

But Bai Liu was unresponsive, only tilting his head a little, blood slowly seeping from the corners of his mouth and his breathing fading.

Du Sanying was so dazed that he rushed over to the body parts and threw them away, kneeling down dizzily, slapping Bai Liu’s face and crying out in fear.

“Hey! Hey! Don’t you die!!!”

“Didn’t you say that no matter how close you get to me, you won’t die or be affected by me?!”

“Stay alive!!!”

The lights outside the window flashed by, so bright it made you want to shed a tear, and the roar of snowmobiles rang through the wintry night.

Du Sanying bawled and clutched Bai Liu's fallen head: "Help! Someone help him!"

The body parts that Du Sanying had thrown aside with such haste assembled themselves as if they were self-aware, turning into a perfect statue covered in cracks on the ground. Then, the blood flowed through the veins of the statue as they connected to each other.

At last, the statue stood up. Except for its eyes closed and its cracked body, it was like a real human being.

Du Sanying dully stopped crying.

The statue stepped forward and took Bai Liu from Du Sanying's arms and thanked him with his eyes closed and head bowed: "Thank you for taking care of Bai Liu."

The voice was a little broken, like the statue was at the moment, but the sincerity of it could still be heard.

Du Sanying couldn't help but shake his head in alarm and take several steps back before he carefully returned, "No, you're welcome."

After a while, Du Sanying couldn't resist and asked in a low voice, "Are you, like, alive?"

The statue shook its head, "I am a monster."

Du Sanying stole a glance at Bai Liu, who was lying on the monster's shoulder: "Bai Liu and you, what's your relationship?"

The statue was quiet for a moment: "He is someone very important to me."

Du Sanying let out an oh, his mood somehow relaxing, "You can save him, can't you?"

"I am there to save him." The statue lowered his head, and he seemed to want to open his eyes to look at the man in his arms, but suddenly remembered that there were other people there, and said, "Can you please turn your head? You cannot see my eyes, but I would like to see Bai Liu."

Du Sanying inexplicably had the feeling that he was glowing, and with a couple of oohs and aahs, he honestly covered his ears and turned away.

Xie Ta lowered his head, his silvery blue eyes opened and he gazed wholeheartedly at Bai Liu in his arms, wiping the blood stain from the corner of his mouth with his thumb and smiling very lightly.

“You’ve worked hard.”

Xie Ta bowed his head and placed a kiss on Bai Liu’s forehead with great reverence.

“It’s almost over, so forgive me for not daring to meet you in this state, it just doesn’t look good.”

The roar outside the warehouse grew louder and Du Sanying tried to turn around somewhat uneasily, only to turn around and see Xie Ta placing Bai Liu in his arms.

” Bai Liu was injured in the game, please continue to look after him.”

Du Sanying took it in a panic, then asked, “What are you going to do with those people out there?”

“It’s not their fault.” Xie Ta stood in front of the warehouse door that was knocked constantly, his voice and expression as flat as snow, “-it was the fault of the new evil god who used me to lure them to their doom.”

“It was my fault that the old evil god fell.”

“I shouldn’t exist.” Xie Ta says, “Bai Liu will be controlled by him because of me.”

Xie Ta’s hands came up and the fuel poured down the sides. A spark fell from Xie Ta’s pale fingertips and the fire burst into flames along Bai Liu’s winter jacket on his body. Strong acid fell from the side of the window and joined the fire.

Rushing smoke billowed from the warehouse.

An ethereal, unreal voice came out of the fire: “After I am burned, all traces of my existence will be erased, including Bai Liu’s memories, the data from the game, the things I gave to Bai Liu.”

Du Sanying was stunned: “How did this happen ……”

The reverse cross and fish scale hanging from Bai Liu’s neck shattered into powder and the fish bone whip in the system panel dulled and disappeared.

An ear-splitting announcement spanned all areas of the game, and players looked up at the huge aerial announcement that [System Notification: Data in all areas of god-level wandering NPC has begun to be cleared….]

[System Notification: Data cleanup is complete, God-level NPC bug is fully erased. From now on, please feel free to play the game, no more God-level NPCs roaming around the major game scenes].

The fire was still burning, and the voice inside faded away, as if in a dream.

” Du Sanying, you should understand better than anyone that sometimes not remembering anything is not a bad thing.”

Bai Liu, leaning on Du Sanying’s arm, opened his eyes weakly, his dark eyes reflecting the light of the leaping fire. A tear slid down the corner of his eye to his jaw and dripped to the ground.

“I hate you, Xie Ta .” Bai Liu said to himself, “I hate you.”

From the fire came a very soft voice: “I love you.”

The sparks jumped, then died out as ashes and the remaining smoke cleared away, leaving nothing behind.

Not even the ashes were left behind, disappearing cleanly.

The roar outside the window went on for a while, and then came the sound of people talking in confusion about why they were here, and then they all drove off in their snowmobiles.

Du Sanying also remained confused for a moment, not seeming to react to why he was in this warehouse, and why there was a pile of burn marks in front of him.

Bai Liu, who was leaning on his shoulder, collapsed onto the cold ground, clenching his heart in excruciating pain and vomiting a mouthful of blood. Blood began to pour from his ears, eyes and nose in a frenzy that could not be stopped.

Bai Liu was choking and coughing convulsively, blood clots flying everywhere, and Du Sanying was so frightened that his adrenaline exploded and he grabbed Bai Liu and rushed outside the warehouse, shouting, “Anyone!

“Come to the rescue!!! Someone’s vomiting blood!!!”

Bai Liu’s eyes closed wearily and the last thing he saw were the black marks on the ground from the burning.

Du Sanying, his hands covered in blood, sat stunned outside the ward.

The unconscious Bai Liu was rushed to the nearest hospital, where he was taken to the ICU.

But the doctors came and went with tense expressions, indicating that Bai Liu’s condition was not good.

Du Sanying was so distraught that he had to stop a doctor and ask in broken English, “How is Bai Liu doing in there?”

The doctor said, “It’s okay, out of danger.”

Du Sanying breathes a long sigh of relief.

“It’s a miracle he survived.” The doctor, who looked tired but also somewhat excited, explained to Du Sanying, “This patient, Bai Liu, has traces of his heart having been cut and then dug out, and the connection is still fresh.”

“He should be recuperating from such a serious operation, but his parachuting and strenuous running caused these otherwise incompatible high-precision vascular anastomoses to split and he developed severe internal bleeding.”

The doctor stressed, “Almost no one survives such a bizarre operation. I don’t know who it was that kept Bai Liu’s blood loss very limited for a period of time and kept him going until now.”

“He should be all right now.” The doctor got up, “But he’s not awake yet, so let him rest for a while.”

Dazed and confused, Du Sanying got up and thanked the doctor, then borrowed a satellite phone to call home – Tang Erda had given him his number before he left.

He had lost a bit of memory of what exactly he was doing over here, except that it was on a very important mission – it seemed to be transporting a high-risk heretic.

The satellite phone was quickly picked up and Tang Erda quickly asked, “What’s the status of you and Bai Liu? Where are the five team members?”

“I’m fine, and the five escorts should be fine too.” Du Sanying stammered and looked towards the ward at the end of the corridor, where Bai Liu was staying.

“But Bai Liu …… is now in the hospital and he is still in a coma.”

” Bai Liu in a hospital?!”

As soon as he heard that Bai Liu had been injured, Mu Sicheng started to grab the phone, furious, “Shit, what’s wrong? Why is Bai Liu in the hospital?”

The call then went to Muke, whose voice was tense: “Did you encounter something during the transport?”

Lastly, Liu Jiayi, who was quick on the uptake: “The five escorts and you are fine, so it’s not something that happened in transit. Was it a problem with the item being transported or was it game related?”

“Both, I guess.” Du Sanying sighs, “The transport items were burned, and Bai Liu’s injuries seem to have been carried over from the game and have little to do with the transport process.”

Mu Sicheng’s voice was suspicious: “Brought out of the game?”

“Bringing an injury out of the game, it’s only if the player feels that the injury is something he actually suffered physically himself. Bai Liu didn’t even drop below 60 mental points in the last game, so how can that illusion arise?”

Du Sanying’s voice was a little confused, he didn’t know much about this: “I don’t know.”

Liu Jiayi pressed, ” What is Bai Liu’s injury?”

Du Sanying recalls: “Heart.”

“The doctor said someone had cut open his heart.”

Reality

The next day, Bai Liu was able to sit up—something the doctors found incredible.

Before they could investigate the cause of his astonishing recovery, however, Bai Liu—bed and all—was taken over by the domestic observatory.

Now, he sat quietly on an observation post bed, gazing sideways out the window at the howling snow and wind. Beside him, Du Sanying dozed fitfully.

A soft knock came at the door.

"Mr. Bai Liu, may we come in?"

Du Sanying jerked awake, hastily wiping the saliva from the corner of his mouth before turning toward Bai Liu.

Bai Liu didn't look away from the window. "Come in."

The door swung open, and five escorts entered, followed by the station chief. They stood at the foot of Bai Liu's hospital bed, their heads slightly bowed.

"You helped us solve the trouble with the heretic that was escorted this time," one of them said.

Bai Liu let out a noncommittal hum. His voice was light. "I didn't do anything."

"Mr. Bai, what you did was invaluable." The station chief lifted his head, his expression tinged with relief.

"I admit, I was somewhat disappointed when I heard that the Heretic Authority had decided to transfer the original dried-leaf rose plant to the Antarctic for preservation. But since no method has been found to destroy it, moving it somewhere sparsely populated was the only option."

He exhaled deeply, as if releasing a long-held tension. "It's fortunate you found a way to destroy it before the other researchers—who had been entranced by the rose—could attempt to claim it."

At that, Bai Liu finally turned his head toward them. Then, unexpectedly, he chuckled. Softly. Slowly.

He repeated the station chief's words, as if savoring them.

"The original plant of the rose was taken to the South Pole?"

The station chief hesitated. "…Yes?"

"So," Bai Liu murmured to himself, "your memories were corrected into a rose plant…"

His voice dropped to a whisper.

"…I'm the only one who remembers him dead. I'm the only one who remembers him alive."

He turned back to the window and nodded to show he understood. Then, he fell silent.

To everyone else, it was nothing more than the fading of an insignificant, fragrant rose.

But Bai Liu knew the truth.

It was his God who had died.

The five escorts exchanged glances before bowing in gratitude. They thanked Bai Liu for saving them from a near-disastrous plane crash, then took their leave, allowing him to rest.

The captain was the last to exit. Before closing the door, he hesitated, glancing back at Bai Liu's pale figure in the hospital bed.

His mind drifted back to the words Bai Liu had spoken to him on the plane:

You have people you want to save. I have monsters I want to save.

In all his years working for the Heretic Authority, the captain had encountered countless high-risk heretics—beings large and small, some barely human. Never had he seen a look like that in a monster's eyes.

And yet, in that moment, Bai Liu's gaze had been utterly sincere.

Perhaps to Bai Liu, that rose had been more than just a heretic.

Perhaps it had been a friend. A lover. A family member.

Something worth saving at all costs.

Yet, in the end, Bai Liu had failed to save the one thing he truly wanted to.

For some reason, the captain felt a deep sense of regret.

After a pause, he spoke.

"I've briefed Captain Su on how you assisted us. He said he'd apply for a review of your risk classification. If approved, you'll be granted greater freedom of movement."

He continued, "All four restraints were removed during your transfer to the domestic observatory. The third detachment won't conduct any surveillance on you until the reassessment is finalized."

A beat of silence. Then, quietly:

"Thank you. For saving us. And the people here."

He hesitated before adding, "…About the rose—I'm sorry."

Bai Liu did not respond.

The captain bowed slightly in farewell and closed the door behind him.

The moment they were gone, Bai Liu tore the IV from the back of his hand.

Du Sanying flinched. "What are you—?!"

"Lock the door," Bai Liu ordered. "Don't let any normal people in. Pack up—we're entering the game."

Blood dripped steadily from Bai Liu's hand. Du Sanying hesitated before whispering, "The doctor said they gave you an anticoagulant to prevent clotting. You're going to keep bleeding if you—"

Bai Liu shot him a look.

Du Sanying swallowed, scowled, and obediently locked the door.

Bai Liu's voice was calm. "Liu Jiayi and the others should be waiting for me in the game."

Du Sanying frowned. "But… the doctor said—"

"Liu Jiayi has a better treatment for me than anticoagulants," Bai Liu interrupted.

Du Sanying blinked. "…What kind of treatment?"

Bai Liu smiled faintly.

"The antidote."

In-game.

Outside the small guild building of the Wandering Circus, Liu Jiayi paced anxiously, while Mu Sicheng crouched in the doorway, arms resting on his knees, staring into space.

Muke stood motionless against the door, arms crossed, head bowed, his expression unreadable.

Tang Erda leaned against a nearby bin, a lit cigarette between his lips, absentmindedly spinning his gun with practiced ease. The movements —unloading, assembling, removing, and reloading—blurred together in rapid succession, the magazine and chamber clicking softly.

In all the countless world lines he had seen, he never imagined Bai Liu would go out of his way to save the Heresy Handling Bureau.

Dissected, bleeding profusely, collapsing in the freezing snow—held by Du Sanying for over half an hour before help arrived, his clothes soaked in his own blood…

Tang Erda had never seen Bai Liu in such a miserable state.

He had always been omnipotent, omnipresent—the sole chosen believer of the evil gods, moving through the world as if it existed solely for his amusement.

But this time, the gods who had always favored Bai Liu seemed to be punishing him.

Because this time, Bai Liu refused to follow the path designed for him.

Tang Erda was lost in thought when Mu Sicheng suddenly shouted:

“Bai Liu!”

Every head snapped toward the entrance.

Bai Liu approached, draped in an oversized hospital gown, blood still dripping from his hand. He walked straight toward the guild building, followed closely by a nervous-looking Du Sanying, who kept his gaze level with the ground.

Muke lowered his arms. Mu Sicheng jumped to his feet. Liu Jiayi stopped pacing. Tang Erda tucked his gun away.

He looked awful, but after all the waiting and uncertainty, he was finally here.

As soon as Bai Liu stepped inside, Muke wordlessly handed him a bandage.

Bai Liu accepted it and, as he wrapped his arm, began issuing orders:

“You all know my condition from Du Sanying. The wounds aren’t difficult to deal with. We’ll go to the game pool and find a low-difficulty game. Jiayi, you’ll use your skill to heal me once inside.”

Liu Jiayi nodded. “Understood.”

Bai Liu turned to Muke. “Is Wang Shun in the guild?”

Muke nodded.

“Good.” Bai Liu gestured toward Du Sanying, who had been keeping close behind him. “Have Wang Shun give him a crash course on game mechanics. Get a count of his past games, and make sure Wang Shun sets aside time each week to review the basics—Du Sanying will forget.”

Then, as an afterthought, Bai Liu added, “And remind Wang Shun to keep interactions minimal. No emotional involvement.”

He looked at Du Sanying. “Your luck stat will affect him.”

Muke gave a curt nod. “Got it. Come with me.”

Du Sanying hesitated, glancing at Bai Liu. Only after receiving a slight nod of approval did he trot after Muke.

Bai Liu then turned to Mu Sicheng. “I have a job for you.”

Mu Sicheng crossed his arms. “What is it?”

“Because of something Spades did, a number of my weapons and props were wiped out. The league demands replacements, and I need better ones.” Bai Liu’s gaze sharpened. “I think the cost should be covered by the Killer Sequence.”

A smirk pulled at the corners of Mu Sicheng’s lips. “They were last year’s top-ranked guild. Their inventory must be stacked.”

Bai Liu nodded. “Have Charles negotiate first. If they’re willing to sell, we’ll buy. If not…” He glanced down at Mu Sicheng’s monkey paw. “You know what to do.”

Mu Sicheng bared his teeth in a grin, flexing his wrist. “Got it. Just stomp in and terrorize their inventory master, yeah?”

Bai Liu hummed in approval.

With a lazy salute, Mu Sicheng sauntered off.

Next, Bai Liu looked to Tang Erda. “You and Jiayi are coming into the game with me. I’m in no shape to enter alone with Jiayi—I’ll get swarmed. I need strong backup.”

At that, Tang Erda exhaled, some of the tension leaving his posture. “Naturally. Are we heading to the game pool now?”

Bai Liu nodded.

Liu Jiayi, too, relaxed. She had been afraid Bai Liu would try to act tough and go in alone with her.

He looked too weak for that.

And yet… despite his haggard appearance, the moment Bai Liu stepped into the guild, everything fell into motion. Orders were given, people mobilized, and an unspoken weight lifted.

What a natural tactician.

Liu Jiayi studied him from the corner of her eye. Even now, calmly orchestrating the guild’s movements, Bai Liu showed no sign of the trauma he had endured. He was so composed, so effortlessly in control, it was almost as if…

As if he had dragged himself out of the wreckage and back into the game purely by instinct.

Who the hell could break Bai Liu's heart like this?

The only person capable of hurting him in the last round was Spades.

But that guy wasn't exactly… emotionally complex. He didn't seem capable of getting under Bai Liu's skin in a way that would actually affect him.

And yet, from the moment Bai Liu came back online, his first order of business was targeting the Killer Sequence and Spades.

Liu Jiayi rubbed her chin in thought.

Just what did Spades do to piss off Bai Liu—the ever-calm, profit-driven mastermind?

For the first time in a long while, Liu Jiayi found herself genuinely curious.

Killer Sequence Guild Lounge
Spades sat slouched on one side of the sofa, his head bowed, while across from him, the Inquisitor of God sat propped up on his knees, delivering a blistering reprimand.

"Look at you!" The Reverse God waved his hand in exasperation, his voice rising. "I'm not saying you can't play solo. It's normal to clash with other players when you want to win—everyone wants to be number one, and as your tactician, I get that."

His frustration only grew as he continued. "-But how the hell did you end up breaking another player's heart—bah, no, another kid's heart?!"

"It was just a game pool, not even the league! Was that really necessary?!"

With a resounding slap to his thigh, the Inquisitor of the Reverse God demanded, "Spades, do you think that was the right thing to do?!"

Spades leaned back, arms folded over the whip resting against his chest, his head dipping slightly as if in silent admission of guilt.

Seeing this rare display of compliance, the Inquisitor of the Gods sighed, his tone softening. "Listen, Spades, it’s still support season. If word gets out that you’re out here bullying smaller guilds like this, it'll tank our support rate. We already have a reputation problem—there aren’t many members in the Killer Sequence as it is, and our image is terrifying enough. Most ordinary players don’t even want to support us."

He considered for a moment before offering a suggestion. "Tell you what, how about we bring something to the door and apologise to people, shake hands and pretend it never happened?"

Spades nodded. His head dropped even lower, almost to his chest.

The Inquisitor of the Gods blinked in surprise. "Wait, Spades—you actually agree? No backing out now!"

A nearby team member, sensing something was off, hesitantly stepped forward and took a closer look at Spades. After a long silence, he turned back to the Inquisitor of the Gods.

"Uh… Reverse God, Spades is asleep."

Reverse God: "....."

For a moment, there was only stunned silence.

Then, with a growl, the Reverse God rolled up his sleeves and roared, "SPADES—YOU—! MARK MY WORDS, ONE DAY YOU'LL BE ON YOUR KNEES BEGGING THAT PLAYER FOR FORGIVENESS, YOU SLEEPY BASTARD!"

Chaos erupted as the other players scrambled to restrain their furious tactician.

"Calm down! We still need him for the game!"

"This isn’t the first time he’s slept through a meeting!"

"Yeah, yeah, just hit him where it hurts—make him lose three games as punishment! It’s painful for Spades to lose a game! It hurts more than killing him!"

At this, Spades, still half-asleep, cracked open one eye just in time to hear the Reverse God take a deep breath and declare, "Alright, same as always—Spades slacking off in a meeting means he’s banned from winning the next three games."

"For the next three rounds, our whole team will keep an eye on him and make sure he doesn't take a single victory, from us or the enemy. That’s his punishment. And a test of our skills. Got it?!"

"Got it!" the team echoed in unison, their fighting spirit ignited.

Spades, groggy and confused, slowly sat up. "…Wait."

Why is he being punished again? Didn’t he just finish serving one?!

The Dense Forest Borderlands

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

The group walked in a loose, casual manner, yet passersby still veered away in fear.

"Look at the state of things!" The Reverse God shot Spades a glare. "This is your fault! You made this happen! Playing so ruthlessly in the game pool—was that really necessary?!"

Spades lifted his eyes, meeting the accusation with a faint, indifferent glance. "They're not afraid of me," he said coolly. "They fear anyone who brings victory. Not because of what I've done, but because they dread the possibility of losing it themselves."

He turned his head slightly, his tone unwavering. "If their fear is a necessary part of winning, then let them be afraid."

The implication was clear—victory would belong to him, no matter what. The sheer arrogance and certainty in his voice left no room for doubt.

The Reverse God was momentarily struck speechless, his annoyance reaching its peak.

Spades, for all his apparent lack of emotional intelligence, had a way of seeing things with razor-sharp clarity. And worse, he seemed to enjoy provoking debates just to keep everyone on edge.

With a sigh, the Reverse God rubbed his forehead, finally conceding. "Fine. Pick any three games." His tone was laced with resignation. "Let's see how well your solo training has paid off—and how much you've missed from our group training."

He took a deep breath, his expression turning serious. "If we can keep you in check."

Then, more firmly, he added, "Just get ready to return to the team. It's time to start proper league training."

Spades gave a small nod. Without another word, he unfurled his long black whip, striking a swimming, distorted poster in the game pool.

In an instant, the entire war party of the Killer Sequence vanished into thin air.

The Other End
Mu Sicheng crouched low on the floor of the Killer Sequence guild, sharp monkey claws embedded in the wall. Behind him, the question-mark-shaped tail of the capuchin flicked slightly, hooking onto any protruding decorations or fixtures.

He wore a chameleon-like coat that shifted colors to match the environment—a rare superhuman item that Bai Liu had obtained in the game pool and later assigned to him.

It had been a perfect decision. The coat allowed Mu Sicheng to infiltrate the Killer Sequence headquarters seamlessly, blending in without detection.

A few well-executed color shifts and some daring midair swings later, he landed firmly in a long corridor near the top floor of the guild.

Dust clung to his claws, and he casually flicked off the crumbled bits of the wall. His tail retracted smoothly behind him like a drawn wire as he glanced around with keen red eyes, eyebrows lifting in mild surprise.

—What the hell is this big guild doing? No security at all? Are they just waiting for someone to come in and rob them blind?

If Muke were here, he could have explained why the Killer Sequence headquarters was so empty and unguarded.

The Killer Sequence was a rising force in the game world, having exploded onto the scene last year on the back of Spades' overwhelming victories. Given their momentum, most guild leaders would have capitalized on that success, working to turn their team into the number one guild.

But there was one problem: the Killer Sequence had no president—because Spades refused to play that role.

Instead, the guild had developed in a wild, unstructured way. Its members were a mix of eccentric high-potential newcomers, players with unique abilities, and those who idolized Spades but had no interest in being tied down by traditional guild constraints.

While they had a guild building, the members treated it as Schrödinger's headquarters—sometimes occupied, sometimes not.

During league seasons, they banded together under the guild's name to meet registration requirements.
Outside of that, they were solo players.

The new generation of Killer Sequence members had absorbed Spades' philosophy: they were born to dominate the league. Each of them saw themselves as an unstoppable force—a ruthless predator ready to devour the competition.

This hyper-competitive mindset had only started to calm down when the Reverse God was recruited into the guild. He made them realize that a team needed more than just raw skill—there were only five true league killers.

"You guys need to actually contribute to the guild before you can call yourselves killers."

That was how the so-called tactician, the one Spades had personally poached and slapped with the title of [Guildmaster], ended up overworked and underappreciated.

Now, not only was he responsible for training the team and keeping disobedient players in check, but he was also burdened with managing every logistical nightmare that came with running a guild.

He was, in short, doing the work of eight people while Spades refused to pay him a dime.

Under these circumstances, guild security was understandably not the Reverse God's top priority—he barely had the time to breathe, let alone implement proper defenses.

Besides, Spades' influence had fostered a guild full of battle-hungry maniacs. These players didn't see security as a necessity; they wanted challengers to come knocking. The stronger the intruder, the more excited they got.

Most guilds wouldn't dare to pick a fight with the Killer Sequence, so security was, at best, an afterthought.

Ensuring the building was mostly empty, Mu Sicheng moved forward, slipping deeper inside.

As was common among guilds, there were typically two main places where high-level props were stored:

The personal inventory of the guild's dedicated Warehouse Keeper, accessible via the system panel.
The physical guild warehouse, where items were stored, tested, and maintained.
The Warehouse Keeper wasn't just a storage manager—they were also responsible for inspecting and maintaining high-grade and rare props in-game. They carried a vast number of valuable items at all times, making them a walking vault and one of the most critical roles in any guild, alongside the Weapon Transformer.

For example, in the Golden Dawn guild, the entire guild functioned as the Warehouse Keeper. It wasn't a single person but a collective responsibility.

Golden Dawn had no discernible purpose outside of this role, yet every single member was trained like a professional vault guard. It was as if they had all once worked in law enforcement, specializing in handling and securing dangerous items.

Naturally, this made them the natural enemy of thieves.

Guilds like the King's Guild, Kabbalah Life Guild, and even Charles' Gamblers' Club had attempted to spy on Golden Dawn's stockpile—not necessarily to steal, but simply to gather intelligence on what items they possessed.

But no matter how they tried, they always failed.

Under the guidance of a new team member, Armand, Golden Dawn had recently restructured its security measures again. Just the other day, they had caught a King's Guild scout in under one dimensional minute.

At this point, their warehouse security wasn't just tight—it was impenetrable.

Mu Sicheng frowned as he moved through the Killer Sequence building. Something about the warehouse's layout felt eerily familiar.

It bore an uncanny resemblance to the security blueprints Wang Shun had shown him of Golden Dawn's storage system.

Behind him, a translucent, rotating barrier shimmered for a moment—

[System Alert: A player has triggered the warehouse trap prop you set!]

At that exact moment, the Reverse God, who had just entered the game, saw a notification pop up on his system panel.

A team member beside him noticed his reaction. "What's wrong?"

The Reverse God smiled. "Nothing. Someone just triggered the warehouse protection prop I set up."

The team stared at him in disbelief. "Wait—someone actually tried to steal from the Killer Sequence?"

"Since when did we even have warehouse security?" another player asked.

"Yeah, I mean... we don't even have a Warehouse Keeper, do we?"

The Reverse God sighed and raised his voice to calm their curiosity. "We don't have the manpower to guard a warehouse. So, I had to resort to the simplest yet most effective solution."

The team leaned in. "Which is...?"

The Reverse God smiled warmly. "I contacted Golden Dawn's president, paid a sum of money, threw in a prophecy or two, and outsourced our warehouse security to them."

Silence.

The team: "....."

They stared at him, utterly dumbfounded.

—Did the Reverse God just... single-handedly whore out the strongest warehouse defense system in the game...

The Reverse God shook his head in regret. "Honestly, if I could, I'd outsource training too. But the Deer Hunter Guild, which produces the toughest players, doesn't take on outsourced battle team training, so —"

He sighed. "I have to do it myself. And you guys don't even listen to me as a tactician."

The team: "....."

—The Deer Hunters?! They believe in Spartan training! Their members scream in agony every day! They don't even have time to eat or take bathroom breaks! They're all getting kidney stones from dehydration!

One of the more unruly team members swallowed nervously. "We—we'll listen to you..."

The Reverse God gave him a smirk. "Really?"

All the players nodded frantically.

The more he walked, the stronger his unease grew. Mu Sicheng came to a halt just in time, scanning the architecture around him. He lifted his nose and sniffed carefully. The bright, open corridors were laced with an odd mixture of scents—layers of human presence tangled together, complex and varied. Beneath it all, there was the faint, sterile chill of metal doors.

—It was eerily similar to what he had smelled at the headquarters of the Heretic Authority.

As Mu Sicheng took in the scents, a butterfly with shimmering green and blue wings, edged in gold, landed gracefully on the window to his left. It fluttered its wings slowly, almost lazily.

Mu Sicheng turned his face away, frowning as he twitched his nose. He muttered under his breath, "—And a little... breath of moving air..."

"The smell of the wind."

The butterfly's wings suddenly beat faster. A gust of wind surged down the narrow corridor, carrying with it a blurred figure that merged seamlessly into the gale, striking toward Mu Sicheng at an imperceptible speed.

The sheer force of the wind sent shockwaves rippling through the walls. His opponent used the pressure to propel himself, bouncing off the surfaces with swift, unpredictable movements before delivering a heavy blow.

Mu Sicheng braced himself, crossing his arms to absorb the impact. With a defiant grin, he retaliated—his claws lashed out, fingers curling to seize the attacker's face and pin him to the ground.

His right paw flexed and retracted in an instant. Pivoting on his foot, he swept a kick low, aiming to take out his opponent's stance.

In this wind, whoever lost their footing first would be the one to fall.

His opponent, however, moved lightly, springing into the air and pushing off the wall with barely a sound. His breath was steady, his body blending effortlessly with the wind. A butterfly clung to his shoulder, its delicate wings still fluttering.

Mu Sicheng inhaled sharply—the wind carried his opponent's scent, thickened with the powdery residue of butterfly scales.

Then, suddenly, the gale intensified.

A suffocating force pressed down on him, the wind so dense it obscured his vision. Mu Sicheng's chest heaved under the pressure. He had no choice but to retreat. His monkey claws dug deep into the metal walls, anchoring him in place against the violent gusts.

The wind slowly began to fade.

As it dispersed, Mu Sicheng dropped back to the ground, landing lightly. Across from him, his opponent stood on the wrecked floor. His short, russet-brown hair was tousled from the fight, shimmering under the white lights with an unusual glow.

Armand met his gaze evenly. "I never thought we'd be fighting again in a place like this, Mu Sicheng."

Mu Sicheng arched an eyebrow. He twirled a golden winged hairpiece between his fingers, its surface gleaming under the light. With a smirk, he said mockingly, "Evenly matched? I wouldn't go that far. If this were a real fight, I'd be holding your head, not just your hairpiece."

"Is that so?" Armand remained unfazed, his calm gaze fixed on Mu Sicheng. "That's exactly what you told me the first time you fought me... and stole my record pen."

"The past doesn't only bring bitterness," Armand's eyes flickered toward the hairpiece. "It brings experience."

Mu Sicheng's expression shifted. A realization struck him, and he immediately tried to throw the hairpiece away—

But it was too late.

The golden ornament in his hand suddenly unraveled, snapping into a wire-mesh trap. It tightened around his wrists, upper arms, and hands, binding him in place. No matter how he struggled, he couldn't break free.

Armand tilted his head slightly, watching him. "You hate mesh restraints and handcuffs, don't you? I took note of that." He offered a small, knowing smile. "Consider it a welcome gift."

His voice softened just a little.

"It's been a long time, Mu Sicheng."

Muke led Du Sanying, who had done his homework, to the games pool.

To Muke's surprise, Du Sanying was performing better than expected. Not only had he adapted quickly, but he had already played more than 52 times—making him eligible for league entry.

After confirming that Du Sanying was willing to participate, Muke assisted him with the league registration and, following Bai Liu's instructions, brought him to the pool to practice.

Du Sanying gazed in awe at the shifting posters floating in the pools, his expression hesitant as he glanced at Muke.

"...Which one should I choose?" he asked timidly.

"It doesn't matter," Muke explained patiently. "I have a high enough base value to handle most games in the pool, and you're a player with full luck stats. Whatever game you pick won't pose much danger to you."

But Du Sanying, haunted by years of being the so-called lucky one, still looked uneasy. "...I might be lucky, but the people around me usually aren't."

"I know." Muke kept a polite distance, pulling up his player panel for Du Sanying to see. "That's why I'll keep some space between us—to protect you, and to limit my own exposure."

He offered a reassuring smile. "I may not seem remarkable, but that's because I'm an assassin."

Despite his lingering hesitation, Du Sanying finally stepped forward and selected a game. Muke followed him in.

The first thing that hit them upon entering was an overwhelming cacophony of gunfire—loud, rapid, and relentless. Bullets strafed the ground, tearing through everything in sight. The bodies of monsters lay strewn across the battlefield, mixed with the dead and unconscious forms of fallen players, their corpses so mangled that it was impossible to distinguish human from inhuman.

It was a brutal sight.

Du Sanying stood frozen, staring in stunned silence.

"This game is already at the final stage," Muke said calmly, unfazed by the carnage. He reassured Du Sanying, "You're really lucky—the other players who entered before us have already cleared most of the monsters."

His gaze flickered toward the bodies on the ground. Many of the corpses were so disfigured that their faces were unrecognizable. Muke narrowed his eyes, keeping the second half of his thought to himself—some of those who were "cleared" weren't just monsters.

There was someone dangerous in this game.

Du Sanying's hands trembled as he bit his knuckle, his voice shaky. "...But that was too fast. I just got here…"

"There are players like that," Muke said evenly. "This game isn't worth staying in. We should—"

His instincts flared.

Without hesitation, he yanked out his armor and shielded Du Sanying beneath him, listening intently for the source of the gunfire.

Panicked, Du Sanying tried to crawl out. "Don't stay near me! Something unlucky will happen!"

The sharp clink of bullets colliding with prop armor was enough to draw the attention of a keen-eyed gunman. Before Muke could react, something massive dropped from above—a giant spring, crushing the armor they were hiding under.

In a split second, Muke rolled away, dragging Du Sanying with him. He landed on one knee, dagger in hand, and snapped his head up—only to freeze.

He had seen plenty of players in bizarre costumes, but the one before him was the kind that made a person stop—even in a life-or-death situation.

Perched atop a massive, three-meter-high, rainbow-colored spring, a figure sat with one leg crossed over the other, his feet idly swinging. He cradled a half-meter-long, dark green sniper rifle in one arm.

The upper half of his face was covered by a crude paper mask, drawn with a grotesquely distorted clown face—like a child's poor attempt at a school art project.

The lower half of his face was painted with an oversized, blood-red grin, smeared carelessly across his skin. The crude lipstick was haphazardly smudged with a thumb, the deep red staining his lips unevenly, some of it cracking and flaking off in dried, crusted streaks. A strong metallic scent clung to him, and flecks of blood still dripped from the corners of his mouth as he grinned.

His exaggerated green flared pants and the dark green sniper rifle were splattered with blood, fragments of entrails, and even bits of white brain matter.

Perched on the spring, he rested his chin in his palm, tilting his head as he peered down at Muke. His lips curled wider and wider, and through the slits of the paper mask, a pair of apple-green eyes gleamed.

"I remember that pretty, pretty face of yours," he mused, his voice carrying an unmistakable Hispanic lilt—one that held an eerie elegance, the slow drawl of aristocracy making him sound both lazy and bloodthirsty. "Because I saw it from below."

His grin stretched. "So, of course, I recognized you at first sight."

He lifted his sniper rifle—only to suddenly pause. As if struck by a thought, he wobbled on the edge of the spring, hopping on one foot like an acrobat balancing on a ball. With exaggerated gestures, he bent forward, one hand elegantly placed in front of him, the other behind his back, bowing in a refined, interlocked manner.

It was a noble's bow—formal, respectful.

Completely at odds with his ridiculous performance and grotesque appearance.

“My father taught me that one should always introduce themselves before killing an opponent.” His voice was unnervingly polite, almost gentle. “Out of respect, one must allow their opponent to know who it was that ended them.”

He straightened, his smile never faltering. But behind the painted mask, his eyes were devoid of laughter.

“My name is Daniel.”

His voice dipped into something colder, something possessive.

“Bai Liu’s beloved godson.”

With a casual motion, he raised his sniper rifle and aimed it directly at Muke. His grin stretched, sharp and ruthless.

“It doesn’t matter what your name is.”

His finger tightened on the trigger.

“Because you’re trash unworthy of him.”

His voice dropped to a whisper.

“Trash doesn’t need a name.”

BANG—!!!

Bai Liu, having wrapped up everything in the massive play pool, led Liu Jiayi and Tang Erda to the water’s edge.

Not a single player remained in the game pool.

Liu Jiayi immediately grasped the situation. “A major guild’s battle group just entered. Since their roster isn’t full yet, other players are too afraid to step in.”

She turned to Bai Liu, her gaze landing on his hand—tightly wrapped in bandages to stop the bleeding. “Shouldn’t we take cover too?”

“When have I ever taught you to hold back before a tournament?” A poised and elegant voice interrupted Liu Jiayi's thoughts, punctuated by the rhythmic clatter of cork heels approaching. "Before a tournament, you suppress others, not yourself."

Hearts stood before them, clad in a striking blue gown with a double-draped neckline. Elbow-length beige gloves covered her hands, her hair styled into a meticulous, delicate bun. Long raindrop-shaped gemstones—blue and green—swayed at her ears, nearly ten centimeters in length.

She carried an air of classical sophistication.

Liu Jiayi stepped in front of Bai Liu. "Empress. It's been a while."

Behind Hearts, an entire squad stood in formation—clearly in the middle of training. But this time, a new face accompanied her.

A young foreign girl, no older than thirteen or fourteen, wore a black-and-white nun's habit. Her golden hair cascaded in soft waves, partially concealed beneath a pristine white veil. She held a small cross tightly in her hands, the symbol of prayer. Her eyes, a striking blend of green and blue, were so clear and innocent they seemed almost untouched by the world.

With just one glance, Liu Jiayi understood—Hearts had dressed today to match the new recruit.

The girl looked like she had stepped out of a classical painting.

Hearts reached out, gently brushing a stray lock of hair from the girl's forehead. "She's your replacement." Her voice was affectionate. "Go on, [sister], introduce yourself. Give her a blessing."

The girl, Phoebe, took a graceful step forward, undeterred by Liu Jiayi's reputation as the 'young witch.' She curtsied slightly, lifting the sides of her habit with practiced elegance. When she spoke, her voice was as sweet and delicate as honeyed confectionery.

"May the Lord bless you."

Rising from her bow, she looked at Liu Jiayi expectantly. "You have a brother, don't you?"

Liu Jiayi pursed her lips, her eyes flickering toward Hearts before she responded. "I did."

Phoebe smiled, angelic. “So do I. We don’t share the same mother, but we have the same father. It’s the same for you, isn’t it?”

Her voice remained soft, her expression warm. “He turned his back on me—just like your brother did to you.”

“But I don’t blame him.” Her smile remained unwavering. “I forgive him. God forgives everything.”

Liu Jiayi didn’t reply. She simply observed Phoebe in wary silence, an invisible tension rising around her like thorns.

Unbothered by the hostility, Phoebe, seemingly unable to contain her emotions, stepped closer. She took Liu Jiayi’s hands and pressed them against her chest. Her oceanic eyes shimmered with affection.

“We’re so alike. Maybe we should be family—brother, sister, or something else. I’ve always dreamed of being friends with you!” Phoebe’s smile brightened, genuine and almost giddy. “You’re my favorite player.”

Her voice dropped into a fervent whisper. “I’ll win the tournament—and bring you the happiness God has destined for you.”

Liu Jiayi yanked her hands away in shock.

Bai Liu immediately stepped forward, positioning himself between them. His gaze lifted to Hearts.

Hearts smiled slightly, unfazed. “Phoebe has always admired Jiayi. In fact, she was even better than Jiayi, but she chose to be an understudy just to stay close to her.”

She turned a knowing gaze toward Liu Jiayi. “But, sadly, the friendship ended before it ever had the chance to begin… because the child she adored ran away.”

Bai Liu’s expression didn’t waver. “Is that so?” His tone was indifferent. “Then why didn’t you use Phoebe before?”

Phoebe let out a soft sigh, pressing her hands together in prayer. “Because I wasn’t stable enough. My brother is still alive, and sometimes… he does things that upset and embarrass me. It affects my performance.”

Her lips curved in a saintly smile. “God forbid he dies sooner.”

The weight of her words—so calmly spoken, so brimming with sincerity—sent an almost physical shock through the squad.

Behind Hearts, Qi Yifang was already in tears.

This is not the teammate I wanted. She looks so pure, so innocent, always preaching about blessings and God—but inside, she's blacker than anyone here…

He sniffled. We're doomed… wooooo…

As Hearts led Phoebe away to resume training, Phoebe turned back, her eyes lingering on Liu Jiayi. A faint sadness tinged her expression.

"Goodbye, little witch." Her voice was wistful. "I hope God brings you into my dreams tonight."

Liu Jiayi shuddered, subtly rubbing at the goosebumps on her arms.

"Oh, one more thing." Phoebe tilted her head as though remembering something trivial. "If you happen to see my brother, would you mind killing him for me?"

Her tone was utterly casual—like she was asking for help with a misbehaving pet.

"His name is Daniel. He's an idiot who enjoys playing the clown."

The moment Hearts was out of sight, Bai Liu pressed a hand over Liu Jiayi's head.

"Hearts likes to toy with emotions. Until we know more about this nun, let's focus on the game."

Liu Jiayi took a deep breath and nodded, selecting the game to log in.

[System Alert: Welcome to the game Dense Woodside Town]
A former war-torn frontier town, thick with gunfire and filth. Swamps and jungles conceal treacherous beasts, buzzing flies, and mutilated corpses. As a battlefield cleaner, your task is simple—dispose of the dead.

[Points-based game: Players earn points for clearing corpses. The highest score in seven days wins.]

Tang Erda turned to Bai Liu. "This is a points-based game. Unlike puzzle games, there's no fixed main objective. Victory depends on two things: collecting more points and stopping others from doing the same."

Liu Jiayi scanned the environment. "Tropical setting. Heavy rainfall and strong winds. Abundant flora and fauna. Complex terrain."

She tossed a small vial to Bai Liu. "Environmental factors will play a big role."

Bai Liu downed the antidote, color returning to his face. "Seems manageable. No players or monsters have attacked us yet. We should do a quick sweep and exit."

Tang Erda and Liu Jiayi nodded.

"To survive on a battlefield, first—camouflage." Bai Liu's gaze swept over their surroundings. "We need three sets of—"

A gunshot cut him off.

The sharp crack echoed through the dense jungle.

Bai Liu, Liu Jiayi, and Tang Erda instantly dropped to the ground, smearing mud over their faces. They held their breath, feigning lifelessness.

Through the gunfire, frantic voices rang out:

"Spades! Stop running! You promised you'd lose this round!"

"You said three-game penalty! Be a man of your word, dammit!"

"Put the corpse down, Spades! That's your teammate!"

A figure in a dark green uniform darted through the jungle, moving fast. As he passed Bai Liu, he hesitated—glancing down as if trying to assess whether Bai Liu was a viable corpse to loot.

Before he could decide, angry voices closed in: "PUT THE MASTER DOWN!!"

Without hesitation, Spades hoisted Bai Liu onto his shoulder and took off.

A sickening crack followed as he whipped around and headbutted the nearest pursuer.

A cry of agony rang out.

“YOU ACTUALLY TOOK OUT YOUR OWN TEAMMATE?!”

Spades ignored this and continued to run forward with the two bodies in his arms as Bai Liu, who was being carried on his shoulders, slowly opened his eyes.

Chapter End Notes

Spades is soo funny

The Dense Forest Borderlands

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Liu Jiayi and Tang Erda watched from the jungle as Spades carried Bai Liu away with effortless ease.

"????"

What the hell?!

Without hesitation, Tang Erda and Liu Jiayi sprang into action. Exchanging a glance, they wordlessly slid through the undergrowth, moving swiftly in the direction Spades had disappeared.

The dense, broad-leaved vegetation and thick undergrowth made pursuit difficult. Spades, with his outrageous speed, quickly put distance between himself and his pursuers.

Yet Bai Liu, the supposed "corpse" being carried away, remained entirely unbothered. He lolled lazily on Spades' shoulder, jaw shifting idly, his expression unreadable.

He idly wondered when Spades would realize he wasn't actually dead.

Before long, Spades keenly spotted a makeshift shelter hidden beneath thick foliage—a small hut of canvas and wood, camouflaged with woven reeds.

The area around it was unsettling. Piles of corpses had been hastily buried under thin layers of sand and earth, left abandoned. Beside them, half-stacked sandbag bastions and concrete blocks suggested this was a temporary base—likely for a battlefield clean-up squad.

Spades, having claimed the stronghold for himself, didn't hesitate. Still carrying Bai Liu over his shoulder, he pushed open the hut's door with his knee.

Inside, the space was sparse. Two steel-framed beds were placed closely together. In one corner, empty shell casings from mines and grenades were piled haphazardly, probably collected during corpse searches. Bloodstained, tattered uniforms hung on the wall. Two dented aluminum cups dangled beside them, and underneath the beds sat two half-opened medical kits. The compartment meant for antibiotics was empty.

Whoever had lived here had left in a hurry—likely taking supplies to aid an injured comrade.

Search-and-rescue squads sometimes doubled as battlefield medics.

Without a second thought, Spades tossed the headless corpse he had under his arm. He was just about to discard Bai Liu the same way when—

"So, this is the great Spades? Winning games by stealing his teammates' corpses?" Bai Liu finally spoke, his voice dry with amusement.

Spades had been mid-motion, ready to fling Bai Liu aside. Instead, he hesitated—twice—before adjusting his grip and laying Bai Liu flat on the bed. He peered down at Bai Liu's dirt-smudged face, eyes narrowing.

The grime made it difficult to see, so Spades, entirely unbothered, rubbed Bai Liu's face roughly with his palm—twice. The force of it distorted Bai Liu's features slightly before revealing his pale complexion beneath the mud.

By now, the two of them were close. Too close.

Spades stared, examining Bai Liu with sharp, focused eyes, as if trying to piece together who he was—leaning in ever so slightly.

Bai Liu leaned back just enough to break the moment, his gaze flicking toward the bloodstained clothes in the corner.

"Oh," Spades finally said, sounding almost surprised. "It's you. Bai Liu from the last round."

Then he nodded, entirely serious.

"Yeah, I steal from my teammates to win."

Without the slightest shame, Spades openly admitted his crime. Then, as if genuinely curious, he asked, "Is that not okay?"

Bai Liu: "....."

For a brief moment, he felt an odd sense of pity for Spades' teammates.

Xie Ta played without rules, without hesitation. He had no qualms about stabbing his own teammates in the back—often with an expression of sincere confusion.

It seemed some things never changed.

Bai Liu pursed his lips, his eyes darkening. He turned his head back toward Spades, lips curling into a small smile.

But the smile didn't reach his eyes.

His voice, cold as ice, cut through the air: "I don't like people who prey on their teammates."

With a flick of his fingers, Bai Liu drew a soul note from his glove. The paper shimmered, revealing Tang Erda's face.

Spades reacted instantly, pushing Bai Liu's gun back into his belt, already reaching for his whip. But he hesitated.

The bitter accusations from Reverse God earlier echoed in his mind—the looming threat of losing the game three times in a row.

And in that brief moment of hesitation, Bai Liu moved.

With practiced ease, his wrist twisted downward, pulling the gun from Spades' grip. A sharp click rang out as he loaded the magazine, barrel snapping into place—aiming directly at Spades' heart.

Spades sidestepped fluidly.

The bullet struck the tent wall with a muffled thud, casting a brief glimmer of light. That light reflected in Bai Liu's eyes—cold, dark, and unyielding, as if holding an abyss of negative emotions.

Spades hesitated.

For the first time, he had the strange feeling that Bai Liu was... angry.

And that anger was more terrifying than anything Spades had encountered before.

On instinct, he stepped back.

But Bai Liu didn't give him the chance.

Noticing Spades' reluctance to strike, Bai Liu moved first—his body dropping low, twisting fluidly. His legs hooked around Spades' waist in a sharp motion, pulling him forward.

In one seamless motion, Bai Liu flipped their positions, his gun pressed against Spades' heart from behind—an embrace, but one meant to kill.

Spades ducked sharply, avoiding the shot, and pinned Bai Liu to the bed. He gripped Bai Liu's wrists, shoving them down onto the frame, prying the gun from his hands.

Bai Liu, now beneath Spades, exhaled roughly.

Spades held him down, eyes dark with confusion.

"Why do you keep aiming for my heart?" His voice was oddly serious.

Then, with dawning realization, he asked, "Is it because I took your heart last round?"

Spades frowned. "But I gave it back. It was the monster's heart I took."

Bai Liu, still pinned, looked up at him. He smiled—slow, sharp, and unsettling.

His voice was soft, almost amused.

"If you're so determined to cut out your own heart," Bai Liu murmured, "I figured I might as well be the one to do it."

His fingers flicked deftly. A second soul note materialized between them, fluttering like a magician's playing card.

On its surface was the face of a guild member—someone skilled with a short, sharp knife.

The pistol Spades had taken from Bai Liu vanished, replaced by a short knife that now rested in Bai Liu's hand. With a sharp movement, he unsheathed it, dropping to his knees on the bed and forcing Spades back.

Even as Spades retreated, Bai Liu didn't let up. The blade in his hand gleamed with a cold, sharp light, aimed unerringly at Spades' heart.

Instinctively, Spades drew his whip to block the strike.

Bai Liu's lips curled into a smile. "I thought you'd keep the whip put away."

Spades narrowed his eyes. "Where's your weapon?"

Bai Liu lifted his gaze, unbothered. "You broke it in the last game, remember?"

With that, Bai Liu braced his foot against the steel frame of the bed and flipped down, slashing his knife hard against the bundle of whips Spades had raised in defense.

Sparks flew as steel clashed. The blade struggled against the tightly woven leather, but Bai Liu didn't relent. He adjusted his grip, twisting the knife and forcing its tip between the strands of the whip.

Spades gave Bai Liu an indifferent glance, tightening his grip. His forearm flexed as he rolled the whip inward, coiling the blade within its folds and trapping it completely.

—This was the natural hierarchy of weapons. The superior technique overwhelmed the inferior. Under Spades' control, the once-lethal blade felt as fragile as soft clay.

Yet Bai Liu didn't withdraw. Instead, his fingers subtly shifted, pulling a soul coin from his glove and activating Tang Erda's system screen, changing his skill weapon.

The knife was never meant to defeat Spades—it was just an opening move. What truly mattered was the weapon that could match Spades' whip: a gun.

Bai Liu's gaze flickered downward.

The trapped blade morphed in an instant, reshaping itself into the barrel of a revolver. The tightly coiled whips now formed a passage that led directly to Spades' heart.

Without hesitation, Bai Liu pulled the trigger.

Bang!

The bullet pierced Spades' chest, exiting cleanly through his back. A fine, crimson line trailed to the ground as the empty, blood-smeared casing clinked against the floor.

Spades staggered back half a step from the impact, his face blank with the delayed realization of being shot. Blood bloomed across his chest.

Bai Liu remained unmoved. With an emotionless expression, he shoved Spades to the ground, straddling him. His gun stayed steady, aimed unwaveringly at Spades' heart as he fired several more shots.

The dull thuds echoed in the silence.

"Why didn't you fight back?" Bai Liu's voice was calm, detached. "Like you did in the last game—why not rip out my heart?"

His eyes darkened. "Aren't you good at that?"

Spades, lying in a pool of his own blood, turned his head slightly toward Bai Liu. His damp hair clung to his skin, submerged in red. His voice, however, remained steady.

"Because attacking you again will get me punished."

Bai Liu's expression flickered—an emotion surfacing for just a moment.

Before Spades could decipher it, Bai Liu masked it once more.

Spreading his fingers, Bai Liu pressed a hand against the wound in Spades' chest. Blood welled up, seeping between his pale fingers—warm, thick, a strange mix of acid and fuel.

"I thought your blood would be cold too." Bai Liu tilted his head slightly, studying him. "Didn't expect it to be warm."

His bloodied fingertips trailed up from Spades' chest, brushing against his forehead.

Spades' eyes—black as night—met Bai Liu's gaze. Unlike Bai Liu's bottomless void, Spades' irises resembled glass beads in a darkened room. If caught at the right angle, they reflected a faint, silvery-blue glow, as if another set of eyes was hidden within them.

Bai Liu's fingers ghosted over Spades' eyelids, his voice unexpectedly soft.

"You have beautiful eyes. Why do you keep them covered?"

Spades, still lying on the floor, answered without hesitation. "I don't see the need to show them to outsiders."

A pause. Then, as if answering his own question, he added, "…And no one has ever called them beautiful before. Except you."

"Is that so?" Bai Liu murmured. His fingers traced the edge of Spades' eyes before he leaned in closer. His voice was almost hypnotic. "I like them a lot. They're silvery blue."

For a moment, Bai Liu's tone was soft, almost indulgent—like he had forgiven Spades, like he had fallen into the depth of those eyes.

Then, Spades' breath hitched.

The gun in Bai Liu's hand shifted back into a knife.

Without warning, he drove the blade deep into Spades' chest. Fingers curling together, Bai Liu thrust his hand inside, seizing Spades' still-beating heart.

Spades' pupils contracted violently.

—Ah. That's right.

Bai Liu was the type to return things blow-for-blow.

What Spades had done to him, Bai Liu would do to him in turn.

He could accept that.

If Bai Liu cut out his heart and ended it here, that wouldn't be so bad.

Bai Liu's grip tightened. He gazed down at Spades, then abruptly leaned in, closing his eyes.

At the same moment his fingers clenched, Bai Liu pressed his lips against Spades'.

The sensation was foreign, jarring—an explosion of contradictions. Heat and cold, pain and tenderness.

It was as if Spades' heart had been crushed not by Bai Liu's hand, but by the shock of the kiss.

Bai Liu's voice was a quiet murmur against his lips.

"I hate you. Remember that—I hate you."

Blood was pouring out of Spades' body and he wrapped his arms confusedly around Bai Liu, who had curled up in his arms after the kiss. For a moment Spades felt that it wasn't him who was suffering from a broken heart, but Bai Liu.

"Are you still angry?" Spades asked.

Bai Liu didn't answer. He curled further into Spades' arms, the gun still loosely in his grasp, pressed against Spades' chest as if ready to fire again at the slightest provocation.

After a long silence, Spades hesitantly patted Bai Liu's shoulder. "… Sorry. I won't do that next time."

Bai Liu remained quiet for a moment longer.

Then, finally, he lowered the gun.

Chapter End Notes

If you didn't get it : Spades is wearing contacts

The Dense Forest Borderlands

As Wang Shun was working furiously on his pre-season team profile, the door to his office suddenly slammed open. A disfigured figure, wrapped in a mess of wire mesh and handcuffs, stumbled a few steps and collapsed onto the couch opposite Wang Shun, startling him.

The barely humanoid mass slowly raised a trembling hand, from which dangled eight or nine handcuffs and several layers of wire mesh. In a faint voice, it said, "... It's me, Mu Sicheng."

Wang Shun exclaimed, "What... happened to you?"

"Unlucky to run into a nosy person," Mu Sicheng muttered, struggling to pick at the wire mesh covering his face.

But the mesh was oddly elastic and sticky. Not only did it not come off, but it also snapped back into place. His voice grew more frustrated: "... It was that Armand from Golden Dawn who developed this thief-catching thing against me."

"So, that's what he did to you?" Wang Shun said, burying his head in a pile of information to research Armand.

Pushing up his glasses, Wang Shun glanced at the papers and said, "You're not to blame for falling into his hands. He was part of a special organization, tasked with guarding valuable and dangerous items. He rose to deputy captain at a young age."

Wang Shun looked at Mu Sicheng and added, "He's known to specialize in theft."

Mu Sicheng snorted in disdain, "I've seen a lot of people who claim to specialize in theft, and few of them can stand up to me."

Wang Shun glanced at Mu Sicheng's "outfit" before responding.

Mu Sicheng caught the glance and grew more irritated, shrugging off the handcuffs hanging from his arms with a rare grimace.

"It's not the same," Mu Sicheng said, frowning. "This Armand... he knows me too well."

"He knows my attacking habits, how I strike, where each attack connects, and he used that to trap me. And there's something else," Mu

Sicheng paused, his irritation rising, "something only I know, something I've never told anyone. It's as if he's known me for a long time and knows me better than I know myself."

Mu Sicheng continued, increasingly agitated as he tugged at the wire mesh tangled in his hair. "Damn, the thought of having to face someone like that makes my blood boil!"

At this point, Mu Sicheng turned to Wang Shun, "Don't use your [Know-it-all] skill on me right now!"

Wang Shun raised his hands, showing he didn't have a pen or paper in hand. "I wouldn't do that to my own teammates," he said, sounding helpless.

Mu Sicheng gave Wang Shun a sidelong glance before sitting with his legs spread, his hands resting on the back of the couch, chin propped on his hands. "Hey, Wang Shun, do you know if anyone has the skill to spy on people's memories? Like you, for example."

He raised an eyebrow. "This Armand guy told me he hadn't seen me in ages, and if I hadn't remembered meeting him only once, I would've been fooled."

Wang Shun hesitated for a moment. "Not that I know of among the players."

Though there were props that could simulate shared memories, like the ones used by the Deer Hunter, they weren't quite the type of voyeurism Mu Sicheng was talking about.

"Tch." Mu Sicheng stood up, waving his hand dismissively. "Then you're useless."

He turned to leave but tripped over the ankle cuffs and wire mesh he had stirred together. He fell to his knees in the doorway and angrily pointed at the pile of cuffs.

Wang Shun, observing from the sidelines, sighed, holding his forehead. "Just sit properly on the couch and get this mess off you before you go anywhere."

Wang Shun found a pair of scissors and pliers but could only fix the wire mesh. The handcuffs wouldn't budge. With a final sigh, he said, "We'll have to wait for Bai Liu to come back. He has magma for forging weapons. He might be able to refine this thing of yours right away."

Mu Sicheng took a deep breath, ready to explode, but someone else beat him to it.

"Aaaaaaaaaah!" Du Sanying rushed into Wang Shun's office, dragging Muke, whose head was hanging and covered in blood. "Help!"

Wang Shun, startled, jumped. "What's wrong now?!"

Du Sanying pointed wildly at Muke, his voice shaky. "He... he met a madman and shot him, but I got lucky. The madman couldn't hit us both!"

Wang Shun furrowed his brow. "Why did Muke end up like this if neither of you were hit?"

Du Sanying broke down, his hands frantically moving. "The man... he said something like, 'Since you chose to stand by his side, you're a fake with my memories. One day, I'll take your place.'"

"He used some strange prop on Muke, said he had placed his memories in Muke's head, and then left."

"Muke went crazy after the prop, slashing and killing monsters until he regained some sanity and agreed to leave the game with me. But once we were out, he passed out."

Du Sanying wiped his eyes, his voice breaking. "Muke looks terrifying in the game..."

Mu Sicheng gave Muke a sidelong glance and, with a grunt, helped him up by tugging at the ankle cuffs. "Why did Muke stay there with a madman?"

Du Sanying swallowed, his voice low as he whispered, "Because the man said he was Bai Liu's son..."

Mu Sicheng: "..."

Wang Shun inhaled sharply.

Mu Sicheng froze, wide-eyed. "?!? What the hell?!"

In-game.

Bai Liu, unaware that he has a son, is sitting on the bed, watching expressionlessly as Spades, sitting on the floor, dresses his wound, rubbing his fingers over the muzzle of the gun in his arms.

…… The man bled out so much, but nothing happened at all and he recovered quickly.

Spades straightened his back and frowned – he sensed an unpleasant murderous aura.

From Bai Liu's point of view, Spades' waist and back were lean and firm, but not bulging with muscle, attached to the frame in a well-proportioned, powerful layer, which flows tautly beneath the cold white skin as he lifted his arms and turned his back in the act of wrapping, a fluid beauty.

Spades seemed to notice Bai Liu's gaze and gave him a questioning look.

Bai Liu averted his gaze imperceptibly, paused in his muzzle fondling and said abruptly, "You're in good shape, no wonder you're so popular."

Spades slowly: "?"

He didn't quite understand the connection, but Spades was acutely aware that Bai Liu was not in a good mood right now.

Spades then chose to agree with Bai Liu in order to avoid further conflict, nodding his head and saying "oh" for the sake of convincing.

Bai Liu's gaze became subtly mischievous again as he smiled, "So that's how Mr Spades, who was number one last year, got to the top. I'm really ignorant."

Spades: "……"

He felt he had answered wrong.

Before Spades was ready to open his mouth again to answer the question, there was a slight shaking sound from the jungle outside.

Spades gathered all his props in an instant, and with a glare, the whip was flung out and rolled back. In the blink of an eye he had Bai Liu circled in his arms, ducking under the bed with a swift movement, and pulling two medical boxes in front of him to block anyone outside from finding him.

“My teammates are here.” Spades hugged, or rather clamped, Bai Liu’s waist from behind, “If they find out I’m suspected of hurting you again, I’ll be punished again.”

With blood stains on the floor and clear signs of a confrontation in the room, Spades would have been 100% convicted as the “guilty party”, given his usual style and history.

“Sorry, cooperate with me for now.” Spades trapped Bai Liu in his arms.

This guy didn’t wear any clothes in a hurry and was holding Bai Liu while naked.

In other words, Spade’s entire upper body was pressed against Bai Liu’s back, which was soaked by the hot and humid jungle dew. His abdominal and chest muscles were tough yet soft and pressed against Bai Liu’s shoulder blades and spine.

Spades, who was not at all self-conscious, seemed to be afraid that Bai Liu would break away from him and was still hugging him, with his thighs inserted between Bai Liu’s legs.

This distance was really too close. Ever since Bai Liu slept with Xie Ta in the orphanage, he hadn’t been in such close contact with this guy’s body for ten years.

Totally different texture from when I was a kid, feel like his body has grown so much, so aggressive ……

Bai Liu leaned forward with his neck, trying to pull away from Spades, breathing heavily: “…… I’m not going to run, let go a little.”

“I don’t believe you.” Spades’ voice is calm, his palm sliding upwards from the nape of Bai Liu’s neck down the knot of his throat, catching Bai Liu’s jaw and pushing it into his own shoulder, pressing it impermeably against his own body – as if he feels he has to do this to keep Bai Liu under control.

“You’re smart enough to use any little prop to escape someone’s control.” Spades’ eyes were serious and his hands were pressed against Bai Liu, but his tone was firm without the slightest hint of desire, “I’ve seen your videos, you might hide a prop somewhere in your body to try and defy me.”

Spades doesn't want to be found in a game where he's with a difficult tactician, which could make the game a lot more problematic.

Bai Liu had no intention of escaping, but when Spades restrained him so violently, Bai Liu subconsciously resisted. The man was so strong that Bai Liu struggled several times without moving out of his embrace, and now his eyes were red.

He was breathing heavily, his voice was muffled, but was laced with laughter: "If I wanted to hide something, ……" could you find where I was hiding it?

Bai Liu hadn't finished his sentence, but Spades behind him clearly misunderstood. He hesitated for a moment, and then said a polite apology – a social etiquette taught to him by the Reverse Gods, to apologise when doing something wrong.

But when Spades was taught, the Reverse Gods probably didn't expect Spades to draw inferences from one instance to another, and apologise while doing something wrong.

For example, now.

Spade put his hand into Bai Liu's soaked shirt without hesitation. Bai Liu's pupils shrank and he couldn't help but tremble as he threw a harsh elbow back at him. Spade reacted quickly, holding Bai Liu's elbow and pressing down. Unmoved, he continued to explore inside his clothes.

He has absolute power and speed over Bai Liu, and at such a close distance, it was difficult for Bai Liu to resist when Spades tried to do something to him.

Spades had a thin layer of calluses on his palms, as if he had been holding a whip for years.

Bai Liu arched his back, his skin flushed after being rubbed against these calluses, and he gasped as he lowered his head, his thin shoulder blades shaking.

Spades finally finished his examination and looked at Bai Liu, curled up in a ball in his arms, and out of some kind of weakness added, "Sorry."

Bai Liu's head was bowed and he did not answer, his breathing was ragged and fast. Spades could hear Bai Liu's rapid heartbeat and could sense a peculiar emotion in Bai Liu – as if he was angry, but more than that……

“Are you still angry about what happened before?” Spades trying to placate him. But Bai Liu simply replies, “I’m out of shape.”

After a long silence, Spades expects a sharp retort. But instead, Bai Liu waits until his breathing calms, then gives a meaningful chuckle, “No, you’re in great shape.”

“I love it.”

The Dense Forest Borderlands

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

The curtain of the tent made a soft rustling sound as it was lifted open.

Spades quickly pressed his hand over Bai Liu's lips and whispered close to his ear, "Here they come."

Bai Liu's gaze shifted past the obstacles blocking his view and landed on the shoes of the person who had just entered the tent—a pair of well-made prop shoes.

Spades had been right in his prediction; it was indeed his teammates who had arrived.

Someone muttered, "Spades, this guy left his looted body here—what the hell?"

"Reverse God, what do you think?"

The Reverse God scanned the area and replied, "I think he's going to use this place as a base."

Bai Liu, hidden under the bed, squinted—he recognized the voice of Reverse God as a synthesized AI, so close to a human voice it was almost indistinguishable unless listened to very carefully.

However, the games Bai Liu had worked on had done some technical interfacing with this system, and one of the voices was almost identical to Reverse God's. Bai Liu instantly recognized it—this man was using a synthesized voice in front of his teammates, not his original human voice.

He shifted his gaze upwards, trying to see the face of the god, but Spades' grip tightened on him. Still, Bai Liu managed to catch a glimpse of the god as he walked toward the bedside.

The face was so unremarkable that even someone like Bai Liu, who had a sharp memory for facial features, needed to stare for a couple of seconds before he could recall it. But the next time he saw Reverse God, Bai Liu wasn't sure he would recognize him immediately.

The man's features were so ordinary they blurred together.

Like his voice, there was something artificial about it—perfectly tuned, too normal, too balanced.

Reverse God didn't stay long by the bedside before turning away with the rest of the team. "Spades probably found a better stronghold and abandoned this one…"

"But he didn't even take his body with him…"

"…Probably found a better one on the way—one with more points on the verdict. Spades dropped this one. Not the first time he's done it. Remember the Kabbalah guild last time?"

The group left the tent, still chatting among themselves.

But Spades remained motionless, his body pressed against Bai Liu's shoulder, seemingly waiting for something to happen and not moving from under the bed.

"There's another wave coming in," Spades muttered.

As his words hung in the air, the tent's curtain—recently drawn closed—was lifted once again. Bai Liu peered through the gaps in the scattered items at the bottom of the bed, his eyes catching sight of several pairs of army-green rubber boots dragging a bloodied human form on a stretcher into the tent.

The man on the stretcher had no limbs left. Blood, semi-viscous and pouring from his mouth, had smeared his face beyond recognition. His severed limbs continued to spurt blood, staining the ground of the tent.

One soldier attempted to stanch the bleeding by tightly wrapping bandages around the mangled limbs. But his efforts were futile—the blood flow merely shifted from a fountain to a steady stream, with no sign of stopping.

His voice was tinged with panic and sorrow: "…He's still alive! Why didn't the medics take him for treatment when they cleared the battlefield? Why leave him behind, only for him to be torn apart by the enemy's artillery shells?"

"He could've survived!" The soldier continued, his hand trembling as he tried to secure the bandages. The force he used to bind the wounds was nearly desperate.

The other soldier's voice, in contrast, was quieter, but the weight of what he said was unmistakable: "...Have you noticed? More and more soldiers are still alive when we're cleaning the battlefield these days."

"There are more wounded than ever, but the medical supplies aren't enough. There's just not enough to go around. The rear troops are preparing..."

The soldier working on the bandages barked a bitter reply: "...So, they're just letting them die—collecting their bodies and leaving no wounded soldiers, just martyrs, right?"

The other soldier fell silent.

The man's voice twisted with dark irony: "A metal medal for martyrdom. Worth less than five cents in wholesale, and they think it's worth a life?"

His voice broke as he continued, the grief apparent: "This man... just yesterday, he was eating with us, writing letters to his mother and fiancée. And now he's just a corpse. You think that medal is worth his life?"

The other soldier sighed, his voice heavy with sadness. "...I don't think it's worth it either. But Alex, this is war. The value of our lives isn't up to us, not even after we're dead."

Alex's trembling hand fell from the wound as he collapsed onto the floor, muttering, "...Yeah, it's war. And that's what the higher-ups want, isn't it? Just corpses. No emotions, no value, not even life."

There was no more blood pouring from the man on the stretcher—he was already dead.

Guy held Alex, whose gaze seemed far away, resting his head on his shoulder. "...But there are no such corpses in this world. We're just human beings, caught in this war. Maybe we're not meant to have humanity anymore."

"Alex, stop caring about the dead. It's too painful."

Alex wrapped his arms tightly around Guy's back, burying his face in his shoulder, trying to hold back his sobs. "I can't do it, Guy. I'm not a corpse. I can't stop feeling—sympathy, doubt, hatred, love."

Tears streaked down Alex's face as he glanced at the mutilated body on the ground, his voice almost a whisper, "Guy... do you think that if corpses could rise up and keep fighting, like they want us to, there would be no need for anyone to die? Just soldiers, collecting bodies?"

Guy stroked Alex's hair, sighing as if dismissing the question. "You're not even twenty yet, Alex. You shouldn't be thinking about these things."

"Surviving the battlefield—that's what you should focus on."

Alex lowered his head to Guy's chest, then suddenly looked up and kissed him fiercely, wrapping his arms around Guy's neck.

Instead of recoiling, Guy leaned back on the bed, allowing Alex's passionate kisses to take over, as if this wasn't the first time such a thing had happened.

They stripped each other of their bloodstained clothes, their breaths ragged, as they stared at each other. Alex pressed against Guy, trembling, his body straining, trying to suppress emotions and desires he shouldn't have, shivering in place.

He knew it was wrong.

But he didn't know what else was right.

Seemingly sensing Alex's conflict, Guy, lying back on the bed, raised his hand over his eyes, trying to sound nonchalant, even flirtatious. "Hey, relax, kid. There's always a way to be careful. Tom in the next tent goes through ten boxes of Warlock condoms a month."

"We just... well, it's like going to a brothel, right? Except it's not quite that, either. We don't want to go to one, so we let off steam this way..."

Alex stayed silent, his head still lowered.

"God," Guy interrupted himself, dropping his hand and staring vacantly at the blood-splattered tent ceiling, as if he were speaking to himself. "What am I saying... Alex, you're still a kid."

"You shouldn't be doing this with me, especially here and now... I've brought you down. God will punish me."

Guy tried to gently push Alex away.

“Then God should punish me too,” Alex said, lifting his tear-streaked face. “Because I just wanted this with you. I couldn’t think of anyone else.”

“You’re the only one who makes me feel like I’m not already dead.”

“I love you, Guy.”

With that, Alex pushed Guy back onto the bed. They rocked violently on the steel-framed cot, as if they might be crushed under it the next moment.

Spades, who had been concentrating on the main plot, suddenly found himself confused by the abrupt shift. “...?”

Bai Liu, who had been paying attention to the main storyline, also realized what was happening and stood silent for a moment. “...”

It seemed Guy and Alex were actually a couple.

While Bai Liu had read about such things in difficult, unique environments where women were scarce, he knew that, in these high-risk conditions, intimate bonds often formed between soldiers—sometimes crossing into sexual relationships—not because the men were necessarily attracted to each other, but because of the extreme circumstances that drew them together.

Bai Liu had anticipated that something like this might happen in this dungeon, but not under these circumstances.

The steel frame of the cot shook violently, occasionally knocking against the back of Bai Liu’s head as the passionate tangle continued just a bed away, the sounds of gasps and heated words reverberating through the tent.

If Bai Liu were alone, he would have shamelessly walked out from beneath the bed.

But... when there’s someone else in that situation, everything becomes...

Spades, making sure his small movements wouldn’t disturb the couple above him, leaned toward Bai Liu and whispered, “Is this... relevant to the main plot?”

Bai Liu turned to Spades and replied calmly, “Not really, except that it reveals the character relationship between the two NPCs.”

“What’s your question about it?”

“Oh.” Spades nodded knowingly. “I see. Just now, when you heard Alex was about to penetrate Guy, you seemed a bit nervous. I thought it was something closely related to the main storyline and you wanted to hear it seriously.”

Bai Liu: “...”

Spades tilted his head. “Why are you blushing?”

Chapter End Notes

> The two men are having sex, and a meter away from them there's a corpse.

The Dense Forest Borderlands

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Bai Liu calmly replied: “You are wrong, I didn’t turn red, it was the reflection of light.”

Spades: “?”

But it looks quite red, even under the ears, all the way to the collarbone…

He couldn’t see it much further down, maybe because it wasn’t too red down there.

Noticing that Spades wanted to get closer and look down at his body, Bai Liu immediately covered Spade’s eyes and reprimanded him coldly with a breathy voice: “Don’t look at me, pay attention to the plot.”

But paying attention to the plot, the plot is now…

After noticing that Spades was listening intently to the two men, Bai Liu felt that he had made the wrong proposal.

The folk customs of sex are different in different places. This may be because Guy and Alex come from a relatively liberal area. Their style in bed is extremely unrestrained and they can say anything when they are in love.

That includes some name calling for when they’re in bed.

“Poke my g-spot hard.” Spades repeated word for word seriously. He asked Bai Liu, “Is this related to the main plot? Whose g-spot do I need to poke hard?”
Bai Liu: “…”

Bai Liu tried to calm down: “No need, it has nothing to do with you.”

“Oh.” Spades asked again, “Where is the G-spot…”

Bai Liu spoke quickly: “You don’t need to know where the g-spot is, this thing has nothing to do with you and me, the main mission, or these two NPCs!”

At this time, Guy on the bed let out another long cry of relief: "——You're going to stab me to death, Alex."

Spades retorted to Bai Liu in an extremely upright and condemning tone: "-Listen, he is going to be stabbed to death. I think after this npc is alienated and turned into a monster, this g-spot is likely to be his weakness. We also need to learn to poke the g-spot…"

Bai Liu covered Spades' eyes with one hand and then covered Spades' lips with the other, and interrupted his words sternly: "-Shut up!"

But Spades has now entered an inexplicable state of inquiry. He feels that this thing is related to the main plot, and he must know why.

So Spades pulled off Bai Liu's hands that were covering his eyes and lips. He was about to continue asking righteously, but when he saw Bai Liu's appearance, Spades was startled.

Spades was confused: "You are even redder than before, Bai Liu."

Bai Liu: "…"

Spade noticed that Bai Liu was looking at him with an openly murderous intent, and the gun in his hand was aimed at Spades' heart, so Spades intuitively changed the topic to one that he felt was safer.

"What exactly is the G-spot?" Spades felt that he was discussing business, so his expression was very open and serious, and he looked directly at Bai Liu without any hesitation, "What weapon did Alex use to poke Guy's G-spot? a gun?"

Bai Liu: "…"

In a sense, Spades is right…

Bai Liu slowly exhaled a long breath, and he realized that he could not easily overcome this topic today.

Spades is sometimes just as curious as Xie Ta when he was a child. When he gets serious, he has to know.

"The G-spot is a human anatomical structure." Bai Liu calmly put on an academic attitude to fool Spades, "Generally speaking, every man has it, it is not special, so it is unlikely to be a weakness of these two NPCs."

Spades' tone was still confused: "Is that so? But I have learned about the structure of the human body. Why didn't I know that men have this kind of thing?"

The human body structure class was taught by The Reverse God to Spades, using the People's Education Press' health textbook for primary and secondary school students. The main focus of the class was on where the weak points of the human body are, which can be used to neutralize the opponent's attack power.

Although The Reverse God briefly gave Spades some brief knowledge about sexuality in this class, it only extended to heterosexuals, that is, [a man and a woman have a baby after sleeping in bed for one night]. ——The g-spot is a superfluous knowledge point for Spades.

So Spades asked Bai Liu: "Where is your g-spot?"

Bai Liu subconsciously retorted without thinking: "I don't have a g-spot."

Spades spoke reproachfully: "You just said that all men have it."

Before Bai Liu could answer, Spades looked at Bai Liu with a sudden realization: "——Are you a woman?"

"That's not right…" Spades' eyes moved down to Bai Liu's chest, his tone was serious, "I just touched your body, you don't have female secondary sexual characteristics."

Bai Liu: "…"

Bai Liu took a deep breath: "I don't have a g-spot, but I am indeed a male."

Spades nodded, and concluded as if everything was understood: "I have learned about this situation in the textbook. The sexual characteristics of men and women are not obvious, so you're intersex…."

Bai Liu couldn't bear it and said: "Shut up!"

Spades looked behind Bai Liu hesitantly: "Behind you…"

Bai Liu calmly stopped: "I don't have a g-spot back there, so shut up."

"Hey." Guy's soft and teasing voice came from behind Bai Liu, "It seems that we have disturbed your discussion?"

Bai Liu remained still for about a minute before slowly turning his head.

Guy was half-kneeling on the ground in disheveled clothes, looking at Bai Liu under the bed with a smile, and stretched out his hand to him: "——Have you decided to come out now, or do you want to discuss it like this for a while?"

Bai Liu: "…"

Behind him, Spades explained innocently: "What I wanted to say is that there is someone behind you."

Bai Liu slowly exhaled a deep breath, reached out to grab Guy's hand, and was pulled out from under the bed by him.

Alex, who was cleaning up his body and the mess on the bed next to him, glanced at the two of them unkindly, at Bai Liu's clothes, and gave Guy a look.

"Relax Alex." Guy was still smiling. He leaned against the bed, his collar still open, and there was a soft and lazy dampness in the corners of his eyes and eyebrows, which made him look very approachable. "Although they are not wearing the military uniforms of our camp, they should not be enemy troops."

Guy glanced at Bai Liu teasingly: "Otherwise they would have shot you when you took off your pants and got on me instead of discussing our sex life under the bed."

Bai Liu: "…"

How much of the conversation between him and Spades have they listened to…

Alex's face turned red instantly, and he interrupted loudly: "Guy ——!!"

Guy found it funny and raised his hands in surrender: "Okay, I was wrong."

Spades, who emerged from under the bed, stood obediently next to Bai Liu. After noticing Alex's blush, he leaned down and said in Bai Liu's ear in a slightly novel tone: "Bai Liu, this guy turns red just like you."

Bai Liu: “…”

Guy had stayed in the army for a few more years than Alex. As an experienced veteran, he had his own judgment on this situation, so he looked at Bai Liu and Spades with a smile: “Did you young men sneak over from the town to see what it was like to fight in a war?”

A few dozen kilometers from the border lay a remote town, home to the army’s base camp. Isolated and economically underdeveloped, the sudden influx of soldiers had breathed new life into the town, driving up demand for entertainment—cigarette shops, pubs, brothels, and hotels flourished overnight.

For soldiers who lived on the razor’s edge of death, military pay was spent as soon as it was received, exchanged for fleeting moments of pleasure—just like Tom, in the tent next door.

To the town’s original residents, these soldiers, along with their well-dressed officers, were akin to nobles. They moved through the smoke of war, indulging in the finest tobacco, the strongest liquor, and the most beautiful women.

It was, without a doubt, the best recruitment advertisement imaginable.

More and more young men from the town began to yearn for the army. They snuck toward the front lines, eager for a taste of the life they imagined awaited them.

Guy had seen these hopeful recruits before. He glanced at Bai Liu and Spades, his expression filled with a helpless kind of pity. "Now that you know what war is really like… how can you still want to join?"

Before Bai Liu could respond, system notifications popped up before both him and Spades:

[System prompt: Congratulations to player Bai Liu for triggering the main plot mission—help NPC Alex win the war.]

[System prompt: Congratulations to player Spades for triggering the main plot mission—help NPC Alex win the war.]

Bai Liu exchanged a look with Spades. Then, smiling, he finally answered Guy’s question. “Of course.”

Guy sighed, exasperated. “I understand why you want to come, but you have a choice—you're young. There's no need to gamble your life away."

He looked at Bai Liu with unguarded sincerity. "I joined the war because I had no other way out. My own family didn't want me."

Guy smiled wryly and gestured at himself. "Whether it was my sexual orientation, my lack of ambition, or my terrible grades, I was never what they wanted. They're a privileged, upper-class family, and I lived too freely—too much like someone beneath them. They wouldn't even let me have the family name. Instead, they forced me into the army, hoping it would 'fix' me."

"They thought war would baptize me—turn me into a 'real man.'"

Alex, who had been sitting silently beside Guy, reached out and took his hand. Guy squeezed back, his smile easy, unforced. "—But obviously, my idea of a man is a little different from theirs."

Then, with a playful wink at Bai Liu, he added, "They think men shouldn't have a g-spot, but I think it's a damn nice thing to have."

Bai Liu: "…"

How much did you hear?!

Alex's head snapped up, and he hissed through clenched teeth, "Guy!!"

Guy only chuckled. "Once the war is over, they'll compensate me handsomely, and I'll live just fine."

Then, he turned to Bai Liu and gestured to Alex. "This is my partner, Alex. He was a medical student. He wanted to keep studying, but in the past two years, high-end universities started requiring recommendation letters from senior medical personnel—specifically, from nobles."

Alex, a commoner, had no such connections. But he had an unwavering passion for medicine, so he joined the army.

"Because," Guy explained, "soldiers who earn enough merit are rewarded by the government. They're given the chance to attend any top university and continue their studies."

His gaze softened as he looked at Bai Liu. "See? We all know why we're here. It's not for war itself, and it's certainly not for those flashy recruitment ads.

"But what about you?"

Bai Liu met his eyes evenly. "We know why we're here, too—we're here to end the war."

"If it doesn't end, it'll soon reach the town behind us."

He played along with Guy's romanticized view of war, molding himself into the kind of person this NPC would trust—a young man from a small town, devoted to peace, with a strong sense of duty to his homeland.

As expected, Guy was completely taken in. His eyes shone with emotion as he murmured, "…You're a good kid."

Alex, who had remained wary of Bai Liu and Spades from the start, sat next to Guy with a gun in hand, expression unreadable. He had refrained from interfering out of respect for Guy's decision to speak with them.

But when Guy uttered those words—"You're a good kid"—Alex's sharp gaze immediately snapped to Bai Liu. Not long after Guy had said the same words to him, they had become romantic partners.

His fingers tightened around his gun. His voice was quiet but firm. "Guy thinks you're harmless. But I don't."

Guy placed a hand on Alex's gun, gently pushing it down. "Hey, come on. He's a good lad. Maybe we can be a little friendly."

Alex's expression darkened. He clicked the safety off, his stare burning straight through Bai Liu.

"A good lad?" he said, voice low.

"There can only be one good lad in this tent."
[System prompt: The main NPC in the plot mission has a jealous reaction towards the player Bai Liu, and his favorability is declining sharply. After falling below the red line, the player Bai Liu will automatically exit the main plot mission related to the NPC!]

Bai Liu: "…"

He was careless, the persona was overdone.

Alex pointed his gun between Bai Liu's eyebrows: "You'd better tell the truth. What did you discuss under the bed?"

Bai Liu had already noticed Alex's huge hostility towards him. Whatever he says now will be wrong and cause a decrease in his favorability. So Bai Liu gave Spades a look and asked him to answer the question.

Spades responded to Alex's words with a straight face: "We were discussing the g-spot."

"Bai Liu said he doesn't have a g-spot, but I think he should have one. I'm imitating your process to find his g-spot, but he won't tell me where it is. I hadn't found his g-spot before I came out from under the bed."

Bai Liu: "…"

Alex:"……"

Guy: "…"

Alex put down the gun with a flushed face. He scratched his head and looked at Bai Liu and Spades standing next to each other with shining eyes, as if they were seeing the same kind of people. He said incredulously: "……God, are you actually a couple too?!"

"You are here in this small tent just like us -" Guy drawled out ambiguously and pointed his fingers at them, "- To have an affair? You guys have a lot of nerve!"

"It seems that we disturbed you. You must've been here before us."

Guy gave Bai Liu's waist a meaningful sweep, "But it seems like you haven't gotten to the point yet?"

[System prompt: Alex's favorability has increased sharply, and player Bai Liu has been included in the main plot storyline again.]

[System prompt: Guy's favorability has increased sharply.]

Bai Liu, who was about to argue, closed his mouth. He couldn't help but move the gun in his hand, glanced at Spades lightly, and smiled like a spring breeze: "Well, yes, he and I are a couple."

Spades, who felt a strong killing intent from Bai Liu, was confused: "?"

He got it wrong again, didn't he?

Chapter End Notes

The second-hand embarassement ... LMFAO

The Dense Forest Borderlands

After confirming that Bai Liu and Spades were going to join the army, Guy told them to wait until he and Alex finished their shifts so he could take them to fill out the application forms.

Alex silently sorted through the collection of bodies, his expression heavy with grief. As a new recruit, he still found it difficult to accept such large-scale death.

Spades kept his eyes fixed on the scattered body parts—not quite looking at them, yet his fingers fidgeted incessantly, betraying an uneasy restlessness.

The collection of corpses was a bonus task, and Bai Liu could tell Spades was eager to get his hands on the bodies Alex had gathered.

But these were Alex's fallen comrades.

Bai Liu smiled faintly, impassively, and stomped on Spades' foot. Leaning in, he murmured a warning, "Taking the body parts will make Alex upset. Don't you want to complete the main storyline quest and earn more points?"

Spades let out a soft hum of acknowledgment but cast one last regretful glance at the remains.

Guy, who was also helping with the retrieval, seemed far more composed than Alex. Though grief lingered in his expression, he remained emotionally steady.

As he passed by Bai Liu and Spades, who were standing close together, he smirked and teased, "Are you two about to kiss while waiting for us? That's cute."

Bai Liu, still stepping on Spades' foot: "……"

Spades tilted his head inquisitively. "Why would we kiss?"

Bai Liu swiftly clapped a hand over Spades' mouth, turning to Guy with an easy grin. "I'm in love with him. It's rare for us to have such an opportunity to be alone without others in the town."

Guy chuckled knowingly. "You can always step outside for some privacy. Be safe—Alex and I were like that when we first got together."

His smile dimmed slightly as a shadow passed over his face. "If you really join the army and get caught up in this war…" He trailed off, as if recalling something painful, then sighed. "Make the most of the time you have together. Moments like these are rare."

Then, without warning, Bai Liu and Spades were unceremoniously shoved out of the tent by Guy.

Outside, they stood facing each other.

Spades, never one to forget a question, persisted. "What's a kiss?"

Bai Liu exhaled, rubbing his temples. After a brief moment of consideration, he decided not to overcomplicate things. "…A kiss is when one person's lips touch another person's skin. That's all."

"I know that." Spades' gaze drifted down to Bai Liu's lips. "I know that a kiss on the lips is the most special kind of kiss. It's called a 'kiss' and only happens between a man and a woman in a special relationship."

Bai Liu's lips pursed involuntarily at the way Spades stared at them. He turned his head slightly, the faintest hint of pink coloring his lips as he pressed them together.

"If you already know, why are you asking?"

His tone carried a hint of annoyance, but because his voice was so soft, it didn't feel like true irritation—more like something quieter, something almost… uncertain. A subtle, unspoken shift.

Realizing it himself, Bai Liu fell silent.

He closed his eyes and took a slow, deliberate breath, forcing himself to regain composure. He wouldn't let Spades stir his emotions so easily.

When Bai Liu was younger, he had been effortlessly led around by Xie Ta. Ten years had passed, yet somehow, he still hadn't learned how to guard himself properly…

Spades, oblivious to Bai Liu's thoughts, simply continued. "What I don't understand is why Guy thought we were kissing."

"We don't have any special relationship between men and women, right?" Spades' voice was calm, utterly matter-of-fact.

Bai Liu's breath caught for a fraction of a second before he slowly opened his dark, fathomless eyes. In an instant, any trace of confusion or complex emotion disappeared.

"Yes." Bai Liu's voice carried the ghost of a smile as he turned his head, his expression unreadable. "We certainly don't have any special male-female relationship."

"But Guy misunderstood and assumed we did. That made him feel closer to us, which will make our job easier."

Bai Liu met Spades' gaze. "So, in front of them, we're going to act as if we have that special relationship."

Spades fell silent, his expression serious, as if processing the information.

Bai Liu waited patiently for him to absorb it. Then, after a moment, Spades looked down at him. "Kissing can happen between two men, too, right?"

"Yes," Bai Liu replied evenly. "Just like a special relationship. Those exist between men as well—Guy and Alex are an example of that."

Spades' eyes lit up in sudden understanding. "So that's the kind of relationship we're pretending to have?"

Bai Liu nodded, then added with a smile, "Of course, we don't actually have that kind of relationship. It's just an act for the NPCs. When we're not in front of them, please keep your distance from me."

His smile was polite, but his voice carried an undercurrent of icy detachment. "Because I hate you, Mr. Spades. Our positions are opposed. I'd prefer if you stayed away from me."

Spades paused for a moment, then, without any particular emotion, said, "I don't hate you."

His gaze dropped to his scuffed boots, the whip in his hand twitching slightly as he flicked it idly once, twice. His tone was light, almost casual.

"I'm looking forward to playing against you," he said. "You're the first player I've met who isn't afraid of me."

"I quite like you."

Bai Liu, who had been about to walk away, halted for just a fraction of a second.

But just as quickly, he smiled as if unaffected, as if nothing had happened.

“Well, I don’t like you,” he said smoothly, then turned to leave.

Spades merely responded with a quiet, “Oh.”

And then, he said nothing else.

They stood still across a fifty-centimeter gap, both facing to one side, deliberately ignoring each other.

Bai Liu idly scrolled through his system panel, while Spades lowered his head, meticulously tracing the lines of his whip. It was as if the objects in their hands had suddenly sprouted flowers, holding their attention far more than they should, an excuse not to look at each other.

Before entering the game, Bai Liu had given Tang Erda a communication prop—a satellite phone.

In this league-mode instance, the system panels of all players were effectively disconnected, akin to computers without internet access. They couldn’t connect to the in-game shop, forum, or other players, leaving them completely isolated.

Even Bai Liu’s Soul Note skill was severed from its usual "network," drastically limiting his system panel’s functionality. The warehouse feature, which required a "network connection," was inaccessible to him as a visitor.

With no way to retrieve items from the warehouse, Bai Liu was unable to use any props to contact Tang Erda and the others. In this situation, a communication device was indispensable.

Bai Liu had experimented with various communication props in past instances. In his last game, he had discovered that a satellite phone offered the most stable connection across different copies and extreme environments.

Upon entering this copy, however, the satellite phone had degraded, transforming into an outdated, bulky radio-like device that was far less convenient to use.

But given the current silence between them…

Bai Liu figured there was no better time to use it.

Fortunately, the device came with instructions. While it looked like an old radio, its functionality resembled a stripped-down mobile phone, making it relatively easy to operate.

Tang Erda's reply came quickly:

[I saw someone triggered the main storyline quest. Was it you?]

Bai Liu glanced at Spades, who was inching closer under the guise of feigned indifference, then responded:

[Me and Spades from the Killer Sequence.]

Tang Erda: [You and Spades? If you both triggered the main storyline quest in the army camp, then you should be here. So why did the rest of the Killer Sequence join the enemy?]

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow.

[The rest of the Killer Sequence joined the enemy?]

Tang Erda: [Yes. I saw them loitering around the tent before deliberately allowing themselves to be spotted by the enemy. They were captured almost immediately—then defected without hesitation. Why would they join the enemy and fight against Spades if he's on this side?]

Bai Liu chuckled.

[Because, at this moment, they and Spades are not teammates.]

Tang Erda: [?]

Bai Liu replied that he would explain more once they regrouped at the enlistment point. Then, he put away the device and turned his head—only to find Spades practically pressed against his back. He smiled.

"Looks like your teammates are determined to teach you a lesson."

"They must've found you hiding under the bed during their patrol. They just didn't call you out on it."

Spades corrected him, "They found us hiding under the bed."

Bai Liu ignored the comment and moved on. "From how that tactician of yours chose his camp, he deliberately set you up to trigger the main NPC quest here while he joined the enemy side. He's forcing you into a head-to-head confrontation, trying to make you lose this game."

"He's reestablishing his authority over you." Bai Liu let out a soft chuckle. "Looks like the Reverse God Inquisitor knows you well. He knows exactly how to push your buttons."

Spades studied Bai Liu. "Defeating me with a team isn't impressive. I respond more to one-on-one duels. That's why I prefer you like this…"

Bai Liu stood up, dusting off his trousers, and cut him off effortlessly. "Aren't Guy and the others done yet?"

Spades glanced at the tent. "Almost."

"We have to act like we have a special relationship in front of them, right?" Spades asked, giving Bai Liu a sideways glance.

Bai Liu, keeping his distance, hummed a perfunctory acknowledgment.

The moment Guy opened the curtain of the tent and came out, Spades suddenly reached out and grabbed the back of Bai Liu's neck. Spades turned Bai Liu to face him with force, then pulled him into his arms before embracing Bai Liu, who was caught off guard . He raised Bai Liu's chin, lowered his eyes and kissed him without hesitation.

His cold, dry lips met Bai Liu's, warm and soft from being unconsciously pursed for who-knows-how-long.

Spades closed his eyes.

Bai Liu's pupils constricted.

Bai Liu instinctively moved to push Spades away, but the moment he caught a glimpse of Guy laughing as he watched and Alex awkwardly averting his gaze, he immediately sobered up.

Lowering his head as if shy, he parted from Spades' lips and buried his face against Spades' collarbone.

His breathing was slightly uneven, fingers curling into fists. His lips pursed briefly before he spoke again, his voice already calm.

"Next time, talk to me first before doing something like that."

Spades, hands still resting on Bai Liu's shoulders, let out a quiet, muffled sound. Then, as if only now realizing Bai Liu's mood, he hesitated before adding, "Should I have asked you this time too?"

"I'm sorry," he apologized sincerely. "Are you angry?"

Bai Liu suddenly laughed, looking up at Spades with an expression that made him pause.

His dark eyes, bright and unreadable, carried a heat that was both unfamiliar and familiar—a reflection of Spades within them, as well as someone Bai Liu was missing.

He rested his head against Spades' chest, where the scent of blood still lingered.

Just earlier, he had emptied two magazines into Spades and ripped his heart out.

The surge of emotion slowly settled.

Bai Liu exhaled, closing his eyes, his usual loose smile returning. "You haven't changed—always apologizing first for what you've already done."

When Xie Ta had spent time with him, the most common phrase he used was "I'm sorry."

That man had an inexplicable survival instinct, always sensing the moment Bai Liu's anger began to rise and apologizing just in time—

—before daring to do it again.

"Let’s leave it at that for now." Bai Liu pulled away from Spades, smoothing out his clothes as he turned to nod a polite greeting to Guy and Alex. Then, casting a sidelong glance at Spades with a friendly, almost casual smile, he added lightly, "But I hope there won’t be a next time."

Spades: “……”

For some reason, he had the distinct feeling he had done something wrong again.

They followed Guy toward the back of the base camp, where they boarded a train.

But it was an unusual stretch of railway—only a few dozen miles long, running solely between the front lines and the rear of the town.

Seated inside the carriage, Guy leaned back and explained reluctantly, "Strange, isn’t it? It’s rare to build a railway like this, but since this war has dragged on for a year and a half, with no advancement, they built this line to transport soldiers and supplies more easily."

Bai Liu pulled his gaze away from the dense jungle outside the window. Building a railway in such a humid, unstable environment was no easy feat.

The fact that so much effort had been invested into constructing it could only mean the commander had other intentions.

He turned to Guy. "Why have you been stuck here for a year and a half?"

Guy let out a long sigh. “Because about twenty kilometers ahead lies a key strategic location—Pluto Lakes.”

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. “Pluto, as in the king of the underworld? Why is it called that?”

Guy explained, "This region experiences incredibly heavy summer rainfall—tens of thousands of millimeters at peak times."

"During the rainy season, this lake, which sits at the lowest point of the terrain, swells rapidly due to the downpours. The resulting flash floods drown many people living nearby every year. That’s why they call it Pluto. The locals refer to it as ‘Summer’s Wrath of Death.’"

"It’s more than just that." Alex, sitting across from them, added seriously, "Once Pluto’s waters rise, the overflowing lake fills the surrounding rivers and canals, forming a vast, interwoven network of waterways. In this dense rainforest, with almost no viable roads, those rivers act as natural highways."

Guy took a deep breath. "In an environment like this, where it’s difficult to build infrastructure, control over the rivers means control over supply lines. Whoever seizes Pluto before the rainy season can use boats to transport soldiers, weapons, and resources across the entire region—giving them a decisive advantage in the war."

Bai Liu nodded. "So, whoever takes Pluto before the rainy season is likely to win."

"But in that case," Bai Liu mused, tapping his fingers against his knee, "you’ve been here for a year and a half, meaning you’ve already had two rainy seasons. Why hasn’t the tide turned during either of them?"

Guy shook his head with a bitter smile. "The year before last, we controlled Pluto. But that particular rainy season saw lower-than-average rainfall, meaning the rivers that formed were too narrow to provide a meaningful advantage."

"During that season, we lost our grip on the battlefield, allowing the enemy to reclaim Pluto. As a result, our side ramped up recruitment to prepare for the next conflict."

Guy’s expression darkened slightly as he glanced at Alex. "That was the year Alex was sent to the front line."

Alex nodded, his expression grim. "Last year, the enemy held Pluto. That rainy season saw significant precipitation—" He exhaled sharply. "—giving them total control over the battlefield. Their advantage has carried over into this year, and we’ve been steadily losing ground."

"Every day, we receive more bodies than the day before."

"Our superiors keep drafting more soldiers to replenish the front line." Alex’s voice was heavy, his fists clenched in his lap. "We can’t afford to lose. We’re not allowed to lose."

Guy patted Alex’s shoulder, sighing. "We don’t get a say in how these things play out."

With a bitter chuckle, he added, "In war, all we can do is die."

Alex lowered his head, his voice barely above a whisper. "...Sometimes, I think it would be better if we lost. At least then, the war would finally end."

Guy's expression stiffened. Glancing around warily, he gave Alex a light but firm tap on the head. "Don't say that kind of thing out loud—especially not on the train. If someone hears you, you'll be disciplined."

Alex remained silent, head bowed, fists tightening.

Guy sighed, wrapping an arm around Alex's shoulder, resting his chin against Alex's head. His voice softened.

"It's okay. After this rainy season, the war will end."

Alex squeezed Guy's hand tightly in response.

"The war must be over after this rainy season. Why do you say that?" Bai Liu looked up at Guy.

Guy was silent for a moment before answering, "You'll understand when you reach the enlistment point."

With that, he turned his gaze out the train window, his grip tightening around Alex. His eyes reflected the shifting shades of green outside—lush, vibrant, and marred by the fire of war.

"There's a proverb where I come from," Guy murmured, his voice barely audible over the train's rumbling, "It says that the time lovers spend together is more precious than gold."

He smiled then, turning to Bai Liu and Spades. The war and the restless green in his eyes faded, softening into something gentler—a light like an old photograph, damp and moving, filled with a happiness that couldn't quite conceal the envy and pride beneath.

Guy let out a bright laugh. "So when the four of us are together, doesn't that make us the richest people in the world?"

As Bai Liu's group jumped off the train, they spotted the crowded enlistment site from a distance.

People stood on tables, shouting through loudspeakers. Others waved draft posters, chanting slogans as they marched through the crowd. Some sat on the ground, filling out application forms that had been trampled underfoot, scrawling with dirty ballpoint pens they had picked up from somewhere.

The whole scene was chaotic.

"Looks like there's no shortage of recruits today," Guy clicked his tongue twice. "Getting two sign-up sheets in a mess like this won't be easy."

He grinned and took Alex's still unresponsive hand. With a delighted whistle, he plunged into the crowd. "I'll get your registration forms!"

Ten minutes later, Alex sat dazed on the ground, gasping for breath, her face slightly squished from the rough crowd. Meanwhile, Guy waved his entry form triumphantly at Bai Liu and Spades.

"Got it!"

He pulled two pens from his pocket and set the application forms in front of them, guiding them through the process with an easygoing smile.

Bai Liu had barely taken his form when he noticed something off—one of the options had already been marked with an X.

It was obvious who had made that mark.

He looked at Guy and tapped the cross with his pen. "What's this? I can't choose?"

Guy's smile faltered slightly. "That's… the option to join the commando unit."

"A commando unit?" Alex's puzzled voice came from behind. "Has there been a new raid organized? How come I wasn't informed?"

At that moment, the man on the table with the loudspeaker raised his voice.

"Gentlemen, our general has assembled thousands of heavy artillery pieces, and they will be deployed to the front lines today in a steady stream!"

He was impassioned, spitting as he waved his arms.

"We all know that if we lose this rainy season, we will be buried at the hands of Pluto, the Grim Reaper! The heavy rains of the past two days signal that the enemy is likely to gain a major advantage this season."

The once-noisy crowd fell silent, all eyes turning toward the man.

His voice turned mournful. "Shall we let this war for glory slip away? Will we hand over our free land to those shameless, insatiable slaves across the lake?!"

"Haven't we given them enough rights?!"

"We employed them from their poor, backward regions, paid them daily wages, provided them with three meals a day, and yet they demand more! They demand property, demand to exchange their labor for land, demand to be treated as our equals!"

"How dare they claim that these lands—lands that became prosperous only through our efforts—were theirs all along and that we should return them!"

"Shameless!" the man bellowed, his face twisted in fury. "If they truly had any pride, why didn't they demand this when we first started helping them develop?!"

"We signed agreements, we legally acquired the land with their consent, and we made them wealthy—yet now, under the banner of 'ownership,' they want to throw us out!"

Guy leaned in close to Bai Liu, speaking quietly.

"The rainforest had timber, minerals, water—an abundance of resources. But the people living there were poor. The officials who discovered the land signed an agreement with them: in exchange for freehold land, they'd provide jobs, property, and daily meals for the next hundred years."

Bai Liu hesitated subtly.

He thought he had seen his fair share of shady deals, but this was something else entirely—taking land that people already owned in exchange for cheap labor.

It wasn't just exploitation. It was a con.

Guy sighed. "At first, the indigenous people agreed because they had nothing, not even enough to eat."

"Factories sprang up, wealth poured in—but wages dropped lower and hours stretched longer. Soon, the workers were treated as little more than slaves, mocked and trampled on."

"Then, one day, a dispute broke out. One of the indigenous workers killed a factory manager."

"The manager's family and friends, in their anger, locked every indigenous person involved in an abandoned factory… and burned them alive."

Guy fell silent for a long time before speaking again.

"A week later, war broke out."

"At the time, no one thought it would last. But the indigenous people knew the terrain better than anyone. International supporters rallied behind them, calling it a war for liberation. Volunteers flooded in from other countries."

Guy let out a small, bitter laugh. "Funny thing? I was going to be one of them. But my family dragged me away before I could sign up."

Bai Liu's gaze settled on the man still shouting atop the table. "There's another version of this story, isn't there? The one in the recruitment ads wasn't the truth either."

Guy looked at Bai Liu with admiration. "Exactly. The official story is that our country selflessly lifted these people out of poverty, gave them democracy, freedom. And yet these 'ungrateful savages' slaughtered a kind-hearted factory manager who only wanted to help them."

His eyes drifted to the discarded draft posters on the ground.

"You know what's complicated? That ad doesn't actually lie."

"That factory manager… he really was innocent."

His voice turned wistful. "He came from nobility but dedicated himself to helping the indigenous people. He wanted them to build their own factories, to escape the grip of the so-called upper class."

"He poured everything into this place, fought against his own family and friends to do what was right."

"But some of the locals never trusted him. They thought his kindness was just another ploy to oppress them. And in the heat of an argument, one of them shot him dead."

"The country turned his death into a rallying cry. People flocked to the battlefield for him. They believed they were fighting for justice—including Alex."

Guy's voice softened. "Their hearts are in the right place. They're just naïve. They think they came here for an apology, but war isn't that simple."

He fell quiet.

Bai Liu studied him. "You knew that factory manager, didn't you?"

Guy gave a small, wistful smile. "It's a secret." He winked, but there was a sadness beneath the gesture that couldn't be hidden. "Don't tell Alex—he'd get jealous."

"He was my first love."

He exhaled, his smile both tired and fond. "I guess I'm lucky, huh? Both my boyfriends are incredible."

The man at the desk shouted over Guy's voice, his tone booming:

"To bring this year-and-a-half-long war to an end and to punish those greedy, lowly enemy troops before the rainy season is in full swing, we have organized a raid in two days' time. We have selected only the best veterans to form an elite strike force."

His voice carried across the gathering as he continued, "These soldiers will undertake the most dangerous assault charge following the shelling. Let us give a round of applause to the brave men of these assault teams!"

He then produced a long list of names, reading them one by one. With each name called, a soldier stepped onto the high platform amidst thunderous cheers.

Guy stared at the list, waiting quietly.

Beside him, Alex suddenly stiffened. His head snapped toward Guy, his expression shifting to disbelief, before he turned back to the list, his gaze nearly burning through the paper.

Then—

“Guy Davis!”

Alex’s fingers dug into Guy’s arm in a death grip, his knuckles white. His throat was dry, and his reddened eyes glistened as if the words had been stolen from him.

Guy simply smiled. Gently, he pried Alex’s hand away, finger by finger, and leaned in to whisper softly against his ear:

“The war’s almost over, baby.”

Then, amidst the deafening roars of the crowd, he stepped forward, making his way toward the commando platform.

Alex instinctively lunged after him, but the ecstatic crowd surged between them, blocking his path.

On stage, the officials applauded enthusiastically. “And now, let us welcome the General’s recognition of these fearless men!”

A dignified-looking middle-aged man, his uniform more refined than the others with its high stand-up collar, clapped his hands with a warm smile as he ascended the platform.

He moved down the line, bestowing each soldier with a medal—cheap trinkets worth less than five cents—hung around the necks of men about to die for him.

Then, turning to the gathered masses, he spoke in a solemn voice:

“Remember their faces. If they fall, they will have died for the most righteous cause in the world. They will be martyrs, worthy of remembrance by all mankind.”

His expression was grave, his voice heavy with self-importance. “I personally called for this raid to be initiated. I understand the painful consequences it will bring, but this is about delivering a crushing blow to those lowly enemies—”

Alex gritted his teeth as he watched the general grandstand. “He’s doing this for his military record.”

Bai Liu cast him a questioning glance.

Alex exhaled sharply, trying to steady himself as he explained, “The general was born a commoner. He married the daughter of a high-ranking officer and climbed his way into military and political management, but the upper class—who pride themselves on their noble blood—have always looked down on him. He's kept his position through constant warfare."

He scoffed. "But more than war, I'd say he's better at politics."

His gaze flicked back to Guy on the stage, his breathing unsteady.

"Launching a raid now is just a way to make the reports look good. Even if the battle is lost, he'll have caused enemy casualties. And when these veterans die, their tragic sacrifice will be turned into propaganda to enrage the public and recruit more soldiers."

Alex clenched his fists, his voice thick with frustration. "They've used this trick to fool countless people."

Onstage, the general continued his speech.

"The Assault I team has the most crucial task. Only the most elite soldiers can enter—"

Someone in the crowd raised a hand. "Can new recruits join?"

The general chuckled, his smile broad. "No, but I admire your enthusiasm. You can join Assault II or III as part of the cleanup teams. To qualify for Assault I, you need to be a well-rounded soldier."

Then, a voice—smooth and confident—spoke from the crowd: "I think I have that quality."

All eyes turned.

The speaker was tall, standing out even among the already-screened soldiers. His posture was effortless, his hand raised conspicuously. In that hand was a silver revolver—its craftsmanship expensive, gleaming under the lights.

Tang Erda raised both hands slightly, looking almost helpless. He had just received orders from Bai Liu to infiltrate Assault I, and now, like it or not, he had to take the risk.

From afar, Bai Liu smiled and raised a hand in a playful gesture —"Come on, I believe in you!"

Tang Erda: "....."

This guy really had the kind of face that made you want to punch him.

The general's expression darkened. He clearly resented being challenged by a new recruit. His voice turned sharp. "War is not a shooting game for the nobility. Assault I requires extensive training—at the very least, you must master high-accuracy shooting."

His gaze swept over Tang Erda's silver revolver with undisguised disdain.

"That kind of gun—" The general lifted the medal in his hand with a smug air. "Boy, I understand your thirst for glory, but I think you'd be better suited to horse riding and hitting stationary targets ten centimeters away."

Tang Erda cocked his gun.

In one fluid motion, he flicked down the dark goggles resting on his head, narrowed his eyes, and pulled the trigger.

The shot rang out.

The bullet pierced the medal in the general's hand.

For a moment, time froze. The general's hands trembled as he slowly opened his fingers, letting the ruined medal clatter to the ground.

A stunned silence followed. Then, all at once, the crowd erupted in murmurs. Eyes widened. Soldiers exchanged looks of disbelief.

Tang Erda lowered his gun with practiced ease. "Am I qualified to join Assault I now?"

A whistle cut through the tension.

On stage, Guy grinned, his gaze sweeping over Tang Erda with open admiration. "Good lad, you shine as brightly as your gun skills!"

Tang Erda hesitated for a brief second before calmly responding, "Thank you."

Then, in his mind, the system notifications chimed.

[System Alert: Guy, the main plot NPC, has increased his goodwill towards you.]

[System Alert: Alex, the main plot NPC, has experienced a drastic drop in favorability towards you, and you have been excluded from the main quest.]

Tang Erda: “????”

What the hell just happened?! Why was he kicked out of the main mission?!

Baffled, he turned toward Bai Liu in the crowd, pointing at himself and shaking his head in confusion.

Bai Liu’s gaze slowly shifted—landing on Alex.

Alex stood rigid, his expression unreadable, his eyes locked onto Tang Erda.

Silence hung thick in the air.

Bai Liu sighed internally.

Carelessness.

The Dense Forest Borderlands

Tang Erda tapped his forehead with his index finger in a deliberate, serious gesture, signaling Bai Liu to think of something.

Alex, who had been glaring at Tang Erda, sneered. “Is he saying he’s not right in the head by making that gesture?”

Bai Liu: “……”

Such strong hostility.

As Alex stepped forward to meet Guy, who had just jumped down from the platform, Bai Liu approached Tang Erda.

He glanced around. “Where’s Jiayi?”

Tang Erda rubbed his brow, looking pained. “This is a battlefield. Jiayi isn’t allowed on the front lines. After she was found, the Red Cross took her away and wouldn’t let her return.”

“But she should be safe,” he added, his voice steady. “I checked the Red Cross camp on the map. No high-threat NPCs or monsters are there. It’s just a matter of her finding a way back to us.”

Bai Liu nodded. “Then we leave it to her.”

“I agree. Liu Jiayi always has a plan, and the rules here won’t stop her.”

Tang Erda’s attention shifted to Spades, standing quietly beside Bai Liu.

Out of trust in Bai Liu’s tactics, Tang Erda hadn’t questioned his decision to bring Spades along, nor did he worry about Spades feeding information back to Bai Liu. The moment Bai Liu had introduced Spades to him, Tang Erda knew that—at least in this game—Spades was on their side. Bai Liu wouldn’t have brought him so openly otherwise.

As for how Bai Liu had managed it, that wasn’t his concern.

Tang Erda gave Spades a quick, critical once-over before turning back to Bai Liu. “So what’s going on with the main quest? Why was I rejected when I didn’t even do anything?”

After Bai Liu explained, Tang Erda couldn't help but glance at Spades. The man's face remained unreadable, but something about the situation made Tang Erda's expression shift. His tone became a bit dubious.

"You're telling me… you got that Alex NPC to accept you by pretending to be in a relationship with Spades?"

Bai Liu glanced at Tang Erda from top to bottom, then fixed his gaze on Tang Erda's chest which was tightly wrapped in the military uniform and the rolled up sleeves that exposed his strong forearms, and said with a smile: "——Especially if you look like this."

Tang Erda felt uncomfortable all over. He covered his exposed arms with a tense expression, and buttoned the first button of his military uniform: "…Would it look better like this?"

"Hmmmm…." Bai Liu tilted his head, his eyes landing on Tang Erda's now more accentuated chest and the way his Adam's apple bobbed with unease. He replied honestly, "If anything, it looks even worse."

Tang Erda fell silent. Then, wordlessly, he unbuttoned the top again.

"But we can't change our in-game appearance, and I don't have any items to disguise ourselves," Tang Erda said with a frown. "How do we get Alex to stop being hostile toward me?"

"The fastest way," Bai Liu mused, glancing meaningfully at Spades, "would be to get yourself a…"

Tang Erda followed Bai Liu's gaze. He and Spades locked eyes.

A long, awkward silence.

Spades: "?"

Spades thought for a moment, then seemed to reach a conclusion. His face remained impassive as he flatly rejected Tang Erda.

"No. You can't have me. I have Bai Liu."

His voice was resolute. "We are in a very special one-on-one male-male relationship. No third parties."

During his education on physical intimacy, the Adversary had taught Spades with great seriousness that people in special relationships must remain devoted. No straying. No second thoughts.

Bai Liu took a deep breath, raised his hands, and looked away.

Tang Erda: "……"

Bai Liu, I can see you holding back your laughter even when you turn your head.

"You don't expect me to randomly rope in an NPC for this, do you?" Tang Erda said helplessly, half amused. "There's no way I'd get one to cooperate. What if I just tell Alex I already have someone back home?"

Bai Liu shook his head with a chuckle. "He won't believe it. And even if he did, your type is too common—his favorability toward you won't recover just from that."

Tang Erda frowned. "Then what? If Alex's favorability stays this low, I won't be able to access his main quest, even if I make it into Assault One."

Bai Liu tapped his chin, considering. His gaze flickered over Tang Erda before he smiled.

"I do have a way to improve Alex's opinion of you," he said smoothly.

"…But it's a bit of a gamble. His goodwill toward me might take a hit."

Tang Erda narrowed his eyes. "What's your plan?"

—

By the time Alex led Guy through the crowd, searching for Bai Liu, he found him standing close to Tang Erda, seemingly engaged in some private conversation.

Tang Erda's posture was stiff. Though his expression remained calm, his ears and face were flushed red—a clear sign of discomfort. Yet, despite looking like he could easily shove Bai Liu away, he didn't.

Bai Liu, on the other hand, looked entirely at ease, withdrawing his hand from Tang Erda's shoulder only when he noticed Alex approaching. He smiled and waved in greeting.

Alex instinctively tensed at the sight of Tang Erda… but something about the atmosphere made him hesitate.

There was a strange undercurrent between Bai Liu and Tang Erda—something off, something he couldn't quite put his finger on.

For the first time, a flicker of doubt crept into Alex's mind.

Was his hostility… directed at the wrong person?

A subtle dissonance settled in his chest.

On the way back to town for some rest, the sense of disconnection only intensified.

Bai Liu, Spades, and Tang Erda—the three new recruits who had signed up that day—needed to be assigned tents and accommodations. Along with that, two large parcels were delivered to them.

It was likely that all three would be participating in the upcoming assault mission, heading straight into battle after just a day of rest. As a concession to those who might not survive, they were granted relatively comfortable lodging in town for the night. Their assigned supply packages were heavy in their hands, packed with generous rations and necessities.

Without a word, Alex slowed his pace, subtly pulling back an enthusiastic Guy so that the three newcomers could walk ahead. Then, in a low voice, he asked, "Do you think there's something off about them?"

Guy, completely oblivious, smiled. "What's off? Bai Liu and Spades are a couple, and Tang Erda has known Bai Liu for a long time. They're both good guys."

Alex raised an eyebrow and pointed discreetly at Bai Liu, who was walking in the middle—empty-handed. "Did you not notice? Tang Erda is carrying Bai Liu's package. Would a normal couple let an outsider carry their partner's stuff?"

Spades, walking beside Bai Liu with his own two parcels balanced effortlessly in one hand, seemed utterly unconcerned that Tang Erda had taken Bai Liu's share. If anything, he didn't even seem to register that helping Bai Liu was something he ought to do.

Meanwhile, on Bai Liu's other side, Tang Erda was carrying four parcels—his own and Bai Liu's—his gaze flickering toward Bai Liu now and then, as if awaiting instructions.

It was a habit Tang Erda had developed as a lead attacker: carrying the tactician's things and always being aware of their position.

But to Alex, it looked like something else entirely.

"…Does Tang Erda have a crush on Bai Liu?" Alex muttered to himself.

Beside him, Guy nearly choked. His voice rose in alarm. "Are you saying Tang Erda is trying to interfere with Bai Liu and Spades' relationship?!"

Alex hastily clamped a hand over Guy's mouth. "We're not jumping to conclusions yet! And keep your voice down—what if Spades hears you?"

Up ahead, Tang Erda shifted uncomfortably before lowering his voice to Bai Liu. "Alex's favorability toward me has gone up. I really need to talk to him again..."

Bai Liu, still lazily skimming his system panel, hummed. "On my end, his favorability toward me has dropped, but it's still within range."

Meanwhile, Spades eyed the two parcels in Tang Erda's hands. His fingers twitched restlessly.

By all rights, that package should have been his to carry…

But Bai Liu had given it to Tang Erda instead.

When they finally reached the point where they had to part ways, Tang Erda moved to hand the package back to Bai Liu—only for Spades to suddenly reach out and take it.

"I'll carry it," Spades said flatly.

Tang Erda hesitated, glancing at Bai Liu for confirmation. Only when Bai Liu, standing behind Spades, gave him a slight nod and an amused smile did Tang Erda release the package. "Alright. Thanks."

Spades paused for a beat. "...Oh."

Then, as if suddenly remembering something, he turned to Bai Liu and pointed at Tang Erda, his tone as indifferent as ever: "He said you were a hassle, Bai Liu. So don't ask him next time."

Tang Erda: "..."

Bai Liu: "..."

Without waiting for a response, Spades adjusted the parcel in his hand, weighed it, and muttered that it was light before taking Bai Liu's hand and walking off with him.

Tang Erda, left standing there, couldn't shake the feeling that Spades had just rubbed something in his face.

It was Alex who arranged the accommodations. He sent Guy to show Bai Liu and Spades to their residence, while he took charge of leading Tang Erda—someone he still wasn't entirely comfortable with.

Except, the moment they set off, Alex felt an overwhelming sense of unease.

Because behind him, Tang Erda had been staring.

Not just looking—staring.

With a tense, unreadable, slightly… intense expression.

The closer they got to the door, the deeper Tang Erda's gaze became. Alex was nearly tempted to break into a sprint.

When they finally arrived, Alex all but threw down the supplies and turned to leave—only for Tang Erda to catch his wrist in a swift, firm grip.

Alex stiffened.

Tang Erda opened his mouth like he was trying to force something out, but the more he struggled, the more he seemed ready to combust on the spot.

"I…" His entire body seemed to be burning with sheer effort. "I..."

Alex, in full panic mode, yanked his arm back. "If you've got something to say, say it to Bai Liu! I'm not the one you like!"

Tang Erda inhaled sharply. "But it's not me and him."

Alex redoubled his efforts to break free, shaking his hand as if Tang Erda's touch burned. "You can't be with Bai Liu, and you can't be with me either! I have a partner!"

Suspicion crept into his voice. "You better not be eyeing Bai Liu or Guy—they're both taken!"

"No, it's impossible for me to hit on them…" Tang Erda closed his eyes, his face turned red, and he almost said these words through his teeth, "…I, I'm the same as them."

Alex was confused: "??? Why are you the same as them? How can you be the same as them…"

Halfway through, Alex thought of Tang Erds's inexplicable shyness and obedience in front of Bai Liu, and his words paused strangely.

Then after an unknown amount of time, Alex, with a blank expression, looked up at the 1.92-meter-tall Tang Erda, and spoke shakily: "…Are you the one on the bottom too?!"

Tang Erda's eyelids trembled and his whole body turned red. He nodded with great difficulty.

"You don't…" Alex's pupils continued to tremble, "You originally had a crush on Bai Liu, but because you and Bai Liu are both bottoms, you can only be friends with him?"

Tang Erda pursed his lips and turned away without saying a word.

In Alex's eyes, this confirmed his thoughts. As a Top, he simply couldn't help but feel a twinge of pity for the bottom. Here was a man—a tall man—who had pined fruitlessly for his crush, followed him into battle, only to realize he had nowhere to go.

He patted Tang Erda's arm. The figure that originally made him feel hostile now only made him sigh and feel pity. Alex comforted him: "Hey, be happy, brother. There's always gonna be someone out there who can fuck you."

Tang Erda: "..."

The Dense Forest Borderlands

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Bai Liu glances at his system panel. After a brief dip, Alex's favorability rating rises again. It seems things have been taken care of on Tang Erda's end.

He is now in his assigned dormitory—a converted hotel room packed with bunk beds for dozens of recruits. It's the best accommodation available, though that isn't saying much.

The only upside is that, for now, the room is empty except for Spades, sitting next to him, and Guy, sitting across.

Guy props himself up on the bed, stretching his arms. Catching Bai Liu's glance, he grins. "Not used to it, huh? This is the best we've got here."

Then, with a playful wink, he adds, "But don't worry. You'll probably have the room to yourselves tonight—some alone time for the two of you."

Bai Liu raises an eyebrow.

Guy chuckles. "The new guys will be out all night—partying at the taverns and brothels. It's their last chance to indulge before the raid. No guarantee they'll come back alive, so they might as well spend their advance pay while they can."

Bai Liu studies him. "You'll be there too, won't you?"

Guy shrugs. "Everyone from Assault One will be. Normally, Alex wouldn't let me go to these things, but I think he'll make an exception tonight." His smile turns a little wry. "After all, a man should have one last drink before he dies."

Bai Liu considers Alex's personality. "Alex will go with you?"

"Of course." Guy sighs dramatically but can't hide his happiness. "He wouldn't be able to relax if I went alone."

The moment Bai Liu confirms Alex—a mainline NPC—will be present, he asks, "Can we come with you?"

Guy blinks, surprised, then leans forward eagerly. “Of course! I thought this wasn’t your kind of thing.”

On the sidelines, Spades lowers his gaze to where Guy is holding Bai Liu’s hand. His fingers twitch against his knee before he looks away, pressing his lips together.

Oblivious, Guy continues enthusiastically. “I’m putting on a show for Alex tonight. It’d be great if you guys came as friends!”

Bai Liu senses the potential for a hidden plot. He smiles. “How can I help?”

Guy gasps. “God, Bai Liu, you just get me!” He runs a hand through his hair, looking both distressed and relieved. “I’ve been stressing over this because I have to do it without Alex. And the guys I know can’t keep a secret, so I have to handle everything myself.”

His eyes light up. “It’d be a huge help if you and Spades pitched in.”

Bai Liu nods. “Of course.”

Guy jumps to his feet. “I’ll go get the list, then. There’s a lot to prepare.”

As soon as he’s gone, Bai Liu’s smile fades. Silence settles over the room. Spades sits motionless, still keeping that deliberate fifty-centimeter distance between them—no more, no less.

Since they left camp, Bai Liu hasn’t spoken a single word to him.

He’s spoken to Alex, to Tang Erda, to Guy. He’s even shaken hands.

But he hasn’t said a thing to Spades.

“Are you deliberately avoiding me?” Spades finally asks, voice quiet, eyes lowered.

Bai Liu doesn’t immediately answer. He glances at the open door Guy left ajar, then replies evenly, “Yes.”

Spades lifts his head. “Are you mad that I kissed you?”

Bai Liu’s tone remains calm. “No.”

Spades frowns. “Then why won’t you talk to me?”

Bai Liu turns to face him. “Am I obligated to?”

Spades hesitates before replying, “We have a special relationship. We should talk more.”

“That was in front of Guy. It was for the mission.” Bai Liu tilts his head. “Privately, we’re nothing.”

Spades grips his whip loosely. “But—”

“I kind of hate you, Spades.” Bai Liu’s voice is steady, as if stating a simple fact. “I’ve said it three times now. Most recently, forty-seven minutes ago. Do you need me to repeat it?”

Spades’ fingers twitch around his whip. He shakes it slightly, then mutters, “That was forty-seven minutes ago. I thought maybe… you didn’t hate me anymore.”

Bai Liu exhales, exasperated. “Mr. Spades, did something happen in the last forty-seven minutes that would change my feelings?”

Spades looks at him seriously. “I carried your bag.”

Bai Liu deadpans, “Tang Erda carried it too.”

Spades’ expression doesn’t waver. “But you were happier when I did it.”

Bai Liu stares. “…What?”

Spades nods, completely certain. “I saw you look at me and smile. A couple of times.”

Bai Liu: “……”

“That didn’t happen,” Bai Liu says flatly.

Spades, undeterred, insists, “It did. You smiled behind me—”

“Enough. Shut up.” Bai Liu interrupts, squeezing the edge of the bed. His face is unreadable, but his grip tightens slightly. “That wasn’t at you. It was at Tang Erda.”

Spades’ whip stills. For a brief moment, he doesn’t speak.

Finally, he asks again, voice softer this time, “…So we have a special relationship in front of Guy, but not in private?”

Bai Liu's eyes half-close. He doesn't look back.

Guy returned with several large boxes, a long pole wedged under his arm, and a notepad clenched in his mouth. There was so much stuff that he was practically blocked from entering the door.

Bai Liu stood up to help, and Spades followed suit, assisting with the boxes.

Guy collapsed onto the bed, panting. "God, this is more exhausting than a battle."

Guy sat up and smiled mysteriously at Bai Liu: "It's something that can make this little bastard Alex smile at me all day long. Of course, usually Alex always smiles at me normally."

"You know, when you like someone, you can't help but smile at him." Guy winked at Bai Liu, "Just like you did with Spades."

The expression on Bai Liu's face froze.

Spades, who was packing the box, slowly straightened up. He was looking at Bai Liu with keen eyes. Although he didn't say a word, Bai Liu read [You were smiling at me] from this guy's unwavering eyes.

Bai Liu explained calmly: "No, I was laughing at Tang Erda."

"Come on!" Guy waved his hand and lay down again, "It's okay for you to lie to others. The look and smile you do to Spades are exactly the same as when I was with Alex just now."

"What a wonderful period of love." Guy sighed while lying on the bed.

Spades nodded in agreement.

Bai Liu glanced at Spades slowly. Spades nodded for a moment, and then said without any desire to survive: "You were smiling at me."

"You didn't laugh at Tang Erda." He also emphasized, "You said it wrong."

Bai Liu smiled nonchalantly and raised his eyes: "I made a mistake, so what?"

"I smiled at you this time, but I don't have to smile at you next time. I can keep laughing at Tang Erda, after all…" Bai Liu smiled very kindly. He leaned close to Spades and whispered in Spades' ear,

“When Guy is not here, I can smile at whoever I want, and for as long as I want.”

“It has nothing to do with you.”

With that, he turned his attention to the list Guy had brought with him.

Spades, now visibly deflated, sat back on the edge of the bed, staring down at the contents of the box, his expression thoughtful and confused. It was clear he wasn’t quite sure why his mood had shifted.

Meanwhile, Guy pulled out the list of items, noting the small exchanges between Bai Liu and Spades. He nudged Bai Liu with his elbow and grinned. “What’s going on between you two?”

“Nothing is as exciting as the show you and Alex had before.” Bai Liu changed the topic as if nothing had happened. He glanced at the things prepared on the list and looked up at Guy, “The relationship between you guys is really good.”

Guy held his chin, looking nostalgic, with a slight smile on his lips: “It’s not always good, he and I have also had arguments.”

He recalled quietly for a while and said abruptly: “Alex has a fiancée in his hometown.”

Bai Liu showed surprise at the right time.

“What’s with your expression?” Guy raised his eyebrows, “I didn’t do anything to fight for his love. When Alex and I got together, he didn’t have a fiancée. This was the one his parents chose for him later. After Alex received the photo of his fiancée from his parents, he immediately rejected it in a letter.”

“But you know what? I think I might be mentally ill.”

Guy smiled absently: “I even wanted to stop Alex from refusing for a moment, but it was unfair to the little girl, and Alex felt the same way.”

Bai Liu listened quietly.

“Alex is an excellent medical student. He made a lot of achievements while in college. He invented a medicine that can preserve the body of a dying person. This can extend the time before death and save more people who were going to die – that's why he came to be a clean-up soldier, he wanted to see if he could help these soldiers."

Guy recalled: "That little girl, Alex's fiancée, was a small-town girl who admired him. Even though Alex wrote to tell her that he had a lover, she was still determined to wait for Alex to come back. She said that even if he wants to give up on her, he will have to give up on her face to face after he comes back alive."

"——I won't accept a letter from someone whose life or death is unknown, rejecting my love is disrespectful to me."

Guy laughed: "That is a very good little girl. She knows that I am a man, but she even challenged me in the letter to say hello, and arrogantly asked us to come back alive to give her love a perfect ending."

He lowered his head meekly and touched the wedding dress he took from the box in his arms.

"I'm a cunning person. I didn't tell Alex that I'd been drafted into the commandos, but I told his fiancée in a letter. I begged and pleaded with her if she could let me marry Alex before she did."

"What a despicable act, anyone who hears it would feel sick." Guy smiled self-deprecatingly, looking at the wedding dress, "That little girl didn't write a single word of reply to me."

"She just… rushed overnight to make this wedding dress in the size of an adult man and sent it to the front line. It was mailed to me. The sentence "God bless you with eternal happiness" was sewn on the wedding dress."

Guy's eyes welled up with tears, his voice cracking slightly. "You know, Bai Liu, I've been lucky. I've been surrounded by people who are good and kind, people with bright souls."

His voice faltered. "But in the end, they all suffered because of the war."

He wiped his eyes. "No one can be happy in war. So why does it even exist?"

Bai Liu stared at him calmly.

He replied quietly, "Because God doesn't want you to be happy. That's why war exists.”

At night, the town was aglow.

The approaching battle had already set the town alight in advance—both literally and metaphorically. People drank as if they had already won, the streets bubbling with beer foam.

The men of Raider I had taken over a small tavern, its shelves nearly emptied by the veterans. The owner was busily hauling alcohol up from the cellar, the scent so thick in the air that just a few more inhales might have made him slightly drunk himself.

Those who abstained from drinking in an atmosphere like this stood out.

Tang Erda sat beside Alex, holding a glass of wine. They were all drinking low-proof wines—even Spades had a glass of sparkling wine in front of him.

Only Bai Liu had a glass of plain water with ice cubes.

"You… don't drink at all?" Tang Erda asked, glancing at Bai Liu with mild surprise.

In his memory, Bai Liu could drink. In fact, he distinctly remembered Bai Liu as someone who did drink…

Bai Liu shot him a sly look. "Corporate drones don’t have the right to drink. If I stay up working on a computer with a hangover, my head will explode the next day. I’m not putting myself through that kind of suffering for no reason."

Tang Erda: "……"

Life really has changed you, Bai Liu.

Spades sat quietly to the side, watching Bai Liu and Tang Erda talk. He opened his mouth as if to say something but hesitated. Then, recalling Bai Liu’s earlier warning—[I want to keep smiling at Tang Erda]—he shut it again.

His gaze dropped to the vodka in his glass.

Spades wasn’t a bad drinker, nor was he the type to lose control. But when he got drunk, he became a relentless, insufferable interrogator—driving anyone who spoke to him into frustration.

Simply put, he became a barrage.

To avoid unnecessary conflict, Spades had decided not to drink. The gods had warned him countless times that alcohol made him prone to offending people.

Though Spades didn't quite understand what was so terrible about offending others, he'd been scolded about it enough times that he chose to refrain.

Bai Liu took a sip of ice water, watching with amusement as Tang Erda drank as if it were nothing. "You're a heavy drinker."

Tang Erda started slightly, lifting his glass. "There was a time when… I drowned my sorrows in alcohol. You get good at drinking when you do it too much."

Bai Liu immediately understood what Tang Erda was referring to. His tone softened. "I'm sorry."

"It had nothing to do with you." Tang Erda shook his head and, after a brief pause, downed half a glass more. His eyes remained clear. "Not anymore. I drink less now."

Bai Liu smiled. "Still, being a strong drinker has its perks. I like that about you."

Seated behind Bai Liu, Spades straightened his back ever so slightly.

Tang Erda had been effortlessly fending off numerous NPCs attempting to challenge Bai Liu to a drink. That was why Bai Liu had praised him.

But Spades misunderstood entirely. Expressionless, he picked up his whip, moved in front of Tang Erda—effectively edging Bai Liu aside—and placed a glass of liquor in front of him.

"Drink?"

Tang Erda, lost in thought, blinked. "???"

Confused, he turned toward Bai Liu for answers, but before he could catch a glimpse, Spades shifted to block his view.

Coldly, Spades asked, "I'm asking you to drink. Why are you looking at Bai Liu?"

From behind Spades, Bai Liu's calm voice warned, "Drinking with him is a mistake. Don't."

Before anyone could react, a few drunken men—drawn in by the rising tension—perked up.

"Ooh, a vodka showdown!"

"Boss, bring out all the vodka in the tavern!"

"A drinking contest before battle!"

In the indulgent, chaotic atmosphere, the bar around Spades and Tang Erda practically pulsed with the glow of various brews. The crowd, whistling and cheering, eagerly awaited the spectacle.

Spades remained expressionless as he raised his chin at Tang Erda. "Drink?"

As a lead attacker, Tang Erda usually followed Bai Liu's instructions to the letter. Now, overwhelmed by the sudden shift in focus, his gaze instinctively sought Bai Liu in the pressing crowd.

But Spades moved to block his line of sight, staring at him levelly. "How much longer do you need to think about it?"

"He's not drinking with you."

Bai Liu stepped out of the crowd, positioning himself in front of Tang Erda and meeting Spades' gaze head-on.

Tang Erda exhaled in relief, lifting a hand in surrender.

A wave of disappointed groans erupted from the spectators.

But Spades wasn't done. He reached into the crowd, yanking a reluctant Alex forward.

"If Alex is here, then you should be on my side," Spades said to Bai Liu, his gaze unwavering. "We have a special relationship now."

Alex, forcibly dragged into the mess, covered his face in exasperation.

God. I'd rather be on the front lines than here.

Bai Liu sneered. "So what if it's a special relationship? Tang Erda and I are also special. We're soulmates. You're just for show."

Tang Erda shivered at Bai Liu's laughter. He felt that Bai Liu had truly been provoked this time.

Wanting no part in the unfolding chaos, Tang Erda stiffly attempted to retreat—only for Bai Liu to seize him by the collar, patting his shoulder twice.

Spades' eyes darkened as they lingered on Bai Liu's hand.

"A special relationship can only accommodate two people," Spades said quietly.

"Bai Liu, you're wrong again."

Bai Liu's smile was unexpectedly soft. "How could I be wrong? I have a special relationship with him. And if I terminate our relationship, you'd have no claim over me, would you?"

Spades pressed his lips together, his dark eyes betraying a flicker of emotion.

Tang Erda: "……"

No, Bai Liu is seriously pissed. I can't handle this.

If only Liu Jiayi were here. At least then someone would understand what the hell Bai Liu and Spades are doing.

Spades seemed to realize that Bai Liu wouldn't back down. Rather than arguing further, he turned and locked eyes with Tang Erda.

"Are you drinking with me or not?"

Bai Liu's smile turned gentle as he stepped in beside Tang Erda. "He's my soulmate. I'm responsible for him. If you're drinking with him, I have to see it happen."

With that, Bai Liu reached for the vodka in Spades' hand, tilted his head back, and downed it in one go. He then smoothly flipped the empty glass onto the table.

Looking up at Spades, Bai Liu smiled.

"Why don't we have a drink instead?"

Spades held Bai Liu’s gaze, his fingers tightening slightly around his whip.

Alex, still trapped under Spades’ grip: "……"

Dude. Don’t take this out on my arm. You’re crushing me here.

Just when Alex thought Spades was about to either punch Bai Liu or beat up Tang Erda, Spades instead grabbed a drink without hesitation.

Mimicking Bai Liu’s exact motion, he placed his empty glass down, staring straight at him.

"Fine," Spades said. "Let’s compete. If I win, we’re still special. And you have to admit—before, you weren’t smiling at Tang Erda."

Bai Liu’s fingers tightened around his glass. A faint flush crept under his eyes, whether from alcohol or something else entirely.

His voice was a fraction lighter as he murmured, "… Fine. I’ll admit it."

Chapter End Notes

> Bai Liu says that Tang Erda is his soulmate (platonic).
> It's supposed to be soul friend but the word doesn't exist in English

The Dense Forest Borderlands

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

The moment Spades accepted the challenge, the roar of the tavern almost shook the roof.

“Hey, take it easy, they’re new recruits!” Alex tried to stop him, helpless. “Don’t deliberately get them drunk!”

A half-drunk soldier beside them gave Alex an ‘OK’ gesture, then, with a playful smile, shoved him aside and turned to explain the rules of the drinking contest to Bai Liu. “Since Alex said so, how about the simplest way to drink alcohol?”

Tang Erda pulled on Bai Liu’s elbow, frowning as he shook his head, signaling for him not to drink.

He could tell Bai Liu wasn’t good at handling alcohol. After drinking the high-concentration vodka earlier, the man’s face had turned slightly flushed.

Spades glanced at Tang Erda holding Bai Liu’s elbow, paused for a moment, then turned back to the soldier explaining the rules. “What’s the most complicated way to have a drinking contest?”

“Wow! You’re brave and full of courage!” the soldier clapped excitedly, then turned to Alex, pointing at Spades and shouting, “Alex, I’m letting them off the hook for your sake!”

Alex rubbed his temples, a headache coming on. Realizing he couldn’t persuade Spades, he turned to Bai Liu. “Don’t listen to them. If you get drunk, you won’t even be able to walk back tonight…”

The soldier clicked his tongue, clearly disappointed. “Alex, you’re such a letdown.”

Spades looked directly at Bai Liu. “Would you like to drink?”

Bai Liu tilted his head slightly and smiled. “I’ll stay with you until the end.”

“Alright, here’s how it works,” the soldier snapped his fingers, drawing everyone’s attention. He began pouring alcohol into a small iron bucket on the bar, the kind used for bartending ice, until it was full.

With pride, he held up the small bucket and shook it. “—Behold, my glorious creation: the Kiss of War. The last person to drink it supposedly saw the God of Death.”

Two nearby soldiers handed Bai Liu and Spades conical goblets, each about 15 centimeters tall, with a capacity of around 400 milliliters, and gestured for them to place them on their heads.

Spades took his without hesitation, placing it on his head and staring directly at Bai Liu. Bai Liu hesitated for a moment but, under Spades' gaze, quickly placed the cup on his head and looked back calmly.

When the soldier saw the funny sight of these two outstanding-looking people holding wine glasses, he couldn’t help laughing.

He laughed and said: “The rules of the drinking competition are like this. You have to continuously scoop the wine from this small bucket and put it on the wine glass above your head. Be careful not to spill it outside. If it spills outside, you have to drink the whole glass you’ve ladled.”

“Then, if you fill up the wine glass on your head and haven’t spilled a drop, the other person must drink the alcohol on your head. At the same time, during the drinking process, neither the wine glass on his head nor the wine glass on your head can be held. If it falls, you will be responsible for drinking twice the amount of alcohol in the glass.”

“When both parties are completely unable to hold the cup on their heads, the drinking competition ends, and the party with the most broken cups is the loser.”

He spread his arms. “Got it?”

Both Bai Liu and Spades nodded, eyes fixed on the glasses on each other’s heads.

The soldier whistled and tossed the small scooping cups into the iron barrel. “Let the game begin!”

Bai Liu reached out, taking the cup between his fingers, and steadily poured wine into the glass on his head.

To everyone’s surprise, Spades ignored the scooping cup entirely. He grabbed both sides of the small barrel with both hands, raising it high above his head, and began pouring alcohol directly into the glass on his head, all the while locking eyes with Bai Liu.

The alcohol flowed smoothly, filling Spades' glass quickly, passing the halfway point.

Tang Erda: "!!!"

Alex: "!!!"

The onlookers were stunned.

Can you even play like that?!

Bai Liu didn't hesitate. He reached up to interfere, trying to stop the flow of alcohol from the barrel above Spades' head.

But Spades was a head taller than him. As Bai Liu moved closer, Spades raised the barrel higher, keeping it just out of reach.

Realizing Spades was deliberately using his height to suppress him, Bai Liu narrowed his eyes. With a swift motion, he leaped onto the bar with one hand, keeping his glass steady atop his head.

Then, just as everyone thought he was going to use his height advantage to grab the barrel, Bai Liu swept his leg in a cold arc, aiming to knock the glass off Spades' head.

Spades instinctively leaned back to dodge. In the same motion, Bai Liu kicked the wine barrel from his grip.

The barrel flipped through the air, scattering alcohol everywhere.

The crowd followed its path, eyes wide.

Spades' right hand snaked around his lower back, grabbing the whip hanging there, and circled the barrel. With a flick of his wrist, he pulled it back, catching the barrel midair. All the spilled alcohol was collected again, not a drop wasted.

The soldiers were dumbfounded. —What kind of operation is this?!

Magical Eastern Kung Fu?!

Seeing the barrel return to Spades' left hand, Bai Liu's eyes darkened. Without hesitation, he pulled out a gun from his waist, aiming at the back of Spades' head.

"!!!" Tang Erda's hand instinctively went to his own gun, realizing it was gone.

Alex's face went blank.

The soldiers stood frozen, their mouths agape, unable to react in time.

Bai Liu pulled the trigger without pause. But before the bullet could reach its target, Spades moved quickly, evading it and prying the gun from Bai Liu's hand.

Instead of hitting him, the bullet ricocheted off and struck the wine barrel, creating a hole in its bottom. Alcohol began leaking out, dripping into Spades' hand, which he caught effortlessly.

"The barrel leaked on your hand," Bai Liu said, retracting his gun. His voice was hoarse, breath quickening slightly from the action. "I won."

Spades stared at him calmly. "You intended to aim at the barrel from the beginning."

—Targeting me was just a diversion.

Bai Liu shrugged, a smile tugging at his lips. "It's just a drinking contest. I'm not bored enough to shoot you for something like this."

Tang Erda, Alex, and the soldiers exchanged glances, dumbfounded. —So you do know it's just a drinking game!!

Bai Liu looked at Spades. "You lost."

Spades hummed softly. "I lost, so I drink."

He stepped closer, placing his hands on Bai Liu's shoulders. "Lower your head."

Bai Liu was silent for a moment, then slowly lowered his head.

Spades didn't need to stand on tiptoe to reach the wine glass on Bai Liu's head. As their faces drew nearer, Bai Liu could feel the heat radiating from him, his own breathing growing faster.

The close proximity made it feel as though Bai Liu had actively lowered his head, inviting Spades to kiss his forehead.

Bai Liu glanced up, eyes tracing Spades' Adam's apple as it moved with each swallow. He could feel Spades' heartbeat, which seemed faster than usual.

Strangely, his own heartbeat quickened in response.

Spades finished drinking, wiped his mouth with his thumb, and said nonchalantly, "Again."

In the second round, Bai Liu lost.

Spades didn't care about the glass on his head, grabbing Bai Liu's glass first and knocking it off. Both of them drank large gulps.

Spades sat back with a grin, letting Bai Liu drink from his head, but Bai Liu, for some reason, would rather hold the glass in his teeth and turn away than drink from Spades' head.

By the third round, they were tied. The backup barrel was damaged. The furious bartender scolded them and ordered three more large glasses each.

…

Tang Erda, initially tense, now sat back, helplessly watching the spectacle with Alex.

"I thought something would happen," Tang Erda sighed. "Thankfully, it didn't."

Alex shook his head with a smile. "I thought Bai Liu was really angry at Spades, but it turns out it was just a little conflict during the 'falling for each other' phase."

"Guy and I have been through that before. It's nice to just have fun."

Alex smiled at Bai Liu, who was drinking the alcohol from Spades' head, and sighed wistfully. "It's amazing. To love someone so much that you're willing to point a gun at them in fun, to be so close, so intimate."

Bai Liu lowered his eyes, focusing on the glass above Spades' head. He carefully balanced himself and drank slowly, trying to maintain control.

But after drinking so much, he might not have realized that his stability was not just in his own movements but in the world itself. To everyone else, Bai Liu seemed to tip his head slightly, letting the glass slip off.

Spades instinctively reached out to catch it. He looked up, intending to point out their loss, but found Bai Liu staring blankly ahead, as if unaware that the glass had fallen.

Bai Liu leaned in, lips pressing against Spades' lips, the wine glass slipping from Spades' head and crashing to the floor.

The onlookers, thinking this was a drunken mess, began laughing and whistling.

Bai Liu blinked slowly, his hands now cupping Spades' face. He pulled away and opened his mouth, as if to say something, but only managed: "I didn't mean to kiss you."

"Oh," Spades looked at him, observing closely. "You've turned red again, Bai Liu."

Bai Liu wanted to blame it on the alcohol, but admitting he was drunk felt humiliating. So instead, he said, "I just turn red sometimes."

Spades raised an eyebrow. "When?"

"Is it when you kiss me? When you get close to me? Or when I tell others we have a special relationship?"

He listed off the moments, then paused before adding, "Bai Liu, you only turn red when you're with me."

"Why?" Spades moved closer, his breath warm with a hint of alcohol. "Is it because we have a special relationship?"

"No." Bai Liu paused, then answered calmly, "It's because I hate you."

"When I'm around people I hate, I turn red."

Spades took a moment to process this. "You only turn red when you're close to me."

"Do you only hate me?"

Bai Liu's eyelids lowered, concealing his emotions. He gently touched Spades' eyes and said softly, his voice hoarse from the alcohol:

"Yes, of all people, I only hate you."

But of all the monsters, I only love you.

Chapter End Notes

> I think this is my favorite quote from the novel
> Yes, of all people, I only hate you.
> But of all the monsters, I only love you.

Spades was quiet for a moment then said, “I don’t understand.”

Bai Liu curled his lips lazily and smiled. He seemed to find Spades’ appearance amusing, so he answered: “What don’t you understand?”

“I don’t understand why you only hate me.” Spades answered honestly.

Bai Liu withdrew from his arms and sat across from him. He raised his hand to support his chin with a kind of drowsiness in his eyes. He said with a half-smile, “You ripped out my heart and made me lose a very important game. You also killed the most important person to me, isn’t that enough for me to hate you?”

A drop of wine dripped from the tip of Spades’ hair, and he breathed calmly: “You have had many enemies. Every one of your current teammates has hurt you, and you don’t hate them.”

“You don’t hate a person for simply winning or losing a game.”

“And I didn’t kill anyone.” Spades looked directly into Bai Liu’s eyes, “I just killed the monster whose heart you hid.”

“I’m not the only player trying to destroy this monster. People around you, your teammates, have all tried to kill this monster.”

Bai Liu turned around coldly: “But you were the only one who succeeded.”

“No, I didn’t succeed.” Spades stared at him, “My intuition tells me that this monster’s heart is still alive because of you.”
He paused: “I thought you killed it after you got out of the game.”

Bai Liu’s breathing became very light, his eyes suddenly unfocused, and the fingers of his right hand twitched slightly.

“No.”

“…It committed suicide.”

“So you can’t blame me for its death.” Spades looked at Bai Liu, “I am no different from the players around you.”

His lips pursed into a straight line: “But you don’t hate Tang Erda, you don't hate anyone in your team, and you don't hate Alex, who was hostile to you before."

There was a visible confusion on Spades' face: "Why do you only hate me?"

Bai Liu looked away: "——Don't make it sound like you know me well, this is only the third time we have met——"

After saying that, he stood up to leave. Spades stretched out his hand and grasped Bai Liu's wrist tightly. He looked at Bai Liu with a keen eye, and there was an imperceptible depression in his tone:

"——Why do you target me in such a special way?"

Bai Liu's hanging eyelashes fluttered, and his index finger moved involuntarily with alcohol sliding down on the back of his hand.

"Answer me, Bai Liu." Spades' eyes were like a dark bunch of thorns growing, enveloping Bai Liu in layers, ensuring he spat out the heartfelt answer that was hidden beneath the tangle of spikes, "-what is it about me that is different for you."

But before Bai Liu opened his mouth to answer Spades, a huge noise from the door of the tavern broke their stalemate in this small corner.

Deafening whistles and some sharp salutes came from the door, accompanied from time to time by some surprising, unbelievable laughter and teasing.

Bai Liu quickly withdrew his hand: "There is a game event coming, let's deal with it first."

"You haven't answered me yet." Spades had no expression on his face. He stood stubbornly in front of Bai Liu and looked directly at him, "Why?"

Bai Liu took a deep breath, raised his head and sneered: "I just hate you. There is no reason. You don't need a reason to hate someone. Can you understand this?"

Spades was silent for about ten seconds. He didn't say yes or no, nor did he get out of the way. He just stood there and said 'oh'.

"You got your answer." Bai Liu looked up at Spades, "Can you get out of the way?"

For the first time, Spade averted his eyes in front of Bai Liu. He lowered his head and raised the whip hanging next to his knees, as if he was going to hit a non-existent enemy: "…How long are you going to hate me for?"

The Reverse God had told him that hatred without reason has a time limit, so he wanted to ask.

Bai Liu was quiet for a while, his shoulders sank as if relaxed, and he said softly: "——"

The moment he spoke, the sound of huge champagne bottles being opened one after another drowned out the sound of Bai Liu's answer.

Spades only saw Bai Liu looking at him with a smile and saying a few words amidst the roar and cheers of the huge crowd, but he couldn't make out what those words were.

Then the colorful wedding bouquets fell down one after another and covered their heads.

Spades frowned and approached Bai Liu and asked, "I didn't hear what you just said."

"Forget it." Bai Liu smiled, brushed Spades' shoulder and ran forward.

Spades looked back after Bai Liu and saw Guy wearing a wedding dress and a snow-white veil in the crowd, holding fireworks, and Alex standing opposite Guy, who looked completely dumbfounded.

The surrounding soldiers formed a friendly circle. They raised their hands in the air, beat the rhythm with their feet, and hummed an out-of-tune wedding march.

Guy knelt down amidst the cheers. He held a bouquet high to Alex, who had a blank expression, and smiled brightly: "Alex, please forgive me for secretly planning this wedding without telling you."

"I hope this is a surprise for you rather than a shock." Guy joked humorously, gently, with a layer of tears in his eyes, "Hey, although I'm dressed a little weird, you shouldn't have this expression, right?"

As if he had just come to his senses, Alex knelt down stiffly, tremblingly, and with a red face, he hugged Guy who was wearing a wedding dress, tightly. His tears couldn't help but roll down. His voice was hoarse and he could only repeat several words meaninglessly.

“God, God, God!”

Guy stroked the back of Alex’s head, his eyes flushed. He couldn’t help laughing, and his tone became softer: “Maybe I can interpret your reaction as if you are willing to marry me?”

Alex cried almost convulsively: “Guy! I love you Guy!”

Guy helped the crying Alex up. They did not ask a priest to marry them – the current priest was still praying for the dead soldiers in the military medical camp, so they took an oath of marriage together under the witness of everyone.

Besides, their wedding was not blessed by God.

These soldiers, who had not seen a happy event for a long time, were so excited that Guy’s wedding dress was almost trampled to pieces by these rude soldiers.

Even if this is an absurd and secular wedding, on the eve of the war, there is no more comforting scene than seeing two lovers hugging each other and kissing with tears in their eyes.

It doesn’t matter whether the protagonist of this picture is a man or a woman. What matters is that they are alive and they love each other.

God may not bless them, but God has never blessed anyone here.

The crowd was noisy, and in the corner, Spades looked at Tang Erda expressionlessly.

Tang Erda: “…”

Bai Liu accompanied Guy to deal with those matters, and then handed Spades to Tang Erda, asking Tang Erda to help look after the half-drunk number one player.

Actually, although Bai Liu said that Spades was drunk, he didn’t look very drunk, although…

Spades asked one word at a time: “What is marriage?”

Tang Erda racked his brains and answered: “It is a ceremony that when people reach a certain age, in order to be with the person they like forever, they introduce each other to other people and comply with legal procedures.”

Spades was quiet for a while, seeming to digest, and then asked again: “What is a certain age?”

Tang Erda held his forehead in pain. He had already answered Spades’ countless questions – this man didn’t cry or make a fuss after drinking, but he had a lot of questions.

And he was very persistent. If you don’t answer, he will use various methods to get you to answer.

Tang Erda sighed: “Probably more than 20 for women and over 30 for men?”

Spades looked at him from the side: “How old are you?”

Tang Erda was startled: “Thirty-five or six.”

Spades made a sound and asked: “Then why don’t you get married? Is it because you don’t have a partner?”

Tang Erda, who was shot once, said: “…The situation is a bit complicated.”

Spades asked: “The person you like doesn’t exist?”

Tang Erda, who was shot twice, said: “…”

Seeing that Tang Erda didn’t answer, Spades continued, “The person you like is married to someone else?”

Tang Erda, who had been shot three times, said: “…”

Seeing that Tang Erda didn’t fight back, Spades continued to speculate: “The person you like…”

“Okay.” Tang Erda took a long, long sigh, “I’ll tell you.”

Spades will keep guessing when he can’t get his answer, and this person doesn’t know why, but he can always guess the most miserable answer with his strange intuition. Until now, Tang Erda has answered Spades’ questions to the point where he is numb from the holes Spades has put in him.

Tang Erda took a big sip of wine and looked at the empty wine glass in a daze: “The person I like… he likes me, but he has left.”

When Spades got the answer, he was quiet for a while, and then suddenly asked: “Will Bai Liu hate the person who marries him?”

“?!?” Tang Erda was confused by the jumping nature of Spades’ question, but since Spades’ questions had always been jumping around, he thought hard for a moment and tentatively gave an answer, “There should be…… no way?”

“Everyone… generally likes their marriage partner.”

Although it was hard for Tang Erda to imagine someone Bai Liu would marry.

Tang Erda remembered that he had seen in Murphy’s Magic Mirror that Bai Liu had fallen in love with someone when he was young, but that person had long been tortured to death in the orphanage. It could only be regarded as a premature love of the great devil Bai Liu that ended in nothing.

Spades’ whip on his knees shook. He sat up straight, let out a heavy ooh, and nodded seriously.

Tang Erda was confused: “???”

What is this look of having found the answer?

Alex hugged Guy’s shoulders and cried, then laughed again. This young man who had previously advised Bai Liu and Spades not to drink, clutched a bottle and drank passionately with all those who came to congratulate him. Less than ten or five minutes later, he lay drunkenly on Guy’s shoulder, just saying ‘I love you’.

This unorthodox, carnival-style wedding finally progressed to the last step – the bride throwing the bouquet.

“The person who receives it will be the next couple to get married!” Guy stood on the stage and supported Alex to throw the bouquet backwards. He counted down happily, “3-2-1-!”

A group of old men were very curious about the bouquets and rushed to grab it.

But the moment Guy threw the bouquet, a black whip was thrown out, and just like a flash, it hooked the bouquet and disappeared.

A group of soldiers who were trying to grab the bouquet: “!!!”

There it is again! Mysterious Eastern Kung Fu!

Spades took the bouquet into his arms and held it up in a dignified manner with Guy's wedding veil, which had been stolen from him at some point, tilted on his head, exactly like Guy's proposal just now. The scene was imitated without any attempt at originality.

Spades then knelt down upright and raised a bouquet to Bai Liu who had been forcibly pulled over by him.

Bai Liu looked at this man with no emotion on his face, without any movement.

Spades, who had his proposal script interrupted by Bai Liu's unilateral non-cooperation, paused and recalled the opening lines of Guy's proposal: "Hey, although I'm dressed a little strange, you shouldn't have this expression, right??"

Bai Liu: "…"

The Dense Forest Borderlands

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Guy on the stage cupped his hands around his mouth, laughed and shouted loudly: “Bai Liu! Promise him!”

“This nice young man just asked to borrow the wedding dress from me!” Guy laughed so hard that he almost burst into tears. “I didn’t lend it to him, I only gave him a veil. He looked drunk. After borrowing the veil, he even came to grab my wedding dress and almost tore it off my body!”

Alex raised his head suddenly, hugged Guy’s waist in confusion, and looked around seriously: “——Where is the good young man who wants to tear Guy’s wedding dress off!”

Guy smiled more and more happily, lowered his head and kissed Alex.

The drunk Alex fell silent again after receiving the kiss. Guy raised his head and looked at Bai Liu with shining eyes, full of sincere tenderness and blessings.

“Promise him, Bai Liu, you really love each other.”

There was a very light layer of sadness hidden under Guy’s happy smile:

“Don’t wait until your lover dies to mourn him. Every moment you spend together is as precious as gold.”

Spades knelt on the ground, holding a bouquet and with his head raised, waited persistently for Bai Liu’s answer.

The crowd jumped around them meaninglessly, waving, laughing and opening bottles of champagne. The sweet and intoxicating foam of the sparkling champagne flew all over the room, and countless golden fragments fell from the roof like fireworks. The sound of laughter outside the windows rang through the night.
A few shiny little fragments fell on Spades’ hair.

Bai Liu lowered his eyes, reached out and gently took away the fragments, and then pushed away the loose hair from Spade’s forehead.

The eyes under Spades' hair were dark and pure, reflecting Bai Liu's figure cleanly and completely, as if only Bai Liu could only be seen in this noisy world.

"Are you willing to marry me?" Spades asked seriously, holding the bouquet almost under Bai Liu's nose.

Bai Liu opened his lips. He had a lot to say and ask.

Hesitating to speak was a rare and impossible thing for him, but at this moment, it happened.

Because the person he wanted to ask couldn't remember anything or understand anything, and sometimes Bai Liu wasn't even sure that the person who had lost his memory was the Tawil in his memory.

They look so different.

But Spades always gives Bai Liu an… indescribable sense of familiarity, letting him know that Spades is that person.

Edmund, the NPC in the previous game, told Bai Liu that people are not containers composed of memory and flesh. There is something higher level than this that exists in everyone, distinguishing them from monsters that are exactly the same as themselves.

This thing is love.

So even if a person's body and memory are completely different, love still exists.

Bai Liu didn't believe in this statement, but he still didn't understand why Spades could find him out of so many [Bai Liu's] before.

He didn't understand where his desire to impulsively accept the bouquet at this moment came from.

Obviously this was just a game.

Bai Liu calmly looked down at Spades kneeling on the ground and asked, "Why do you want to marry me?"

Spades said: "I hope you don't hate me."

Bai Liu easily understood Spades' logic. His eyes were half-closed: "…

Why don't you want me to hate you?"

"There are so many players who hate you. Do you want to marry each of them so that they don't hate you?"

After a pause, he frowned and shook his head: "They have always hated and feared me."

"I don't want to marry them."

Bai Liu asked calmly: "If you want to marry someone who hates you, why don't you choose someone else?"

"They are afraid of you and will easily agree to your request. They will not always oppose you like me, or even hurt you repeatedly."

Bai Liu's long eyelashes dropped, and his voice was so soft that it was almost inaudible: "…I have never been your best choice."

"I've been… killing you."

"You have never killed me." Spade looked directly at him, "If one day I die, it will be my choice to die."

Bai Liu's breathing slowed down: "… There are so many choices, why do you have to choose me?"

— Even after dying for me twice, you're still picking me.

Spades' eyes reflected Bai Liu, and his tone was calm and serious: "Because you are different from others."

Bai Liu asked: "What's the difference?"

Spades pondered for a long time and gave the answer: "They can hate me, but I don't want you to hate me."

Bai Liu was quiet for a long time, then he chuckled and raised his eyes: "Why can't I hate you?"

Spades was quiet for a while: "…I don't know, I just don't want you to hate me."

The expression on Bai Liu's face softened unconsciously: "Just like I hate you, there is no reason for it, right?"

Spades lowered his voice as if he was a little depressed: "…Yeah."

“Promise him! Promise him! Promise him!”

The booing was getting louder and louder, and the soldiers who were red-faced and drunk were shouting loudly, as if they were threatening Bai Liu, but they were laughing happily, with a look full of expectation, eager to see a second married couple. Spades’ expression made it clear he was waiting for Bai Liu to speak.

“Spades, people will not marry someone they hate.” Bai Liu said softly, “This does not conform to the logic of normal people.”

Spades knelt motionless, as if he had fallen into a strange whirlpool of thinking because the logic of the proposal had been destroyed.

According to his idea, two people who hate each other can get married and end their hatred for each other through marriage, but Bai Liu said that the causal relationship was reversed, which made Spades pause in place.

This was different from what he thought.

Bai Liu’s eyes dropped to the bouquet in Spade’s hand, and he seemed to be talking to himself: “But you and I are both drunk now.”

“So we can do things that don’t make sense.”

Bai Liu reached out, took the bouquet from Spades’ hands and smiled at Spades who had not yet reacted:

“I do.”

Guy stuffed his index finger and thumb into his mouth, laughed wildly and whistled without any thought to his own image: “—Now the groom can kiss the groom!”

Bai Liu held the bouquet and slowly walked towards Spades. He slightly tilted his head and raised it as if he wanted to kiss him, and looked intently into Spades’ eyes.

Flowing golden fireworks fell from their heads. People from a strange country they didn’t know held up empty beer bottles and knocked against each other in confusion, shaking their heads and playing the beat of the wedding march. In the dim bar in the distance, a man in a wedding dress and a drunk groom were kissing passionately.

Bai Liu had never imagined his marriage before the moment he jumped from the plane.

But at that moment, he had thought about it.

Bai Liu thought that the wedding scene imagined by a monster like him should be weird and unattended, but the strange thing is that the wedding he imagined with Tawil was like what all normal people in the world yearn for.

Vulgar, lively, with a large group of strangers who have only a slight connection with them to witness, and then they make the same promise to each other in the noisy background – we will be together forever, until death do us apart.

Until death do us part.

Bai Liu thought that after that, after he found Tawil… he might… try to accept a wedding.

Now he did get it, although it didn't seem to be the same as he imagined.

It's like this every time, he seems to have endless bad luck. Then that person, that person will always try his best, as if he wants to take advantage of the whole world, to bring what Bai Liu wanted back to him in all sorts of strange and bizarre ways.

——A storybook that had been torn and then pasted together, a lanky ghost doll with a missing face.

The wedding after parting.

This person has been clumsily comforting him, trying to cheer him up by giving Bai Liu the gift he wanted most.

Even if the price of this gift is to sacrifice one's own life.

Soothing background music was played in the tavern, and everyone swayed and danced in pairs, hugging each other. The lights dimmed, and only vague light and shadow could be seen.

Bai Liu circled the back of Spades' neck and pressed against his chin, blinking slightly.

With Bai Liu holding the back of his neck, Spades struggled to look back at the movements of Guy and Alex hugging each other in the middle of the dance floor – he had never been married, and he needed a template to learn from after getting married.

Guy hugged Alex's shoulders and swayed. They were kissing continuously, and Alex's hand had already reached into the hem of Guy's wedding dress.

Spades' eyes flickered back and forth between Guy and Bai Liu, then he leaned into Bai Liu's ear and asked hesitantly: "-I'm going to kiss you now?"

He still remembered that he had made this person angry by casually kissing him before, so he asked in advance this time.

"People don't kiss people they hate, Spades." Bai Liu didn't look up and answered Spades softly.

"But we are married." Spades answered confidently, "Those who are married should kiss each other."

Spades felt Bai Liu, who was leaning against his shoulder, chuckle.

Then Bai Liu said: "Didn't you ask me before about how long I will hate you?"

Spades quickly asked: "How long?"

Bai Liu raised his head. There was a layer of luster in his eyes, and the smile on his face was pure and clear, with a touch of mischievousness that was not well hidden.

"——Forever, I will always hate you."

Spades stopped all movements and tried to argue: "We are married, so we should kiss, but if you hate me, we can't kiss -"

Bai Liu lowered his eyes, pulled Spades down, closed his eyes and kissed him.

After the kiss, Spades looked at Bai Liu: "You said you hate me, but you took the initiative to kiss me."

This was too contradictory. Spades couldn't understand such a thing. He was confused and depressed: "Why did you do this?"

"Because I'm drunk." Bai Liu didn't close his eyes this time, and leaned in to kiss Spades again, "——I can marry people I hate when I'm drunk, and I can kiss people I hate."

He kissed Spades and closed his eyes calmly.

“I would like to be with the person I hate forever, until death do us part again.”

Chapter End Notes

Till death do us part AGAIN !!!!!

Amidst the cheers, Alex, who was so drunk he couldn't tell where he was going, picked up Guy and was swarmed to his new, improvised room in the tavern.

This group of people also took the time to arrange a room for Bai Liu and the others. Although it looked simple, it still had that look.

Spades was about to bend down and imitate Alex's movements to carry Bai Liu into the new house, but Bai Liu calmly stopped him.

Bai Liu raised his eyes and glanced at Tang Erda, who had been motionless for a long time like a wood statue among the human race.

The expression on Tang Erda's face was blank. He stared at Spades and the veil on his head for a while, then at Bai Liu with a natural expression, and finally slowly lowered his head and glanced at the wine bottle in his hand. He then turned it over and checked the strength to confirm that he was not hallucinating due to drinking too much.

Tang Erda muttered to himself in a daze: "Is there a monster here? My mental value has dropped due to my alienation…"

Bai Liu calmly stopped Spades behind him who tried to lift him up again: "No need."

Spades raised his head: "?"

"Alex already hugged Guy." He wondered from the bottom of his heart, "Can't I hug you too?"

Bai Liu said: "——We don't need to."
Spades asked: "Why?"

Bai Liu thought about it for a few seconds, and then started to talk nonsense without changing his expression: "——Alex hugged Guy. It was the one who wasn't wearing a wedding dress that hugged the one wearing a wedding dress, not you hugging me."

Spades let out a sudden oh, then naturally opened his arms and looked straight at Bai Liu, as if he was ready for Bai Liu to carry him into the new room.

Bai Liu glanced at Spades, who was a head taller than him, from top to bottom, and looked away as if nothing had happened: “-But you look too heavy for me to carry, so forget it.”

Spades was quiet for a while, then he slowly put down his hands and put them behind his back. He said “oh” and stood in front of Bai Liu, still looking at him steadily.

Bai Liu looked up and raised his eyebrows, showing a questioning expression, asking what else he wanted.

“I’m not very heavy.” Spades defended seriously, “74kg, only one hundred and sixty-three pounds. You should try holding me.”

After saying that, he opened his arms again, with a calm expression on his face, and stared directly at Bai Liu, giving him a sense of urgency “Hurry up and pick me up and take me to the new room.”

Bai Liu: “…”

Bai Liu retorted calmly: “——I really can’t pick you up.”

“But we got married, you should carry me in.” Spades’ eyes glanced at the door of the room where Alex entered with Guy in his arms, and then his eyes fell flatly on Bai Liu’s face, “Even though Alex is drunk he can carry Guy, who weighs 174 pounds to the room.”

Spades lowered his eyes and looked at Bai Liu, calmly explaining the facts: “I am eleven pounds lighter than Guy.”

Bai Liu: “…”

He inexplicably felt a sense of condemnation in Spades’ words.

Bai Liu knew very well that he couldn’t carry Spades when he was drunk, but he’d learned the hard way that Spades was stubborn and serious when he’s drunk – this man wouldn’t give in until he got a reasonable answer.

“It’s true that I can’t carry you.” Bai Liu looked at Spades with a smile, “But a certain tool in my system panel has the ability to transport you. I can use this tool to carry you in. Can you accept this?”

After thinking for a moment, Spades nodded.

He could accept Bai Liu using game props to carry him in, such as floating mats used to reduce weight.

One minute later.

Tang Erda's facial expression was completely frozen. He took a rigid step, like a Haidilao food delivery robot that had lost its brain. His arms stretched forward stiffly, and his eyes stared blankly ahead, not looking down at the "goods" being transported in his arms at all.

The "Cargo" was expressionless with an upright posture, and his hands were neatly placed on the seams of his trousers. He lay straight on Tang Erda's stretched-out arms like a frozen corpse.

Because Tang Erda didn't support or hold Spades at all, Spades would roll off if he didn't straighten his body.

But even though Spades straightened his body, the slight bumps caused by Tang Erda's movement caused the expressionless Spades on his arms to roll from side to side.

But fortunately he didn't fall down.

Bai Liu walked beside them calmly, guiding the "food delivery robot" to the door of the new house.

Next to him were a group of soldiers with dull eyes and dumbfounded expressions. They watched in stunned silence as Tang Erda carried Bai Liu to the door of his new room.

It wasn't until the door of the room was closed and these strange three people disappeared into the doorway that the soldiers retracted their sight in a daze.

A soldier gulped and exclaimed: "God, what are they doing?"

"I know!" A soldier raised his hand excitedly to answer, "This is an ancient Eastern wedding custom!"

A group of soldiers looked over curiously.

The soldier rubbed his hands and laughed drunkenly: "I heard that the ancient eastern emperors would ask some of their male subordinates to help transport their wives to the bed."

"It seems like this – [I asked my subordinates to tie up my wife with something, and then asked them to carefully send her into the room.] " The soldier felt that he was talking about something extremely interesting, so he came closer to these people. The soldier lowered his voice and said mysteriously, “In order to ensure the chastity of the wives being transported, these subordinates are usually castrated!”

The soldiers let out a long, shocked, and extremely gossipy “Oh——!!”

One soldier expressed extreme disbelief at such a cruel tradition. He shook his head and exclaimed: “So that tall recruit–?!”

The soldier who talked about customs nodded sadly: “Most likely.”

Everyone let out a long sigh.

The soldier changed the topic and said, “But you don’t have to sympathize with him too much. Generally speaking, such castration is voluntary for them.”

“Voluntary?!” Everyone’s eyes were shocked. “He is so tall and handsome but he is actually willing to do such a thing to himself!”

“Ancient Dongfeng civilization customs.” The soldier shook his head and showed off his knowledge, “It is said that this is to show his loyalty and to better serve his king!”

“That little man must have royal blood!” The soldier concluded.

Everyone let out another long ‘ohh’.

Bai Liu, unaware of his royal blood, sat on the edge of the bed and glanced at the “Beloved Concubine” Spades lying on the bed, and Tang Erda who stood beside the bed as if he had solidified.

“I, I’m leaving first.” Tang Erda said these words with difficulty, not daring to look at Spades on the bed and Bai Liu who was beside the bed, and almost ran through the back door of the room.

He didn’t know yet that he had been “castrated” outside.

Spades, who was lying on the bed, looked at Bai Liu quietly with a haunted gaze.

Bai Liu turned his back to Spades and said with a faint smile in his voice: “I showed you that Tang Erda is indeed in my system panel and is considered my tool. I didn’t lie to you.”

Spades turned over, buried his face in the pillow, and let out a muffled sound.

But soon, Spades' mood seemed to calm down. He looked sideways at Bai Liu, who was sitting by the bed, unbuttoning his cuffs and taking off his coat, his eyes becoming full of inquisitiveness again: "Are we going to do anything else tonight?"

"There's nothing to do." Bai Liu said

Bai Liu took off his coat and unbuttoned his shirt.

He didn't shy away from Spades' gaze, so he changed his clothes, then lifted up the quilt and lay down, smiling at Spades and saying good night.

Bai Liu reached out and turned off the lamp, everything turned dark, and soon his breathing became even.

Spades lying next to him looked confused – his intuition told him that the marriage process had not yet been completed.

But he didn't know what to do next. It seemed like the two of them were lying on the bed, unable to do anything else except sleep…

Spades turned over several times, and finally whispered good night to Bai Liu and closed his eyes.

Bai Liu, who was pretending to be asleep, quietly raised the corners of his mouth.

When Bai Liu was a child, when he wanted to escape some of Xie Ta's questions, or did something he didn't want Xie Ta to know about, but Xie Ta found out, he pretended to be asleep.

Xie Ta would not disturb his sleep no matter what.

It seems that this good habit has been carried over to this day.

But Bai Liu's lips froze halfway up – there was a strange sound and the intertwined breathing of two people coming from another room that was only separated from them by a wall.

Bai Liu: "…"

Are the rooms in this tavern so poorly soundproofed?

Spades opened his eyes. Instead of disturbing Bai Liu, who was still pretending to be asleep, he knelt down on one knee at the head of the bed quietly, tilted his head and put his ear to the wall – he must know what the next steps are in getting married.

Bai Liu: "…"

He also opened his eyes and silently stared at Spades' side profile in the darkness.

The voices of Guy and Alex were so intertwined that ordinary people might not be able to hear what these two people were mumbling while kissing, but Bai Liu and Spades now have high level panels. Their acuity in the five senses was very high, so they could hear clearly.

"Oh God! Guy, Guy you're so…!"

Guy's laughing voice came over: "Alex, um, please slow down – condoms, I put condoms on the bedside… Hey, good boy, even if it's the wedding night, this is a must. Wear it."

Spades' movements stopped for a second or two, and then he turned around to open the bedside table, but Bai Liu had to stand up to stop him.

Bai Liu turned on the desk lamp, raised his eyes and asked calmly: "What are you going to do if you don't want to sleep?"

Spades looked at him: "I'm looking for the condoms in the bedside table."

Bai Liu paused for a moment: "What are you going to use them for?"

The voice on the opposite wall suddenly became shriller: "Oh my God! Guy – you're putting it on me with your mouth – God!"

"It's for wearing." Spades immediately understood the use of this thing. He stared straight at Bai Liu's lips, "Do you also want to use your mouth to help-"

Bai Liu retorted calmly: "Impossible."

Spades looked at Bai Liu: "Why is it impossible?"

Bai Liu took a deep breath and exhaled it slowly.

He realized that Spades couldn't simply be fooled again.

Bai Liu looked away, his neck turned red almost visibly, and the fingers hanging by his side twitched twice almost convulsively: "——I can help you in other places——"

"I don't want Tang Erda to help me put it on." Spades interrupted Bai Liu without hesitation. He looked at Bai Liu right away, knelt down and pressed Bai Liu against the wall. He then pressed his lips against Bai Liu's. Very, very close: "I want you to do it."

The Dense Forest Borderlands

Bai Liu turned his face away from the approaching Spades. He could smell the obvious alcohol in Spades' breath.

Of course, maybe it's not Spades', it might be his.

Bai Liu probably drank more vodka tonight than he had drank in his entire life.

Although his actions and thoughts seemed to be very stable, his limbs also felt weak from drinking. As soon as Spades opened his arms and walked over, Bai Liu couldn't help but move back and lean his shoulders against the wall for support.

Spades lowered his eyes and looked at Bai Liu, who was blushing. This time, he didn't ask why Bai Liu turned red – because Bai Liu's face was red all the time after drinking.

The sounds from across the wall had become muffled.

Bai Liu slowly raised his eyes to look at Spades, his breathing was warm and light, and Spades could see a very shallow halo of alcohol and drunkenness in Bai Liu's eyes.

That halo made Bai Liu's eyes out of focus. It was clear that his eyes were on Spades' face, but Spades always felt that Bai Liu was looking through him, at someone hiding behind him.

"… I can put it on for you." Bai Liu said softly. He seemed to be smiling and a little lazy, "But do you know where to wear it?"

Spades paused, and he said honestly: "Where?"
Bai Liu's smile became more obvious. He reached behind Spades and opened the drawer. There was a whole box of Ares condoms, ranging from small to large. Bai Liu took them all out and spread them out over the bed.

"?" Spades was a little confused, "Should I wear them all?"

Bai Liu raised his head, holding his chin with a half-smile, his eyes filled with undisguised mischief and nostalgia: "Have you ever played with balloons?"

Spades: "I've seen them, but I've never played with them."

“It was the same for me when I was a child.” Bai Liu smiled, his eyes stopped on Spades’ face and became distant, “I grew up in an orphanage. The dean and teachers at the orphanage didn’t like children like me. During festivals, other children would get two balloons, but I didn’t get any.”

Spades’ lips pursed into a straight line: “They should have given them to you.”

“There is nothing that should or should not happen in this world.” Bai Liu lowered his eyes and said in a nonchalant voice, “I wouldn’t have been sad about this kind of thing, because the wholesale balloons are not worth much.”

Bai Liu paused: “But the other kid who didn’t get a balloon didn’t think so.”

“He got a bunch of balloons from somewhere, painted them colorfully with markers from the craft room, and handed them to me in front of all the children who got the balloons.”

Bai Liu lowered his head and smiled: “I saw the rubber rings on these balloons. He took them from the trash can, washed them, and tied them with string to make the balloons.”

“He didn’t know what these things were originally used for, but he turned them into balloons that children would find beautiful and gave them to me.”

Bai Liu’s eyelashes trembled slightly: “Essentially… I shouldn’t have been happy because of this kind of thing.”

“Because these balloons are actually not worth much, and they are dirty and disgusting.”

But Xie Ta just looked at him, holding up the balloons and looking at him. There were still small wounds on his hands from rummaging through the trash can, and Bai Liu quickly took them without knowing why.

Then Xie Ta looked at Bai Liu and smiled slightly.

At that moment, those cheap balloons and those dirty and disgusting condoms seemed to become pure and precious because of Xie Ta’s smile.

It was a very strange feeling. Bai Liu realized for the first time that the value of these items was actually subjectively biased.

“For the first time, I felt that these pretentious… things turned out to be valuable.” Bai Liu said softly, “Because he gave them to me.”

“He made those condoms feel less disgusting to me.”

Spades held up a box of condoms. After observing them for a while, he asked, “Are these disgusting balloons?”

“In the original concept, these are balloons used to do very dirty things.” Bai Liu raised his head, he reached out and touched Spades’ face and moved his hair away from his forehead. He looked at Spades’ half-closed pure black eyes, “It is used to accommodate the human body’s desire for complete contact.”

Spades was confused: “If you want complete contact, why do you need to use this thing to isolate?”

“Because of distrust, fear, dread.” Bai Liu lowered his eyes, “People can’t trust that the person they are in contact with has no disease, that they can marry them, that they can bring their children a happy marriage and future, and can love them forever, so they use this thing as the last insurance to protect themselves.”

“Most of the time, this is the correct way to use condoms – because there is really no one in this world who will love you forever and will not hurt you.”

“But people always use this excuse to get involved with each other, and then use this thing to separate themselves from each other – sometimes they don’t even use it, in order to better control and hurt the other person. Such as making the other person pregnant with their child, or having a better sexual experience.”

“From a universal logic point of view, it is right to use this thing.”

Bai Liu looked at Spades: “I thought this logic was ironic, so I told the person who gave me the balloons the origin and use of these balloons. At that time, I thought this was disgusting.”

“You know what he told me?”

Spades stared at Bai Liu and said calmly: “If I am a very harmful monster, when someone is willing to get close to me one day, this thing can protect him from me."

"I don't find it disgusting, it's a protective prop."

Bai Liu was quiet for a long time and said, "Yes, that person told me that too."

"I can teach you how to use and wear it." Bai Liu's voice was very calm, "… Maybe there is no other person besides me who can teach you these things."

Just like Xie Ta didn't understand that the balloon he held up was a condom that everyone laughed at.

"No need." Spades interrupted Bai Liu abruptly.

There was no emotion on his face. He suddenly stretched out his hand to collect all the condoms at once, swept them into the bedside table, then turned off the light. He turned around, pushed Bai Liu into the quilt and covered him, and said in a muffled voice: "I don't want to wear it anymore. I'm going to sleep."

Bai Liu looked at the ceiling. There was a faint banging and gasping from the bedside, but he smiled for some reason and asked, "Why not?"

Spades was silent for a long time in the dark night before replying: "I'm not sure if you won't be hurt."

"This protective prop looks fragile."

Bai Liu's voice was very calm: "Didn't you already hurt me? Now you don't want to do it anymore?"

"At that time, my intuition told me that I should separate you from that heart." Spades' tone was a little low, as if he felt that he had done something wrong.

Bai Liu asked: "What about now?"

"Now my gut tells me I shouldn't hurt you anymore," Spades said.

Bai Liu turned his head slightly, looked sideways at Spades, and imitated the man's tone: "Why, there's no reason, right?"

"There is a reason." Spades said, "We got married and took an oath."

In a strange tone, he solemnly mimicked the oaths made by the soldiers when they imitated the priest to solemnize their marriage: "——From now on and forever, in good times and in bad, for riches and for poor, in health and in sickness, in happiness and in sadness, I will love you and cherish you forever."

Bai Liu couldn't help but chuckle, but he quickly poured cold water on Spades: "This is just a game, you don't need to take it so seriously."

"There are only games in my life." Spades asked in confusion, "Why can't I take it seriously?"

Bai Liu fell silent. He turned his back to Spades and said, "Good night."

Spades laid flat on his back beside Bai Liu. He let out a sigh, and then closed his eyes.

After he heard Bai Liu's breathing completely even, Spades gently opened the bedside table. He lowered his head and looked at the condoms inside for a while, then reached in and took out a box.

There was a heavy gasping sound from the next room.

"This thing turns out to be a balloon. No wonder you have to use your mouth…" Spades nodded in realization and said to himself, "So Guy and Alex blew up the balloons until they were out of breath?"

Then Spades fell into a new round of questions: "Why do two people blow up balloons together on their wedding night?"

But Bai Liu behind Spades had truly fallen asleep this time, and no one could answer his endless questions.

The next morning, when Bai Liu woke up slowly, he drew his gun within a second and pointed it at the unknown white spherical objects in the room.

Bai Liu felt like he had changed rooms to a different one during the night. The room was full of balloons, large and small.

After confirming that this room was the one where he slept last night, Bai Liu put away his gun, got dressed, and expressionlessly tore off a balloon as big as a wash basin taped to the wall.

He saw the mouth of the ball, a pale yellow rubber ring.

Bai Liu paused for two seconds. While buttoning his shirt, he walked to the bedside table and opened it, and then paused again.

At least six boxes of unopened condoms that were there yesterday had been used up, leaving only a few empty boxes lying in the drawer.

Bai Liu adjusted his breathing slowly, cleaned up all the balloons in the room, threw them into the trash can, turned around and walked out of the room.

As soon as he opened the door, he saw Alex and Guy outside, poking their heads through the doorway, and Bai Liu gasped as soon as he came out.

Guy spoke frankly and looked at Bai Liu with horrified eyes: “You’re still alive! I thought Spades had… killed you!”

Bai Liu was quiet for a moment, then he looked at Guy with a questioning gaze.

Guy’s eyes couldn’t help but wander around Bai Liu’s waist: “Spades came out last night and asked for condoms.”

“He asked for twelve boxes, in all sizes available.” Alex’s eyes were particularly strange, and he said slowly, “But we have already put six boxes in the room, which adds up to almost two hundred… “

Bai Liu: “…”

Guy couldn’t help it anymore and glanced curiously into the room: “What did you do last night? Did you use so much in one night?”

Alex thought of Tang Erda, and looked at Bai Liu with an increasingly uncomfortable look, and emphasized faintly: “And in all sizes…”

Bai Liu ignored the topic as if nothing had happened and asked calmly: “Where is Spades?”

Alex’s expression was very complicated: “We met Spades this morning. He said he didn’t have enough and went to town to buy condoms…”

“We thought you wouldn’t get up for a while.” Guy teased a little and winked, “After all, Spades seems to be in a hurry, and it feels like he will come back soon to continue using them with you.”

Bai Liu: “…”

Guy was right. After Bai Liu loaded the gun with a smile and said he was going to find Spades, Spades came running back by himself.

Bai Liu was startled when he saw Spades.

The man's face was covered with various paints, he was holding up a lot of huge balloons painted abstractly, and his hair was covered with various paints intertwined with colorful lines.

Spades walked up to Bai Liu. The man was unusually short of breath.

Bai Liu noticed a red mark around the man's mouth – he could tell he had worked very hard to blow up the balloons all night.

Spades held up a pile of about seven or eight balloons that had been damaged by paint. His black eyes seemed to be shining brightly in the mess of colors: "I couldn't find any markers, so I borrowed the paint to draw with."

Bai Liu realized that this guy was imitating Xie Ta's behavior of drawing on balloons with a marker and giving them to him.

But he wasn't good at it at all, so he created a bunch of even more miserable artistic failures.

But Spades himself didn't seem to think so. He straightened his back and said, "I blew them up all night, and these are the most beautiful ones."

"Here you go, the balloons they didn't give you." Spades put the balloons into Bai Liu's hand and said, "You should have them."

Spades gasped, and his tone was particularly serious: "The two of them certainly didn't blow up as many balloons as me last night. Our wedding won over theirs."

"I just asked around. Of the people who got married here recently, we were the only ones who used the most condoms during one night. We should be the ones who got married the best."

Bai Liu looked up at the dirty Spades. He finally took the balloons, then gave Spades a hug and said, "Yes."

"We tied the knot nicely."

The Dense Forest Borderlands

After the brief revelry, there was the coming war.

After Guy greeted Bai Liu, he quickly said goodbye to them, and followed the men of Assault One and a couple of dozen heavy guns onto the train.

Alex stood where the train started. He looked at Guy who stuck his head out of the train window and greeted him with a smile, his eyes almost staring right through Guy.

Tang Erda left even earlier. As a recruit of the Assault One team who joined through abnormal means, he took the train and left the tavern at about two or three in the morning to go to the battlefield for adaptive training.

Bai Liu asked Spades to wash off the paint, store the balloons in the box that Guy found for him, and put them in the room. He then went to the training ground with other recruits to receive their assignments.

Alex took them to the training ground. When he reached the door, he turned around and looked at Bai Liu: “I hope I will never pick up your bodies on the battlefield.”

“Of course, it’s very possible that someone else will pick it up.” Alex smiled reluctantly, but he quickly calmed down, raised his head and looked at Bai Liu firmly, “After I finish today’s cleaning work, tomorrow I will apply to join the second commando team, and I won’t be a sweeper anymore.”

Bai Liu looked at him: “Because Guy went to the first team, right?”

“Yes.” Alex lowered his head, he turned the ring on the ring finger of his left hand. With a very happy and contented smile on his face, he whispered, “We have come this far, and only death can separate us.”

Alex patted Bai Liu and Spades on the shoulders: “Guy crossed off your commando registration. Go be a sweeper, it’s safer.”
After saying that, he jogged off and waved goodbye to Bai Liu.

Bai Liu withdrew his gaze from Alex’s back and looked at the shelves standing near the door of the training ground.

The shelf was rusty, and there was a thick stack of registration forms on it. There was a notice board with white letters and a red background on it – [Application for quotas for the Second Assault Team and the Third Assault Team].

“It seems that there is a player identity option here. The suggested answer given by the main line NPC is the sweeper.” Bai Liu said thoughtfully, “But the game also places a commando application here.”

The main task of the game is to help Alex win the war. The winner is the player who collects the most corpses within seven days.

From these two points of view, it is possible to complete the mission as a sweeper and a commando, but the price/performance ratio is too low.

Collecting corpses as a soldier is a pure labor competition. This is not in line with the usual design style of this game. There must be some shortcut to obtain corpses in large quantities.

What is the best way to get the most bodies in a war?

Of course, as one of the camps, there is nothing more cost-effective to obtain casualties than to initiate a war.

Bai Liu narrowed his eyes.

Helping Alex win the war does not assign a camp, but only characters and contact methods of victory. Combined with the attitudes of the two main NPCs, Alex and Guy, towards the war, it is very likely that there is a setting here. A subplot involving Alex’s rebellion.

Assuming that the designer of this game deliberately made Alex an NPC with an unstable position, as Bai Liu thought, then Alex would be likely to rebel against his current camp.

This should also be the reason why the players of The Reverse God’s group could join the hostile camp.

If Alex rebels and joins the enemy camp, players in the enemy camp can also trigger the main mission to help Alex win the war.

From this perspective, there are two player camps in this game. One is to help Alex, who did not rebel, win the war, and the other is to help Alex, who rebelled, win the war.

So the only question now is under what circumstances will Alex, a medical student with a gentle temperament who loves his hometown and country but has a negative attitude towards war, rebel?

Although Alex holds a negative attitude towards the war, this attitude isn't enough to catalyze Alex to violently resist his current environment and defect to join the enemy.

His opinion still remains that even if this war is wrong, he must wait until the war is ended with his own victory before settling these mistakes and compensating the innocent people who were harmed by this mistake.

Alex has accepted war for what it is, in which neither side is innocent.

In Alex's mind, the incompetent government is certainly guilty, but even more guilty are these backward enemies who killed soldiers and started the war.

In this case, Alex will definitely be inclined to stand in his own camp. Even if Guy dies on the battlefield, he cannot easily change Alex's perception of his camp and make him rebel – this was something that was predetermined when Alex chose to join his own army camp instead of becoming a volunteer for the enemy.

If Alex is to defect, a different kind of catalyst was missing.

Bai Liu turned his head and looked at the track where Guy was sitting, riding away on the train.

He knew what the catalyst was.

"Choose the sweeper." Bai Liu turned to look at Spades, "Do you have any objections?"

Spades nodded and said, "Anything is fine."

After Bai Liu and Spades entered the training ground and were assigned the status of sweepers, a communications soldier ran into the training ground in a panic holding a telegram. His eyes widened in horror and shouted sharply: "Guy Davis of the Assault One Team has mutinied!"

"He suddenly turned around on the battlefield and used a bazooka to blow off the head of his deputy shooter, destroying two hidden firepower points on our side."

The soldier who rushed in was so angry that his eyes were red: “This despicable asshole! He killed more than twenty veterans of the Assault One team, and then under the enemy’s fire cover, he cleaned the battlefield, dragged the loot and surrendered to join the enemy military!!”

The whole place was in an uproar.

That night, the fighting worsened again.

The operation of the first assault team failed miserably due to Guy’s rebellion. The general who relied on his wife to rise to power was so angry that he finally pulled the thousand heavy artillery pieces to the front line overnight and merged the remaining members of the entire first assault team into the second assault team. He let the second assault team take over, and launched the second assault at dawn.

Bai Liu and Spades, two sweepers with only simple training, were also forced to the front line along with the heavy artillery because of the imminent mass casualties.

They were given a simple military tent, some stretchers and two sapper shovels, some anti-infection drugs in small bottles, a dozen suture kits, and several rolls of hemostatic bandages.

Bai Liu and the others were stationed next to Alex’s camp. After they were stationed, they walked into Alex’s tent.

The light inside the tent was very dim, and one could vaguely see the piles of corpses on the ground, with Alex sitting motionless like a corpse in the middle.

This young man who said during the day that he wanted to join the Second Commando Team seemed to have had his soul sucked out of him in just one day, and he was so haggard that he lost his form in just a dozen hours.

Alex’s military uniform was spattered with blood and coagulated flesh from top to bottom, and his face was covered in patches of blood. He stared at the mutilated corpses on the ground in trance, flicking his eyes up only slightly as he saw Bai Liu and the others lift the curtain and enter, before he continued to stare again.

Bai Liu walked to the table and lit the lamp. The light illuminated everything in the tent, including the bedding on the narrow camp bed that had not yet been tidied up, where the two people had been intertwined.

Alex's eyes slowly moved to the quilt, and he stared at it for an unknown length of time. Finally, the accumulated emotions overwhelmed him, causing him to bend down under the unbearable strength on them for a moment, covering his face, breaking down and crying.

Only then did Bai Liu ask, "Alex, what happened?"

Alex raised his head, his voice was hoarse and he was in a trance: "——I got on Guy's next train and was transported to the front line."

"I was worried about Guy, I was afraid that something would happen to him, so I secretly exchanged positions with other sweepers and came to the area where the first commando team was stationed – it was already very late, there was a heavy rain, and the sky looked particularly dark. I saw Guy and their tents moving, as if they had received a telegram from the commander. Because of the heavy rain, the lake level had risen a lot, and the raid had to be brought forward."

"The captain of the first assault team proposed to go far away and attack from the area outside the lake to the east. Guy seemed to disagree. I heard him refute the captain fiercely, saying that it was not a war zone at all."

Bai Liu knelt on one knee in front of Alex and asked softly: "Where is that place?"

"There is another indigenous village there." There were countless dried tears on Alex's face. "According to the requirements of the international peacekeeping department, the people there have declared themselves to be a neutral camp and are not allowed to attack."

Bai Liu continued to ask: "Then why did the captain attack there?"

"Because the indigenous people there adopted many children and women of the enemy who were displaced due to the war. Later, people from the enemy camp began to deliberately and quietly place their children and wives there because it was safe."

Alex paused for a moment: "But many of us here don't think it is innocent. The general has submitted applications to the international peacekeeping departments three times, requesting that this indigenous village be included in the war zone, but it has been rejected because of insufficient reasons."

"So this time, the general was going to kill first." Bai Liu asked calmly, "But there are only children and women there, so what's the point of attacking?"

Alex shook his head: "It's not just that. The indigenous people here attach great importance to blood and family ties. If the commando team can hold that village hostage, it's very likely that these indigenous people will be suppressed for a short period of time – at least it can allow us to survive this rainy season."

"And…" Alex paused, "The International Peacekeeping Department's restrictions on us are not as big as you think. As long as the other party fights back, it can be judged as an act of war, and the other party can be included in the war zone."

Bai Liu asked again: "So was this plan implemented in the end?"

Alex was lost in silence for a long time before he replied with difficulty: "…It was done. I saw Guy get into the car with his luggage on his back and leave."

"We, the sweepers, followed very closely behind, and waited until the sky was dark… I couldn't remember what time it was, but there was more heavy rain in the middle, and then I heard the sound of artillery fire and screams. "

"But there was no artillery reserve in the villages raided this time, so there should have been no sound of firing."

Alex's breathing became rapid: "I didn't know what happened, but I was afraid that something would happen to Guy, so I ran over -"

He closed his eyes, tears falling down: "There were sounds of bullets and artillery fire everywhere, and someone was yelling hysterically, but I couldn't hear anything. I touched my ear and it was bleeding. I think it was from the shock. I screamed for Guy like crazy, and eventually I saw him on a hillside, bruised and battered."

"I wanted to rush over, but the people around me were pulling me and yelling at me ferociously, telling me not to go over. I didn't understand why I couldn't go over at first. There was Guy, my lover, and I wanted to go save him."

Alex opened his empty eyes: "Until I saw him raise his rocket launcher and sniper rifle, shooting at the people around him coldly, without any hesitation."

"I know he has received professional training and was once the best rocket soldier in the team, but I have never seen this side of him."

"He was like a god of death, holding a rocket launcher at me and everyone, smiling with tears in his eyes and saying, 'I'm sorry, Alex, I can't watch the people he wanted to protect being so persecuted'."

"Marrying you was what I longed for most. After that, I think I will be happy even when I die."

Alex's tears slowly overflowed, and he took a deep breath: "——So he said that he has no regrets anymore, and he is going to die for something else."

"I carried the corpses he had blown up back one by one. Many of these people were the same people who blessed me and him last night, but today they are lying here, blown to pieces by the person they blessed."

Alex whispered, "I don't understand."

"The factory director, the first person he loved, pursued justice, and the lives he wanted to protect were human lives. These people–" Alex staggered to his feet. He pointed to 20 or so broken corpses on the ground. He was almost hysterical, and his eyes were red as asked Bai Liu, "–The lives of his friends who have rescued him countless times and blessed him do not count?"

Alex shook his head and backed away. He screamed desperately: "This is not right!! Guy did something wrong! These people didn't deserve to die!"

As Alex spoke, he staggered back and kicked a bottle on the ground. The bottle was empty, and it fell down and rolled to Bai Liu's feet.

Bai Liu lowered his eyes and looked over, and saw in neat writing on the bottle – [Medicine to Reactivate Cells of Dead Organisms (Animal Experimental Version, Do Not Use on Humans)].

[Developed by: Alex Brown]

Bai Liu moved his eyes, and saw several empty bottles scattered behind Alex. He then calmly looked at the corpses around him.

The fragmented upper limbs, half of a head with the brain exposed, and a calf whose tendons were broken by the explosion, all aimed their fractures at Bai Liu at an eerie angle.

In the dim tent, these bloody fractures seemed to be the eyes of these limbs. They were using their rotten eyes to greedily stare at Bai Liu, the uninvited guest with intact limbs.

It's as if…these fragments of corpses have evolved independent consciousness.

[System prompt: Congratulations to player Bai Liu for unlocking the "Dense Forest Border" monster book – half-dead corpse]

[Players can earn one point by collecting and subduing a half-dead corpse piece. The player with the highest total points within seven days wins]

It seems that these are the body parts that the game asked them to collect.
And the creator of these corpses… Bai Liu slowly raised his eyes to look at Alex, who was still collapsed, kneeling on the ground. He could feel a sway of position caused by tremendous pain in this NPC.

This should be a central plot point that determines whether Alex defects or not.

Bai Liu didn't get up and let the corpses squirm closer to him. He stayed crouched and looked at Alex: "You think Guy did something wrong, but do you think these corpses did the right thing?"

Alex held his head and howled in pain. He did not answer Bai Liu's words, but the wavering and confusion in his eyes already showed his answer – he felt that what these people did was not right either.

Bai Liu glanced at the corpses on the ground and said meaningfully: "Guy told you that war is like this. In war, everyone is a corpse without emotion."

"I think your idea before was quite good. If a corpse could come back to life to fight, no one would be harmed." Bai Liu sighed regretfully, "But this is simply impossible."

Alex paused.

After saying that, Bai Liu patted Alex's shoulder, who was motionless after hearing these words: "Get a good rest, there will be a big battle tomorrow, and we don't know how many fresh corpses will be produced. We will be busy."

Bai Liu stood up and pulled Spades, whose eyes were almost glued to the corpses, out of Alex's tent and back to their own tent.

Spades looked at Bai Liu: "You are baiting Alex to switch camps."

"That's not entirely the case." After Bai Liu entered the tent, he took off his military uniform coat stained with dirt and hung it on the wall. He then laid on the camp bed and turned his head to look at Spades with a smile. "Changing camps will not be beneficial to us. If Alex switches to the enemy's side and we defect after him, the enemy's acceptance of us rebels will definitely not be as high as that of The Reverse God and others who defected from the beginning."

"To put it simply, if Alex defects, our chances of winning won't be as high as those of The Reverse God." Bai Liu opened his eyes and looked at Spades with a half-smile, "In this case, The Reverse God and the others have a high probability of winning over you."

As soon as he heard about winning or losing, Spades concentrated instantly. He undressed as he sat on the edge of the bed close to Bai Liu: "How are we going to beat them?"

Bai Liu calmly retreated a little further onto the bed: "The game only gives two options; one's own camp and the enemy's camp. Judging from the current direction, whether it's Alex staying in his own camp or mutinying to the enemy, we have to become a weapon of war if we want to win. By spending huge amounts of labor to slaughter and create corpses for Alex to transform."

"Personally, I don't like this cost-effective way of winning by comparing the panel value of both sides. Moreover, we couldn't beat them in terms of comprehensive panel value."

Spades interrupted Bai Liu: "It's comparable. My board value is higher than the other three people except The Reverse God combined."

Bai Liu was quiet for a moment and raised his eyebrows in surprise: "What's your panel value data?"

Spades reported a string of numbers seriously and then said: "The panel value of The Reverse God is confidential, I don't know it, but it shouldn't be higher than mine."

Bai Liu fell into an eerie silence – no wonder The Reverse God wants to suppress Spades' momentum…

With this ridiculously high panel value data, if he wasn't suppressed and doesn't obey orders, he's equivalent to a super wrecking ball. He would make the situation extremely chaotic and the outcome couldn't be seen clearly. When he plays in the league, nine other people are needed to beat him. Not even one person is able to beat him.

"I heard rumors from the outside world, and I only knew that your panel was worth over 10,000, but I didn't expect it to be so much more," Bai Liu said.

Spades replied: "I broke 10,000 when I first played last year. Later, my teammates asked me to keep it secret at the beginning of the league, saying that the panel value was too outstanding and could easily be targeted."

Bai Liu continued: "But even if your board value is high, it's only a personal advantage. In this game, The Reverse God and the others made a good first move, entering the enemy's army and taking advantage of the camp. Even if we rebel again, we will still be fighting for the corpses. At that time, their advantage will still be far superior to ours."

"So I'm thinking." Bai Liu smiled, "In order to dissolve their camp advantage, we can induce a third camp option."

Spades frowned: "The third camp, whose camp is it?"

Bai Liu replied: “Alex’s personal camp.”

At midnight.

Spades, who was lying defenselessly next to Bai Liu, held Bai Liu’s waist and slept deeply.

Bai Liu very gently moved away from Spades’ arms and legs, and crawled out of the bed to the outside of the camp.

He quietly walked into Alex’s tent. Alex was still sitting on the ground, looking exactly the same as before Bai Liu left, like he hadn’t changed his position for several hours.

Alex seemed to notice Bai Liu coming in, but he did not raise his head and just said in a hoarse voice: “The war will start in three hours. Don’t try to persuade me. Go back and have a good sleep.”

“You have joined the second commando team. In three hours, you and Guy will stand on the battlefield and fight each other.” Bai Liu turned on the dim lamp and looked down at Alex, “Do you want to see him one last time before you point a gun at each other?”

Alex slowly raised his head. A trace of hope overflowed from his originally dull eyes, but it was quickly extinguished: “Soldiers caught associating with the enemy before the start of a major battle will be tortured. Don’t risk it for me, Bai Liu.”

“But there is a place where your meeting is justified and you won’t be tortured.” Bai Liu smiled softly, “The neutral Red Cross Rescue Society, where wounded soldiers can seek help.”

Alex’s eyes suddenly lit up again: “But to go to the Red Cross, you need someone to guarantee admission. Do you know the people there?”

Bai Liu smiled: “Yes, I have someone I know who can guarantee your entry now.”

The Red Cross aid yard is brightly lit.

This borderless, neutral medical organization, whose main purpose was rescue, was stationed in camps on both sides, as well as at the warring border.

After Bai Liu reported his location to Liu Jiayi, Alex shot himself twice in the leg without hesitation.

Soon the Red Cross car stumbled in and took away Alex, who had an injury on his leg.

Bai Liu went up with the car. The people in the car were very friendly to Bai Liu and asked him with a smile: “Are you Jiayi’s brother? She thought you were injured and asked us to come quickly, so we rushed over. You guys look really alike.”

In the eyes of these people, the faces of the two Asians, Liu Jiayi and Bai Liu, were undoubtedly similar.

“Hey, your sister is such an outstanding little girl.” The people in the car seemed to have a particular liking for Liu Jiayi and rushed to talk to Bai Liu about her. “She is very good at treating people. We can’t believe that such a young child could be so skilled. Treating battle injuries and heavy bleeding, she can do things alone that more than a dozen adults couldn’t.”

“She saved dozens of people in just two days.”

“Have you considered sending her to a medical university after the war?” A group of people hinted at Bai Liu frantically, “I remember that after joining the war, you had a place to go to a top university, have you considered giving it to Jiayi??”

Bai Liu smiled and replied: “But she is only nine years old.”

This group of people retorted fiercely: “It has nothing to do with age. Jiayi is fully capable of going to a top university for further studies. She is a little genius!”

It seems that within two days, Liu Jiayi had completely increased the favorability of the NPCs in the Red Cross Society.

This made it extremely convenient for Bai Liu. They drove directly into the Red Cross camp. When Bai Liu jumped out of the back of the truck, he saw Liu Jiayi trotting towards him.

Liu Jiayi was wearing a nurse’s uniform that didn’t fit well, with a small nurse’s cap on her head, blood-stained white gloves on her hands, and a palm-sized Red Cross logo on her sleeves that fluttered as she ran.

She was trotting this way through the intertwined chains of stretchers with a serious look on her face, giving instructions as she ran.

The people here surprisingly listened to her words. As long as she said where to send it, the people carrying the stretcher would immediately send it to that place in the tent.

Liu Jiayi seems to be a very influential figure here.

When she ran up to Bai Liu, Bai Liu smiled and teased: “You’re doing well.”

Liu Jiayi took off her gloves angrily and threw them into the medical trash can: “Could you have delayed any more? You’re dragging out this camp game until just before the big battle with the intention of changing sides. I almost defected to your side with the entire Red Cross.”

“But you hadn’t given instructions yet, so I held my position.” Liu Jiayi shook the talcum powder from her hands and said seriously, “You didn’t contact me yesterday, so I knew you had other ideas about this game. As a neutral voluntary organization, the Red Cross can help you switch camps. Which side are you going to join now?”

Bai Liu smiled: “A third party.”

Liu Jiayi reacted very quickly: “You want to form your own party? With the main line NPCs and corpses as the core?”

Bai Liu nodded.

Liu Jiayi frowned and thought for a moment: “The corpses don’t need to be rescued, so the Red Cross will be useless to you. I want to get out of here as soon as possible.”

“Oh, by the way, the difficult part of this game is not the camps.” Liu Jiayi raised her head, “I think you also know, it’s the Killer Sequence players in a different camp than you.”

She was a little worried: “Even if The Reverse God and Spades seem to be targeting each other in this game, no matter which side they are, they aren’t something we can compete with now. After all, they are last year’s championship team, and their overall quality is too far off.”

“Essentially, the two camps that really determine the outcome of this game are Spades and The Reverse God. We are just a small addition.”

“I know.” Bai Liu smiled, “So I just need to make Spades and The Reverse God think that they and I are in the same camp, isn’t that enough?”

“That way no matter which side wins, I win.”

Liu Jiayi was startled. She quickly understood what Bai Liu wanted to do, and couldn’t help but “＝＝”: “Are you going to play double agent again?”

Bai Liu smiled and hummed.

Liu Jiayi frowned: “But Spades and The Reverse God are not slouches. How do you make the other party believe that you and them are in the same camp?”

Bai Liu lowered his eyes: “Of course, it’s my sincerity.”

Liu Jiayi: “…”

Don’t make bad jokes to me at this time!

“The Reverse God and the others, as well as the main NPC Guy, should be at the Red Cross now, right?” Bai Liu changed the topic.

Liu Jiayi nodded: “Well, because it was the eve of the war, The Reverse God and the others came to contact the Red Cross. I just triggered the main NPC Guy. He was injured and was sent here for treatment.”

Bai Liu looked at Liu Jiayi: “Did they recognize you as a player?”

“I was recognized…..” Liu Jiayi was confused, “But The Reverse God and the others generally have a good attitude towards me. They seem to regard me as an ordinary NPC with rescue functions, and they even traded points with me for antidotes twice.”

Liu Jiayi: “The NPCs here cannot be saved with antidotes, but players can. The Reverse God and the others took the initiative to buy antidotes from me, and I gave them to them.”

After thinking deeply, she replied: “They have no hostility toward us. Their purpose is very clear. They just want to win over spades.”

“To put it bluntly, they just want Spades to lose.” Bai Liu curled his lips, “We are quite consistent on this point.”

Liu Jiayi looked up at Bai Liu: “I feel like you have already figured out how to persuade The Reverse God. What about Spades? He doesn’t look like someone who is easy to persuade.”

“Spades’ side…” Bai Liu paused slightly strangely, “It’s taken care of. He completely believes that he and I are on the same camp.”

Liu Jiayi was shocked: “You guys had a fierce fight in the last dungeon, how did you convince him to believe in you wholeheartedly?!”

Bai Liu looked away imperceptibly: “I used some special means.”

Liu Jiayi walked around suspiciously and continued to face Bai Liu: “Why don’t you dare to look me in the face and say this? You never feel guilty when you do immoral things. What did you do to Spades that makes you feel so guilty?”

Bai Liu: “…”

Children who are too perceptive are really not a good thing for dirty adults.

When Bai Liu didn’t answer, Liu Jiayi raised her eyebrows: “I won’t force you to tell me, but I will always know.”

“But forget it now, the war is about to start, and there isn’t much time.” Liu Jiayi waved her hand, “I’ll take you to see The Reverse God and the others.”

Bai Liu followed Liu Jiayi and asked, “Isn’t it a bit too urgent for The Reverse God and the others to contact the Red Cross at this time?”

“You have the nerve to talk about others.” Liu Jiayi was speechless, “Aren’t you the same?”

Bai Liu: “I’m waiting for the key plot points.”

Liu Jiayi walked forward without looking back: “The same goes for them. People on the indigenous side don’t believe in the Red Cross people. They feel that the Red Cross and the other camp are on the same side, and have always refused our help. We are not allowed to help shelter their wives and children.”

“But the Red Cross was actually safer than the neutral indigenous village where they were hosting them.”

Bai Liu instantly understood: “But last night’s raid made the natives realize that neutral villages are not safe, so they began to consider the Red Cross. As rebels, The Reverse God and the others have no communication and understanding barriers with the people here. So they were sent over to communicate, right?”

“It’s not just that.” Liu Jiayi looked back at Bai Liu, “The Reverse God is more capable than you think. I don’t know what he did, but he is now the commander of the indigenous people, the top strategic officer. Today he came to the Red Cross to contact us, and he also came here as a commander to resettle harmless women and children.”

“In two days, from a rebel to a commander?” Bai Liu raised his eyebrows.

Liu Jiayi paused: “Yes.”

“Anyway, this guy gives me an uncomfortable feeling… He looks harmless and has a smiling face, but in fact he knows everything.”

“But if The Reverse God is the commander, it should be a very simple matter for him to come over to arrange for the placement of women and children. He shouldn’t stay here until the war, but return to the camp.” Bai Liu thought for a moment and asked, “What happened?”

“Yes.” Liu Jiayi said, “There are also factions among the indigenous people. Some of them are emerging indigenous people led by the new commander, The Reverse God. The indigenous people of this party are willing to accept many new things and hope to use the victory of the war as a basis for development and growth.”

“Most of the top leaders of this party had good relations with the factory director who was shot dead before, and received assistance and ideological enlightenment from him.”

“There are also some old indigenous people who are highly hostile to everything new. They believe in a religion preached by Arabs. I heard it is the religion of some evil god. They yearn for traditional farming life and reject all mechanical production tools. They feel as though it’s blasphemy against the hands God had given them to work with.”

Liu Jiayi turned to look at Bai Liu: “You’ve probably guessed that the leader of this indigenous party is the old commander, the one who shot and killed the factory director and started the war.”

“There are irreconcilable conflicts between the old and new parties.

Currently, the new party has the upper hand, but the old party is always unwilling to let the new party take power and causes all kinds of troubles."

"For example, today The Reverse God actually arranged for these women and children to be resettled a few hours ago, but a group of people from the old school suddenly came over and frantically stopped The Reverse God's actions, saying that The Reverse God was a traitor and an undercover agent. Not trying to protect these offspring and wives, but to sacrifice them to the enemy to obtain greater rewards."

Liu Jiayi led Bai Liu to a tent and raised her chin: "They are right here. They should still be arguing. Do you want me to go in with you?"

There was a faint quarrel in the tent.

Bai Liu shook his head.

Liu Jiayi nodded in understanding and threw a bottle of antidote to Bai Liu: "Your weapon was destroyed. If there is any movement, scream. I will guard outside."

After saying that, Liu Jiayi, who was wearing a nurse's uniform, took out a bottle of poison spray, hid it on the side of the tent, and gave an OK gesture to Bai Liu who was about to enter.

Bai Liu returned an OK gesture, then opened the curtain and walked in calmly.

Both parties who were arguing went silent. The one standing on the left was The Reverse God and his group, and the one on the right was a group wearing eagle feather hats, animal skins on their shoulders and backs, and oil paint on their faces. The faces of this group were fierce. Their exposed teeth were slightly sharp, probably because they had the habit of tearing large pieces of meat.

When they saw Bai Liu come in, this group of traditional natives were about to bear their teeth at Bai Liu, but they were stopped by the leader. He stared at Bai Liu for a long time and said in a very strange tone: "He is the one who is favored by the true God. Don't offend him."

Then he saluted Bai Liu, bowed and withdrew politely.

The emotion in Bai Liu's eyes was unclear, but he quickly restrained himself. He looked at The Reverse God: "It seems that I have disturbed your conversation."

"No, no, no, you saved me." The Reverse God rubbed his forehead, sat tiredly on the chair and breathed a long sigh of relief. He looked at Bai Liu with a smile and stretched out his hand, "I have been arguing with them for two hours. Once you came, they were willing to take a break and let me go for now."

Bai Liu lowered his eyes, extended his hand and shook The Reverse God's hand: "First time meeting you, Bai Liu."

The Reverse God smiled: "The tactician of the Killer Sequence. Just call me The Reverse God."

The Reverse God gestured for Bai Liu to take a seat: "You have something to talk to me about, right?"

Bai Liu sat down, raised his eyes and smiled: "Yes, I want to talk to you about how to make Spades lose this game."

The Reverse God, who had been slumped in the chair, slowly sat upright. He waved his hand, and the people behind him immediately withdrew. Only three other members of the Killer Sequence, Bai Liu and The Reverse God who were sitting on the chairs were left in the tent.

Bai Liu said calmly: "I have a way to make Spades lose to you miserably in this game."

The Reverse God and the three members of the Killer Sequence stared at Bai Liu with very surprised eyes. After a while, The Reverse God asked expectantly: "Tell me more specifically."

"I can lure Spades to a certain place on the battlefield and cooperate with you to attack him from both front and back. He trusts me more and won't be too wary of me, so the success rate of this plan is relatively high…" Bai Liu related.

"Stop." Standing behind The Reverse God, a young man who looked to be no more than seventeen or eighteen years old raised his hand and made a "stop" gesture. Then he looked at Bai Liu and asked sternly, "Spades will not listen to anything at all. If so, there will be problems with your plan from the beginning."

The Reverse God turned around and hit the young man as if he was angry: “Why are you talking to other players like this? Don’t you know how to be polite? Introduce yourself first.”

The young man paused stiffly: “Member of the Killer Sequence Team, control position, Bai Jiamu.”

The Reverse God raised his hand and apologized sheepishly: “I’m sorry, go on.”

Bai Jiamu interrupted Nishen’s words simply: “But there is no way he can control Spades. Spades doesn’t even care about us…”

“It may not be possible to reach the level of control.” Bai Liu raised his head with a smile, “But influencing him at this level should be fine.”

The Reverse God first apologized for his team members but changed the topic and asked with a smile: “Mr Bai Liu, you said that Spades would trust you. Is there any objective basis worthy of reference?”

Bai Liu said calmly: “Oh, that’s right, I married him yesterday.”

The Reverse God: “…”

Bai Jiamu: “…”

Other Killer Sequence members: “…”

The Reverse God fell silent for nearly a minute. He raised a hand, rubbed his stiff face, and forced a smile. “Mr. Bai Liu, you must be joking…”

Bai Liu interrupted him without hesitation. “You have a lie detector scale, don’t you? Take it out and try it.”

The Reverse God: “…”

Bai Liu’s unwavering confidence made several members of the Killer Sequence—who had initially dismissed the claim—begin to waver. They exchanged uneasy glances until, at last, Bai Jiamu reached for the scale.

Fixing Bai Liu with a steady gaze, Bai Jiamu asked, “Did you marry Spades yesterday?”

Bai Liu smiled without a flicker of change in his expression. “Yes.”

The scale slowly tilted toward [True].

The room fell into a long, stunned silence. Bai Jiamu, gripping the scale, looked as if his entire worldview had just cracked.

The Reverse God exhaled deeply and raised a hand to cover his face, as though shielding himself from the reality before him. When he finally lowered it, he looked like he had aged ten years.

His voice was hoarse. “Did Spades… force you?”

Bai Liu was silent for a long moment before replying, “You could say that.”

The scale tipped toward [True] again.

Bai Jiamu stared at the scale as if he wanted to strangle it.

The Reverse God rubbed his temples and, after a long pause, bowed slightly in an apology. “I’m sorry. Our team’s main attacker, Spades, seems to have caused trouble for you, Mr. Bai Liu.”

“He… he probably doesn’t understand marriage. He might think it’s some kind of game. I doubt he meant to—”

Bai Liu kindly interrupted, “He forcibly went through eighteen boxes of condoms and made me keep seven of them.”

The scale tipped once again toward [True].

Bai Jiamu remained frozen, his expression utterly blank as he held the scale in rigid disbelief.

A team member, who had been clamping a hand over his own mouth to stop himself from speaking, finally lost control and gasped loudly. “Eighteen boxes?! That’s insane!”

The Reverse God turned and smacked him on the head. Then, after taking a deep breath and adjusting his increasingly strained expression, he muttered to the other team members in hushed tones:

“What do we do? We never gave Spades any sex ed, and now look where we are. He forced someone!”

“I told you we should’ve taught him! He doesn’t know anything—he could’ve been tricked by some bad woman!”

“But back then, we saw how he looked at Hearts and thought there was no way he’d be deceived by a woman! He’s met Hearts over a dozen times and still mistakes her for someone else every time.”

“Bai Jiamu never let me show Spades the movie! This is Bai Jiamu’s fault!”

“As if that would’ve helped. This guy’s a man. Your collection of hetero films wouldn’t have taught Spades a damn thing.”

“The real issue here is—what’s our next move? Spades forced someone, and now that someone has shown up at our doorstep.”

“Are we… responsible for this?”

“Well, if one of our own screws around with an outsider and the outsider comes knocking, isn’t there a standard procedure for handling it?”

“Oh, oh, I know this one!”

The Reverse God straightened, crossed his arms over his knees, and regarded Bai Liu with an unreadable gaze. Then, in a solemn tone, he said, “Mr. Bai Liu, I will give you five million points to leave Spades.”

Bai Liu: "…"

A brief silence.

Then, without missing a beat, Bai Liu responded cheerfully, "Transfer the five million to me now, and I promise not to harass Spades or bother you about this marriage ever again."

The Reverse God and Bai Jiamu both froze—this was not the reaction they'd expected.

——Shouldn't he be outraged? Insulted? Demanding to know if they thought his dignity could be bought?

But Bai Liu, utterly unbothered by the notion of accepting five million points, smiled in satisfaction. "That said, the real reason I came here is because I'd like to work with you on something."

His expression sharpened. "I want to teach Spades a painful lesson in failure. I believe that's something you'd be interested in as well."

At that, The Reverse God finally sat up straight, his demeanor turning serious. "What exactly do you have in mind?"

Meanwhile, at the other end.

Alex sat silently in the wheelchair, his legs had been bandaged, and now he was sitting quietly by Guy's bed, staring wordlessly at the unconscious man on the hospital bed, breathing weakly.

A nurse nearby reminded him: "He was seriously injured. Thirteen shrapnel fragments were just removed from his body. The anesthesia has not worn off yet and he is still sleeping. If you want to talk to him, you have to wait for a while."

Alex shook his head gently: "No need for him to wake up."

"Can I be alone with him for a moment?" Alex looked up at the nurse.

The nurse smiled understandingly: "Of course, I will change the dressing in an hour. Is this enough time?"

Alex nodded: "Thank you."

The nurse waved her hand to indicate that he was welcome. She opened the curtain and turned to leave.

Alex and Guy were the only two people left in the tent. Alex sat quietly by the bed for a while, and after a long time, he moved his wheelchair to the head of the bed.

He reached out and lifted up the white quilt, and Alex saw Guy's left hand placed by his side. The silver ring on his ring finger was shining and untouched by any stains.

Alex stretched out his left hand with the ring on it, as if he wanted to hold Guy's left hand, but in the end he just hovered it tremblingly and did not put it down for a long time.

Something invisible prevented Alex from tightening his grip on Guy's hand, even though he had done this action a thousand times.

Alex took a deep breath, turned his face away, took back his hand, and spoke to himself: "… Guy, I know you have never been on my side; your heart belongs to the other side."

"——Belongs to the side of justice and the weak indigenous people. You told me a long time ago that you would prefer to be a volunteer in their army." Alex smiled miserably and shook his head, "Even though the person you love most was killed by the indigenous, that still didn't change your opinion."

"You, your lover, you are both of the noble class, you are both kind-hearted people, and you are both here to help these backward natives escape the control of the aristocrats."

"Your ideals, pursuits, origins, and even your nobility are so similar."

Alex murmured to himself: "If he hadn't died, you would have been a perfect match."

"It's not my turn to get you, a poor boy who asked you to carry me back when I went to the battlefield for the first time."

Alex lowered his head, put his hand on the quilt, and gently shook Guy's hand under the quilt: "But I love you just as much as he does, Guy."

His eyes gradually filled with tears: "…I know that before the accident, he proposed to you, you never told me, but I know, Guy, you can't hide your words when you are drunk. Guy, you told me everything."

"But you didn't say yes to him because you felt he deserved someone better, not someone like you."

Alex's tears slowly slid down the bridge of his nose, and his voice choked up: "——So that day, after he failed to propose to you, he didn't want to go back. So he went to check the safety equipment of the factory in a low mood, and happened to meet those who were working there. The natives arguing in front of the factory."

"He died in that dispute with the ring he proposed to you in his hand."

"His parents and brothers went crazy. They rushed over and beat and insulted you, the guy who brought their son and brother to hell. They even locked you up in the factory, trying to burn you with the natives they thought had killed him."

"You escaped with the help of the imprisoned indigenous people. They knew that you were the lover of the factory director, so they tried their best to help you escape first. But when you wanted to turn around and help the indigenous people, you were discovered by the security patrol."

"You were forcibly pulled away by the patrol and watched helplessly as the natives who helped you were burned to death."

Alex lowered his head and leaned against the edge of the hospital bed, sobbing: "I know why you betrayed us, Guy, you were tormented by the fire at that time and kept blaming yourself for your cowardice, you were blaming yourself for your escape. So you chose to marry me before the war – you didn't want to leave me with another regretful ending."

"But Guy, it's not supposed to be like this… you don't deserve to die, and neither do they."

Alex's low and mournful voice echoed in the small tent. A line of gloomy-looking natives stood outside the tent. They leaned against the tent to eavesdrop, and then talked to each other in a nasally slang with a distinct look of hatred on their faces.

"The man inside named Guy, who just came to join us today, is the one responsible for the death of his fellow workers in the factory in the first place!"

“He watched as his companions who rescued him burned to death!”

“What kind of relationship does he have with that factory director! He and that factory director are both people abandoned by God! They both deserve to die!”

“He, like the factory director, is a hypocrite who wants to invade our territory and make us slaves under the guise of helping us!”

“Without their presence, we wouldn’t be in such harm’s way.”

“Kill him, this man abandoned by God, and God’s blessing will return to us!”

A kind of fanatical and violent impulse soon spread among this group of traditional natives. Before the group of natives were about to lift the curtain and rush in to kill Guy, Bai Liu reached the edge of the tent first.

Behind Bai Liu was The Reverse God, and to his right was Liu Jiayi who looked tense.

Bai Liu looked at the eavesdropping natives with interest and asked in a friendly manner: “What’s the matter?”

This group of traditional indigenous people seemed to be afraid of Bai Liu. As soon as they saw Bai Liu appear, they lowered their heads, saluted and retreated. However, during the process of retreating, these indigenous people continued to glance at the tent in front of them with a sinister look.

Bai Liu’s ambiguous gaze swept past these aborigines, then he turned around and smiled at them. He nodded goodbye to The Reverse God, and led Liu Jiayi into the tent where Alex was.

After Alex cried bitterly, he rested his head on Guy’s bed and fell asleep. Guy seemed to be waking up, and his sleep was not very peaceful. He frowned and murmured in his sleep: “…Alex. “

Bai Liu introduced the relationship between the NPCs to Liu Jiayi: “Alex, another mainline NPC, and Guy, his marriage partner.”

Liu Jiayi crossed her arms in front of her chest, tilted her head to scrutinise Bai Liu from top to bottom, then raised her eyebrows and asked, “I’m more curious about you and your marriage partner now, eighteen boxes of condoms?”

Bai Liu: “…”

Bai Liu coughed calmly: “Condom is the name of a special kind of balloon. The use of eighteen boxes means that he blew up eighteen boxes of balloons for me.”

“Oh.” Liu Jiayi slowly jumped to the edge of the bed and sat down, her calves dangling, “Do you think I haven’t received any serious lessons on physiological knowledge?”

Liu Jiayi smiled very cutely: “The first lesson Hearts taught me was about sexual knowledge between any two human biological genders. It was mainly to help me avoid some dogs in this game who had special desires for me.”

“Oh, this sexual knowledge sometimes includes some non-human monsters with strong sexual abilities.” Liu Jiayi added with a sweet smile, “After all, people are free to have their own preferences, such as using eighteen boxes of condoms in one night, don’t you think so, Bai Liu?”

Bai Liu: “…”

Hearts, is this the right thing for you to do?

The Dense Forest Borderlands

It's not a good idea to play the bullshit game with a player with 91 intelligence.

Bai Liu paused for less than three seconds before choosing to tell Liu Jiayi the truth about what had happened.

Liu Jiayi: "…"

Liu Jiayi sneered. As a subordinate team member who had seen Hearts liking Spades and suffered deeply from it, she was keenly aware that something was wrong with Bai Liu: "So you just married him so easily? This is not your normal approach. Do you have any thoughts about Spades…"

Bai Liu calmly interrupted Liu Jiayi's words and changed the topic: "The war will start in less than three hours. This is an important plot point. I have already made arrangements with The Reverse God. Tang Erda, who has been demoted to the second assault team, will join him during the battle and try to minimize the casualties on The Reverse God's side."

"On your side, I need you to heal Guy as soon as possible so he can go to the battlefield."

Liu Jiayi stared at Bai Liu for a while, and then mercifully chose to follow his words and skip the topic.

She nodded to express her understanding: "Because he is the main line NPC, he can't be missing key plot points, otherwise there will be problems in progressing the plot. I will find a way to wake him up and maintain his basic mobility."

Bai Liu looked at Alex who was leaning on the bed: "I will take Alex back, and then both sides will fire wildly. You should also pay attention to your own safety here at the Red Cross."

"The Red Cross is not a completely neutral and safe place in the eyes of those who don't follow the rules." Bai Liu reminded lightly, "In an extreme dispute, unless there is a long geographical isolation, there is no such thing as a completely neutral place, and any area may be involved."
Liu Jiayi frowned: "Are you talking about the natives who were preparing to attack Guy at the Red Cross just now?"

Bai Liu shook his head: “Not entirely.”

He looked at Liu Jiayi calmly: “I mean all the people who took sides in this war.”

The night was dark.

In the damp and dark jungle, the armored vehicles in the front lined up to flatten the roads and plants, making it easier for the tracked tanks behind them to advance forward.

The dismantled parts of dozens of heavy artillery lay heavily on the tow hooks on the backs of these armored vehicles as they were pulled along for transport, muzzles looming eerily.

The soldiers moved forward silently and orderly with military shovels, occasionally clearing away some branches and leaves that were wrapped around the tires.

The jungle ground after heavy rain felt indescribably sticky to the feet, so the marching speed was not very fast. However, thanks to the year and a half of war experience, everyone was already accustomed to walking in the rainforest with such terrain, and there were no major changes.

Tang Erda was wearing a steel helmet, holding an assigned gun and standing guard next to the leading armored vehicle. He controlled his gaze and did not look at Spades beside him who had been staring at him expressionlessly for a long time.

This man had been staring at him with a look like “You must be hiding something from me”, but Tang Erda was very patient and didn’t say anything to him.

Spades didn’t ask anything, just looked at him silently. From time to time, Spades would hold up the gun and adjust it, with the muzzle pointed at him.

Tang Erda: “…”

Wasn’t Spades from the cleaning team? Why were you promoted to the second commando team?

The reason why Spades suddenly became a member of the second commando team couldn’t be explained clearly until you went back to earlier that morning.

Due to the sudden mixed orders from the commander, the Second Assault Team was still in chaos and low in numbers when the marching team assembled before departure.

When the members of the first commando team came to get Alex, who had signed up for the second commando team, he was not found in his tent.

Deserters were punished severely by law, but looking at the corpses of comrades from the Assault Team carried back to a tent by Alex, these people really couldn't bear to report Alex's escape.

Alex experienced two major changes overnight. Regardless of his mood, he was probably injured. Even if he managed to get up at this time, he probably wouldn't be able to fight anymore.

In desperation, they dragged away the only person nearby, Spades, who sat motionless looking at the empty bed on the other side.

Originally, Spades was not very obedient, these people were bluffing him with nonsense. Someone said that Bai Liu was also going. Spades paused, glanced at the person who said this, and followed him very cooperatively.

But when Spades arrived, Bai Liu wasn't there at all.

After Spades searched around, he stared at the soldier who said Bai Liu was here. There was no expression on his face and his tone was very calm, but he looked inexplicably ominous: "Bai Liu is not here."

The soldier was frightened and said, "Why don't you ask Tang Erda? He has a good relationship with Bai Liu. If Bai Liu comes here, he will definitely know where Bai Liu is."

So Spades stared at Tang Erda all the way, and Tang Erda felt that his back was about to be stared through.

But because Spades didn't know what was at stake, and kept his lips tightly pursed without speaking, Tang Erda didn't know why he was being targeted – he really couldn't figure out the brain of the league's number one player.

It wasn't until a break in the march that Tang Erda glanced at Spades who was sitting next to him with his head down eating a cake. He deliberated for a long time before tentatively speaking: "…Bai Liu isn't with you??"

Spades replied instantly: “You spoke first, you lost.”

Tang Erda’s head was full of questions: “…?!? What?”

Spades glanced at Tang Erda coldly: “You were competing with me just now to see who would speak first. If you spoke first, you lost.”

Tang Erda: “…”

He really wanted to hold his breath and wait for Spades to speak first so that he could make the first move. How come this person turned it into a big competition where whoever spoke first would lose?!

Tang Erda couldn’t understand, but he still managed to keep calm and decided to follow this person’s words: “I lose. Why didn’t Bai Liu go with you…”

Spades interrupted him again and emphasized: “You just lost.”

Tang Erda: “…”

Tang Erda touched his face and took a deep breath: “Okay, I lost. Where is Bai Liu?”

Spades held the gun leaning on his shoulder, with one eye exposed from the edge of the gun barrel, staring directly at Tang Erda: “Someone told me that he ran away with you while I was sleeping last night. “

The soldiers nearby who were eavesdropping on the gossip gasped in shock.

Tang Erda: “…”

How on earth did you come to this conclusion!!

Tang Erda held his forehead helplessly: “Bai Liu didn’t run away with me. I have been training since last night and haven’t seen him.”

Spades lowered his eyes, held the gun and said, “Then Bai Liu must have run away with Alex. He has been paying close attention to Alex since Guy’s accident.”

“He seems to like to pay attention to the fighting power of the person who just died.” Spades said calmly, “He also hugged Alex. Alex completely accepted Bai Liu’s comfort and betrayed his camp with him then ran.”

Tang Erda who somehow felt connoted: "…"

The soldier who was drinking water next to him choked in horror – aren't Alex and Guy a couple?

I didn't expect that Bai Liu, a young man who looked very ordinary on the outside, was so heavy-handed behind their backs, and actually liked widowed husbands!

Is this the special hobby of traditional Eastern emperors?

After a short rest, the entire team began to move forward again. The soil became increasingly slippery, and the ground became denser with puddles. There were also some small, unformed rivers and waterlogged riverbeds.

The heavy armor and tanks could no longer move forward, so they decided to stay where they were. The soldiers filled in the nearby riverbed, while the members of the Second Assault Team continued to move forward.

"The rough plan is that we arrive near Pluto Lake, first ambush and clear the ships and fire points on the lake to prevent them from spreading to the surrounding rainforest in ships to reserve combat power, attack from behind, and then attack with artillery fire here."

As Tang Erda walked, he explained to Spades next to him: "Their heavy forces are not as strong as this side, and this time the commander spent a lot of money – thousands of artillery pieces, more than 200,000 artillery shells to be fired before ten o'clock in the morning to beat them all."

"This rainforest will be blown into ruins and burned to a crisp." Tang Erda tasted a bit of blood in the air, and his expression was cold, "All the resources have been polluted and destroyed. He has no intention of letting the surrounding residents still survive here relying on the rain forest, and the subsequent consumption will kill the opponent."

Although it was just a game, Tang Erda instinctively didn't like this direction. It reminded him of some bad things that had happened in the past.

Tang Erda couldn't help but commented sarcastically: "Originally, the war was launched to compete for the resources here, but in the end, they would rather destroy it than let the original natives here continue to enjoy it."

This way of carelessly destroying things he couldn't get reminded Tang Erda of a very familiar person – Bai Six.

In the early days, this guy was still doing things for profit, but in the later stages, it seemed that he had gained too much profit. After his endless, black hole-like desire for money was satisfied, a boredom similar to laziness overflowed.

Bai Six began to indulge in new pastimes and entertainment. He began to like exciting games that put his life on the line, chasing victory, and collecting people's soul banknotes – money in another sense.

But then there came a point where victory could not satisfy him.

Bai Six began to be willing to expose his flaws, create opponents for himself, and even intentionally or unintentionally made the people in his hands lose control—— — and then get rid of them.

Tang Erda was a qualified toy who was not tired of being played with by Bai Six in more than three hundred world lines. He understood very well how evil this person was.

Mu Sicheng, Liu Jiayi, Joker, and even Mu Ke. In the later world lines, Bai Six would kill one or two of his own men in almost every world line on the grounds that they betrayed him or lost control. They were no longer completely subservient to him.

But for people like Bai Six, it doesn't depend on the other party whether they will betray him or not.

It depends on whether Bai Six is willing to give these people a chance to betray him.

Bai Six is the only believer recognized by the evil god. If this person had bones, a heart, and any structure similar to humans, they would be rotten and black when dug out, exuding the disgusting smell of money.

This war and the entire process really looked like Bai Six's handiwork.

The conflict between the two sides should not have broken out so early.

If it hadn't been for the death of the factory director, this dispute that killed so many people might have been resolved more gently under the leadership of that factory director, especially since the factory director had already achieved a lot.

But it was such a coincidence that this key figure died tragically, all conflicts were rolled into a bigger knot, and all possibilities for peaceful development were cut off.

Tang Erda's mood fluctuated for a moment, then stabilized. They came to the lake, put on their diving suits and sank down.

Before entering the water, an experienced veteran reminded: "Be careful, there may be a lot of giant pythons in the lake here. The traditional indigenous people here believe in a terrible evil sect and like to keep reptiles."

"It is said that the factory director was also killed by these traditional indigenous people according to the instructions of the evil god."

Tang Erda's pupils shrank, and he suddenly took a step forward and grabbed the soldier: "How do you think that factory director died?"

The soldier was frightened, but he still responded to Tang Erda's words: "—I heard that it was the evil god these natives believed in who sent down the oracle."

"——To execute the factory manager in a brutal manner."

The Dense Forest Borderlands

Inside the Red Cross

Guy, who was lying on the hospital bed, slowly opened his eyes. He raised his arms and leaned against the head of the bed, lowered his head and shook his intact hands in surprise.

His injuries miraculously healed overnight.

Guy looked up and was even more surprised when he saw Bai Liu standing beside his bed: “Why are you here?”

“Maybe you should say thank you to me first?” Bai Liu pointed to Guy’s healing wounds with a smile, “I stole Alex’s potion to treat you. Although it is only for external use, it seems to have a good effect.”

Guy looked at the craters on his hands that didn’t even have scars, and looked proud and nostalgic: “Yes, he is a very good young man.”

“Alex doesn’t want you to be cured at all, but I’m sure you have your own resolutions.” Bai Liu sat on the bedside and looked up at Guy, “Remember what I told you the night before the wedding?”

Guy hummed softly. He fell into some deep thoughts and whispered: “You said that because God doesn’t want us to be happy, he created war.”

“Because if we live too happily, we don’t need the existence of God.”

Guy raised his head and looked directly at Bai Liu resolutely: “It was your words that made me determined to rebel.”
“I want to join the indigenous people and destroy their faith in God.”

Bai Liu raised the corners of his lips imperceptibly, and he lowered his eyes: “Really?”

——Just as he thought.

A big battle is coming next, and Alex’s third party camp is forming.

Alex left alone when Guy was about to wake up. He didn’t let Bai Liu tell Guy that he had been there. He just stayed outside Guy’s tent, sitting in a wheelchair and looking around in a daze.

The stretchers of wounded soldiers from this side and the enemy were anxiously passing back and forth. The blood dripping on the ground pulled out red lines, criss-crossing around him and arranging into an invisible net, with the centre as him and Guy, who was behind him.

Bai Liu opened the tent and came out. He squinted at Alex in the wheelchair: “Do you feel like nothing can be done to stop this?”

Alex was silent for a long time, then hummed hoarsely: “The natives said before that all this was God’s will. Guy and I laughed for a long time, but now that I think about it…”

“… Perhaps everything that God has created can only be stopped by God.”

Bai Liu lowered his eyes: “Maybe.”

Alex paused for a while and suddenly said: “I have thought about using the medicine I tested on these people to prolong their lives, hoping that they can survive.”

“But I found that no matter how long it was, they would still die. But they would be able to move after death, becoming a moving, attacking corpse.”

Alex’s eyelashes trembled slightly: “The corpse has no memory, no emotions, and no soul, but it can move, hug, and kill. I’m scared. I feel like I have created a terrible monster of war so I dared not tell anyone.”

“Except Guy.”

Alex chuckled in a daze, tears falling from his eyelashes:

“He said that he doesn’t think such things are terrible. If one day, he turns into such a monster, he won’t feel sad, because then he can hug me tightly after death.”

“War will turn this moving corpse into a weapon, but people in love will use this weapon to embrace each other.”

Alex turned to look at Bai Liu. His expression was blank, as if he was asking Bai Liu, as if he was asking himself: “——Should I use this medicine?”

Bai Liu held the back of his wheelchair and looked down at him calmly: “Don’t you already have the answer?”

Alex clenched the potion bottle in his hand, lowered his head, and said to himself: “If…I won’t use it.”

“There are too few people in love in this world, and medicine can only become a weapon to break them up.”

Bai Liu glanced sideways at the tent and said softly: “Sometimes what breaks up people who love each other may not be external things, but that one of them has chosen a different path than you.”

“And you can’t stop him.”

Alex smiled bitterly: “Yes, Bai Liu, why did you have to tell me the real reason why Guy and I separated?”

“You are really… rational and cruel. You have to watch your lover go on the road of self-destruction. Bai Liu, you don’t understand the pain of it.”

Bai Liu lowered his eyes, “Maybe.”

He said, pushing Alex’s wheelchair outside.

After recovering, Guy quietly slipped out from behind the tent. He looked back at the front of the tent from a distance. There was nothing in front of the tent, only two wheelchair tracks left on the ground.

It was as if the Alex’s voice he vaguely heard was a hallucination caused by missing him too much.

Guy paused for a moment then left without looking back.

The morning light was faint.

The water in the central lake was dotted with fusiform wooden boats, with five to ten indigenous soldiers stood on each boat. Under the dark green water, a group of assault soldiers approached silently with mines.

At exactly 6:25 in the morning, all the lurking soldiers set their watches to the same time before entering the water. The bombing of the war was first launched from under the water.

After a group of people capsized, the assault team retreated quickly and began to lay down other mines in an orderly manner along the channel where the current lead, preventing the group of indigenous soldiers in the central lake from attacking along the channel.

It was a perfect raid until the heavy rain came.

The artillerymen behind were loading bombs in the rain forest under heavy rain. Almost all of the tens of thousands of bombs in the first batch that could have caused huge turmoil were driven into mud pits by heavy rain before they hit the target, not producing the desired effect.

As the water level in the lakes and rivers previously blocked by water mines rose rapidly, the impact instantly became smaller. Countless natives rushed out in boats. As the heavy rain became more intense, the war became a stalemate.

Tang Erda's whole body looked like he had been fished out of muddy water. Half of his face was covered in mud. He touched his face, and was about to shake the gun that was half a kilogram heavy with mud out of his hand. He was not using it smoothly. He was about to lose it and replace it with a skill weapon but suddenly, Spades next to him thrusted his gun barrel over, stopping Tang Erda's attempt to throw the gun away.

Tang Erda turned around and asked in confusion: "What are you doing?"

Spades' clothes were all soaked in muddy water, and his face was stained with mud, which made the exposed skin look shockingly white: "You and Bai Liu are in the same group, right?"

Tang Erda nodded hesitantly.

Spades' eyes had a faint light in the pouring rain: "Don't use skill weapons, hold the gun, let's go back to the lake."

"I found the point where the bodies were stockpiled."

Meanwhile, at the other end.

The men from the Killer Sequence were sitting on a rocking boat on the lake.

Amidst the noise caused by the heavy rain, thunder and lightning, The Reverse God almost screamed: "Have you found were the corpses are stored?"

Bai Jiamu wiped away the raindrops dripping from his chin and shook his head: “We have searched all over the land, and no obvious storage points have been triggered.”

Usually this kind of scoring task is divided into two parts. The first is to find the correct scoring object, such as a moving corpse. The second is to find the scoring location. The corpse must be placed in a designated location before the points are officially counted for that player.

“There’s something wrong with the corpses. They’re not ordinary corpses as we thought.” The Reverse God wore a steel helmet and sat cross-legged on the boat rocking back and forth like a contractor, with the rain falling on his head. The rain on his head was flowing down stubbornly, as if a small waterfall was hanging in front of him. “We didn’t find the correct points object, and there was no way to use the points object to trigger the point location.”

The Reverse God touched his face and took a deep breath: “Spades’ intuition is still accurate. The points object corpse should be produced on the enemy’s side.”

“We are not in the same camp as Spades, so we can only find another way and wait for the mainline NPCs to defect and come over to produce points corpses for us.”

Bai Jiamu shouted loudly: “Judge, when do you think the main line NPCs will rebel?”

The Reverse God’s eyes were deep: “Soon, we already have a mainline NPC here. According to Bai Liu’s plan and the relationship between the two mainline NPCs, it should be after this battle.”

After saying that, The Reverse God stood up, and the water on the helmet slid down the brim of the helmet to wash his face.

The Reverse God: “…”

Why is this helmet so rotten and leaking?

Bai Jiamu couldn’t help but pull The Reverse God: “I don’t understand why we have to cooperate with Bai Liu. According to your arrangement, the main line NPC will also rebel. There is no need to cooperate with him.”

The Reverse God took off his hat and turned to look at Bai Jiamu.

That look was gentle, but Bai Jiamu didn't know what was going on. He felt like he had offended the majesty of his elders.

Bai Jiamu quickly let go of The Reverse God's hand, looking a little nervous like a child who realised that he had made a mistake: "…You are a tactician, shouldn't I ask?"

The Reverse God shook his hat and put on the rotten steel helmet again. He looked at Bai Jiamu and smiled, not angry: "I activated a prophecy skill after I came in."

This time, not only Bai Jiamu, but also the other two members of the Killer Sequence were shocked and looked over.

Although The Reverse God is rated as the best tactician in the league, it's not because of his prophecy skills, but because of his intelligence value.

The intelligence value of The Reverse God was 96 points.

In almost every game, this person can win with minimal casualties. Ever since the Deer Hunter had The Reverse God, the members of the team did not change until after The Reverse God left. They all followed The Reverse God.

After participating in so many league games, without a death-free gold medal, and under the guidance of the tactician The Reverse God, all members survived until The Reverse God left.

He is a well-known tactician who likes to play stalling battles. Compared with various other extreme tacticians, his methods can be said to be quite mild.

But after The Reverse God left, one member of the Deer Hunter team died quickly.

The Reverse God sat in the Killer Sequence's office all night that day, looking at photos of old team members without saying a word. The Killer Sequence was full of tough members, but no one dared to disturb him at that time.

They are still afraid of going against The Judge Against the Gods.

The Reverse God seems to be easy to get along with and rarely gets angry, but in fact his temper and behaviour are quite weird. Sometimes he smiles and looks very perceptive, and it's impossible to figure out what he's thinking.

Because as a player, The Reverse God rarely uses his own skills. But his skill is a prophecy skill that pushes the rules of the game, which seems very unreasonable.

Skills that can be used to push the games permissions are all great weapons, such as Heart's imitating playing cards and Bai Liu's old trading wallet. No player would think that they could live a long life by hiding them and not using them.

But The Reverse God just didn't use it. There were very few times when he used prophecy skills. At least, there were only two times that Bai Jiamu could remember.

Once, The Reverse God gave a prophecy to Spades, but no one knew the content of that prophecy.

And this time, for a new player who they had just met for the first time. It was really bizarre. If he had used a prophecy skill this time—

Then something truly terrifying was coming.

Bai Jiamu blurted out: “Why did you suddenly read Bai Liu’s fortune?!”

“What fortune-telling!” The Reverse God retorted, seemingly angry, “My skill is called [Listening to God’s Words], and it’s different from fortune-telling, okay?”

“It’s all the same.” A teammate from Killer Sequence next to him leaned over with interest, “What did you figure out?”

The Reverse God’s gaze paused, and he smiled: “I have calculated the birth of a new god.”

Bai Jiamu quickly thought of the group of indigenous people who like to raise snakes, and their strange attitude towards Bai Liu. He frowned: “Are you saying that Bai Liu will become the new god of these indigenous believers in this dungeon?”

The Reverse God turned around, and there was no emotion in his voice: “Sort of.”

“However, the origins of gods are the same. Bai Liu can be selected here, which proves that he has been selected in all copies. That’s why he keeps encountering old gods… god level NPCs.”

The Reverse God was quiet for a moment: “The evil god chose Bai Liu as his next successor. He is inducing Bai Liu to kill the god-level NPC.”

Bai Jiamu frowned when he heard this: “What do you mean?”

The Reverse God turned around and smiled again: “I don’t really understand, I just saw some things that the gods were talking about. This is what the prophecy is.”
“Even I, a prophet, sometimes don’t know whether the things I predict are true, or whether the gods deliberately sent these words to lead me astray.”

The more Bai Jiamu listened, the more confused he became. His brows were almost knotted: “You mean God lies?”

The Reverse God shook his head: “As you know, my skill identity is similar to that of a judge in religion, and my skill is to accept God’s oracle about the future and use this prophetic oracle to judge everyone."

"The oracle is absolutely true and God can indeed see everything that will happen to everyone in the future."

Bai Jiamu became more and more confused as he listened: "Then why…"

The Reverse God lowered his eyes slightly, as if he was deep in thought, and suddenly changed the subject when he spoke again, "Do you know how to deceive someone perfectly without lying?"

Bai Jiamu was startled: "How?"

The Reverse God raised his eyes and looked at Bai Jiamu, with a very strange smile on his face: "That is to only tell him a few words about the truth."

"Oracles are the most perfect manifestation of this deception."

The rain was getting heavier and heavier, and the strange smell of campfires came from the dense jungle.

In the center of the indigenous territory farther from the lake, stood a shed made of rolled broad leaves and grass roots. Under the shed was a two-person-high wooden statue of a God. The statue's eyebrows and forehead were painted with a unique grassy oil-based red paint.

There were six piles of torches placed around the statue. In such torrential weather, not only did the flames not go out, but it mysteriously burned higher and higher when blown by the wind.

The natives, whose bodies were covered with red paint, danced in a strange pattern around the statue and the six torches, beating their knees and humming an unknown eerie tune.

Kneeling in front of the statue was a man lying on his hands and knees in the mud. This man was the traditional indigenous leader. He put his hands up and humbly buried his head in the mud. He let the heavy rain drench his body and kept praying.

"O God, you gave us vast land and abundant rain. You foreshadowed enemies and crises to us in advance. You gave us Pluto, the death-like lake, as a harbor for defense. When the enemy sneak-attacked us with sinful artillery, at that time, rain and dew fell to help us fight back."

“Victory will be ours, for God has foretold it all.”

“You once sent an oracle to tell us that the only way to get rid of those evil strangers who have occupied our land and enslaved our bodies was to kill the factory director.”

The man kneeling on the ground slowly raised his head, as if he was afraid of offending the wooden sculpture. He raised his neck and looked at the statue with feverish eyes:

“You and I have the same opinion. The factory director was indeed a despicable and shameless foreigner, using his hypocritical appearance to confuse us!”

“We have regained our freedom under your oracle’s instructions. The next step is to win this war. God, please tell us, tell your weak and devout believers, what should we do?”

“For this I will offer you your favorite offering, our desire and pain!”

After finishing speaking, the man climbed into the shed and put his ear to the ground, as if he was listening to the oracle sent by God. He nodded in response from time to time, with a solemn look on his face, as if he had really heard something.

Other natives waited with bated breath.

After a while, the man carefully walked out of the shed. He stood with his eyes flickering, and there was an unconcealable malice in his voice:

“God said, kill that Guy and that new commander, and put me in power again, and God will give us everything we once had.”

“Everything will be peaceful again.”

On the boat.

Bai Jiamu was still thinking about what The Reverse God just said. He couldn’t help but ask: “But Reverse God, even if the oracle has the possibility of deceiving people, although I don’t think God really exists, didn’t you say that few people except you can hear the so-called oracle?”

Bai Jiamu was not religious. He was skeptical of this god-or-not-god stuff, but is okay with The Reverse God.

A liar who pretends to be gods (False prophet) - has a strong sense of self-management – The Reverse God doesn't believe in god, but only uses prophecies as a reference. Sometimes, he does not take the oracles seriously at all and would even go back on the instructions in them.

That's why this guy was called [Judge against the God] before.

"You want to ask me why an NPC in a dungeon can also hear the oracle?" The Reverse God sat on the edge of the boat and rowed. He looked back at Bai Jiamu with a smile, "Except for a judge like me who can make a one-way phone call to the God from time to time and ask him about oracles, whether ordinary people can hear the oracle depends on the intensity of the person's inner desires."

"In other words, most of the oracles that a person can hear are what he wants to hear from God, in line with their own desires."

"Historically, most of the cases where oracles were heard were because the person wanted to gain a certain status, so they used divine power as a cover to persecute others."

The Reverse God withdrew his gaze: "But it does not rule out that some people can really hear the oracle. God likes to give hints to people with such strong desires, and then uses these people to keep control and cause a mess to the world."

"God does not want to see the world in peace, so that his existence would have no value."

The members of Killer Sequence, who wanted to hear the gossip, came over and squatted next to The Reverse God, causing the small wooden boat to tilt over to one side.

The Reverse God quickly put his feet to the other side and stopped the two team members who were running his way. He stabilized the boat, and said helplessly: "If you don't want to help with rowing, it's okay to just watch me row alone, but why are you trying to capsize the boat? You must be undercover agents sent by the traditional indigenous people to assassinate me."

The team members nodded seriously: "That's not impossible. The traditionalists have an advantage in the game. If we defect with your head, we might be able to pass the level lying down."

The Reverse God: "…"

What is the point of me working so hard to take them through the game?

The members of the Killer Sequence were all smiling. They all knew that they came to this dungeon to help Spades get better.

Several of the team members were already very young. The process of running back and forth with Spades, and the tactician The Reverse God, it really felt like playing a game, and they all played very relaxedly.

Bai Jiamu took The Reverse God's oar and asked curiously, “Even when my desire is really strong, I still can’t hear the oracle. Why is that?”

The Reverse God glanced at him sideways. “You’re young—how strong can your desires even be? Those favored by God must have exceptionally strong desires.”

A team member beside them smirked and teased, “Oh, Bai Jiamu, are you saying your strongest desire hits first thing in the morning?”

Bai Jiamu’s eyebrow twitched. He shot a glare at the speaker. “Bai Yi, just because you’re my brother-in-law doesn’t mean you can crack dirty jokes! Watch yourself, or I’ll chop you up and feed you to the fish!”

Bai Yi rubbed his nose, stuck out his tongue, and wisely shut up.

Still flushed with irritation, Bai Jiamu turned back to The Reverse God and retorted, ears burning red, “Isn’t Bai Liu young too? Didn’t you say he was chosen as God’s successor? How strong can his desire be? What, does he just wake up every morning and deal with it himself?”

Bai Yi mumbled from the side, “Nope, he’s married to Spades. So, actually, they do it together at night.”

Bai Jiamu: “…”

The Reverse God: “…”

After a moment of silence, Bai Yi thoughtfully stroked his chin. “Of course, if Bai Liu really has strong desires, there’s nothing stopping him from doing it again in the morning. Or, you know… from morning till night—”

Before he could finish, Bai Jiamu's oar swung down mercilessly, smacking Bai Yi straight into the water with a loud splash.

Bai Yi's head popped back up, dripping wet. He looked at Bai Jiamu in disbelief, his face full of grievance. "Why'd you hit me?! I'm not making this up! Bai Liu said it himself—he and Spades went through 18 boxes of condoms in one ni—Gululu!!"

Bai Jiamu stood at the edge of the boat, pressing his oar down on Bai Yi's head with an expression of righteous fury. "Shut up! I'm not even of age yet!"

Bai Yi flailed, spluttering. "Bai Jiamu! You can't just ban adult jokes because you're underage! You'll be an adult in one month anyway!"

He struggled to keep his head above water, shouting between gulps, "Adults should have the freedom to be perverted—!! Gululu—!! Spades is married, are you really going to deny he has a sex life?! Gululu—!!"

Bai Yi gasped for breath and shouted one last time, "You just don't like the fact that you're the last single guy on the team! Even Spades—a textbook straight man—found a wife before you—"

Bai Jiamu turned completely red, from his ears to the base of his neck. His expression twisted into something murderous as he smacked Bai Yi's face twice with the oar.

Bai Yi flopped back in the water, dizzy, his eyes spinning in circles. The bubbles rising to the surface gradually slowed.

Bai Jiamu took two deep breaths, forcibly suppressing his embarrassment. Then, as if nothing had happened, he sat back down, straightened his back, and looked The Reverse God dead in the eye.

"I don't care that I'm the last single man in the Killer Sequence. Don't listen to his nonsense."

The Reverse God calmly ignored the blood stains on the oar and gave him a thumbs up: "Killing relatives for justice, well done."

The Dense Forest Borderlands

The rain was getting heavier.

The water quickly overflowed and soaked into the ground, making the mud thick and moist. Tang Erda followed Spades unsteadily. In the heavy rain, he could hardly see the rapidly moving Spades in front of him.

Spades was obviously heading towards Lake Pluto.

The closer to the lake, the deeper the water on the ground became. In the later stage, Tang Erda's lower body was already submerged, and Spades in front of him jumped into the muddy water like a fish.

Tang Erda took a deep breath and jumped in as well.

The muddy water was turbid, and raindrops pelted the surface. Coupled with the previous dual attacks of artillery fire and mines, the bottom of the lake was turned upside down. You couldn't see anything under the water, you could only feel the waves one after another. Tang Erda relied solely on his years of chasing people to keep up with Spades.

From time to time, some snake-like long black shadow creatures would slide past his side, but Tang Erda cautiously dodged them.

Spades swam very fast, and it didn't take long for them to reach the bottom of the lake.

The bottom of the lake was very different from when they came here to place mines. There were countless holes, large and small, all blown out by artillery shells.

But fortunately, the water here was deeper and the visibility was higher. Tang Erda could barely see Spades clearly in the chaotic water, suspended in the water at the bottom.

Then, Spades calmly took out a piece of a left foot that was rotting and still moving from his waist, and carefully examined it under the water like a detector.

Tang Erda looked in the direction of Spades. The bombed water exposed a layer of very strange volcanic rock texture, with a layer of viscous, asphalt-like earthy liquid flowing on it.

Spades handed the body piece to Tang Erda, who tentatively inserted the body piece into the pile of asphalt-like liquid.

[System prompt: Congratulations to player Tang Erda for triggering the corpse storage point – the bottom of Pluto Lake]

[Putting a complete part of the collected corpse of the living dead into the bottom of the lake can be counted as one point, and putting a whole corpse of the living dead into the bottom of the lake can be counted as twenty points. Placing a corpse into the bottom of the lake in scattered places can only be counted as twelve points. Players are requested to try their best to piece the corpse together and place it at the bottom of the lake.]

[System prompt: The bottom of Pluto Lake is not yet the territory occupied by the camp to which player Tang Erda belongs. We regret to inform you that you should join the indigenous camp that owns Pluto Lake, or help your own camp occupy Pluto Lake. Only after that, the player can score points for this corpse.]

The corpse pieces slowly fell out of the soil, and Spades firmly grasped the suspended corpse pieces.

Tang Erda took a deep look at the bottom of the lake, then raised his head to look at Spades. He opened his mouth slightly, and when bubbles overflowed, he pointed to the top, gesturing for Spades to go up and breathe.

Before they came up, the water surface suddenly shook violently. Tang Erda suddenly raised his head and looked at the water surface. The countless wooden boats suspended above suddenly burst into flames.

The burning boats hung overhead, like a sudden appearance of flaming clouds in the hazy sky.

If a fire attack is successful on a heavy rainy day, there must be something wrong with the wooden boats themselves. Someone must have done something to them, such as soaking them with oil, turning the boat into a flammable substance.

This is simply not an attack strategy that people here can do!

On the surface.

The traditional indigenous people wore shawls made of straw ropes and feather ring hats. They held guns and artillery and rushed forward on rafts that had not been painted with red paint. A strange accent vibrated in their throats. The person at the head was clearly the person who led the sacrifice before. He shouted with a fierce look:

“Kill these people cursed by God! Take back what is ours!”

“The paint God gives will summon unquenchable fire that burns the sinners!”

“Kill them! Burn them!”

The Reverse God and the others who were walking towards the river turned around, and Bai Yi emerged from the water, looking at the burning wooden boat warily: “Didn’t this group of traditionalists plan to wait for the enemy’s attack to end and turn around to attack us, the new faction, who are running out of battle power? How come they suddenly attacked us?”

Bai Jiamu frowned and said: “Now is the time when the two sides are fighting in chaos. It will do no good at all to attack our group of pioneers from behind. Are these traditionalists crazy about seizing power?”

“Something irritated them.” The Reverse God stretched out his hand with a steady expression, “Bring the telescope prop we brought in, let me see what happened over there.”

Bai Jiamu handed The Reverse God a standard telescope.

The Reverse God clamped it on the bridge of his nose, and his shaking and blurred vision finally settled on a small smoking jungle behind the lake. He frowned and adjusted the field of view of the telescope, and saw the situation in the small smoking jungle more clearly.

Then, The Reverse God couldn’t help but gasp.

There was a burning shed in the small jungle. The highly revered statue in the shed was shattered to pieces with a gun, poured with paint and set on fire. The entire sacrificial site was in a mess.

Only half of the shed was burned, and the torch next to it was not extinguished. It could be seen that the person who smashed the statue broke in and shattered it while the sacrifice was in progress.

The audacity of this!

This group of devout traditionalists must be going crazy to catch this troublemaker!

The Reverse God searched back along the path of the burning wooden boat, and sure enough he saw a man who kept jumping nimbly between boats. He was carrying a gun and had bloody bandages on his calves and shoulders, but he was avoiding the attacks in an extremely flexible manner.

He was followed by a long line of natives who were chasing him angrily and humming religious songs. Bullets and rockets flew past him from time to time.

This man is Guy who surrendered to them yesterday! One of the main NPCs!

Shouldn't he be at the Red Cross being treated after being seriously injured? Why would you come here to burn the statue of these traditionalists!

Guy was heavily pursued, and although he had tried his best to hide himself by using the boat to dodge, he still received two shots.

The Reverse God, who was holding the telescope, frowned. Why didn't Guy hide under the water?

Although hiding in such turbid waters may lead to random shooting, it's better than running around like a living target on the surface, right?

Soon, The Reverse God got the answer, and he couldn't help but squint.

Guy actually held up a huge statue head in front of him, and put a gun to it. He raised it while running, and opened and closed his lips, seeming speaking emotionally to the group of natives who were chasing him. Why did the traditionalists dare not shoot him?

This young man is quite talented. He knows that using a statue of a god as his hostage and shield before running away is not considered courageous.

The Reverse God put down the telescope and handed it to Bai Jiamu: "Go over and save people."

Bai Jiamu nodded and was about to row back when Guy ran this way.

As Guy ran in, The Reverse God and the others finally heard what Guy was saying.

Guy shouted loudly in the sound of rain: “You say God exists, you say God has saved you, you say God has given you everything, and God asked you to kill the good people who help you.”

He stood on a swaying small wooden boat, with several corpses killed by shrapnels lying at his feet. They were lying on the edge of the boat with their eyes open, and the blood on their bodies had long solidified.

Guy glanced at the dead people with compassion, his eyes were red, he raised the head of the wooden statue high, and pointed the gun at the forehead of the statue: “This is the only symbol of your so-called god here. If you really exist, take your head back from my hands!”

The Reverse God’s face changed when he heard this: “No, he is going to use extreme means to prove to these traditionalists that God does not exist! If he really breaks those traditionalists, they will go crazy and kill him without any hesitation, stop him!”

Bai Jiamu’s expression stiffened, he flipped his wrist and threw out a bright scalpel, which passed through the rain and mist, and struck the gun in Guy’s hand.

Bai Jiamu’s breathed a sigh of relief: “I caught it with my skill weapon, he missed.”

The moment Guy pulled the trigger, the gun was hit by the scalpel and fell. The bullet missed the statue’s forehead.

The leader of the traditional faction who was chasing him laughed maniacally: “God sent believers to stop you! God exists! You can’t kill God!”

“God is protecting Himself and me. That factory director, that dirty hypocrite, should be killed by me according to God’s instructions!”

Guy was half-kneeling on the boat. His eyelids moved, and he suddenly picked up the scalpel. Without hesitation, he grabbed it fiercely and chopped the head of the statue.

Bai Jiamu: “!!!”

The Reverse God: “!!!”

Why is he like this! Young man, you are too stubborn!

Guy seemed to explode, the muscles of his shoulders bulged, and he kept holding the knife and lowering it. He gasped, and the rainwater slid down his wet hair.

The head of the wooden statue was chopped into pieces and covered with scars by the scalpel.

The leader of the traditionalist faction across from him yelled like a chicken with his throat squeezed. His eyes were wide open, and he watched almost in disbelief as the head of the statue, which was protected by paint, was chopped into sawdust by Guy. There was a look of panic and horror on his face that could not be concealed.

A native next to him murmured to himself in a trance: “How could he destroy the paint coating that God has blessed us with…”

“Why didn’t God send heavy rain to drown him and thunder to burn him to death?”

“Why would God let a person who betrays God insult his own statue…?”

The leader’s eyes were about to burst. He raised his hand and gave the people next to him a slap in the face. He shouted at them hoarsely: “That’s enough! God exists! God is protecting us! Are you going to abandon God like these people?! Be punished by God and drowned?!”

The voices of doubt slowly weakened again.

Guy raised his head, and his eyes filled with countless emotions fell on the hysterical leader through the wet hair on his forehead. He showed a sarcastic smile: “God does not exist, he shouldn’t die.”

“God has never protected you at all. You are doing all this just for your own desires.”

Guy stood up staggeringly, raised the unrecognizable statue head in his hand towards the leader, and said hoarsely: “You dirty, cowardly person who dares to hide under the beliefs of a cult, do you dare to face up to the broken appearance of the god you have woven out of your own lies?”

The leader's eyes were red, and he roared as he raised his gun: "Shut up, you are the one abandoned by God!"

The bullets passed through the statue of the god that Guy had lifted up, shooting randomly at him. Guy slowly closed his eyes, with a satisfied and tired smile on his face, and fell into the lake of death named Pluto together with the god's head.

The Reverse God had a complicated look and stopped Bai Jiamu from stepping forward to catch Guy who fell into the water: "——This is the main plot of this NPC. We can't stop it. Just watch. He is destined to die. This is of his own free will."

Bai Jiamu was startled, and then asked in disbelief: "Why did he want to seek death on his own? He might still have a way to live if he didn't anger the leader."

"What he wants is for the leader to smash the idol with his own hands in anger." The Reverse God pointed at the natives, and sighed, "Look, the expressions of those natives have changed, and they are beginning to doubt their leader. "

"Guy knew that if he smashed the idol, he would not completely shatter the faith of these indigenous people. He wanted the person who created these lies, that is, the leader, to smash the idol with his own hands, so that these indigenous people would wake up."

The Reverse God sighed: "When he surrendered, he was ready to pay the price with his life."

"But I still find it very strange." The Reverse God changed the topic, touching his chin thoughtfully, "Based on my previous predictions, Guy's main plot should only be triggered in the middle to late stages. Why did it advance to the first day of the war? Guy already fully understood what to do to achieve his goal. Has anyone taught him?"

Bai Jiamu reacted very quickly: "The abnormal reactions of NPCs are all caused by players. Someone induced Guy to commit suicide?"

The Reverse God paused subtly: "What does this player want to do by advancing Guy's death and exacerbating the conflict between the two camps?"

The Dense Forest Borderlands

At the Red Cross.

Alex's ring finger on his left hand hurt while the dressing was being changed. He looked subconsciously and saw that the ring on his ring finger broke off out of nowhere, inexplicably leaving a bloody cut at the base of his finger.

Alex's heart choked, and an indescribable feeling of fear gripped him. He staggered, holding on to his wheelchair and tried to stand up: "Guy! Is Guy not in the tent anymore?"

Before he finished speaking, out of the corner of his eye, he saw Tang Erda running over from the edge of the Red Cross with a seriously injured soldier who had his head down on his shoulders, his face covered in mud. He shouted fiercely: "Guy is injured, but he is not dead yet, come and take care of him quickly!"

Tang Erda was followed by a large group of natives who were chasing them. Spades fell far behind Tang Erda, sweeping back and forth with his whip to clear away the natives who were following them.

The native who was chasing them were almost going crazy, with veins popping out and his eyes bloodshot. He kept firing at Tang Erda and said, "Give me this damn apostate! I'm going to break him into pieces for his offense against God!!"

The natives followed behind him, and some even raised heavy weapons such as rocket launchers, staring fiercely and hatefully at the three people fleeing in front, but they were unable to close the distance under the defense of Spades.

The people from the Red Cross hurriedly picked up their weapons, opened the defense line, and vigilantly put up a red-letter sign saying "No attacks here, this is a non-war zone". The defense tanks stationed here also slowly raised their guns and aimed at the group of natives who were about to break into the Red Cross area.

Tang Erda ran into the Red Cross area first, followed closely by Spades, while the natives who were unwilling to put down their weapons were sternly stopped outside the defense line.

The unconscious Guy and the idol head he was holding tightly in his hands were quickly transferred to a stretcher, carried past Alex, and sent to the tent for saving wounded soldiers.

Alex saw the blood-stained Guy and reached out to touch him, almost falling off the wheelchair. Fortunately, Bai Liu next to him quickly helped and resettled the dazed soldier in his wheelchair.

“Don’t worry.” Bai Liu bowed and patted the ashes on Alex’s knees, raised his eyes and said calmly, “Guy will be fine this time.”

Alex glanced at Bai Liu in a daze. He looked directly into the man’s dark eyes, somehow remembering the god’s head on Guy’s stretcher.

The eyes of the statue with a compassionate smile were also like this, dark and peaceful, reflecting everything in the world, as if all human emotions cannot be integrated into them, watching all the scenes in this world that have been arranged by him.

… Guy will be fine this time. This statement was as if Bai Liu had already arranged that Guy would be fine.

Alex couldn’t help but shudder. He pushed the wheelchair away from Bai Liu, took a deep look at Bai Liu, then turned the wheelchair without looking back and chased Guy’s stretcher to stand guard outside the tent.

Bai Liu wasn’t angry when he saw Alex running away. He lowered his eyes and rubbed the ash that had just been stained from Alex’s knee on his index finger, and then calmly wiped it away.

Tang Erda sat at Bai Liu’s feet to catch his breath and rest. Spades disappeared as soon as he entered the Red Cross. Tang Erda looked around and couldn’t find him, so he gave up.

He raised his head and took a sip of water, and was about to report what happened to Bai Liu. Just when Tang Erda was about to speak, he raised his head to look up at Bai Liu and couldn’t help but be startled by the indifferent expression on Bai Liu’s face.

…This expression looks like Bai Six from other timelines plotting something…

Soon, Tang Erda calmed down the familiarity and fear he felt for a moment. He shook his head to get rid of those terrible thoughts in his mind, took a deep breath, and began to dutifully report to Bai Liu what happened on the battlefield:

“… Guy fell into the water after being hit. Spades and I happened to be in the water. I found that he was still breathing and dragged him to the shore and started running this way…"

"After the natives discovered us, they chased us all the way. Fortunately, Spades was very capable of breaking them up. The two of us moved very fast, so we came here first…"

Bai Liu nodded: "It's pretty much what I expected."

"You arranged for me to join the first commando team just to cooperate with you in rescuing Guy, who was lured by you to fight for his life during the battle?" Tang Erda half-bent his knees and leaned his back on the gun barrel inserted into the ground. He looked at Bai Liu and asked, "When did you guess that Guy would rebel?"

Bai Liu smiled: "The first time I met Guy, he was very good at fighting, but he was willing to be a cleanup soldier. He was either a pure pacifist, like Alex, or he did not agree with the victory of the camp he represented."

Tang Erda breathed out, not surprised at all, and continued to explain along with Bai Liu's words: "If Guy rebels, Alex will definitely not last long and will also rebel. Then the enemy camp will have mainline NPCs and ownership of the lake. They will have a pretty big advantage later on."

"You want to ask me why I didn't join the enemy army from the beginning, right?" Bai Liu answered Tang Erda's call and smiled, "Because I am not planning to join either camp."

Tang Erda frowned: "You won't join either of these two parties? Do you want Alex to form a separate camp?"

Bai Liu nodded.

Soon Tang Erda cautiously put forward his opinion: "Bai Liu, I believe you have your own ideas, but from my perception of Alex's emotions just now, I feel that if Guy is successfully rescued and still alive, it is very likely that he will be successfully persuaded by the seriously injured Guy to join the indigenous camp."

"And if Guy dies, he will be completely stable in his own camp because he is angry at the natives for killing Guy."

Tang Erda said cautiously: "It is difficult for Alex to have the consciousness and possibility to rebel and become a third-party camp."

Bai Liu nodded and agreed with Tang Erda's view: "It's true. Alex grew up in a very peaceful environment, and he was also very kind. That's why he chose to become a medical student in a war-like background, and in order to save people. He didn't kill anyone even after he came to the front line."

"This kind of character is called gentle and kind to put it lightly, but in the context of this game where you can't save people without killing people, it means being cowardly and incompetent." Tang Erda turned his head to look at Alex, who was guarding Guy's tent, his head bowed and buried in his arms, and couldn't help sighing, "Alex is a person who feels that war is completely wrong. Even if you kill him, you won't be able to make him stand up as a third party."

Bai Liu looked at the tent where Guy was being rescued, and said calmly: "It's possible."

"I've discussed it with Guy and he'll help me do it."

Tang Erda became more and more confused: "Guy was seriously injured. He may not be able to survive tonight. How can he help you?"

"There is no need for Guy to wake up." Bai Liu furrowed his brow, "He can help me complete all this even if he doesn't wake up."

At Midnight.

The bullet in Guy's body was removed through surgery. The doctor wheeled Guy into the tent after using some anti-inflammatory medicine.

However, Guy's anesthesia had not worn off yet, and he was unconscious with a high fever. Alex was standing by his bed, looking at him with red eyes.

Alex's hands and voice were trembling: "The ring is broken, Guy, my ring is broken, they said your ring is also broken, it was broken by a bullet…"

"The doctor said you may not be able to wake up."

Alex lowered his head and leaned against the edge of the bed, choking and saying: "Guy, the only evidence that we can be together is gone

now. If we both die, I won't be able to prove to Pluto that you are my spouse, to prevent him from dividing our souls."

Tears slid down Alex's chin, and before they could land on the sheets, a group of people quietly opened the curtains of the tent where Guy was sitting. They stared at him in the dark, holding sharp knives and wooden sticks. The voice was extremely hoarse when he opened his mouth:

"Alex, if you still want to live, get out of here!"

Alex turned around suddenly. He turned on the light in the dark tent. After seeing the group of people in front of him clearly, he was shocked and his voice was extremely difficult:

"You were the survivors of the first commando team…"

"We are still survivors." The leader used a sharp steel knife to support his body. His left leg was missing below the knee, and the bandage was still bleeding. It was obvious that the leg had just been amputated not long ago.

He stared at Guy on the hospital bed with red eyes, and gave a vicious laugh: "Thanks to Guy, I was blown away when he went to the group of natives. I don't know how much longer I'll live in this shithole."

Alex turned his wheelchair to block Guy's hospital bed. His voice trembled: "This is the Red Cross. What are you going to do?"

"The Red Cross only stipulates that we can't kill enemy troops here, but it doesn't stipulate that we can't punish our own people according to military law." The soldier at the head with the broken leg looked fierce. He raised his finger and pointed at Guy, "This traitor is still here, wearing our uniforms and has killed more than twenty of our brothers, why can't I kill him!"

The man roared at Alex like a trapped animal: "Alex, if you protect this traitor, we will kill you too!"

Alex subconsciously wanted to push himself up, but his legs were injured and he was quickly held down by the tall commando team. His hands were tied behind his back. No matter how hard he struggled, it was all in vain. In the end, he screamed at the top of his lungs: "Help!! Someone is attacking the wounded soldiers here!"

The leader walked to Guy's bedside. He looked back at Alex coldly, with resentment and complexity in his eyes: “No one will come, Alex, they know it’s an internal matter.”

“No, no, no!” Alex was flustered and frightened. He spoke incoherently and tried to dissuade him with tears on his face, “Guy shouldn’t kill you, and you shouldn’t kill Guy. No one should attack each other! “

“This is wrong, this is not right!! We should stop!”

“But the fact is, we are attacking each other.” The soldier standing next to Guy stood on one foot. He raised the knife high towards Guy on the hospital bed, with an unconcealable cruelty in his expression, ” ——The war will never stop!”

The snow-white blade fell hard, and blood spurted out instantly. The angry soldiers kept waving wooden spikes and sabers, cutting Guy in his hospital bed to pieces of blood and flesh.

Alex’s heart-wrenching screams and pleas for mercy could be heard across half the Red Cross district.

Bai Liu stood at the edge of another tent. He lifted the curtain and listened calmly to the sound. Next to him stood Tang Erda with a solemn expression.

Tang Erda started to speak but stopped several times, and finally he couldn’t bear to speak: “…Is it true that we can’t save Guy?”

“This is a deal between me and him.” Bai Liu looked at Tang Erda calmly, “Guy doesn’t want to live, he wants to die at the hands of his former teammates to atone for his sins, so I made arrangements for him. In exchange, I used his death to achieve my own little purpose.”

Tang Erda didn’t know how he felt: “…Both camps directly killed Guy. Alex can no longer belong to any camp.”

…There is nothing wrong with this approach, and it is just a game, but it always reminds Tang Erda of Bai Six inexplicably.

This is what Bai Six was good at. After inducing others to die willingly, he can then use this death to achieve his own goals.

Tang Erda hesitated again and again, but gritted his teeth and asked: “Bai Liu, you really won’t become Bai Six, right?”

Bai Liu was silent for a few seconds, then he turned to look at Tang Erda, and suddenly smiled very lightly, with extremely light emotion in his eyes: “This is just a game, don’t be so nervous, Tang Erda.”

The Dense Forest Borderlands

Alex's shrill screams gradually faded, and bloodstained soldiers emerged from the tent one after another, shaking the blood from their hands as they left.

Bai Liu glanced at his watch, waited another fifteen minutes, then walked toward Guy's tent. He lifted the curtain and stepped inside.

Tang Erda remained outside, his expression complicated. "I won't go in. Alex's mental state won't be good right now."

He hesitated, then called out to Bai Liu just as he was about to enter. "Are you still going to use Alex?"

Bai Liu paused, his fingers gripping the curtain. He turned his head slightly, a faint smile on his lips. "Of course. Is there a problem?"

Tang Erda clenched his fists, his jaw tightening as if he wanted to say something—but in the end, he simply shook his head. "…No, it's nothing."

As a player, Bai Liu's goal was to win. Using NPCs to achieve that goal was only natural. He had no obligation to consider their feelings.

So why did this feel so wrong?

Bai Liu patted Tang Erda's shoulder, his voice soft. "If it makes you uncomfortable, I can consider Alex's feelings and find another way."

Tang Erda wanted to say it didn't bother him. But when he met Bai Liu's dark eyes—void of any real warmth—the words that escaped him were: "What way?"

Bai Liu's smile deepened. "A very effective one. You'll like it."

—After all, he had already used it on Tang Erda before.
Bai Liu lifted the curtain and stepped inside.

Alex sat motionless in the middle of the blood-soaked tent, his head hanging so low it seemed it might slip from his neck at any moment. His hands, resting on the sides of his wheelchair, were stained with blood that dripped steadily from his fingertips. At his feet lay Guy's severed head, eyes still open.

The hospital bed in the corner was a grotesque display—its once-white sheets now saturated with red. Scattered limbs lay atop them, torn flesh and viscera spilling from an open abdominal cavity. The scene resembled the remains of a butchered lamb, abandoned and forgotten.

In the stifling heat of the rainy season, it hadn't taken long for flies to descend on the body, already feasting.

Bai Liu stopped in front of Alex, but Alex remained unmoving, head bowed, seemingly unresponsive to the world around him. His lifeless eyes showed no recognition, no reaction.

Yet, with just one sentence, Bai Liu made him look up.

"You already knew, didn't you?" Bai Liu said. "I arranged for Guy to die like this."

Slowly, Alex raised his head. His voice was hoarse, barely above a whisper. "…Why?"

"I think you've already figured it out," Bai Liu continued, his tone light, almost pitying. "Otherwise, you wouldn't have come to the Red Cross to watch over Guy."

He lowered his eyes, looking down at Alex. "Because this is how Guy wanted to die."

"He wanted to atone for the teammates he killed. He blew them to pieces, so he wanted to die the same way."

Alex's face was streaked with dried tears, his already swollen eyes welling up again. He lowered his head, covering his face with trembling hands as he choked out a sob.

"Guy…"

For a long while, he cried. When he finally looked up again, his expression was a mix of disgust and barely concealed fear. His voice, though steadier, still wavered with emotion.

"Guy wanted to die for his sins. But you… if you wanted him dead, it wasn't for something as simple as that, was it?"

[System prompt: NPC Alex's favorability towards player Bai Liu is decreasing…]

Bai Liu didn't react to the prompt. He simply answered, calm as ever.

“No. I arranged all of this for my own goals.”

Alex’s back arched as he half-rose from his wheelchair, his voice breaking into a hoarse scream.

“—You orchestrated Guy’s death! You planned this from the beginning! You made sure I saw this! You’ve been using us this entire time!”

His breath came in ragged gasps, bloodshot eyes burning with hatred.

“—You’re nothing but a despicable liar, a filthy manipulator!”

Tears streamed down his face, his voice cracking as he muttered, as if speaking to himself:

“…Guy trusted you. He gave you his bouquet, watched as you had your wedding under his witness…”

His gaze sharpened, full of venom. “You don’t deserve any pure feelings in this world.”

Then, through gritted teeth, he spat out, “If Spades ever finds out who you really are, he’ll leave you.”

For the first time, Bai Liu’s fingers curled slightly at his side. But his expression remained composed—he even smiled, soft and unbothered.

“That wouldn’t be anything new to me.”

Alex screamed at him, cursed him, for over half an hour—repeating the same few accusations again and again. The words looped like a broken record. For all his education, for all his intelligence, he didn’t seem to know how to craft a proper insult.

In the end, his fury gave way to sobs.

He broke down, grabbing the hem of Bai Liu’s clothes with shaking hands.

“Why did you let him die?” His voice was raw. “Why did he have to die?”

Tears spilled freely down his face, his entire body trembling. “Wasn’t I enough? Wasn’t my existence enough for him to let go of his guilt and hatred—to start over?”

He clutched at the empty air between them, fingers curling around nothing. His sobs wracked his frame, desperate and hopeless.

“…There’s nothing left. Nothing left for me.”

Bai Liu shifted his gaze to the pile of things on the bed. His voice was calm, almost indifferent.

"He left his body for you."

Alex shuddered violently, his expression twisting in horror as he lifted his head to stare at Bai Liu.

But he quickly forced himself to regain composure. He wheeled himself back a few steps, shaking his head.

"I won’t use that drug on him. Guy will always be Guy. He was a human being. Even in death, he’s still a human being. I won’t turn him into a soulless monster."

Bai Liu chuckled. "Why not? What difference is there between a resurrected Guy and the Guy you love?"

"They’re nothing alike!!"

Alex’s voice rose sharply, his breath unsteady. He finally grasped the depths of Bai Liu’s madness, the realization sending a chill down his spine.

"——A corpse treated with that drug is just that—a corpse. Just flesh and blood vessels that can move. It’s not him. It’s nothing but a soulless monster!"

Outside the tent, Tang Erda stood guard, frowning as he listened. Alex’s agitation made him doubt whether Bai Liu was truly using a "gentler" method as he claimed.

Someone tapped his shoulder.

Tang Erda turned—and his eyes widened in surprise.

Spades stood before him, his face void of emotion. He stared at the tent for a long moment but made no move to enter. Then, in a low, unreadable voice, he asked:

"Is it impossible for a human to love a soulless monster?"

Tang Erda was caught off guard by the sudden question.

Inside, Bai Liu tilted his head slightly, gesturing for Alex to continue. "So?"

Alex's voice trembled with disbelief. "Could you love something that's just an empty shell?"

Silence stretched between them.

The only sound was Bai Liu's calm, even breathing—he seemed to be thinking.

Outside the tent, Spades stood rigid, his lips pressed into a thin line, fists clenched tight. It looked as though he might burst in at any second—demand an answer, maybe even hit Alex for asking.

Finally, Bai Liu spoke.

"I don't know."

Tang Erda's breath hitched.

In all his memories, no Bai Liu had ever given such an ambiguous answer—especially not before striking a deal or exploiting someone's emotions.

And yet, for some reason, Tang Erda felt himself relax.

——Bai Liu wasn't doing this just to manipulate Alex.

He had answered the question seriously. For once, it wasn't purely about strategy or personal gain.

He wasn't Bai Six.

Tang Erda let out a long breath.

A faint crease appeared on Spades' otherwise expressionless face. He kicked the gun lying across the entrance of the tent and asked coldly, "Why doesn't he know?"

Tang Erda bent down to pick up the gun, frowning. "Go in and ask Bai Liu yourself. How would I know why he doesn't?"

Spades let out a quiet "Oh" before stepping forward, approaching the tent. He walked back and forth twice, his movements unusually hesitant, his brows furrowed. But in the end, he didn't go in.

Instead, he stepped back and squatted beside Tang Erda, lowering his head as he absentmindedly poked at the mud with his fingers. He pressed one hole into the ground, then another, lining them up in neat rows.

Tang Erda watched in confusion. "Why aren't you going in?"

Spades hugged his knees, rocking slightly where he squatted, resembling a child left behind by a friend, dazed and at a loss.

When Tang Erda pressed again, Spades only nodded lightly and muttered, "I don't know either."

He kept his eyes fixed on the small holes in the dirt, his voice dull as he continued, "…I don't want to see Bai Liu right now. He doesn't even know this."

Tang Erda followed his gaze and then paused, momentarily startled.

Then, unable to help himself, he sighed in amusement.

The holes Spades had been poking in the dirt—slightly crooked but still recognizable—spelled out two characters: 白柳 (Bai Liu).

Even if you say you don't want to see him, you still want to.

Inside the tent, Alex was equally bewildered by Bai Liu's response.

"…You don't know?"

Bai Liu's voice was calm, almost indifferent. "I can't say I don't know at all. It's just difficult to distinguish—whether you miss the feelings you once had for him in that body, or whether that body itself is holding onto the remnants of your feelings."

He paused before continuing, his tone unreadable.

"Sometimes, I feel like he's a souvenir left to me by the gods who took pity on me."

Silence stretched between them. Then, softly, Bai Liu spoke again:

"And sometimes, I feel that he is the monster I love."

"It's not that he has no soul," Bai Liu said, his voice barely above a whisper. “It’s just that the soul is hidden within the body. I have to wait until the day it emerges and comes to see me again.”

Alex stared at him in disbelief, forcing out a weak laugh. “…You make it sound like you’ve gone through the same thing as me.”

Bai Liu lifted his eyes and met Alex’s gaze directly. “I have.”

“That’s why I can tell you—two people who love each other may be separated by death.”

His gaze dropped, landing on Guy’s severed head at Alex’s feet. His voice was calm, distant.

“But two monsters who love each other never will.”

The curtain of the tent was suddenly pulled open.

Bai Liu looked up.

Spades stood at the entrance, his silhouette framed by the harsh light outside. His chest rose and fell slightly, his gaze locked onto Bai Liu—silent, unmoving.

But Bai Liu didn’t seem surprised. It was as if he had known Spades had been there all along.

“You’re back?” Bai Liu asked evenly. “Why didn’t I see you earlier?”

Spades hesitated for a moment before replying.

“Yeah.”

Then, after a pause, as if searching for an excuse, he added, “I had mud on me. Didn’t look good. I washed it off before coming to see you.”

The Dense Forest Borderlands

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

In the early morning of the next day, in order to avoid decay and infection caused by the remains of the body, Guy's corpse would be collected and burned by the Red Cross people. So before dawn, Bai Liu collected all of Guy's body parts and waited quietly for Alex, who was still struggling to decide what to do.

"Have you thought about it?" Bai Liu asked.

The emotions in Alex's eyes were extremely complicated, "… If the resurrection is just a body, a monster, what should I do?"

Bai Liu glanced at Spades standing next to him from the corner of his eye, "It depends on how much emotion you can put into this body."

Alex gritted his teeth, as if he had gained some kind of determination: "Okay, I agree with your proposal, let's go!"

Bai Liu glanced at Alex's legs, took out a potion bottle from his pocket and tossed it to him: "Use the potion to solve your own leg problem first."

Alex took the potion, looked at Bai Liu, then took a deep breath and poured the liquid on the injured leg – the wound did not heal, but turned into a corpse-like grey colour.

He stood up quickly, picked up the backpack full of body parts, and looked at Bai Liu: "What is your next plan?"

Bai Liu smiled: "Do you want to resolve this war?"

Alex was startled, but he quickly retorted: "Now that the fight is like this, the sneak attack this morning was disastrous for both sides, it's impossible to stop it." "Of course." Bai Liu looked at Alex levelly, "Unless they have a common third-party enemy that scares them more, in that case they can stop the war and cooperate with each other."

Alex was stunned: "Where can such a powerful third-party enemy come from?"

Bai Liu glanced at the backpack which Alex was holding: “Does the army of the living dead you once imagined count?”

Alex was silent for a long time, and then he spoke in a hoarse voice: “…I know what you want me to do, but I don’t have that many potions and corpses to create a third-party army.”

“You don’t have to worry about this.” Bai Liu smiled and pointed at his feet, “Isn’t the Red Cross where we are located a perfect production site for potions and corpses? There will be a steady stream of potions and corpses delivered here for your use.”

Alex refuted in a low voice: “But the Red Cross will not give the corpses and potions to an ordinary soldier like me to use casually. Listen, Bai Liu, I know what you want to do, but this is impossible, you are just an ordinary soldier. The Red Cross is not your back garden. It is strictly guarded and only insiders can get the potion…”

“I agree with you.” Bai Liu pointed behind Alex and said meaningfully, “Maybe you can turn around and take a look?”

Liu Jiayi, who was wearing a nurse’s uniform, twirled her keys around and leaned against the tent. She raised her eyebrows and looked at Alex: “I just went to solve the problem of the corpses and the potions. I am responsible for the key to the potion warehouse and the disposal of the corpses. You can use it all as you wish.”

Alex glanced at Bai Liu with wide eyes as if he had seen a ghost. He felt an uncontrollable chill running down his back: “…When did you plan all of this?”

Guy’s death, his collapse and compromise, and the subsequent potions and corpses, this guy had it all handled before it happened!

Bai Liu even took the time to get married! He never left his sight from beginning to end, and Alex never saw him do anything!

God, how on earth did Bai Liu do all this!

Bai Liu looked at him with a smirk: “Do you really want to know the answer? Believe me, you won’t be happy after hearing this.”

Alex rubbed the goosebumps on his arms and swallowed: “…I swear, you are one of the best time managers I have ever met.”

While cleaning his gun, Tang Erda asked curiously: “One? Is there anyone who is better at using time than Bai Liu?"

"It's Guy…" Alex sighed faintly, "When I first met him, he could maintain a 'good' relationship with seven or eight guys at the same time, and he could have private contact with at least three guys in one day without being discovered by others."

The word [good] was spat out hard by him.

Alex's eyes were deep, and he glanced at Spades who was next to Bai Liu meaningfully, "You know, Bai Liu, I found something in common with Guy and you. You can both contact others under the eyes of your partner without being found out."

Bai Liu, who had contacted team members many times behind Spades' back to do things: "…"

Tang Erda who was contacted: "…"

Liu Jiayi who was also contacted: "…"

Spades stared at Bai Liu suspiciously with squinted eyes.

The Reverse God, who had been privately contacted by Bai Liu from afar, suddenly sneezed loudly. Rubbing his nose in confusion, he muttered, "Who's cursing me?"

"There are too many people who'd want to," Bai Yi chimed in eagerly. "Want me to filter them for you in real time?"

The Reverse God waved a hand dismissively. "Appreciate the thought, but I'd rather not hear anything that might break my heart while I'm trying to enjoy my game."

Bai Jiamu held his chin beside him in a daze: "Reverse God, do you think that the Bai Liu guy has cheated you? Now Alex has not defected, and our main line NPC Guy is still dead. The traditionalist faction is about to make trouble."

"Let them make trouble. The more trouble they make, the quieter it will be here." The Reverse God said unconcernedly, "Guy's death must have been deliberately brought forward, but it's not a big deal."

Bai Jiamu asked in confusion: "The situation is in such chaos, isn't it a big deal?"

"No." The Reverse God replied affirmatively, "The more chaotic it is, the better it is to reshuffle the cards and control the situation. Players who play this set must be very greedy. Although there is no more than 80% possibility, I generally don't take it easy. I have to make a judgement, but after contacting him, I feel that the player who disrupted the situation should be Bai Liu, and this is how he played the game before."

Bai Jiamu frowned: "Then you cooperated with him so easily before?"

"I've seen the video of his small TV, and his skills are related to money transactions." The Reverse God said, "It seems that the higher the points transaction, the more he has to execute the transaction."

Bai Yi next to him suddenly realised: "So you gave him five million points when we cooperated?"

"Part of it is for this, and another part of it is…" The Reverse God's eyes wandered, he clenched his fists and coughed, "For the money, he is married to Spades. As a tactician, I should give a gift on behalf of the whole team no matter what."

The Reverse God calculated solemnly with his fingers: "Except for Xiao Bai (Bai Jiamu) who is underage and refuses to rush the gift, the four of us adults should give 1.2 million points each which adds up to 4.8 million points, plus the transaction payment — Five million is just right."

Bai Jiamu: "…You are good at calculating, Reverse God."

The Reverse God continued as if nothing had happened: "However, did you pay attention to the wrong thing? Bai Liu said that he would help us make Spades lose, but he did not say anything about helping us win."

"Alex's defection was just a cover proposed by Bai Liu. He didn't tell the truth, which means that he cannot be included as part of the transaction."

Bai Jiamu stood up and looked unhappy: "He lied to us?"

The Reverse God glanced at Bai Jiamu: "To be more precise, we were deceived. Deception has always been an important part of this game. The game for players is whether they can prevent themselves from being deceived."

"There is nothing wrong with lying to others. It is us who were deceived and are in the wrong."

Bai Yi muttered: "Reverse God, you have a very good temper, aren't you angry if someone lies to you?"

The Reverse God gave Bai Yi a meaningful smile: "If I get angry because I was cheated then shouldn't I be angry when I entered this game?"

"This game is a huge scam."

The sky was about to brighten.

There were many stiff figures walking in the woods, their faces interlaced with stitched threads. Flesh and blood sections were faintly visible as they moved. They emitted strange whining sounds, like a bunch of puppets made of real corpses, twisting their limbs unfamiliarly to move forward.

Bai Liu and his group fell far behind the group of corpses.

Liu Jiayi couldn't help complaining: "It's only now that I realised it was actually a zombie book."

"But it's not about fighting zombies." Tang Erda added, "We are the sweepers responsible for creating zombies. We will pick up a lot of corpses when the war starts."

"There are still too few corpses from the Red Cross." Liu Jiayi stared at the corpses in front of her, "I don't know how long we can last with these two camps holding us hostage."

Bai Liu was very calm: "Don't worry, as long as the war between the two parties does not stop, our camp will continue to grow."

"Yes." Liu Jiayi squinted at Bai Liu, "You would think that as long as there are dead people on the other side, our zombie army will continue to grow. In the end, they will try their best to avoid casualties on both sides in order to prevent us from continuing to grow. Thus achieving the goal of the war stopping forever."

"This is how you convinced that indecisive mainline NPC, right?"

Liu Jiayi withdrew her gaze: "Bai Liu, sometimes I really don't understand what you are thinking. You can always achieve the goal of peace with an extreme and evil approach."

“You say you are a good person, but you are indeed doing things in an extremely anti-human way. You do not have any compassion for these innocent soldiers. You will use them to do things for you even if they die.” Liu Jiayi stared at the broken zombie soldiers in front of her and said, “I would say you are a bad person, but judging from the results, you have done something that surpasses the efforts of all the good people.”

Liu Jiayi asked: “Sometimes I wonder, why on earth do you do this?”

Bai Liu smiled: “Because I’m curious.”

Liu Jiayi asked, “What are you curious about?”

Bai Liu lowered his eyes: “I was curious about what kind of ending Alex wanted, whether it was peace or endless war, so I included both possibilities in the plan.”

“The ending that Alex wants?” Liu Jiayi frowned. She realised there was something in Bai Liu’s words and asked keenly, “What do you mean?”

Bai Liu looked at Liu Jiayi: “Don’t you think Alex accepted our proposal to form a third camp and attack the other two camps too quickly?”

“This is not the normal behaviour of a person who would reject someone who harms others. Alex complied with my offer with almost no struggle, which was strange.”

“According to Alex’s previous performance, the emotional impact of Guy’s death on him should have been strong, but he calmed down very quickly and immediately threw himself into the production of the living dead.” Bai Liu opened his eyes and looked at the large zombie army in front of him, “And the zombies are being produced too fast.”

“Alex’s identity is set as a medical student who has not yet done an internship, but he is very skilled at finding a certain part of the same person among a pile of broken limbs and then sewing them together.”

“…It feels like this isn’t the first time he’s done something like this.”

Liu Jiayi’s steps forward paused, and she suddenly turned her head to look at Bai Liu: “Do you still remember the function of Alex’s potion?”

Bai Liu spoke calmly: “Yes, the function of his potion is to freeze people in the state they were in before death."

"…The state before death." Liu Jiayi murmured to herself twice, then she suddenly looked up at the zombie army in front of her and her expression changed, "The potion this guy invented is not a biological healing potion at all. It's a time potion that can turn back the time of an organism! It's a resurrection in the true sense of the word!"

"These things are not zombies at all, they are the living dead who are going back and forth to their pre-death state!"

Before Tang Erda could react, he lowered his head and approached Liu Jiayi and asked doubtfully: "A time potion?"

Liu Jiayi took a deep breath and turned Tang Erda's head around, "You will understand when you see it."

As the group of originally swaying, stitched-up corpses continued to march, the fractures on their limbs gradually opened and closed, and the injured sites that were originally covered with various gunshot wounds gradually grew open then healed. The various wounds on the corpses creepily turned into bloody fresh wounds, and then healed bizarrely.

These corpses that were originally pale then became rosy and moved more and more flexibly, as if they were alive.

Tang Erda was completely stunned: "What on earth is going on?!"

Bai Liu was not surprised. He looked at the corpses that were "coming to life" as if he had expected it, and said flatly, "Sure enough."

Tang Erda immediately turned his head and stared at Bai Liu, "You already knew this?!"

Liu Jiayi rolled her eyes and said breathlessly, "Of course he already knew."

Tang Erda pointed at Bai Liu and said with condemnation: "Then why didn't he tell us? He is a tactician, why did he hide it from us!"

Liu Jiayi held her forehead: "Of course it's because he wants to play. Didn't you notice that he was in a bad mood? Haven't you been playing this game seriously all the time? It's all about playing games. Where's the fun? If Bai Liu doesn't tell you, it's because he's just playing with his teammates…"

“Tang Erda, sometimes it’s not a good thing to rely too much on tacticians.” Bai Liu quickly interrupted Liu Jiayi’s words and said seriously, “I prefer that you, as my best main attacker, think about the information gained on your own first.”

Tang Erda’s eyes flickered between Liu Jiayi and Bai Liu twice, then he cautiously took two steps back, crossed his arms and looked at Bai Liu: “First tell me what’s going on in this game.”

Bai Liu asked: “Do you still remember the time limit of this game?”

“Seven days.” Tang Erda answered quickly.

Bai Liu continued to ask: “Do you remember what day it is now?”

“In the early morning of the third day.” Tang Erda replied.

Bai Liu smiled: “Don’t you think it’s strange? A game with a time limit of seven days has reached its third day and is halfway through. No player has gained points yet.”

Tang Erda replied cautiously: “This situation is not impossible.”

“Yes, but it is impossible for top players.” Bai Liu said, “The players in this game, me, you, Liu Jiayi, and Killer Sequence can be said to be the top players in the entire system. If these top players haven’t even gotten a single point halfway through the game, it can only mean one thing.”

Bai Liu raised his eyes and looked at Tang Erda: “First, the design of this game is very poor. It doesn’t allow players to experience a sense of gain even halfway through.”

“Second, these three days are not the real three days at all. The game is not halfway through, and we found the wrong time reference.”

“Then what is the real time reference?” Tang Erda asked.

Bai Liu said: “I gave my radio equipment to Spades and asked him to find it. If he finds it, he should use the equipment to send you a message.”

Liu Jiayi asked in disbelief: “Bai Liu, did you just say that you gave our team’s communication equipment to an outsider?!”

Bai Liu replied calmly: “It’s not for nothing. I sold it to him. I sold him 73 points for 10,000 points. It’s not a loss.”

Liu Jiayi: "…"

Tang Erda: "…"

Yes, that's something only you can do.

Not long after, Tang Erda's radio equipment rang. He lowered his head to check, then looked up at Bai Liu: "He said he found it."

Bai Liu asked: "Where?"

Tang Erda called back: "The military mass cemetery built behind the town."

Bai Liu found a broken down truck that was abandoned in the mud on the road. Tang Erda used brute force to get it out and got under the truck to repair it. The three of them then tied up the pile of living dead and loaded them on the truck.

"The road here is not easy to drive." Tang Erda, who was sitting in the driver's seat, lifted up his vest and wiped off the mud on his face with a serious expression, "I will drive a little faster to make it less likely to get stuck. You guys sit tight."

From polar planes to battlefield tanks to this old truck…

Bai Liu slowly looked at Tang Erda: "I'm curious, what means of transportation do you not know how to drive?"

Tang Erda really thought for a few seconds, and then answered Bai Liu seriously: "If it fits the means of transportation in your definition, I will not use Mu Sicheng."

Bai Liu: "…"

Liu Jiayi: "…"

Who taught Tang Erda to tell cold jokes?

It took about a few hours to drive from the Red Cross to the small town. Fortunately, Tang Erda drove very fast and quickly arrived near the small town.

Tang Erda got out of the car and covered the writhing living dead on the back with cloth, then found a place to hide the car. When he was about to take out the skill revolver, he jolted. His head popped up from behind the car. "Hey," he called Bai Liu.

Bai Liu turned around.

Tang Erda hesitated for two seconds: “Do you want to use my skill gun? I won’t take it out if you want to use it.”

Bai Liu raised his eyebrows in surprise, “No, but I’m curious about why you suddenly thought of this?”

Tang Erda has fought with his skill weapon for so long. Using his own skill weapon is as easy as drinking water and eating. To be able to consider Bai Liu, who shared his skill, before using it was honestly quite difficult.

At least among the current Wandering Circus, only Mu Ke could do this.

Tang Erda paused strangely for a few seconds. He seemed to realise something from Bai Liu’s reaction: “You didn’t tell Spades about your skills?”

Bai Liu raised his eyebrows: “Why do you think I would tell him?”

Tang Erda paused again and said, “Spades and I have been working together for a while. He forbids me from using skill weapons. He said that you might want to use them, and that he will beat me if I draw the revolver.”

“…I thought you told him.”

Bai Liu was quiet: “I didn’t tell him, did you ask him how he knew?”

Tang Erda nodded: “I asked, he said he didn’t know, it was intuition.”

“Ignore him for now.” Bai Liu brushed off the topic calmly, “Go find the cemetery first.”

The cemetery is actually easy to find. The signs in the town all mark the cemetery. But the strange thing was that every time Bai Liu and the others went in this direction, they encountered a very thick and strange fog, and then after passing through the fog, returned to the same intersection.

“Is this a ghostly wall?” Liu Jiayi raised the poison spray vigilantly, “No matter how you go around, it’s the same place.”

Tang Erda also took out the Rose Revolver and stood behind Bai Liu: “Do you need to do something to get out?”

“There should be certain conditions before you can get out. According to the popular process, we should decrypt it first.” Bai Liu looked at Liu Jiayi, “But now there is a more direct way.”

Liu Jiayi quickly put down the spray and turned on the wireless device: “Send a message to Spades and ask him how he got out, right?”

The news from Spades came back quickly. Liu Jiayi frowned after reading it: “——Can you use a whip to clear the mist and come out?”

“Weapon attack?” Tang Erda cautiously fired twice at the fog directly in front, and then a crackling sound came from directly behind. His pupils shrank and he quickly pushed down Bai Liu who was standing in front.

The bullets flew over their heads and hit the sign with a loud bang, leaving a huge hole.

“The spaces are in a state of close contact with each other. Weapon attacks are ineffective and can’t break it. They will reappear in the same place.” Tang Erda shook his head solemnly.

Liu Jiayi frowned: “How did Spades break it? Is it possible that his whip can even break space-“

She paused suddenly when she said this, and then looked up at Bai Liu who was patting off the dirt on his knees.

Bai Liu stood up and looked back at Liu Jiayi with calm eyes: “——And maybe break time.”

Liu Jiayi pursed her lips: “It has the same function as the bone whip you destroyed before.”

“Then how do we get out now?” Tang Erda asked.

Bai Liu looked at Liu Jiayi: “Send a message to Spades and ask him to pick us up.”

As soon as he finished speaking, a needle cut across the side of Bai Liu’s face, and a line of blood was drawn.

The needle fell to the ground, and the curved tail was still wrapped with silk thread – it was a hooked needle used for suturing.

Tang Erda turned his head abruptly. Just as he was about to shoot, he suddenly remembered that the space here was closely connected and it would be easy to shoot directly here. He had to grit his teeth and switched his gun to a military knife: “Who’s there?”

In the white mist, several figures that looked like women wearing wide skirts were looming, approaching Bai Liu and his group at the centre of the intersection from all directions. They held long guns in their hands, dragging them on the ground and making rustling sounds on the gravel.

Liu Jiayi and Tang Erda arranged themselves to the left and right in order to protect Bai Liu who was in the centre, both of them scowling.

Tang Erda took a deep breath and said, “You can’t attack casually here. Because the space is closely connected, we don’t know where our attack will hit. We can only fight hand-to-hand.”

“—But you two are not good at it, so I’ll count to three, and when the physical fight starts, you two will run back.”

Liu Jiayi nodded simply and threw two bottles of antidote to Tang Erda, “Be careful.”

The women’s figures were getting closer and closer, and only then did Tang Erda see clearly that the dresses these women were wearing were not just any other clothes, but beautifully sewn old white wedding dresses with many blood stains on them.

These wedding dresses seemed inexplicably familiar to Tang Erda. He looked up at the dresses, and when he saw the person wearing the wedding dress, his expression finally froze.

These weren’t women at all, they were all Guys.

These Guys were sutured with surgical stitches, and there were countless scars on their faces. In some places, the suture threads had not yet been cut. The smile at the corner of his mouth was weird but sweet, his skin was grey, and his eyes were completely black, with no white visible at all. The wedding dress on his body was stained with countless blood spots.

[Congratulations to player Tang Erda for triggering the second page of the “Monster Book of the Jungle Border” – Corpse Bride]

Chapter End Notes

A "cold joke" (冷笑话, lěng xiàohuà) in Chinese refers to a type of joke that is often dry, absurd, or awkwardly unfunny—so much so that it might make people groan instead of laugh.

The term "cold" (冷, lěng) suggests that the joke is so unfunny that it creates an awkward or "cold" atmosphere, as if it leaves people speechless rather than amused.

The Dense Forest Borderlands

When the first Guy raised his gun and pointed it at them, Tang Erda raised his hand to stop them and shouted: “Duck and run!”

“It’s not necessary.” Bai Liu looked towards the end of the fog, “The space here started to connect from the moment we came in, but now it’s completely sealed. We can’t escape.”

Tang Erda followed Bai Liu’s line of sight, and his expression froze.

At the end of the mist stood a looming sign, marked by a fresh bullet hole—a result of Tang Erda's recent shot. Next to the sign stood three figures: two large and one small, with their reflections mirrored beside them.

“It seems that we have to decrypt the code before we can get out of here.” Bai Liu turned to look at the zombie brides who were getting closer, “Tang Erda, please hold on for a while.”

Tang Erda raised his hand and swiped the guns of the two zombie brides. He held the gun of the third zombie bride, turned it around, pointed it at the opponent’s mouth, and fired twice. After having blood spattered on his face, he turned around and asked Bai Liu behind him: “There’s a puzzle here?”

Bai Liu pointed to the street sign next to him: “That’s it.”

“What kind of puzzle can this be?” Tang Erda asked doubtfully as he broke one of the Guys’ necks and wiped off the blood splashed on his face.

Bai Liu’s eyes stopped on the sign. There were eight road signs on it, pointing to the recruit station, the tavern, the training camp, the town exit, the registration office, the train station, the direction of the battlefield and the cemetery.

Liu Jiayi quickly scanned the sign above: “The prompt is the address, but no matter where you go, you will circle back to the same place. There should be some sort of special route to go out.” “But there are too many possible routes that can be combined with eight signposts.” Liu Jiayi frowned and looked at Bai Liu, “Do you have any clues that can serve as reminders?”

Bai Liu glanced at Guy, who was struggling with Tang Erda: “Haven’t the clues already been given to us?"

Liu Jiayi suddenly turned her head to look at the Guys: "These guys are zombies, buried corpses, they came from the cemetery!"

"Yes, this group of Guys came from the cemetery and passed through this barrier." Bai Liu's eyes returned to the road sign, "Since this group of Guys who are already zombies can pass through this barrier, it means that this route is very familiar to him, and he can subconsciously follow it even after dying and becoming a zombie."

Liu Jiayi had been staying at the Red Cross Society and was not familiar with the NPC Guy. After hearing Bai Liu's analysis, she simply said: "I don't understand this. I'll help Tang Erda fight so please hurry up and figure it out."

After saying that, Liu Jiayi rushed to Tang Erda with two bottles of antidote, and kicked away a gun that came from behind him.

The gun went off, and Bai Liu sidestepped to avoid it, but his eyes were fixed on the sign.

If the seven days of the war were a cycle, these dead Guys should have remembered the path they had walked here during their lifetimes. Guy defected on the second day, so it should be the road that Guy traveled on the first day.

And Guy was with him all the way that day.

They met Guy when… Bai Liu shifted his gaze and glanced at the first road sign. "The first one is in the direction of the battlefield," he muttered, his thoughts interrupted.

Tang Erda had already confiscated all the monsters' guns. He lifted Liu Jiayi on his shoulders with both hands and ran two steps towards the battlefield. He turned around and said hoarsely: "Then what? Bai Liu, there are more and more zombies. Hurry up!"

Bai Liu reported the next address smoothly: "The second place is the train station, the third place is the registration office, the fourth place is the recruit station, the fifth place is the tavern, and the sixth place is the training camp."

Tang Erda asked urgently: "What about the seventh and eighth!"

Bai Liu glanced back and forth twice at the [Town Exit] and the [Cemetery]. He had never been to these two places with Guy, so he didn't know the order.

But these are corpses, and the final destination of the corpses should be the cemetery.

Bai Liu was only quiet for a second, and then continued: "The seventh one is the exit of the town, and the eighth one is the cemetery."

Tang Erda stepped in the direction of the cemetery, then looked at the motionless mist behind him, and looked at Bai Liu in confusion: "Why isn't there a reaction? Did I not go the right way just now?"

He did not doubt that Bai Liu's judgment was wrong.

Liu Jiayi pulled away from Tang Erda's hands that had grabbed her. The man ran so fast that she was shaken and so dizzy that she didn't even have time to dissuade him. At this moment, she was put down and she said breathlessly: "You are going the wrong way. These Guys are from the cemetery, we should walk backwards from the direction of the cemetery."

Tang Erda: "…"

Tang Erda glanced at Bai Liu in confusion and disbelief: "But Bai Liu was thinking…"

Bai Liu smiled innocently at him: "I thought you knew you should walk backwards. It's easy to guess."

Tang Erda: "…"

"I told you that Bai Liu was just playing around, did you believe him?" Liu Jiayi waved her hand impatiently, "Let's go, you silly man."

As expected, he walked out easily after walking backwards. Bai Liu pushed aside the fog and saw another figure in front of him.

Tang Erda subconsciously pulled out his revolver and tried to shoot the figure, but before he could even do anything, a black whip came out of the mist with a snap. The speed was so fast that Tang Erda didn't even have time to pull away before he was whipped on the back of his hand.

This familiar weapon and the pain of the whip… Tang Erda withdrew his skill weapon and asked tentatively: "Spades?"

Spades walked out of the mist. He held the whip in his left hand and glanced at Tang Erda coldly: “Didn’t I tell you not to shoot casually?”

Tang Erda couldn’t help but “….”.

Why can Spades demand such outrageous things like not allowing others to use their skills and weapons in such a confident tone?

Bai Liu glanced at Spades lightly: “Don’t hit my team members casually.”

Spades said oh, then immediately turned to Tang Erda and said, “I’m sorry.”

Liu Jiayi, who was standing next to him, muttered in a low voice with disapproval, “You’re just going to say I’m sorry?”

Spades looked at Liu Jiayi calmly, raised his hand and whipped the back of his hand without hesitation then asked, “Is it alright now?”

Liu Jiayi: “…”

Tang Erda: “…”

Why would this person argue so seriously with an eight-year-old girl in such a childish way…

Seeing the serious look on Spades’ face and his aggressive attitude of arguing with Liu Jiayi to the end, Bai Liu had no choice but to stop him: “Okay, what clues did you find?”

Spades then turned to look at Bai Liu: “I found a woman in the cemetery.”

“Woman?” Bai Liu’s tone rose slightly, “Who?”

Spades looked directly at Bai Liu: “Alex’s former fiancée.”

Spades led Bai Liu and his group through a blanket of mist to a long-forgotten town, but at the same time, a brand-new town.

Once a lively and bustling border town, it now lay abandoned and decayed. The wooden signposts were rickety, their inscriptions long rotted and illegible. The tents that once marked the training camp were now buried beneath layers of old industrial buildings. The shelves at the entrance, where the list of names had been kept, were rusted through and discarded.

The tavern was nowhere to be found.

In the location of the tavern was a grocery store that has long since closed. The closing date was written to be thirty years ago.

The ground was covered with scraps of paper, billboard plastic, and some vinyl disc fragments.

Bai Liu turned around and found that the lush battlefield rainforest had disappeared and was replaced by a huge factory. Next to it was a dilapidated billboard that read [Producer of tropical forest raw materials, global log production base]. Next to it was a smiling lumberjack face oil painting.

The door of the factory, known as “the world’s largest log production base,” was locked, and the sign hanging on the door showed that it had been closed for a long time, similar to the closing time of the grocery store.

Bai Liu withdrew his gaze and continued walking through the ruined town.

Passing through the exit of the town and walking to a long-abandoned cemetery, Spades climbed over the rusty gate with familiarity and opened it for Bai Liu from the inside.

Bai Liu walked into the cemetery.

This was an extremely desolate and old cemetery. The marble monuments were covered with weeds. The cemetery was very messy. At first glance, it looked like a back garden that had not been taken care of for more than ten years. Crosses and tombstones were looming among the weeds.

But that was not the weirdest thing about this cemetery.

The weirdest thing about this cemetery was found out by Bai Liu, who carefully paid attention to the names of the deceased on every cross and tombstone.

The time of death, black and white photos, and names of the deceased on all the tombstones were exactly the same.

All the graves in the cemetery were the graves of Guy Davis.

And basically, every tomb has been dug open. From the inside, you could vaguely see the corpses rushing out of the coffins that were violently destroyed, and the soil that was pushed out from the tomb next to them, piled on both sides of the tombstones.

Walking through the empty cemetery and reaching the corner, Bai Liu saw an old woman standing there holding a bouquet of flowers. She turned her back to Bai Liu, tremblingly bowed down, and placed a bouquet of flowers and a wedding dress on a tombstone.

“Hello.” Bai Liu called her softly, “Who are you?”

She turned around; her cloudy eyes filled with tears: “I used to be the fiancée of that boy Alex.”

“But that was fifty or sixty years ago.” She waved her hand, swept away the dust on the tombstone, bent at her waist and sat down with a sigh, saying, “Now, I’m just an old woman cleaning his tombstone.”

Bai Liu squatted down and looked into the old woman’s eyes: “What is your name?”

“Elena, just call me Elena.” The old woman looked back at Bai Liu, “Young man, who are you?”

Bai Liu said calmly: “Maybe you won’t believe me, but I am Alex’s comrade-in-arms.”

“Comrade?” The old woman indeed sneered, “Young man, I see that you are more senile than I. That war has been over for more than fifty years now. How about a more recent war setting for your dreams of being a war hero?”

Bai Liu repeated softly, “Fifty years have passed since the war ended?”

Elena lowered her head and looked at Bai Liu with droopy, wrinkled eyelids: “Maybe it’s been longer, I’m so old that I can hardly remember these dates.”

“I just remember that a long time ago, when Alex was still alive, he and the guy named Guy wrote many, many letters to me.” Elena took out a pile of old letters from her dirty skirt bib. “Every time I visit their graves, I read the letters they sent me in front of their graves, so as not to forget them all.”

Elena sighed tiredly: “You know, I am the only old woman who remembers these things now. If I forget them too, there will really be no trace of them.”

Bai Liu looked at the stack of letters and politely asked: “Can I see it?”

Elena looked at Bai Liu in surprise: “Are you interested? No young people want to hear these old stories anymore.”

Bai Liu smiled: “I am Alex and Guy’s comrade-in-arms, and I have an obligation to help remember them.”

Elena stared at Bai Liu quietly for a long time, and she suddenly laughed: “Young man, even if you are a liar who tells lies, you did use your lies to make me happy.”

She handed the pile of letters to Bai Liu kindly, with tears in her eyes: “You are welcome to remember these two people with me.”

Bai Liu held up the letter: “Perhaps you aren’t suggesting that I open it and read it in person?”

Elena laughed and waved her hands tremblingly: “Of course not, I can recite everything from the top of my head.”

Bai Liu lowered his head and arranged the letters in chronological order, and then opened them one by one. Elena was talking nonchalantly:

“…You know, young man, if a person had a bad life and is alone when they are very old, they will recall their past over and over again and wonder what they did wrong to end up like this…"

Elena's old voice paused: "Do you know what is the most terrifying thing in this process?"

Bai Liu raised his eyes and looked at her: "What is it?"

Elena forced a smile, but tears flowed from the corners of her eyes: "If you did do a lot of things wrong."

Bai Liu lowered his eyes and looked at the first letter in his hand. It was from Elena to Alex.

[Tribute to my dear fiancé :

Your dirty, shameless, despicable male lover wrote to me two days ago, begging me to forgive him for his despicable behavior with you, and shamelessly asking me to bless your love and marriage.

What a disgusting idea!

Is there any god in this world who would allow two men to unite in front of him?

I even suspected that enemy artillery shells would be raining down on the place where you were getting married as punishment for your breach of ethics!

Alex, as a doctor who studies the mechanism of human life, the greatest profession on earth, why would you allow yourself to hang out with such a ridiculous psychopath, wasting your time when you could be saving people?

When you're with him, don't you feel like your future and ideals are tainted by shit?

At least when I got the letter from him, I felt like my dignity had been stained by shit.]

Bai Liu opened the next letter, and the sender was Alex.

[To Elena :

First, allow me to viciously refute the way you have addressed me. I have never met you, and I have never agreed to allow you to make your own decisions and become my fiancée. The title you addressed me at the beginning of your previous letter is completely wrong.

Second, there will only be one lover, wife, and person who will be with me for life, and that is Guy, not you, who suddenly appeared after Guy and I fell in love.

I don't know where your inexplicable affection for me came from, whether it was from my parents' unrealistic expectations and descriptions of me, or from the pursuit of the only young man in that narrow town who had achieved an advanced degree, or from the complacency and self-congratulation of your own beauty, the ridiculous notion that the prettiest girl in the town would be able to win over the nicest young man.

Allow me to solemnly explain to you, Elena, I am not an object that you can use to win or flaunt, I am a person with feelings.

After I gave my love to Guy, it was absolutely impossible for me to fall in love with anyone else unless I stopped loving him.

Elena, you are also an independent person. Your value does not need to be flaunted by getting me. You can go on to more worthy things to prove that.

Guy and I have two qualifications to go to higher education institutions. Mine will be used by myself. Guy said that you are still a naive little girl and has more qualifications to enjoy the beauty and knowledge of the world than he, who does not know if he'll come back alive.

If you have any thoughts of going to a higher education institution, Guy says he can give you his qualifications.

Although you said all kinds of things to Guy that I think are bullshit, Guy forgave you and nobly said that he would give you this opportunity to further your studies.

Although I strongly disagreed, Guy was adamant.

Guy said he could tell you were a girl with aspirations.

He said that you like me because I am a doctor. You think I am great for treating diseases and saving people, so you cast a kind of girlish admiration on me.

Guy asked me to pass on something to you. If you like saving people, why not try it yourself?

I'm sorry for the blind assurances my parents made to you, but I will still scold you if you make any inappropriate remarks about Guy again.]

Bai Liu continued to flip through it, and the next letter was from Elena again, but this time it was not addressed to Alex, but to Guy.

[Tribute to Guy:

I apologize for the inappropriate and emotionally charged insults.

I put all the money I had saved from working in the past three years from the age of eleven to now in this envelope as compensation for my personal exportation of inappropriate words.

I won't take the academic qualification you gave me. I still think you are wasting Alex's time. He could have more. He invented a potion that can delay the death of mankind. How many military men who died in the war could have been saved?

Everyone in town says Alex could be the next war hero!

But after he met you, all he can think about now is falling in love!

I still hope you stay away from him, maybe you can find another true male lover, but that person shouldn't be Alex.]

The next letter was from Guy to Elena.

[To the lovely little girl Elena:

Hey little girl, guess what? I think what you said is right.

Alex will indeed have a rather bright future, he was a very talented fellow. The experimental process of the potion is moving forward quickly, and his superiors have given him permission to experiment on wounded soldiers with remarkable results.

I'm not worthy of him. Alex is very good, so I still want to selfishly possess him for a while and have the best memories with him.

Elena, I have seen your photos. You are very beautiful, but you are too young, only fourteen years old. You still can't tell the difference between love and longing.

I have to admit, Alex is a good young man. However, by the time you and he can talk about love, it will likely be at least four years from now. Believe me, with your beauty, determination, and perseverance, you'll probably have met someone else by then—someone who makes your heart race even more.

Of course, it could also be a lovely young woman. You should not be tied to any prejudice.

After the war, enjoying a romantic and slow-paced love in a peaceful era is what you and Alex deserve, instead of sacrificing your youth and marrying a war hero they imagined under the enthusiasm of war-mongering town residents and Alex' parents.

This isn't fair, not to both you and to Alex.

I hope you are happy, because you deserve happiness, and I hope I can be happy too.

But unfortunately, the happiness I want is not something God is willing to bless.

Hey, Alex told me you were a great wedding dress maker, could you make one for me? It just so happens that I want to dress up and marry Alex]

The last letter that Elena wrote to Guy was very messy, with many tears on it, as if the fourteen-year-old Elena was crying while writing the letter.

But her tone in the letter was completely different and cold:

[To Guy:

I don't know where you got those rumors that I was forced to marry Alex. There was no such thing. I did it of my own free will.

I won't make a wedding dress. I won't allow anyone to marry Alex before me. Just give up!]

Bai Liu looked at the wedding dress Elena placed on Guy's tombstone, raised her eyebrows and asked, "Can I know why you made a wedding dress for Guy in the end?"

Elena smiled with nostalgia, but her smile seemed to contain a lot of unspeakable sadness hidden in her happiness, and the corners of her mouth couldn't stop turning down.

"…I was too young at that time and didn't understand anything. The town said that a beautiful girl would be chosen to marry a war hero in the town. The winner would get a sum of money from Alex's parents and my parents let me go."

"I was the most beautiful of all the girls." Elena's eyes became more distant. "I was chosen easily. I was still very young at that time and the law did not allow me to get married, so Alex's parents told me to wait for Alex's return, and I was not allowed to have any contact or love with anyone until Alex came back."

"At that time, my whole life was devoted to marrying the hero, Alex. When someone else took him away, I panicked. I hated Guy so much." Elena's eyes were red, and her tone was hateful, "Guy was a very glib guy, and he also likes to write letters to tease me. I simply didn't understand how a man who was fighting in a war could be so carefree and still smile every day."

"Guy is different from all the men I have met. He respected me, encouraged me, and said that sooner or later I will achieve results that are not inferior to Alex's. He even helped me get admission, so I could go straight to school when the time came."

Elena's tears overflowed from her wrinkles: "On the night when I was crying and writing this letter to Guy, I secretly made a wedding dress overnight and rushed to the post office to send it to him."

As she spoke, she turned to look at Bai Liu in a daze: "But when I got to the post office, they notified me that a new letter had arrived and asked me to pick it up. I opened it, and it was still a letter from Guy."

Elena burst into tears: "——It's Guy's obituary and a suicide note."

"Guy was shot dead on the spot after rebelling during a sneak attack in the early morning. He knew this would happen a long time ago and left a suicide note for me in advance, asking me to take good care of myself and help him take care of Alex."

"I wanted to give him a wedding dress, an apology, and a thank you…" Elena choked, her lips trembling as she said, "He didn't have time to hear all of it."

“I laid on the oversized wedding dress and cried and fainted at the door of the post office. Elena raised her head and her gaze drifted away. “When I woke up, I thought this was the darkest moment that war could bring me.”

“But everything that followed told me it was much more than that.”

Elena raised her hand, wiped her tears with her palm, took a deep breath, and continued: “Later, Alex and I had no contact for a while, until I heard someone say that the commander of that war had many tanks and artillery dispatched and transported from our town to the front line.”

“I realized that a big war was about to start, so I wrote to Alex again to make sure of his safety and try to persuade him not to participate in this dangerous war.”

Elena covered her face with wrinkled hands, her voice hoarse:

“I waited for a long time, waiting anxiously at the post office day and night, but still didn’t receive a reply from Alex until the day before the war.”

“That one, one…”

Her voice broke, as if she couldn’t pronounce the letter’s name.

While listening to Elena’s words, Bai Liu continued to search for letters. He once again saw the letter Alex sent to Elena.

This is a long letter, a family letter that arranges the aftermath, and a desperate suicide note.

[To Elena:

I shouldn’t have written this letter to you, but after thinking about it again and again, it seems that besides you, there is no one else I can confide in about my funeral affairs.

It’s so wonderful to say, Elena, little girl, that I’ve never met you, and yet you’ve enjoyed a nominal fiancé-couple relationship with me, survived the death of the person I loved most, and accompanied my parents through the most difficult of years.

If nothing else happens, you will have to witness my death next.

It's selfish and self-serving that you've been through all the great things in my life, yet I've yet to meet you once in person, have always rejected your existence, and in the end have to tell you, the stranger I know best, the most important thing about me before I die.

But there's no way around it. You're the only person I've ever willed to die without feeling guilty, I guess.

I know that my death will not make you too sad, but will only completely free you from this marriage relationship that should not exist in the first place.

Only with you can I realize that my death may be a good thing for someone, and I feel more calm and proud of myself.

Next I will confess to you all the mistakes I have made in my life.

I spent my whole life trying to save everyone around me, but in the end no one was saved.

I invented a potion that could freeze death, but everyone rushing to die didn't say hello to me in advance and instead said, Hey, Alex, I'm going to die, remember to freeze my death.

I could only helplessly cover their bleeding wounds, break down and cry, begging them to stay for even a second, and finally carry their bodies back feebly, sitting there until dawn, waiting for the next round of death.

The lake of death named Pluto must have found it hilarious that I was trying to prevent it from coming to earth.

I kept, kept, and frantically tried to improve my potions, but no matter how I slowed down their death, death would eventually come. All I did was make them suffer a little longer before death.

When they are in extreme pain and despair, they will quietly and with tears beg me to let them die easily.

Because even if they survive, they are likely to die in the next round of offensive and defensive battles.

Sometimes I ask myself, is my selfish desire to leave these people alive and tortured in this war more cruel than letting them die?

Am I wrong?

Elena, I have never wanted to reply to your letter because I cannot face the ubiquitous name in your letter – Guy.

Guy did not die on the battlefield. I lied about his death and used my status as a sweeper to secretly transport his “body” to my pharmacy laboratory.

I devoted everything I had to saving him, and he miraculously revived. I swear when I saw him open his eyes, I even wanted to thank the evil god for a moment.

Whichever god it was, I wanted to thank him for sending Guy back to me.

I want you to be honest. My potion originally did not have such a strong effect, but my experiments in this place are limited and I cannot get sufficient experimental supplies like those on university campuses. I can only use some locally produced experimental potions as materials.

Most of the experimental chemicals were of poor quality, causing the experiment to fail, but there was one strange thing that worked wonders – a strange paint.

This kind of paint is used by the natives here to smear on the statues of evil gods. It is a flammable oil-like texture. When I was short of oil-based solvents, my superiors collected half a jar of this kind from a captured native. The red paint came out and was sent to my lab as a replacement oil solvent.

Although this stuff looked sticky and weird, like human blood after melting oil, I didn’t have any other choice.

But the addition of this paint produced an incredible change – it made Guy, whose heart had stopped beating for half a minute when he entered my laboratory, come back to life.

I simply couldn’t believe what I saw, and I even felt that my desire to resurrect Guy was too strong and led to some self-deceptive hallucination.

But Guy is indeed improving day by day, or in other words, using improvement to describe his entire recovery process is not accurate. Combining my clinical and microscopic observations, I can come to a conclusion that you will definitely think I am crazy——

——Time is running backwards for Guy.

His fallen skin reglued, his broken bones healed again, and even his nails and hair that grew after death were shortened.

This is not something that humans can do at all. This is the realm of gods. Even God does not have such ability.

From the moment I arrived here and learned that the reason why these ignorant and ugly natives launched the war was actually the so-called evil god's oracle, I hated the so-called evil god deeply.

And all along, I thought that this evil god was a symbol fabricated by the natives to explain things they couldn't understand and to express their anger that they couldn't dispatch. It was an illusory and evil image.

But when Guy sat up again, opened his eyes, smiled confusedly and asked me why he was in my laboratory, I closed my eyes and hugged him tightly.

If this is the work of the evil god, then I can understand why the natives are crazy because of the evil god.

When Guy woke up, he forgot everything that had happened in the past seven days – sneak attacks on innocent villages, killing children and women in neutral zones, and being shot dead after his rebellion.

Everything, he couldn't remember anything.

I carefully hid him in the laboratory, almost anxiously waiting for the war to come, but before the war came, Guy still got the information he wanted from a recruit who came to clean the laboratory.

He knew what had happened in the past seven days, and he also knew that the commander would summon enough artillery fire to launch the final battle – to blow up all the native habitats and the natives inside, as well as all surrounding neutral areas where the natives might flee.

Although this neutral zone did not participate in the war from beginning to end, and most of them were women and children, the commander felt that this kind of indigenous people with despicable beliefs must be exterminated, and they should not be left with any chance to reproduce and share resources with us.

You can predict what Guy will do.

Guy went to assassinate the commander without hesitation. After the failure, he was blasted into a gun board full of holes by hundreds of guns, and burned to ashes by a flamethrower.

When I arrived at the scene, nothing was left.

I told the soldier on guard that I was on duty for him, and then I naturally stood alone all night at the place where Guy was burned to death, leaving black marks, letting my tears fall numbly in the dark night.

Elena, do you know what I saw that night?

I saw cannons as thick as a child's waist constantly being brought here, cold tanks, soldiers ready to go, and the eyes of the crowd filled with blood-red anger, fear, or greed.

At that moment, I realized that no matter how powerful the potion I invented, I still couldn't save anyone from this war.

People who want to kill others will still kill others, and people who don't want to kill will want to avoid dying painfully because they are unwilling to kill.

There seems to be a natural food chain between these two types of people, running endlessly.

Even the ability to resurrect the dead and reverse time seems to be unable to change the outcome of this war.

So I filled out the form to sign up for the commando team, and I wanted to go deep into the rainforest to meet the evil god who gave me the ability to realize my desires——

——Ask him what he needs to do to give everyone a lasting ending in this war.

For this, I am willing to give everything.

Elena, if I don't come back after this war, please forgive me for selfishly entrusting my parents to you. Please take care of them until you reach adulthood, and then go pursue your own life.

—-Alex.]

“This is the last letter I received from Alex,” Elena whispered with trance-like eyes. “The next day, the war broke out.”

“I still can’t forget that war. The artillery fire shook the small town where I lived. Ash fell off the wall. Plates and wine glasses were shattered on the floor. Planes were flying around outside the window. Everyone was scared. Huddled together at home, I hid under the bed and could see the fire flickering in the distance.”

Elena was silent for a few seconds: “The artillery fire lasted for three days. On the evening of the third day, the town where the soldiers were stationed, where the weapons were stored was attacked by the natives. The natives sprinkled the weapons with a magical red paint. “It ended up causing a huge explosion.”

“After the explosion subsided, there was no movement in the town and the rainforest that was blasted through. It wasn’t until half a month later that someone came to take over.” Elena looked at Bai Liu, “You said you were Alex’s comrade but that is impossible.”

“Because there were no survivors in that war.”

The Dense Forest Borderlands

Elena closed her eyes and her voice was hoarse:

"…… I waited four years, until I was an adult, and every day I wanted to hear about Guy and Alex's remains in the newspapers and on the radio, but I didn't wait until all the channels I had access to no longer broadcast news about the war. "

"…I gave up and kept waiting."

Elena's chest rose and fell slightly: "After I became an adult, I left the town to go to school, work, and live, but this place still haunts me. After I turned thirty, I saved up money and came to this small town where there was a war."

"It was very prosperous at that time, and the damage after the war was still repaired to some extent. Some people built a large factory relying on the rich wood resources of the rainforest, which attracted many people to work, but this prosperity did not last long. "

Elena looked back in the direction of the abandoned town: "The workers and machine tools in the large factory were running day and night, transporting the wood here to the world. Soon the wood here was exhausted, and a lot of trees were lost. Rainforests that originally received heavy rainfall gradually turned into deserts."

"… Later, everyone here left again, and I am the only old woman who is still guarding the tomb here." Elena patted the tombstone where she was sitting, and suddenly said, "Oh, by the way, didn't I forget to tell you about this cemetery?"

She rubbed her temples and sighed: "… When people get old, they tend to mess things up. This cemetery was used as a collective cemetery to bury dead soldiers during the war. After the war, it was acquired by a private owner and turned into a cemetery. Commercial cemetery for sale."

"But most of the corpses buried here are nameless corpses from the war. The government did not allow them to be removed, so they have been buried here. The named corpses were all taken away by their families."

"When I came here, I found the owner of this cemetery and said that I was willing to spend my own money to build two empty tombs for Alex and Guy in this cemetery. That is to say, there are no corpses in the tombs, only the remains of them. Something for me."

When Elena said this, her eyes became vacant: "But they quickly gave me a reply, saying that Alex can have a cemetery in this cemetery, but Guy Davis cannot."

"…I asked them why, and they said that because Guy Davis had a rebel record, according to regulations, he was not eligible to be buried in any cemetery in the country."

Elena's voice suddenly became hysterical: "I screamed at this group of heartless businessmen; I said Guy Davis is dead!! He has been dead for more than ten years! Even God can forgive him after death. It's not your turn to judge him for his crime!"

"Even a mouse with indigenous blood can purchase a grave in your cemetery. Why can't an upright and kind person be buried!!"

Elena held on to the tombstone with a fierce look in her eyes. She choked and gasped:

"…I was young and vigorous at that time, and I was unwilling to accept it. I almost lost all my money and sold all my clothes and jewelry in order to sell them to Guy's tomb from this cemetery seller…"

Elena smiled proudly, but tears fell from the corners of her eyes:

"I still succeeded. This cemetery dealer agreed to sell me the grave in violation of the regulations. You see, with enough money, the sins of this group of people who refuse to give up pursuing even death can be easily erased."

"… After the cemetery dealer left here, this cemetery fell into ruins. I retaliated by changing all the tombstones here to Guy's name. At that moment, it was really a mischievous pleasure."

Speaking of this, Elena fell silent.

"…In Alex's grave, I put some things that I took from his house, Guy, in Guy's grave…" Elena couldn't help but take a deep breath, "Because I really can't find it. I didn't want anything related to him, so I put in the old wedding dress I made for him."

Bai Liu looked at Elena calmly: "Later, you found that the wedding dress was missing, right?"

Elena looked directly into Bai Liu's eyes: "Yes, there hasn't been a day in these years when I haven't been tortured by the guilt of not agreeing to his marriage to Alex. I put it in Guy's grave. The letter I later wrote to him agreeing to all his requests, and the wedding dress."

"But one day the tomb was opened, and the wedding dress and letter inside were gone. There was still a reply letter from Guy. It was indeed his handwriting. The ink on it was not dry yet and was still fresh." Elena's breathing quickened, "I doubt, doubt…"

Bai Liu asked softly: "You suspect that they are not dead yet, they are still alive, but they just don't want to see you."

Elena was silent for a long time and said softly: "…Yes."

"I started to experiment, and I found that whenever I put the wedding dress and letters on the grave, they would sometimes disappear the next day, and sometimes it would take a long time to disappear, and some new letters would appear, and the letters would disappear. It's from fifty years ago."

Elena breathed out: "These two things representing repentance may be the only reason why they are willing to come to see me. I started writing them according to the content of the letters and making wedding dresses for them, hoping that they would be willing to keep them. Come down and take a look at me."

"…I hope I can personally say to Guy and Alex, I'm sorry, and God wishes you happiness forever."

[May God wish you happiness forever] – Bai Liu had seen this sentence on Guy's wedding dress.

Elena drooped her eyelids and said with some difficulty in breathing: "…I waited and waited for who knows how many years, made who knows how many wedding dresses, and wrote how many letters, until everyone left. Here, I still haven't stopped waiting for them to come see me."

"…Sometimes, I suspect that I have gone crazy." Elena smiled, her eyes full of the vicissitudes of life, "I will see Guy in a wedding dress and holding a bouquet appearing in this cemetery from time to time. He still has a happy and beautiful smile on his face that I hope he can have. "

"…But when I got closer, I found that he was just a corpse that had been stitched together."

She looked at Bai Liu with cloudy eyes: "If you are really Alex and Guy's comrades, please tell them that I don't expect them to forgive me for my despicable behavior. I just hope to meet them. It's okay even if they don't forgive me."

Elena slowly shed a tear: "…I just want to see them be happy."

"And not because of me, Alex's fiancée, who can't be together until death."

"I will tell them." Bai Liu stood up and smiled softly, "The wedding dress you made is very beautiful and suits Guy very well."

Elena was stunned and raised her head.

Bai Liu said softly: "I have attended their wedding. Guy likes your wedding dress very much. He was very happy when he married Alex in the wedding dress. He said that he was so happy that he would willingly die for it the next second, too.."

Elena opened her lips. The look on her face was empty and broken. She looked at Bai Liu with suspicion and forced a smile: "Hey, young man, it's enough to tell some flattering lies once already…."

Bai Liu pulled out a silk-like white gauze scarf from his pocket.

Elena stopped talking in disbelief.

"This is the veil of one of your wedding dresses. My friend accidentally pulled it off Guy's head during the wedding." Bai Liu handed it to Elena and smiled, "I never lie to please people, ma'am."

Elena stared at the veil for a long time, then tremblingly stretched out her hand to touch it: "…the hair on it is indeed Guy's hair. This is a wedding dress I made a long time ago. The thread hasn't been connected here yet."

"Are they…happy?" Elena held the veil and raised her head carefully and asked.

Bai Liu lowered his eyes: "They are indeed living happily in a place where you can't see them."

After Elena handed the letter to Bai Liu, Bai Liu and his party said goodbye to her and went back.

Liu Jiayi frowned in confusion: “If this is the real game world line, and the false game world line we experienced is the same relationship between the inner world and the outer world like Rose Factory, then there should be only one Guy— No, there were probably so many Guys who wore all the wedding dresses that Elena made.”

“Is it possible that it’s a seven-day cycle?” Tang Erda tried to come up with a new explanation. “The real world outside is running as usual, and the war world inside is a seven-day cycle. There will be a Guy in each cycle, and then Guy will be killed after death. Alex was buried in the cemetery.”

Bai Liu shook his head: “No, there is a contradiction in this explanation.”

Tang Erda asked: “What is the contradiction?”

Bai Liu glanced at him: “The effect of Alex’s potion is to change things back to the way they were seven days ago. It is not a cycle in the true sense. He can only restore existing things to the way they were seven days ago.”

“In other words, if Guy ran from the war world line to the real world line, then there would be no Guy in the war world line.” Liu Jiayi quickly reacted, “But we did see Guy in the war world line, so this argument doesn’t work.”

“And only Guy has multiple living dead. No one else in the War World line has this situation.”

Liu Jiayi thought: “I think the general direction of Tang Erda’s seven-day cycle is correct, but there must be something wrong with Guy, the NPC. I don’t understand why he is allowed to enter from the war world line to the real-world line?”

“You have to ask Alex, the creator of the War World Line.” Bai Liu looked up at the mist that appeared in front of him again.

The Dense Forest Borderlands

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

With the help of Spades' whip, Bai Liu and the others passed through the fog smoothly without encountering any monsters.

But after they passed through, the scene they saw was completely different from before. The rainforest, which was originally full of towering trees, was filled with gray fog. A large area of trees was burning, and the air was full of ashes from the burning flames. The sky was so dark that it could only let out faint light, making it impossible to distinguish between day and night.

A strong, pungent odor of exploding gunpowder immediately hit them, and the bitterness of carbon could be tasted the moment they opened their mouths.

Tang Erda choked and coughed twice, covering his mouth and nose then said: "What happened in this war world during the hour that we were out?"

"The flow of time in the world of war is different from that outside." Bai Liu looked around. "The timeline here fast-forwards to the end of the Great War after we left."

Liu Jiayi waved her hand at the tip of her nose and looked up at Bai Liu: "——Is it the point where everyone died after the explosion that Elena was talking about?"

"Generally speaking, at this point, an excellent horror game will design some very exciting climax plots." Bai Liu looked at the mist-filled rainforest, "For example, a large-scale chase battle."

Tang Erda was startled: "Why is there a chase? Isn't everyone dead at this point and about to enter the next seven-day reincarnation?"

Liu Jiayi took out the poison from her waist, took two steps back cautiously, and narrowed her eyes slightly: "It is precisely because these people are dead that this is the most dangerous place before entering the next seven-day reincarnation."

Bai Liu looked directly at the rainforest where something seemed to be emerging: “Because this means that except for us players, this war dungeon map is full of monsters and the living dead.” Tang Erda also became alert. He paused before drawing out his gun, and subconsciously glanced back at Spades, who was totally silent next to him.

Spades looked at Tang Erda silently, his hand on the handle of the whip behind his waist, his fingers seemed a little eager to move, as if he still wanted to stop Tang Erda from drawing the gun.

Tang Erda: “…”

As if aware of the silent confrontation behind him, Bai Liu turned around and glanced at Spades lightly.

Spades stiffened inexplicably, then silently turned the whip handle towards Tang Erda.

Tang Erda breathed a sigh of relief, then he dared to take out his gun, and pointed it at the gray mist rainforest that was shaking constantly, as if something was about to appear.

But the rainforest only trembled, and nothing emerged, only the crackling of burning leaves and branches could be heard.

Just as Tang Erda looked at Bai Liu in confusion, Spades, who was by Bai Liu’s side, suddenly pulled out a whip and smashed it into the ground, causing the ground to burst open.

Along the lines that opened on the ground, the soil splashed to both sides. Not only soil, but also a few fingers were thrown out. Tang Erda looked at the lines from where Spades’ whip had smashed, his expression stiffened.

Buried in the ripples beneath the ground were countless pieces of corpses that seemed to have been blasted and torn apart, white with blood and gunpowder stains, shattered limbs, half heads, hands with exposed wrist bones, writhing waists, with all with their severed mouths aimed at Bai Liu and the others as if they were eyes.

These fragments that could not be pieced together into humanoid limbs were densely squirming in the soil, as if they had smelled prey and were hiding in the ground as they approached.

Countless charred hands suddenly drilled out of the mud under Bai Liu’s feet, grabbed his ankle and dragged it down. Tang Erda did not hesitate to shoot at the limbs and opened a big hole in the center of the palm accurately.

But it didn't help, these things were still twisting and tugging.

"The attack is ineffective." Bai Liu, who was caught, analyzed calmly, "These broken limbs are already in the state of the living dead. If you can't kill them, you have to find their weaknesses."

Spades swung his whip over and circled the living dead's hand, trying to pull it off Bai Liu's feet. He only pulled it once and then quickly stopped and slowly raised his head to look at Bai Liu.

Bai Liu looked back at him calmly: "It can't be torn off."

Liu Jiayi suddenly lowered her head and looked at Bai Liu's ankle. She squatted down and wanted to take a closer look, but Bai Liu stopped her.

Bai Liu lowered his eyes and looked at the fragmented limbs on his feet: "These things have grown with me and cannot be torn off."

"Grown together?!" Tang Erda lowered his head in shock.

The green and black fingers on Bai Liu's ankle pinched into the ankle, half of the knuckles were sunk in, and the skin was perfectly bonded together, like a hand that suddenly grew out of Bai Liu's ankle. At the same time, half of the knuckles at the end of Bai Liu's left hand fingers also turned blue-black.

"This monster's attack method is called [Fusion of Life and Death]. As long as the corpse touches the player, it will become a part of the player's body." Bai Liu raised his head, "When I am attacked by all the corpses of a person's body parts, the corpse pieces will completely merge into my body, turning me into a living dead."

As soon as he finished speaking, the hand on Bai Liu's foot disappeared, and his entire left hand turned blue-black, hanging motionless by his side.

The corpses kept getting closer, but they all seemed to have a target and jumped over other people to rush straight towards Bai Liu.

Tang Erda struck several corpses and blew them away. Liu Jiayi used poison to draw a circle. Spades whipped out a clean area in the circle. He looked straight at Bai Liu: "What did you do? Why are these corpses only attacking you?”

Bai Liu shrugged his shoulders and said, “Maybe it’s because I’m the player with the lowest evaluation in the comprehensive panel here? Do they think I’m easy to bully?

Spades retorted almost without thinking: “You lied.”

“Don’t worry about what Bai Liu did for the moment!” Liu Jiayi interrupted Spades’ questioning, “These things can’t be killed. If we stay here, we will be completely transformed into corpses. Don’t let Bai Liu touch the ground. Put Bai Liu on your back and leave first!”

As soon as Liu Jiayi finished speaking, Tang Erda and Spades, who were standing on the left and right of Bai Liu, almost simultaneously made a move to grab Bai Liu, who was standing in the middle.

Both of them were a full head taller than Bai Liu. They grabbed Bai Liu’s shoulders and lifted them up at the same time. There was only one result—— ——Bai Liu’s feet lifted off the ground, and he was lifted into the air like a primary school student. His feet were still swinging left and right in the air twice.

Spades: “You are so short, Bai Liu.”

Liu Jiayi: “!!!”

Tang Erda: “!!!”

It’s over, Bai Liu will definitely be angry!

Bai Liu slowly raised his head and smiled at Spades: “Really?”

On the way to escape, Tang Erda lowered his head and covered his mouth, not daring to look up at all. He looked left and right, cleaning up the nearby corpses on the ground. Liu Jiayi took a deep breath, suppressed the upturned corner of her mouth, turned her face away professionally, and used poison to disperse them as the body parts followed.

Liu Jiayi approached Tang Erda and whispered, “Did you take pictures?”

Tang Erda hesitated: “It’s not too good…”

Liu Jiayi rolled her eyes: “Don’t you think it’s funny?”

Tang Erda tried his best to be serious: “Fortunately, I have received strict training and will not easily laugh at my team’s tacticians…”

Spades took the lead and smashed the ground with his whip to clean up the corpses in front of him.

Bai Liu had straddled Spades’ shoulders, while Spades carried Bai Liu forward staggeringly.

“Am I still short now?” Bai Liu asked Spades slowly.

Spades paused: “No, you are very tall.”

——It is really too childish to increase one’s height by riding on other people’s shoulders, especially if it is done by Bai Liu, who is smiling but does not express his emotions.

This was too funny!

Tang Erda, who was behind him, finally couldn’t hold back his laughter.

Liu Jiayi said speechlessly: “Unless you really can’t help it, right?”

Spades who was in front quickly swept away the nearby corpses. After a while, he asked Bai Liu: “Are you angry because you are not tall?”

Bai Liu was quiet for a second and said lukewarmly: “No, I won’t care about such a trivial matter.”

Spades took a deep breath, then he swung out his whip and wrapped it around the trunk of a big tree nearby, and pulled it up suddenly. Both Spades and Bai Liu on his shoulders were pulled upwards by the whip.

He lightly stepped on the tree trunk, and using his strength, he shot out his whip and wrapped it around the trunk of another taller tree. At the same time, with a clear vision, he knocked off several corpses that fell from the shaking trunk.

After several back and forths, Spades smoothly jumped to the top of the tallest tree in the rainforest, which was enough to overlook the entire rain forest.

Bai Liu shook his head and then stabilized his sitting position on Spades.

Spades' chest rose slightly, and his voice was serious: "Now you are the tallest person in the world."

Bai Liu's expression moved slightly, and just when he was about to speak, he heard Spades continue to say calmly: "——We can use this external thing to make up for our innate shortcomings. Bai Liu, don't be angry with yourself for your physical shortcomings. "

"It's not your fault that you are so short." Spades said every word.

Bai Liu: "…"

Bai Liu slowly exhaled a long breath and recited a few words quickly in a low voice.

Spades seemed to understand: "Bai Liu, what are you talking about?"

Bai Liu said calmly: "I am reading an ancient limerick that has been passed down to this day."

Spades: "What kind of limerick is it?"

Bai Liu smiled: "[Don't be angry.]"

Spades slowly said: "? Why are you reciting this?"

"Because it can repair my mental decline caused by emotional ups and downs." Bai Liu said.

Spades nodded.

He understood that this was a spiritual bleaching poem, and he would learn it if he had the opportunity in the future.

But the top priority right now was something else.

Spades had carried Bai Liu here, on one hand to soothe the emotional damage Bai Liu had caused to himself due to his short height (…), and on the other hand, to see what changes had taken place in the entire rainforest map.

The originally dark green rainforest scene had turned gray and black. There were huge craters everywhere on the ground. The ground was constantly being arched into cracks. Broken limbs were constantly crawling out of the cracks, approaching the big tree where Bai Liu was. Looking down, it was dense and dark, like a bunch of ants looking for nests and food.

The closer he got to the town, the source of the explosion, the more broken the limbs Bai Liu saw. The closer he got to the lake, the more complete the corpses he saw.

And these complete corpses gathered in a place on the opposite side of the lake, seemingly cheering and jumping around something, their limbs and heads swaying crazily as if they were about to be thrown off in the next second.

Bai Liu squinted his eyes. He found a telescope from the props and looked through it. He adjusted the focus and finally saw clearly what was surrounded by the corpses.

A pieced-together sculpture of an evil god, five wooden stakes, and five people being tied to the wooden stakes.

The pile of black things stacked under the five people tied to the stakes looked like firewood, but Bai Liu looked carefully for a while and found that the pile was moving.

Bai Liu looked at it intently for a while, and finally determined that the pile of things was not firewood at all, but broken arms and calves that had been blown up to the point that they were dry as firewood.

These charcoal-black, dry limbs were piled like wood under five wooden stakes. A bucket of red paint was placed next to each stake. There were also six “wood fire” stacks – piles of broken limbs – placed around the five wooden piles.

These broken limbs were constantly moving and struggling, trying to climb onto the people on the wooden piles, but they were stomped down again and again by the dancing corpses, and each time they stepped on them, red paint fell on these broken limbs.

——This was obviously a weird human sacrifice ceremony in progress.

Bai Liu further adjusted the focus, trying to see clearly who the five people tied to the stakes to worship the evil god were, and then he raised his eyebrows subtly.

“Spades, I see four of your teammates being tied up by monsters.”

Spades nodded without any reaction, indicating that he understood, and then asked: “I saw five wooden stakes. Who is the other one tied up?”

“It’s someone we couldn’t even imagine.” Bai Liu smiled, “It’s Alex.”

Chapter End Notes

> A limerick is a form of humorous poetry that consists of five lines. It has a specific rhythmic pattern (anapestic meter) and a rhyme scheme of AABBA, where the first, second, and fifth lines rhyme with each other, and the third and fourth lines share a different rhyme.
>
> Here’s an example of a limerick:
> There once was a man from Peru (A)
> Who dreamt he was eating his shoe (A)
> He awoke with a fright (B)
> In the middle of the night (B)
> To find that his dream had come true! (A)
>
> The limerick Bai Liu is referring to is likely this well-known Chinese nursery rhyme:
>
> 别人生气我不气，气出病来无人替。
> 我若生气中他计，气死自己为不值。
>
> Translation:
> "If others get angry, I won’t. If I get sick from anger, no one will suffer for me.
> If I get angry, I fall into their trap. Dying from anger is not worth it."

The Dense Forest Borderlands

Spades carried Bai Liu on his back and jumped along the branches with fewer corpses, moving with great leaps. Bai Liu was riding unsteadily on him. In order to stabilize Bai Liu, Spades first pulled Bai Liu's calf with his hand before moving his hand up to pull his thighs, and then…

In the middle of the process, Bai Liu calmly lowered his legs, from sitting on Spades' shoulders to clinging onto Spades' back, and put the hand that was about to move up to his buttocks on Spades' side: "I can hold myself up just fine, you don't need to help me."

Spades made a sound without realizing it, and the posture of withdrawing his hand to draw out the whip instantly became cold. The shiny black bone whip flicked out unexpectedly, the twisting whip like a poisonous snake in the air. Fiercely, he threw it at a corpse that jumped on the tree branch and almost split it in half with the whip.

Bai Liu looked at the corpse monster that fell from the air, the middle of its body sunken in: "Did you deliberately save your strength so as not to break the opponent in half?"

"Yeah." Spades responded.

He whipped back without looking back, with almost the same force. It only made a dent in the middle of another corpse, stopping its movement, but it did not damage the overall structure of the corpse.

Spades took the time to briefly reply to Bai Liu: "These things can't be beaten to death. It's not a good thing if they are broken and their numbers increase."

Bai Liu suddenly became interested and asked him: "You were so reckless when playing games before. You just killed monsters indiscriminately and didn't care about the quantity or quality of monsters. Why are you so careful with the monsters in this game?"

"Because these monsters are not coming for me." Spades looked back at Bai Liu indifferently, "They are coming for you."

Spades didn't say everything, but Bai Liu already understood what this man meant.

Bai Liu was quiet.

As soon as Spades finished speaking, a torso with exposed internal organs flew towards Bai Liu from behind, and was knocked away by Spades' merciless whip.

Even when knocking away such a rotten and decayed abdomen, Spades' control prevented any organ from falling out, ensuring that the number of monsters did not increase.

Bai Liu was only quiet for a moment, then changed the subject as if nothing happened: "Don't you want to ask me why The Reverse God and the others were kidnapped? This happened to your teammates. Given their strength, this is a strange thing."

"Oh." Spades nodded as if he had just remembered such a thing, and continued following Bai Liu's words without much care, "They were tied up, but what does this have to do with me?"

Bai Liu: "…"

Bai Liu said slowly: "You are their league teammate. For all intents and purposes, you should show appropriate concern for the safety of your teammates at this time."

Spades understood quickly, and he immediately said: "I will care about them now."

He took out a golden bell from his waist, half the size of his palm. Seeing Bai Liu looking at it inquiringly, Spades explained: "This is a reward prop from an ancient dungeon of the game. It's called twin bells. When one bell vibrates, the other will also vibrate."

"We have refreshed the dungeon three times. There are six bells in total, all of which are bound to the vibration relationship. If one vibrates, the other five will too. In some ancient or pre-modern dungeons where modern instruments cannot be used to communicate, The Reverse God requires that we use this bell to communicate."

Spades said: "The Reverse God also specially formulated a set of vibration frequency codes for this bell. Different vibrations represent different meanings."

Bai Liu commented with interest: "This is a good communication tool."

Without saying a word, Spades took out a bell from the system panel and handed it to Bai Liu: “I have two, I’ll give you one.”

Bai Liu glanced at the bell with a half-smile but didn’t answer: “You’d just hand over the communication tools within your team to me so easily?”

Spades looked at Bai Liu and said in a very matter-of-fact tone: “You also gave me your team communication tools, why can’t I give mine to you?”

Bai Liu was silent for a moment – he actually sold it to Spades for 10,000 points.

Spades directly threw the bell into Bai Liu’s arms, then held the whip in one hand and the bell in the other and shook it quickly.

The sound of bells ringing could be heard from Bai Liu’s arms and in the distance at the same time, startling many corpses in the forest, and they all moved towards the place where the bells were ringing.

Spades shook it violently and forcefully. Bai Liu looked at it for a while but couldn’t make out any clues. The pattern of Spades’ shaking didn’t match any of Bai Liu’s known codes. He had to ask: “Are you contacting them using a bell code?”

Spades said: “I don’t remember the bell password made by The Reverse God.”

Bai Liu paused for a moment, and his eyes moved to Spades’ bell that was still shaking rapidly: “Then what are you doing…?”

Spades answered very frankly: “Didn’t you ask me to care about them? I’m just concerned about them.”

Bai Liu: “…”

His eyes moved down to the bell, and then he looked at the members of the Killer Sequence who were tied to the stakes from a distance. The unusual sound of the bell attracted a large number of corpses that were screaming in agony.

Bai Liu silently withdrew his gaze and looked at Spades who finally stopped ringing the bell.

Spades turned to look at him: “Do you still need me to care about them?”

Bai Liu: “No need.”

He finally understood why The Reverse God was willing to give him five million points to help educate Spades.

Across the lake.

Bai Yi looked at the corpses that were constantly approaching him, and screamed like a chicken that was being held by four butchers to chop its head off: “Ah! Who the hell is ringing the bell!!”

Bai Jiamu snapped and interrupted Bai Yi’s screams: “Can you stop? You and the sound of the bell mixed together are almost giving me a fucking concussion!”

“Between me and the bell, only one of us can stop the sound!” Bai Yi kicked the corpse climbing up below and yelled at the top of his voice, “Reverse God, tactician, who among us is ringing the bell! Make him stop!”

The Reverse God, who was tied to the wooden stake, sighed deeply: “It’s like this, Bai Yi. The hands of the four of us are tied very tightly. Logically speaking, we don’t have any bells to ring, so the person ringing the bell should not be here.”

Bai Yi understood instantly, and he choked up sadly: “Is our sixth bell stolen? I said at the beginning that five bells are enough, and if there is one more bell, it should be destroyed instead of kept. This sixth bell should be destroyed. If the bell falls into the hands of others, it will be a huge hidden danger, but The Reverse God insists on keeping this one, saying that this bell has its own destiny. Look, something is happening now…”

Bai Jiamu rolled his eyes and interrupted Bai Yi’s thoughts: “Silly, it’s not the sixth bell, it’s Spades who is ringing the bell.”

Bai Yi instantly restrained his miserable expression and retorted seriously: “Impossible. I have never seen Spades ring the bell after he got it. He won’t ring the bell.”

“That doesn’t mean that it won’t happen now.” Bai Jiamu replied breathlessly, “This one is not easy, if Spades can’t get through it, he might contact us…”

When Bai Jiamu said this, Bai Yi also asked in a subtle way with his eyes: [“Do you think this kind of thing is possible?”]

“I once saw Spades stepping on and hitting the bell with his whip, trying to break it.” Bai Yi recalled, “I was very shocked and stepped forward to stop him and asked him why he was doing it.”

The Reverse God was also very shocked: “This is an important prop that I saved through hard work in the game, and used to communicate within the team. Why would he do this!”

Bai Yi replied quietly: “Because he felt very annoyed. It kept vibrating and he couldn’t turn it off, so he just wanted to smash it.”

The Reverse God’s whole face was about to crack: “That’s because he doesn’t reply to our messages at all, okay! That’s all because everyone is exchanging game information intensely!”

Bai Yi smacked his lips: “Actually, Spades hates this bell. It’s not that I can’t understand it. It’s like there are many people chatting in a work group. You can’t leave the group, and you can’t block the leader’s messages, and the phone also keeps vibrating.”

“But when Spades is alone and is having fun playing games, he doesn’t want to be disturbed…”

The Reverse God’s eyes were glazed over, like an old father who was hit hard after he bought his rebellious son a toy that he didn’t like: “… So he wants to smash the bell I gave him?”

Bai Yi stomped on the corpse underneath him a few times, looked at The Reverse God sympathetically, and decided to change the topic: “So I don’t think Spades is shaking it. He probably doesn’t have any bells in this game.”

The Reverse God shook his head: “No, it must be Spades shaking it.”

Bai Yi asked suspiciously: “No, who took our sixth bell? Is it possible that that person is ringing it?”

The Reverse God’s eyes widened: “It must be Spades shaking it…”

“The sixth bell was originally in the warehouse, but last time Spades told me that his bell was broken and he could not participate in the team discussion. So I opened the warehouse before this game and handed the sixth bell to Spades with great care. I told him that this was a prop that I got with great difficulty, and asked him to take good care of it and not break it again. I didn't expect that he would break it on his own initiative…"

The Reverse God looked sad at the end.

Bai Yi: "…"

Bai Jiamu: "…"

…What's going on? It's a pitiful story that this kind of honest father works hard to buy toys for his son, but the supercilious son throws them away just because he doesn't like them, and even lies to the father that he was careless.

"But Reverse God," Bai Jiamu turned to look at The Reverse God next to him, "When those indigenous living dead came to arrest us, we didn't attack them, but surrendered and chose to be kidnapped by them. How did you know that they will no longer fuse and devour us?"

The Reverse God calmly looked at the wooden sculpture of the Evil God facing him: "Because the old Evil God statue is broken, a new Evil God statue needs to be replaced. This rotation generally means that the cracks in the powerful old Evil God will appear. He is looking for his next successor, a new evil god."

"This kind of rotation of religious gods requires a large-scale sacrifice and ceremony to support it. When the conflict between the old and new gods is particularly intense, this rotation is usually accompanied by huge wars."

The Reverse God lowered his eyes to look at the charred corpses and continued:

"In the ceremony of the birth of a new evil god, sacrifices and witnesses are needed. The sacrifices are those who oppose the evil god, and the witnesses are those who have experienced the history of the evil god."

The Reverse God said lightly: "There are no better sacrifices and witnesses than us. They will not fuse us easily. They need us to maintain a clear consciousness to witness the rituals of the new gods. This is a tribute to the new gods."

As they talked, Alex, who had been keeping his head down on the fifth stake next to him, as if he was unconscious, slowly opened his eyes.

He raised his head and looked directly at the wooden sculpture of the evil god facing him, with an unknown smile full of anger and sadness at the corner of his mouth.

The wooden sculpture of the evil god standing in the center had obvious signs of repair. The wooden sculpture's head, which had been chopped with a scalpel and shot once, stood on the wooden body with a smile, looking down at the scene with scarred and pitiful eyes. There were corpses dancing before his eyes, and five sacrifices tied to stakes.

In front of the evil god's wood carving, there was a huge piece of wood standing. The wood was split in the middle. It could be seen from the cross section that the material is the same as the one used to carve the evil god's wood statue.

The corpses moved their hands shakily and carved on this cross-section with axes and chisels. They could already see the outline of a new wood carving. With the progress of the carving work of the corpses, the wood carving born from the logs became more and more lifelike and realistic.

The wood carving of the New Evil God gradually took on a human form.

Bai Yi glanced at the wooden sculpture's eyes twice. For the first time in so many games, he felt an unspeakable creepiness. He gently kicked Bai Jiamu next to him with his foot and whispered: "Hey, did I see it wrong? The more I look at this wooden sculpture, the more I feel like it's—"

The Reverse God took a deep breath and looked at the smiling wooden sculpture of the new evil god: "——Bai Liu, right?"

The Dense Forest Borderlands

The wood carving gradually took shape, and the corpse under the stake tried to climb up restlessly.

Bai Yi twisted his body to remind The Reverse God: “The main NPC Alex finally woke up! Reverse God, you should quickly complete his story line, so that we can unlock the rest of the [True End] line.”

The Reverse God hummed, and he looked up at Alex who had just woken up: “Although I know that the whole world is just a scam created by the evil god who gave you power, I still don’t understand why you ended up becoming a believer of the evil god.”

“——It even came to the point of sacrificing all the lives of the people to the evil god in order to create the illusion you wanted.”

Alex moved his hands, which were bound behind his back, but said nothing.

The Reverse God continued calmly: “In this world of war, a huge explosion occurred in the town the night before yesterday. Someone poured paint on the town’s arsenal that night and set it on fire.”

“The entire rain forest was blown up, and almost all the soldiers in the rainforest were killed. However, these soldiers did not really die. Instead, they strangely turned into a half-dead state, walking around the rainforest in the form of corpses and body parts.”

“Whether it was using paint to blow up the arsenal or giving so many people the special potion you invented, did you do it all by yourself?” The Reverse God asked.

Alex lowered his head, blood dripping from the ends of his hair. He chuckled nervously twice: “I did.”

The Reverse God sighed.

“…We found you unconscious not far from the exploded arsenal. After confirming that you were still alive, we took you away to avoid monsters and escaped, until you were captured by this group of old-school zombie natives as a sacrifice, and you just woke up.”

“You killed so many people. Isn’t this contrary to your original intention of saving lives? Why did you do such a thing?”

"…Because I can't save anyone." Alex slowly raised his head, his eyes staring at the broken wooden sculpture of the old god with empty eyes. "Even in this illusory world, I can't save anyone."

The Reverse God followed Alex's gaze, paused for a moment at the smiling face of the old evil god, and continued to ask: "What happened in the real world line?"

"… What happened…" Alex's eyes were hazy and his face was twisted, as if he was trapped in a painful memory that he couldn't bear to recall. "I saved Guy, but Guy… still died. He was burned to ashes. There was no possibility of resurrection."

"Guy died on the eve of the war."

"At that time, I was eager to use my medicine to change everything, to save everyone, to undo this war…"

Alex smiled sarcastically: "But who could have known that in the end, I would be the one to ignites the arsenal with paint?"

"But this cowardly, deformed country, the one I fought to protect, didn't even dare to record in history what really happened."

Alex laughed loudly: "They dare not write that it was me, a native of this country with no flaws in my thinking from childhood to adulthood, a doctor dedicated to saving everyone, who set fire to the warehouse because he discovered the evil of war."

"They were writing that a group of natives had attacked the munitions depot, using this to prove that they were right in starting the war – these natives were just as stupid and hopeless as their recruitment advertisements said, and they were very worthy of being enslaved and blown to pieces."

The Reverse God asked: "What did you do during the war?"

Alex was silent for a few seconds, his voice hoarse: "…I signed up for the assault team after Guy died. I wanted to take advantage of the chaos of the war to go deep into the indigenous tribe and see if the evil god statue that gave me the power to change life and death could give me an answer to save everyone."

"It rained heavily on the day of the battle. When I swam across the lake, I was already shot with five or six bullets. I was dying." Alex seemed to want to laugh, but his mouth was pressed down, and he looked like he was about to cry. "… But I didn't die. I saw the wooden sculpture of the evil god."

"Then, I lay in a pool of blood, looking up at the wooden sculpture. I didn't even have the strength to speak. I could only pray over and over in my heart, asking, 'God, can you save everyone?'" Alex said in a daze, "… I don't remember how long I prayed. Suddenly, I heard the sculpture talking to me."

The Reverse God reacted very quickly: "Driven by extreme desire, you heard the evil god's oracle? What did he say to you?"

Alex's expression was blank. "He said he could make my wish come true, but he wanted me to play a game with him."

"If I win the game, I won't have to pay the price of my wish coming true, and if I lose, I'll be stuck in this game forever."

The Reverse God paused: "What game?"

Alex's breathing quickened. He looked at The Reverse God and said word by word, "A game he designed called 'The Dense Forest Frontier'"

The Reverse God asked: "What is the content of the game?"

Alex took a deep breath and looked sideways at the broken wooden sculpture of the evil god. "He will turn the timeline back to seven days before everything happened and provide me with unlimited amounts of red paint to create an army of undead."

"I have a total of ten chances to reload the game. He will keep rewinding the timeline to seven days ago. As long as I can prevent the final war once out of ten times within these seven days, I will win the game. Otherwise, I will lose."

Alex hung his head: "I agreed to his request."

The Reverse God looked at Alex steadily: "So what did you do in this game?"

"In the first game, I chose to stop Guy from rebelling and used the Undead Potion to persuade him to stay in our army. I said I would secretly save the dead natives and our soldiers through the Undead Potion."

“I was still very naive at that time, and I had unrealistic expectations of my own side.” Alex blinked his eyes weakly, “… I thought that as long as we gave them the final victory, the war would be over.”

“I chose to assist my own army.”

“I tried my best to keep the secret of the potion, but soon, the people I saved found that they were resurrected after death and were not afraid of harm for a period of time. They reported the secret to both organizations.”

“There are no better soldiers than the undead who have not yet been fully resurrected. Because I am in my own organization, after they learned the effect of the potion, they forced me to mass-produce an army of undead.”

“Of course I refused. No matter what kind of torture they used or who threatened me, I would never agree. I knew I had the Undead Potion, and I could do it all over again.” Alex paused awkwardly, then continued, “–but I didn’t expect that they would actually find a group of volunteers.”

The Reverse God asked: “What volunteer army?”

Alex’s breathing became rapid. “They brought a group of 100 new soldiers to me, blindfolded them, pointed guns and flamethrowers at them, and interrogated me. If I didn’t take out the potion to save them, they would shoot them to death and then burn their bodies completely with flamethrowers until they were reduced to ashes.”

The Reverse God was startled, as if he suddenly realized something. He looked down at the dry wood-like corpses under his feet and said, “Then are these——”

“Yes,” Alex said, “These are the bones of the volunteers.”

Alex closed his eyes. “The first time, I didn’t agree. The second time, I gritted my teeth and still didn’t agree.”

“They were shot and burned in front of me, time and again. The youngest volunteer was only 15 years old, with a pair of gray-blue eyes. He rolled on the ground for half an hour after being covered with a black cloth before he stopped struggling. Some of these volunteers were burned into black bones that could still be saved, while others were burned into ashes that could never be saved.”

“After countless tortures like this, I finally broke down and took out the potion to save a group of volunteers.”

After saying this, Alex was silent for a very long time. Both sides of his face were shaking with some intense emotion, and his voice was extremely hoarse:

“After the volunteers stood up from the ground, the senior officers who had been watching nearby actually applauded. The volunteers who had just been rescued by me actually took off their black cloths with joy, saluted the senior officers, and happily reported that they had completed their mission.”

Alex’s eyes were red and almost bleeding: “It was only then that I realized that these teenage volunteers all came voluntarily.”

“Every volunteer soldier who died because of me would receive a five-cent martyr medal. The superior officers told these kids that I had a very powerful biological weapon in my hands that could transform the dead into humanoid weapons.”

“But because I’m picky and selfish, I don’t think everyone is qualified to be transformed, so I’m unwilling to use this potion on everyone.”

“They told these children, ‘I am going to give you a dangerous mission. I will kill you first, and then let me select some people from the dead to have the right to be transformed.’”

“Those who are not chosen are the warriors who die for the victory of the war, while those who are chosen are about to become heroes of the war.”

Alex’s breathing was so fast that his voice was intermittent: “-They told these children that the dead soldiers died because of my cruelty, and the surviving soldiers survived for the war.”

“Every volunteer soldier who was shot dead in front of me volunteered to win the war.”

Alex clenched his fists, his expression gradually becoming numb. “They found my weakness. I couldn’t bear to see them die so cruelly in front of me. They started to bring volunteers here in batches. Sometimes, they even tortured the volunteers to provoke me to take out the potion and forced me to watch closely.”

“I clearly knew that these volunteers were willing to accept these tortures. For the sake of victory in the war, they could endure any torture."

"I rescued more and more soldiers, and my own undead army grew stronger and stronger. The war finally broke out."

Alex exhaled: "But in that war, because of the undead army, in order to save military expenses, only these undead soldiers and cold weapons were used. It did not meet the evil God's requirements for the scale of the war, so I did not lose the game."

"The war with the natives was over. It was the sixth day. I was in a trance and thought I was going to win the game tragically, but something unexpected happened."

Alex gritted his teeth and said, "The emergence of the undead has greatly fuelled the desires of the officers and the government. They feel that these undead were simply perfect weapons of war. They secretly approved the start of another war – to plunder all the territories on the other side of the rainforest."

"On the afternoon of the seventh day, I saw with my own eyes that they first fired a cannonball, which triggered a counterattack from the other side. Then they wrote in the report that the other side attacked us first, thus launching a full-scale war."

Alex said dryly, "It was a horrific war. I lost the first game and asked the evil god to let me go back to the past seven days."

The Dense Forest Borderlands

“The second time, Guy and I defected to the indigenous camp.” Alex narrated in a low voice.

“This time, with Guy’s encouragement, I learned about this group of natives and their evil god beliefs. I used to think they were very ignorant, but that was the first time I felt that ignorance was a good thing.”

Alex chuckled twice: “Their faith comes from the land and the evil god. They will never leave the territory given to them by the evil god to invade other places. In other words, they will not launch large-scale wars and continue to invade other places like my army did.”

“I foolishly thought that if I could just let the natives win the war peacefully, it would all be over.”

“I already know that hiding this potion is useless, because those who were saved by me will tell their own camp about the effect of this potion no matter what, so this time I chose to tell the natives the effect of the potion directly.”

Alex lowered his head and his expression could not be seen clearly: “After resurrecting two more dead natives, they easily believed me. I created a large number of native undead armies, formulated a plan, and attacked the enemy in an orderly manner. Soon, I achieved a phased victory.”

“When the enemy was desperate and prepared to use a large number of artillery, I ambushed them with the undead army and transferred this artillery to the indigenous people.”

“On the sixth night, under the dual threat of the undead army and massive artillery fire, they finally gave in, chose to negotiate peacefully with the natives, and gave up further attacks.”

Alex’s voice was hoarse: “I don’t know how long this false peace could last, but I was relieved at that moment. After signing the peace agreement and stopping the war, I thought I would definitely win the game this time, but I never expected…”

He closed his eyes, took two deep breaths, and then continued with difficulty: “…When I returned to the native camp, they aimed their artillery at the group of undead troops that had been fully resurrected." "The natives said that these undead people were evil and cursed by the gods. They had tolerated the existence of these undead people until the end of the war, and only now did they finally decide to judge them."

Alex said hoarsely, "No matter how I explained that these undead would be no different from normal people after they were fully resurrected, they still didn't believe me. Unspeakable fear filled everyone's face. They shouted that these undead would not die easily and that they had to be bombarded repeatedly with cannons to smash them into pieces so that they could not be resurrected again."

"…Those undead were once their parents, friends, lovers, and even children. They knelt before me, hugged their corpses, and begged me to revive them. But now, after using those undead to win, they are afraid of their opponents' strength and declare them heretics. They want to send them to hell."

Alex sneered, "How ironic! I was originally glad that their foolishness didn't hurt others, but now it had become a weapon that hurts me."

"I shouted at the undead to flee, but they just stayed where they were."

"Because during the resurrection process, they will gradually recover their memories from seven days ago. They don't know what happened during these seven days. They just open their arms and smile to the relatives and friends who approach them then let them set up the artillery."

Alex gritted his teeth and said, "They still didn't understand what was happening until they were finally targeted by the cannons. I watched helplessly as they shouted the names of their loved ones, and were blown to pieces by them the moment they were fully resurrected."

"…I lost the second time, and I chose to reload the game again."

"In the third game, I didn't join any camp. I went crazy and kept creating my own undead army to attack and control the other two camps. The more they resisted, the more people died, and the larger my undead army became."

Alex took two deep breaths. "Just like that, I quickly took control of the situation. In order to contain me, the other two parties had to stop the war and chose to cooperate. One party transported a large number of artillery, and the other party used the terrain to coordinate with each other to attack me."

"But I intercepted the artillery fire again. After the first two times, I not only mastered the firepower distribution, but also had a clear understanding of the terrain. I thought that as long as I could hold on for seven days, I would be fine."

Alex paused and said, "On the sixth night, I went to ask the evil god. I said that as long as there is no war in these seven days, I will win, right?"

"He said yes, but the world line you are in will continue to run as the world line in which you win."

Alex shed a tear, and his voice choked up: "… In other words, if I win in this world line, I must continue to create undead to ensure the strength of my camp, clamp down on the cooperation of the other two camps, and prevent them from going to war."

"But after seven days, these undead people will become living people. They are no longer immortal, but normal living people with flesh and blood. If I continue to create undead people, I must keep killing people. If I stop killing people, the war will break out once more, and everything I want to change essentially remains the same."

"I chose to reload the game again."

Alex was silent for a long time, his eyes staring at the statue of the old evil god with empty eyes: "…I have come back ten times, I have tried everything to prevent the outbreak of the war, to prevent everyone from dying."

"But even if I have an unlimited supply of immortality potion and ten chances to start over, a large number of people will still die in this war."

"I realized that neither the potion nor I could save anyone. The only way to stop the war is if the initiator of the war does not exist, so that the harm of the war will not be further expanded."

Alex shed tears numbly: "So when I loaded the last save, I chose to use all the paint the evil god gave me to pour on the arsenal and kill everyone with my own hands on the eve of the war."

"Finally, the real world continued to operate with the ending that I killed everyone for the last time, and the world's time continued to flow forward."

"I lost the game with the evil god, so he combined my experiences that had been repeated ten times and created this nightmare-like world of war that keeps repeating. He froze me here forever as a character in his game, and watched my pain for fun."

Alex hung his head, tears dripping from his chin: "…The starting point of every cycle in this war world where I exist is always the arrival of a new group of soldiers that I have never seen before, and then it ends with these soldiers playfully sinking the undead I created to the bottom of the lake to count them."

"I can't remember how many times Guy was sunk to the bottom of the lake and reappeared in the tent, lying next to me. Other living dead would forget what happened seven days ago after they were resurrected. They didn't remember anything."

"But I remember."

Alex smiled nervously at the evil wooden sculpture, tears rolling down his cheeks: "–I remember every cycle!"

"Because I am not a living dead, I am the only living person in this world of the living dead. God does not allow me to die, so I cannot forget. I remember everything."

Alex's voice was so hoarse that it was almost a breath:

"At first I was trapped here and tried to change what happened here, trying to save them in this virtual world, but then I became desperate – I couldn't change anything."

He smiled blankly:

"No one understood what I was doing except Guy, who believed me completely, so I told him what was going to happen and Guy said, let's run away."

"We found a foggy blank area, which should be the boundary of this virtual war world. We tried many ways to get out but couldn't. However, Guy and I didn't give up. After each cycle, I talked to Guy again and we came here again to find a way out."

"Until one day." Alex whispered softly, "I knelt at the edge, the desire to not be trapped was driving me crazy, and I heard the voice of the evil god again. He asked me, ‘do you want to go out?’”

“I said yes, and he said he could design a way for me to get out, but only me or Guy could escape from here, so he let me choose.”

Alex’s eyes were red: “I chose to let Guy out.”

“Guy didn’t know anything. He couldn’t hear the evil god’s voice. I watched him disappear into the mist. A surprised voice came from the other end, saying, ‘Alex, I’m out!’”

“The fog disappeared in front of my eyes in an instant, and I saw Guy standing on the other side of the barrier. He smiled and waved, asking me to get out quickly. I said I needed to study the rules of how to get out, and that it might have been an accident. I might have to wait for the next seven days to get out.”

Alex blinked slightly. “Guy is the living dead. I know he will be completely resurrected in the next seven days and then forget that I am trapped in this world. He may think I am dead in the real world.”

“But at least, there is one person — my lover, who was saved by me.”

“Guy came to the edge of the barrier to find me every day. He couldn’t get in, and he shared with me what he saw outside every day. He told me with surprise that he found my grave and his grave, and that Elena’s letter and wedding dress were placed on top. He said that the little girl had grown up and actually made him a wedding dress.”

Alex’s voice choked up: “He was holding up the wedding dress and smiling so happily. For a moment, I felt that my pain had meaning.”

“But seven days later, I came to that border again, ready to see Guy for the last time before the cycle restarted…”

Alex was trembling all over. “I found Guy on the other side of the barrier. He was holding the wedding dress and had transformed into an unconscious corpse, a bluish-white zombie.”

“I almost went crazy, smashing the wooden sculpture of the evil god over and over again, asking him why.”

“The evil god told me that Guy was originally a living dead. When he left this virtual world and entered reality, the time in his body broke away from the time in the virtual world and synchronized with the real time.”

“The evil god said in a compassionate voice, Alex, have you forgotten? In the real world, in the ending you chose, Guy had already been blown to death by you. He was originally a corpse.”

“Guy can only live for seven days. After seven days, he will become what he should be in the real world.”

“I’m unwilling to accept this. I’ve tried time and again to get Guy to leave here, but I’ve failed every time. All I’ve done is add countless zombie brides to the border.”

Alex’s voice gradually faded away. “I finally gave up and numbly took the wedding dress and letter that Zombie Guy brought back. I will give them to another Guy in the next cycle so that he can wear Elena’s wedding dress and marry me before he dies. This may be the happiest thing for him.”

“… I can’t do anything else.”

The Reverse God stared at him: “You should hate the evil god very much. I don’t understand, why are you helping the evil god complete the sacrificial ceremony for the evil god’s new successor?”

Alex’s eyes moved, as if looking at the Reverse God, and then turned back to look at the statue of the new evil god: “-Do you know how to escape from the control of a god?”

The Reverse God was silent for a moment: “Go create a new god, huh?”

“How can you be sure that this new god is a good person and won’t continue to design games to torture you?”

Alex’s voice was so soft that it was almost inaudible:

“I don’t know, but I’ve never seen the evil god have such a strong obsession with a new soldier. The moment the soldier named Bai Liu entered this war world, I heard the evil god happily tell me that the new evil god, the successor he had chosen long ago, had finally arrived.”

“At that moment, I could hardly control my disgust towards Bai Liu. I also hated the subordinates he brought in. I hated them for contacting Guy.”

The Reverse God recalled in his heart – that’s why Bai Liu told him before that his favorability level fell below the safe value when he first saw Alex after entering the game, while the favorability levels of those players who chose to be in the enemy camp with Alex were all stable at above 60.

It turns out there was another reason behind this.

Alex continued, “But soon, I didn’t hate Bai Liu so much anymore, because the evil god told me that once the new god is formed, he will fall and his control over me will be lifted – this Bai Liu is here to destroy him and then inherit his throne.”

“The rotation between gods is so brutal, no different from humans.” Alex couldn’t help but smile sarcastically, “Maybe it’s because gods, by their very nature, are also humans filled with desire.”

“Have you ever thought about why the evil god told you this information that is harmful to him?” The Reverse God said, “What if he wants to kill you…”

The Reverse God stopped abruptly when he said this.

Alex turned his head to look at The Reverse God. His eyebrows were lowered, his eyes were gloomy, and his laughter maniacal: “—Who’s going to kill me? What I am least afraid of now is death.”

“I don’t want to save anyone anymore, and I’m not afraid of anything anymore. No matter what the cost, as long as I can end this, I’m willing to do it.”

Alex panted, his eyes red:

“That guy, when that evil god told me these things, when he said Bai Liu would destroy him, he was smiling from the bottom of his heart.”

“He fully expects Bai Liu to kill him and become the new evil god.”

Alex sneered morbidly: “–Maybe he is just like me, tired of living, and is almost going crazy waiting to die in this world full of ugly human desires, so he is looking forward to someone who can end his life.”

Alex stared at the wooden sculpture of the old evil god:

“You know, new soldier, I talked to this evil god once after I lost the game. He asked me condescendingly, if I knew why I lost the game?”

“I said I don’t know. I’ve tried my best, but I still can’t change anything. Why can't everyone survive?"

"So he laughed and said that most of the time human desires are based on harming each other. The more unhappy a person is, the more he wants to hurt others, or the stronger his desires are, the more meaningful his existence is."

"He is the one who sees, stores, and listens to all the evil desires in this world. As long as there is one person in this world whose desires smell of blood, the evil god's game will never stop."

Alex's eyes gradually moved from the old woodcarving to the face of the new woodcarving: "——And Bai Liu is the player he found who is most suitable for this game related to desire. His desire is so strong that he can transcend this game and touch the existence of God."

"Bai Liu is a player born for the evil god's game. Everything the evil god carefully prepared in the game, war, destruction, death, souls, are all to celebrate his coming."

"God favours him and is willing to die for him." Alex paused, "Whether it's the previous one who died long ago, or this one who is full of expectations."

The smile on the old wooden carving of the evil god grew eerily gentle and sweet, and the new wooden carving of the evil god was less than a third of the way to being born perfectly from the log.

The smile on the face of the evil god wooden sculpture was warm and peaceful, as if a compassionate god was hypocritically looking down on all living beings.

–

At the temple.

The petrification of the prophet sitting on the stone bench had spread to his heart, making it difficult for him to speak. His voice became hoarse: "–What did you put into this copy?"

The hooded man had an eerily gentle smile that was exactly the same as the one on the old wooden carving of the evil god. He clasped his hands together and then opened them, and a pure black whip and a suspended inverted cross appeared out of thin air between his hands.

"——His original weapons and beliefs."

The whip was covered with bone spurs and was extremely sharp. Compared with the previous siren bone whip and Spade's lizard bone whip, this whip looked similar, but it carried a very obvious murderous aura.

The inverted cross was made of some unknown stone, the colour of which seemed to be flowing blood, and it exuded a soul-stirring light.

The Prophet's pupils shrank for a moment: "You put Bai Liu's weapon and the reverse cross into this copy?"

"Bai Liu is the most perfect successor I chose from among so many Bai Liu's." The man smiled with indulgence, "I broke his original weapon and reverse cross, so I should replace them with newer and better ones, right?"

"It's like I killed his old god, so I should give him a more perfect new god."

The Prophet gasped with all his might: "Bai Liu hates you, he will not become your believer, so your statement of giving him a more perfect new god is not true at all. He will not believe in you, nor will he want what you give him. The only person Bai Liu will believe in is-"

"Tawil." The man under the hood opened his eyes and smiled, "But Prophet, if Tawil doesn't exist, you still missed a person that Bai Liu believes in."

The Prophet was stunned, and this time his face was completely frozen.

The man under the hood laughed: "—That's Bai Liu himself."

"The more perfect new god I'm talking about is not myself, but Bai Liu himself."

"Bai Liu can dislike me, hate me, despise me all he wants. I need him to have these emotions towards me." The man had a smile in his eyes that was not to be seen. "I will continue to take away the things he cherishes, so that Bai Liu will have to face me and kill me."

"—Because only a God has the power to kill God. Bai Liu should have fully understood this truth by now. In order to kill me, he has to accept all the gifts of God's power that I have given him—"

The man smiled softly: "—Then, as I wish, become the new evil god who kills me, the old god."

The Prophet spoke word by word with great effort, as if he was having difficulty breathing: "Do you really want Bai Liu to become the new god? You will be destroyed by him because of this."

The hooded man slowly stood up, his back to The Prophet who was almost petrified, and looked at the waves of the sea outside the temple, with a smile on his face and nothing reflected in his eyes:

"Prophet, you can see the future, so you should know that nothing in this world can last forever. Rocks, water, waves, sky, earth, even God will perish one day."

"—That's why living things have the instinct to reproduce. All conscious things are instinctively looking for some way to continue their existence."

The Prophet coughed and said, "Are you trying to seek the continuation of your existence in Bai Liu?"

"No, I think it's boring to pursue the continuation of this kind of existence." He smiled, "So I hope there is someone, a guy who completely complies with my game rules, a player who can crack all my games, who can break all the rules I set for each world and come to me, and kill me, the game designer, with his own hands."

His eyes hidden under the hood flashed with a strange light: "—Don't you think it's fun to be killed by such a person as a game?"

The Prophet spoke hoarsely: "—There are so many Bai Liu who can beat your game, why did you choose this Bai Liu as your successor?"

The man turned his head slightly and asked with interest: "—Then let me ask you, why do you put all your chips to win against me on this Bai Liu, why not on another Bai Liu."

The Prophet was silent.

The man turned his head, the sea breeze blowing his long ponytail outside the hood. He lowered his eyes and smiled gently: "—Because you and I both know that this Bai Liu is different."

"Bai Liu's soul is completely different from those crudely made Bai Six(s). He is the most perfect and the most interesting."

“He has a soul full of desire and restraint.”

“If I am going to die in some way,” He looked at the boundless sea, smiling expectantly, “I hope that Bai Liu, who has such a soul, will kill me personally.”

The Dense Forest Borderlands

Deep in the jungle.

Spades was jumping on the tree trunks with Bai Liu on his back, getting closer and closer to the other side of the lake. The voices of Tang Erda and Liu Jiayi could be heard faintly from below.

“That group of corpses are still chasing us. To be more precise, they are chasing you.” Tang Erda said.

Liu Jiayi asked: “Bai Liu, do you want to lure these corpses directly to the bottom of the lake when crossing it, and then accumulate points?”

Bai Liu hummed vaguely, Liu Jiayi and Tang Erda looked at each other, then they looked towards the lake in front of them, and instantly went their separate ways.

Behind them, from the ground to the branches, there were densely packed corpses, mixed with some half-formed corpses, looking ferocious and crazy, with fangs and claws bared, raising their heads and roaring at Bai Liu above.

Spades stepped on the tree trunk with his left foot to gain leverage and flew into the air. Immediately behind him, a number of black corpses jumped up and roared as they pounced towards Bai Liu behind him.

Spades turned around indifferently to protect Bai Liu, knocked down all the corpses with his whip, and knelt steadily on one knee on another branch.

The branch shook twice, and Spades suddenly asked, “Bai Liu, I think you know why these corpses are chasing you, and you can easily dissolve this pursuit. Why do you deliberately let these corpses chase you?”

Bai Liu smiled: “Didn’t Liu Jiayi just say that as long as these corpses keep chasing me, I can naturally lure them into the lake bottom to accumulate points. As long as these corpses are recovered by the lake bottom, they can be counted as my points. This is my goal.”

Spades said without hesitation: “You lied, this is not your purpose.”

Bai Liu paused for a moment, and his hand around Spades’ neck loosened slightly. He spoke with a casual smile in his tone: “Spades, your intuition about me is not always correct.”

“Occasionally listen to what I say to you instead of trusting your own instincts.”

Spades was silent for a while, frowning slightly, as if he was getting used to not trusting his own instincts. Then he said, “As long as we lure the corpses into the bottom of the lake, you will take the initiative to stop them from following you, right?”

Bai Liu lowered his eyes: “Yes.”

Spades paused, jumped up on one knee, swung his whip to knock away the approaching corpses, and got closer and closer to the lake.

Bai Liu leaned on Spades’ shoulder. He glanced at the blue lake that was getting closer and closer to him, clenched his fingers slightly and curled them into a fist.

With the wind carrying burning embers blowing through their hair, Spades approached the lake faster and faster.

Bai Liu rested his head on the center of Spades’ shoulder blades, half-closed his eyes and remained silent for a while. Suddenly, he spoke in a joking manner as if chatting: “Spades, your intuition is really an amazing thing. Can you tell me what your intuition is telling you now?”

“My intuition tells me that you are afraid and you are lying.” Spades said calmly, “You don’t like jumping into the water. You hate this burning environment, these burnt body parts, and you hate seeing bodies sinking in the water.”

“You jumped into the lake not for points, but for something else, something more dangerous. You hate doing it, but you decided to jump in anyway.”

Spades paused for a moment: “I don’t understand why you want to do something you hate.”

“Do you hate denying your intuition?” Bai Liu asked softly.

Spades hummed, “I don’t like it.”

Bai Liu laughed softly: “Then why are you willing to deny your intuition for me and trust me? You can clearly feel that I am lying to you, and you are also doing things that you hate."

Spades paused for a moment: "…Because you asked for it."

"Are you willing to do what is asked of you?" Bai Liu smiled, "Will you also do what others ask of you?"

Spades instantly retorted: "No."

Bai Liu whispered softly: "Then why are you willing to do it when I ask you to do it?"

Spades was silent for a moment, and when he spoke again, there was confusion in his voice: "…I don't know."

Bai Liu opened his mouth, as if he wanted to say something, but in the end he just smiled and explained: "Spades, has anyone ever taught you that sometimes people are willing to do something they hate for someone else?"

Spades shook his head honestly, then asked, "Why?"

Bai Liu was silent for a long time, then said: "Because I love this person."

He whispered in an incredibly soft voice, and the next second, he released his hands from around Spades' back and fell backwards.

Spades was whipping open a group of corpses approaching him. When he noticed Bai Liu falling off from behind him, he immediately turned around. He ignored the corpses rushing towards him and whipped open the corpse next to Bai Liu. He jumped down with Bai Liu and reached out to grab Bai Liu.

Bai Liu fell wantonly in the burning woods and the residual wind. His emotionless pure black eyes reflected the continuously approaching Spades like a mirror.

The corpses kept approaching Bai Liu. Although most of them were blown away by Spades' whip, there were too many of them and a small part of them still crawled onto his body.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu is attacked by a monster (Zombie Corpse), and his spirit value is decreasing…]

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu's mental value has fallen below 60, and he is about to see hallucinations…]

Spades stared intently. He tried several times to use the whip to circle Bai Liu's waist and pull him up, but he stopped at the moment of whipping.

——He was not sure.

Spades used any weapon to hit monsters without thinking about the strength. Although it seemed that he had good control over the strength, he himself was not sure of it.

Because he has never used a whip to save anyone.

He didn't know whether this blow of the whip would bring Bai Liu up intact or break him into two pieces.

For the first time, Spades felt that what The Reverse God said to him was useful.

——Practice with the whip well, or sooner or later you will encounter a situation where you want to use the whip but cannot handle it.

【At that time, you will lose to another person who is good at using a whip. 】

Spades used his whip to push away the corpses that were approaching him. He concentrated on stepping on the surrounding wood trunks, descended rapidly, and reached out to Bai Liu who was falling close to the lake.

Just when Spades' hand was about to grab Bai Liu's shoulder, Spades saw Bai Liu turn his head slightly and smile at him.

That smile was pure and naughty, and his eyes were full of the reflection of Spades, as if there was water flowing in them. It was obviously full of pure joy that could not be concealed, but it always made people feel that he would cry in the next second.

Bai Liu looked at Spdes with that smile and said softly, "Xie Ta, I missed you so much."

"Goodbye."

Spades was startled, and when he was about to grab Bai Liu's hand, Bai Liu slipped from his palm and fell into the cold lake.

Then Spades fell.

The corpses all around were crawling towards the lake frantically as if they had gone mad. A black mass poured into the bottom of the lake, instantly dyeing the blue-green lake surface black.

Even the corpses and dried firewood fragments used in the sacrificial ceremony for the new evil god were attracted away and rushed to the bottom of the lake recklessly.

There were only a few corpses left who wanted to run, but were fixed in place by some unknown force. They howled and screamed while carving the new evil god wooden sculpture in a distorted posture.

After Alex saw all the corpses run away, he laughed in a trance: “Bai Liu finally came, I can finally be free.”

The Reverse God’s expression changed: “Not good, with this kind of reaction, Bai Liu chose to accept the gift from the evil god.”

After he finished speaking, he raised his hand and cut the ropes that bound his hands. The other three team members also cut the ropes that bound themselves and jumped down from the wooden stakes.

Bai Yi yawned in confusion: “What’s going on? I just fell asleep. Have I collected all the [true end] line information and cleared the level now?”

Bai Jiamu couldn’t help rolling his eyes: “How can you fall asleep in this situation? Are you a pig?”

Bai Yi said confidently: “I can’t understand a single word every time The Reverse God pushes the [true end] line, I might as well take this opportunity to have a good rest. I still have to do housework after I log out of the game. Do you think it’s easy for me, a househusband, to find time to train every day?”

Bai Jiamu was speechless: “…You are the only one who can talk about your stupidity so openly.”

“Did you understand what The Reverse God said just now?” Bai Yi shrugged Bai Jiamu maliciously and looked at him sideways.

Bai Jiamu: “…”

Actually, I didn’t understand it and almost fell asleep afterwards.

The Reverse God waved his hand helplessly, interrupting the two people's bickering: "Okay, let's do the main thing first."

Hearing what The Reverse God said, Bai Jiamu and Bai Yi finally became serious, and they drew their weapons at the same time.

[System Alert: Player Bai Yi uses his personal skill (Cooking God), and selects a high-speed eggbeater as the tool]

Bai Yi pulled out a half-person-high eggbeater and casually carried it on his shoulder.

[System Alert: Player Bai Jiamu uses personal skills (Failed Scalpel)]

Bai Jiamu pulled out several scalpels with a loop on the end from his chest, put them on the base of his fingers, and turned them several times smoothly in a strange way without hurting the fingers around him at all.

Then he raised his hand to grasp the hilt of the knife, looked at The Reverse God and nodded, indicating that he was ready.

The Reverse God paused, raised his hand to pull something out from behind, but finally put his hand down: "Let's go."

Bai Yi asked curiously, "Hey, Reverse God, don't you use your skill weapon? Your skill weapon is the strongest among us, and according to Bai Liu's rebellious personality, your skill should have a miraculous effect on him."

The Reverse God turned around and smiled at him, his eyebrows curved and full of tenderness: "Yes, so we have to save him until the official league to maximize his value."

"It's a bit of an overkill and a bit stupid to use the trump card so easily now."

Bai Yi and Bai Jiamu who both easily used their "trump card" skills: "…"

They could never figure out whether The Reverse God was deliberately mocking them or seriously analyzing the current situation.

The Reverse God walked straight forward.

Bai Jiamu followed closely: "Where are you going?"

“The lake.” The Reverse God said without hesitation, “The final battlefield chosen by Bai Liu must be there.”

Bai Jiamu was puzzled: “Why?”

The Reverse God turned around and answered, “Because he made a deal with us, saying that he would make Spades lose miserably and quit the game at the lake.”

“This man will not break his deal easily. He will definitely deliver a crushing defeat to us at the lake as promised.”

On the other end.

After Spades followed Bai Liu into the lake, Tang Erda and Liu Jiayi also jumped in without hesitation.

The dark, cold surface of the lake was murky and unclear, and one could only see long black corpses vaguely swimming. A steady stream of corpses crawled into the water, spreading from the edge of the lake to near the center.

The bottom of the lake seemed to be boiling with asphalt-like mud, swallowing up the corpses.

Tang Erda stood in front of Liu Jiayi and kept shooting at the approaching body parts, but he was still hung with several body parts. Tang Erda’s left shoulder and Liu Jiayi’s left foot began to turn into corpses.

The visibility under the water is too low and the shooting speed of bullets will also be hindered. This is a map that greatly limits Tang Erda’s performance as a gunner.

Not to mention Liu Jiayi, her poison is an attack weapon that can kill one thousand enemies but only eight hundred in the water.

Before she found Bai Liu’s location, she was unable to provide Bai Liu with the antidote in time, and she might kill Bai Liu by mistake if she abused the poison.

Liu Jiayi curled up her corpse-like left foot and frowned in thought.

…She didn’t know if it was her illusion, but she always felt that in this copy, Bai Liu always separated her and Tang Erda from himself intentionally or unintentionally, or brought them to some game scenes that would limit the use of their weapons.

For example, at the very beginning, Bai Liu allowed Spades to take him away, and later sent them out to the Red Cross Team and Assault Team 1 respectively. After they finally reunited, they took her and Tang Erda to the close border where they could not use their skills.

——Now it's this turbid lake where both her and Tang Erda's skills will be restricted.

Liu Jiayi believed that Bai Liu would be able to figure out the design rules of the game "The Dense Forest Borderlands". Normally, Bai Liu would have used some extreme tactics to gamble once and then ended the game.

But… he dragged it until now, and repeatedly used the map to restrict her and Tang Erda's skills…

This is not Bai Liu's tactical style at all. He is good at maximizing the skills of each person instead of restricting them everywhere.

…This gave her the feeling that… it was as if Bai Liu was waiting for something extremely dangerous, and this thing was something they would definitely prevent Bai Liu from touching, so Bai Liu would use various methods to isolate them, restrict their skills, and prevent her and Tang Erda from stopping them.

Liu Jiayi stared at the black bottom of the lake with a frown on her face, and the uneasy feeling in her heart grew stronger and stronger.

Bai Liu, what on earth are you trying to do by scheming against everyone like this?!

The Reverse God and his men rushed to the lakeside, and saw clusters of black corpses falling into the water. From a distance, it looked like groups of black ants crawling towards a large puddle.

Bai Yi got goosebumps all over his body. "Wow, what happened in the lake?"

The Reverse God turned his head to look at the surging lake not far away: "We can only know when we go down."

After saying that, he jumped down first without hesitation, followed by Bai Jiamu and another team member. Bai Yi rubbed the goose bumps on his body, pinched his nose bitterly, and followed them down.

In an instant, Tang Erda beat both Liu Jiayi and the Killer Sequence led by The Reverse God's speed as they all swam to the bottom of the lake.

The body parts were continuously swallowed by the lake bottom, forming a large whirlpool. The more body parts were swallowed, the thicker the mud on the ground became. Bai Liu was lying in the middle of the body parts being swallowed.

Bai Liu clasped his hands together in front of his abdomen, his face calm and indifferent, his eyes half-closed with no light, and the fair skin above his neck glowed dimly in the dim lake bottom.

Bai Liu's shoulders, left hand, right hand, left foot and right foot had all completely turned into corpses, revealing an abnormal bluish-white color.

He lay peacefully on the corpses that surrounded him, like a body that was about to be buried with those corpses.

Spades grabbed his shoulders tightly and was trying to pull Bai Liu out, but in the end he could only watch Bai Liu sink deeper and deeper into the corpse.

It's not that he can't pull it out, but——

Spades exerted force with his wrist, and he clearly heard the sound of Bai Liu's bones breaking and tearing. He loosened his grip, bubbles overflowing from the corners of his mouth, and looked at the corpses under Bai Liu with an indifferent expression——

——These body parts have completely grown together with Bai Liu.

Unless Bai Liu figures it out himself, Spades can only tear Bai Liu's shoulders off his body bloodily instead of pulling Bai Liu out entirely.

But Bai Liu obviously didn't want to come out. He lay on the corpse as if he was asleep.

The corpse-transformation has spread to the heart.

Spades' resistance panel was ridiculously high, and these corpse parts posed little threat to him, so no part of him had been transformed into a corpse for the time being. He stared at Bai Liu for a long while, and suddenly leaned over and hugged Bai Liu tightly, using his body to block the constantly rising corpse parts.

Bai Liu finally opened his eyes and looked at Spades who was on his body: “You don’t have to do this for me.”

“I’m not doing this for you.” Spades’ voice was muffled, and a lot of bubbles came out of his mouth. “I just feel that I did something wrong just now.”

Bai Liu asked: “What did you do wrong?”

Spades’ voice was a little depressed: “I should have trusted my intuition instead of your words. You really are lying to me.”

Bai Liu chuckled: “Yes, didn’t The Reverse God teach you that the smarter people are, the more they like to lie.”

“Yeah.” Spades responded calmly. He hugged Bai Liu tighter. “I understand.”

Bai Liu was dragged deeper and deeper by the corpse parts. His body and the corpse parts seemed to form an airtight barrier. The area that Spades could protect became smaller and smaller. In the end, only a pair of exposed eyes and a right hand of Bai Liu were left that had not yet been transformed into corpses.

Spades tightly grasped Bai Liu’s only remaining right hand, not daring to use any strength at all, nor to use too much strength. He stared at Bai Liu’s gradually disappearing eyes with his pair of black eyes.

Bai Liu’s voice with a smile came out from the corpse: “Spades, you know, I once held a person’s hand like this and tried to save him.”

Spades asked: “Did you save him?”

Bai Liu smiled and said, “He was saved.”

“Now, it’s his turn to hold my hand tightly and rescue me.”

Bai Liu’s voice gradually faded away: “——But I suddenly want to know what the world belonging to God is like after he was buried underwater.”

“——Can I enter the world that belongs to God, find him again, kill everything that imprisoned him, and then bring his soul out?”

As Bai Liu's voice faded away, the wriggling corpses finally stopped and the lake bottom became clear again.

Liu Jiayi and Tang Erda, who had been obstructed, finally saw the location of Spades at the bottom of the lake.

Liu Jiayi and Tang Erda rushed to Spades almost instantly.

She looked at Bai Liu in disbelief as he was swallowed until only his right hand was exposed.

Moreover, this right hand was gradually turning into a corpse, and Liu Jiayi immediately wanted to use the antidote.

Spades shook his head: "This is an attack by a spirit monster. Your healing potion is useless."

Tang Erda was about to pull out his gun and shoot the huge, wriggling corpse at the bottom of the lake, but Spades grabbed the muzzle of the gun.

He stared at Tang Erda without a trace of emotion in his eyes: "Bai Liu is down there, he and the corpse have grown into one, if you hit the corpse he will also be hurt."

Liu Jiayi stared motionlessly at her right hand, which had only two fingers left that had not been turned into a corpse. Her expression almost twisted in an instant.

——Think of a way! Think of a way quickly! There must be a way to stop Bai Liu from becoming alienated!

There is no way.

This was Bai Liu's own desire for alienation. She couldn't stop Bai Liu from doing anything he wanted to do. She couldn't even understand why Bai Liu did this!

Liu Jiayi and Tang Erda watched helplessly as their right hands were devoured and turned into corpses, while Spades released his fingers one by one.

In the end, the right hand also completely turned into a corpse.

[System Alert (for all players): Player Bai Liu's spirit value has dropped to 0, and his body has been completely alienated. Exit the game.]

The Dense Forest Borderlands

Liu Jiayi couldn't breathe as she looked at the dark blue hand. She choked and coughed twice, about to drown, but Tang Erda immediately brought her up to the surface.

Spades let go of his hands and floated in the water. He stared at the bottom of the lake motionlessly, then immediately floated up. In the process of floating up, he met the Reverse God who was diving, and they floated to the surface together.

By the lake.

Liu Jiayi was choking and coughing with a pale face. She stared at the lake, as if expecting a Bai Liu to jump out of it.

Tang Erda patted Liu Jiayi on the back, his face almost blank, he seemed to have no idea what had just happened.

——Bai Liu, the omnipotent Bai Liu, became 100% alienated in front of them, and then died?

This sounds like a joke.

If the system prompt for all players had not been there, Tang Erda would have almost thought that this was another trick of Bai Liu.

Spades climbed out of the water, followed by Bai Yi and the others who were full of questions: "What's going on? We just got into the lake and we received the death notice of Bai Liu?"

"Bai Liu is not dead." Spades said without even turning his head, water dripping down the ends of his hair, his tone cold and calm.

Bai Yi was getting more and more confused. He opened his system panel, checked the bright red system notification two or three times, and muttered, "…I didn't see it wrong, it was a death exit…"

Spades turned around and stared at Bai Yi without saying a word. Bai Yi's voice gradually became weaker and he finally shut his mouth. He hid behind Bai Jiamu, trembling a little and whispered, "Bai Jiamu, I feel like Spades is looking at me with murderous intent…"

The Reverse God looked at Spades: "Why do you say Bai Liu is not dead?"

Spades remained silent and did not answer.

The Reverse God understood instantly: “Is it your intuition that told you this?”

The Reverse God quickly accepted Spades’ intuitive judgment and analyzed calmly: “If Bai Liu is not dead, then he cannot quit the game. He must be somewhere in this game. Now we have to find him from this game.”

“But this game has many time loops, and there are external and internal worlds.” Bai Jiamu frowned, “How do I find my way around such a large game map?”

The Reverse God smiled and said, “I have a way to find Bai Liu.”

Bai Yi muttered softly: “But, Reverse God, this Bai Liu is none of our business, why should we help find him?”

Liu Jiayi supported her knees and helped Tang Erda to stand up. She looked up and stared at the Reverse God: “If you help me find Bai Liu, I can participate in all your training matches for free and ensure your safety.”

The Reverse God turned around and glanced at Liu Jiayi, and suddenly realized: “You are the little witch with healing skills.”

Liu Jiayi took a deep breath and nodded.

The Reverse God laughed: “It’s a pretty significant bargaining chip. I’m really tempted.”

“But little witch, didn’t your tactician teach you that when negotiating with a smart person, no matter how panicked you are, you should never take out all your bottom line chips at the beginning?”

The Reverse God smiled gently and touched Liu Jiayi’s head, saying softly: “– In this way, he will shamelessly take advantage of your bargaining chips.”

“Bai Liu is very important to you, right?” The Reverse God smiled and casually threw a bomb, “How about I help you find Bai Liu, and you join my team?”

Liu Jiayi’s pupils shrank, Tang Erda stepped forward and knocked away the Reverse God’s hand that was touching Liu Jiayi, and said coldly: “Dream on!”

The Reverse God raised his hands with a smile, indicating that he meant no harm: “Just kidding, a big team like us, the Killer Sequence, generally don’t do things like taking advantage of others’ misfortunes to rob them.”

But almost every member of Bai Liu’s team was snatched from others.

This person was alluding to Bai Liu.

Tang Erda had a gun in his hand, and his expression showed a fierceness: “That has nothing to do with you.”

The Reverse God opened his smiling eyes, glanced at Liu Jiayi who was hanging her head, and then turned to Tang Erda: “But I think, as a tactician, I am fighting for you like objects, and then placing you so casually-“

“It’s a little bit disrespectful of your feelings.”

The Reverse God smiled: “——It’s as if he is relying on you to follow him forever, clamping your emotions and making you fearfully accept all the consequences of his willfulness and recklessness, and you can’t get rid of it.”

“How should I put it? It’s a more advanced way for a tactician to control his teammates than absolute control. You all definitely trust Bai Liu from the bottom of your hearts.”

The Reverse God smiled: “——But the pain brought by this trust is also doubled, because you have deep feelings for him.”

“But Bai Liu clearly knows that you will suffer for him. He can also design a game path that will not make you suffer, such as making you quit the game first.”

“Why did Bai Liu choose to suffer and let you watch him suffer?”

“The evil spirit loves to observe the suffering of others.”

The Reverse God’s tone was so light that it sounded like a whisper: “–Don’t you think that from the very beginning, Bai Liu was showing your pain to the evil god to prove his true nature, and then let the evil god wholeheartedly choose him as his successor so that he can enter the territory of God–“

“——Your suffering is nothing more than his tribute to the evil god ——”

Liu Jiayi and Tang Erda drew their weapons almost at the same time, and clamped the Reverse God from both sides at a speed invisible to the naked eye. Liu Jiayi jumped onto the Reverse God’s shoulder, clamped her legs around the Reverse God’s neck, and pointed the smoking poison spray bottle at his Adam’s apple.

Tang Erda clamped the Reverse God’s hands behind his back with one hand and pointed the gun at the Reverse God’s temple.

Bai Jiamu and Bai Yi picked up their weapons almost instantly, their expressions turned cold, and aimed at Tang Erda and Liu Jiayi.

“Let go of our tactician.”

The atmosphere was tense.

The Reverse God interrupted with a nonchalant and laughing voice: “Relax, I was just joking.”

“Bai Jiamu, Bai Yi, put down your weapons, they won’t kill me.”

Bai Jiamu and Bai Yi hesitated for a moment, but finally put down their weapons.

The Reverse God turned his head to look at Tang Erda who was pointing a gun at his temple. After thinking for a moment, he suddenly laughed: “I have investigated you, Tang Erda, the former third captain of the Heretic Administration, right?”

“In reality, I am a good citizen who has never done anything bad to any creature. I pay taxes on time, work overtime every day, and I have never killed any innocent people in the game.” The Reverse God smiled frankly, “Are you sure you can kill a normal person like me who does not meet your killing standards at all?”

Tang Erda clenched his teeth and the finger holding the trigger trembled slightly.

–cannot.

His principles do not allow him to kill normal people.

Liu Jiayi’s eyes were red, her fingers were stuck on the poison spray gun, her expression was almost unconcealable malice: “–Tang Erda can't kill you, but I can, help us find Bai Liu, or I will kill you!"

"The cause and effect relationship is wrong, little sister." The Reverse God was unmoved and pinched the muzzle of Liu Jiayi's spray gun with two fingers, looking back at her with a smile, "–You want me to help you find Bai Liu, so you have no way to kill me."

The Reverse God looked at Liu Jiayi gently: "Are you sure you want to kill me now?"

Liu Jiayi clenched the spray bottle tightly, then slowly put it down.

Bai Liu's obvious weakness was in the hands of the other party, and she really had no initiative.

Bai Yi stared in amazement as he watched the Reverse God resolve a crisis with just a few words.

Bai Jiamu turned the scalpel as if he was used to it.

The Reverse God's tactical style has always been like this. He is not very controllable and has a neither-good-nor-bad relationship with every team member. Even if he has a conflict with the enemy, he will try not to use force to solve the problem.

After all, the Reverse God is a tactician who can make the opponent surrender directly without drawing their weapons in the league game. The title of low-casualty tactician is not for nothing.

Liu Jiayi jumped off the Reverse God's shoulder, and Tang Erda took back the gun.

"Even if Bai Liu is sacrificing your pain, you have to find him, right?" The Reverse God asked softly.

Liu Jiayi turned her back to the Reverse God, her shoulders and voice tensed: "——Yes."

She clenched her fists and sneered, "We, the heartless team members who were snatched away by him like goods, can feel the pain of Bai Liu's self-destruction——"

"——How miserable Bai Liu must be."

Liu Jiayi took a deep breath:

"If Bai Liu is really offering pain to the evil god, then the most important tribute is his own pain. Our pain is just an addition, a secondary offering."

Liu Jiayi turned around and looked at the Reverse God calmly: "You don't have to rely on this kind of sophistry to shake the relationship between me and Bai Liu."

"Bai Liu is the person I chose myself. I know what kind of person he is better than you do. When I followed this guy, I was ready to be used to death by him."

"Bai Liu is my tactician." Tang Erda said solemnly, "As long as he wants to win the game, the main attacker must bear all the pain and do his best."

"As his team member, I will not be easily shaken by this little pain."

"…So determined?" The Reverse God thought for a moment, then smiled. "That's beyond my expectation. Okay, I'll help you find Bai Liu for free."

Liu Jiayi looked at him warily: "Free of charge?"

The Reverse God turned his head and looked in distress at Spades, who was squatting by the lake, staring at the lake and poking it with a whip from time to time.

Spades seemed to think that Bai Liu had sunk to the bottom of the lake and would soon come out, so he squatted beside it with his knees hugged, watching over him.

The Reverse God sighed helplessly: "It's not just you who are being used and sacrificed by Bai Liu and suffering, but also my ace team member."

"Your tactician Bai Liu is really a tough guy. He took away the soul of our team's main attacker in just one game."

The Reverse God smiled with crooked eyes, he turned his head to look at Tang Erda and Liu Jiayi: "As a return gift, I originally wanted to let his team members' souls be seduced by me, it seems that my skills are still not good enough."

Liu Jiayi and Tang Erda didn't know why, but they felt a chill down their spines when they heard the Reverse God's laughter.

——For some reason, this tactician called the Reverse God makes you want to run away when he laughs.

“How did you find Bai Liu?” Liu Jiayi asked directly.

The Reverse God smiled and said, “Use props.”

“What props?” Tang Erda asked.

The Reverse God scratched his face, his eyes wandering: “Well, we have to thank our team’s main attacker. He gave Bai Liu a very important contact item in our team. The judgment of this item is very strong. As long as the player is still there, it will automatically pop up from the item panel when the bell rings.”

“If Bai Liu is still in this game, you can find him by ringing the bell.”

Hearing this, Spades, who was squatting by the lake, slowly straightened his body. Without saying a word, he pulled out the bell from the system and shook it violently. As a result, the bell disintegrated after only two rings.

Spades uttered a slow “Ah! I broke it.”

The Reverse God took a deep breath and covered his face: “…Yes, you have made this bell before. The reason why it can last until now is because of its good quality.”

“Let me do it.”

The Reverse God had no choice but to take out his bell, hold the handle, and shake it lightly twice. Suddenly, several bells rang at the same time.

The bells of Bai Jiamu and Bai Yi were ringing, but the Reverse God immediately looked towards the other side of the lake: “There are no people from us on the other side, but there are bells ringing.”

Spades disappeared almost the moment the bell rang on the other side of the river, followed by Tang Erda and Liu Jiayi.

The Reverse God looked at Bai Jiamu and Bai Yi beside him and said, “Let’s go too.”

On the other side of the lake, next to the wooden sculpture of the evil god.

The corpses that had just been attracted away by Bai Liu in the lake had now come back one after another, dancing wildly around the two wooden sculptures of evil gods, chanting the evil god's songs with strange intonations in their rotten throats.

"…The mortal body has decayed, and the believers have carved new vessels to hold the wandering souls…"

Bai Liu on the new wood carving of the god became more and more lifelike, with only the head and shoulders still connected to the original wood, and the rest of the body having been completely carved, only the hair on the head was left uncarved.

The corpses who carved the wood carvings moved the old evil god wood carving next to the new wood carving that looked like Bai Liu, and compared the carvings carefully. They told "Bai Liu statue" that his originally short hair had been carved into a long ponytail that was loosely tied and hung to the side of the waist, just like the old evil god wood carving.

It seemed that because of this change in the new evil god wood sculpture, the smile on the face of the old evil god wood sculpture became more and more satisfied.

The corpses shook their arms and legs around the wooden sculpture of the evil god, and the chanting became louder and louder:

"The evil god boasts that there will be people wandering in his shadow.

The person in the shadow is fourteen years old.

So the evil god gave this man a spine, a heart, and a divine emblem.

Boasting that this person will be its only believer and will become the next new god

The person in the shadow is 24 years old.

Then the evil god fell and the souls of his followers wandered around.

Spine, heart, and divine emblem, all broken,

The change of evil gods,

…

God died but he survived, and he lives forever because of evil. “

As the chanting went on, the new wood carving was gradually completed. A corpse staggered and lifted a large stone and began to hit the old evil god wood carving. The old evil god wood carving, which had been patched up, was easily broken apart.

The corpses danced wildly, and a pure white bone whip along with an inverted cross pendant slowly appeared in front of the old evil god wooden sculpture.

They raised their hands tremblingly, and the chanting became louder again:

“…The evil god gave this man a spine, a heart, and a divine emblem…”

“Using the spine of the old god and the heart blood of the new god, this evil faith comes from the depths of eternity, and even death cannot extinguish it—”

“——Create a new evil god to rule the universe.”

The corpses trembled as they raised a sharp stick and stabbed it hard into the heart of the old evil god wooden sculpture.

A red liquid similar to sticky blood flowed out from the heart of the wooden sculpture.

The corpses held up white bone whips and received the red liquid with reverence and awe. The bone whips were strangely dyed into a pure black color starting from the handle, which did not reflect any light.

As it was dyed, the bone spurs on it burst open, looking extremely sharp.

Alex, tied to a stake, grinned – that was the red paint.

——These red paints are produced from the evil god’s wood carvings.

As long as you pierce the heart of the wooden sculpture with a thorn, a magical red paint with magical powers will continuously flow out of it, which will always help people realize their desires.

At first Alex thought it was just some strange plant juice produced by the wood used for the evil god wood carving.

Later, he realized that it had nothing to do with the wood, but was the heart and blood of the wood sculpture.

Bright red liquid dripped onto the white bone whip drop by drop. The dyeing process of the bone whip was already halfway through. The corpse carefully put the inverted cross pendant on the new wood carving.

Alex raised his head in relief, closed his eyes, and showed a trance-like smile on his face: "…It's finally over."

A sound of ringing bells suddenly came from the new wood carving shaped like Bai Liu. The carefully carved surface of the new wood carving was cracked with brittle cracks like eggshells. These cracks grew bigger with the ringing of the bells, as if a creature inside was about to break through the wood carving and get out at any time.

The corpses panicked and stopped chanting and ritual:

"…The bone whip has not yet been dyed…"

"…The New Evil God shouldn't enter the container at this moment!"

Alex was stunned. He stared at the wooden sculpture.

The half-closed eyes of the new wooden sculpture blinked slightly, and a strong wind blew, blowing away the smoke that had been lingering in the jungle.

The surface of the wooden shell was completely shattered, and the long, loose ponytail passed through the wooden shell and drifted in the wind. The inverted cross pendant was blown into the air by the wind, sparkling in the dark rain forest.

Sawdust flakes fell, Bai Liu slowly opened his pure black eyes, his ponytail tied loosely behind his head, casually falling on one shoulder and hanging to his waist.

There was no emotion on his face, just a calmness without wind or cloud. His eyes seemed to contain all kinds of human desires, sorrows and joys, and convey the eternal galaxies and laws of the universe.

The corpses in the rainforest lay trembling on the ground. The miasma that had been covering the rainforest dissipated, and a faint light fell from the illusory sky, falling on the sacrifices who were tied to wooden stakes and witnessed all this.

Alex stared up at the new god born before him in a daze, and almost stopped breathing.

——This is the new god that the old evil god has been waiting for so long.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu's body has been replaced, and the overall panel value has risen sharply… Calculating…]

[…climbed to 10,000…unlocked the Bronze False God achievement… unlocked the low-level belief value system…]

[…climbed to 30,000…unlocked the Silver Pseudo-God achievement…unlocked the intermediate faith value system…]

[The comprehensive panel value continues to rise, the system is calculating…]

[…Obtained the system's crown-level gift package (a gift from the evil god)…]

[…A bone whip of unknown attributes, and a reverse cross pendant that can communicate with the evil god…]

[…acquired a new hidden identity (the heir of the evil god). Based on this identity, the evil god gave the player Bai Liu a world line save point – congratulations to the player Bai Liu for obtaining the world line game design rights of "Secret Order Border".]

[From this moment on, the player Bai Liu is the supreme god of the world line of "Dense Forest Frontier". You can rewrite and design all the stories in this world, save and retrieve at any time, and rewrite at any time, as long as you find it interesting. This is the right granted by God to the heir.]

[…Based on the identity of (the heir of the evil god), the player Bai Liu unlocks the (the heir of the evil god's faith) collection system by leaps and bounds.]

[Player Bai Liu, becoming an evil god requires not only strength, but also faith.]

[If you want to kill the evil god and become the new god, it is not only about being physically strong, but also about constantly gaining the faith of mankind. This is the most important thing for you. When your faith value exceeds that of the current evil god, you will have the right to kill him——]

[How do you make humans believe in you?]

[Friendly advice from the evil god: Only when humans are in enough pain will they believe in God. As long as enough pain is created, humans will sell their souls and become believers of the evil god out of despair, praying to the evil god for wishes and help.]

[In other words, when a human becomes a player in the evil god's game, the evil god gains his soul and faith.]

[For you, Bai Liu, when you have a person's soul banknote, you have his faith. When the quantity and quality of your soul banknotes are equal to mine, you will see me.]

【I believe this day will come soon. 】

[Looking forward to meeting you, Bai Liu (laughs)——An evil god remains]

The Dense Forest Borderlands

Bai Liu turned his head to look at the half-dyed white bone whip and reached out to take it, but was stopped by the corpses lying on the ground in panic: “It’s not ready yet. Your soul and this whip have yet to completely fit into the container…”

He lowered his eyes to look at the bone whip. The blood-colored paint turned black the moment it dripped onto the bone, as if the color was formed by corroding the bone.

“I like white.” Bai Liu said calmly and was about to reach over the corpse to get the whip, “No need to dye it.”

The moment Bai Liu stretched out his hand, a stern shout came from behind: “The ritual has not yet been completed, stop Bai Liu from taking the whip!”

A scalpel spun rapidly and broke Bai Liu’s whip.

Bai Liu pulled out the whip and swung it away without even looking back.

Bai Jiamu raised his hand to take back the scalpel. His face darkened: “–You made a notch in my scalpel. It’s at least a weapon of the same level as Spades’ whip.”

The Reverse God quickly stepped forward. He only glanced at Bai Liu, and had a rare serious expression on his smiling face: “——It’s really a huge investment. The evil god actually directly delegated the right to design the world line to Bai Liu, the heir.”

He turned around and said to Liu Jiayi and Tang Erda behind him with unprecedented seriousness: “To tell you the truth, if you still want your previous Bai Liu tactician to come back, you’d better stop this guy’s whip from turning black.”

“Otherwise, next time Bai Liu won’t just sacrifice your pain.”

The Reverse God said coldly: “The real evil god rituals all involve the sacrifice of souls. Your two souls are in his hands, right?”

After saying that, the Reverse God turned around and quickly ordered: “Bai Yi will surround from behind, Bai Jiamu should not interrupt the attack and interrupt Bai Liu’s movements.”

Bai Yi and Bai Jiamu said in unison: “Yes!”

Bai Yi lifted the egg beater high up, and with a few quick leaps, he jumped almost as high as a dozen floors. Then he raised the egg beater and swung it down with gritted teeth: “—Beat at high speed!”

The egg beater, which was half the size of a person, spun rapidly, making a buzzing sound almost like a chainsaw. During the falling process, the rotating egg beater was so fast that it could almost cut the air, creating an air vortex in the air.

Bai Yi held the egg beater high above his head, and the moment it fell, it passed through all the waist-thick branches of the trees almost without any hindrance, and landed heavily on Bai Liu.

“Boom–!!”

Where Bai Yi hit, almost the entire ground sank several dozen centimeters, and a huge white smoke erupted.

At the same time, Bai Jiamu kept waving the sharp scalpel in his hand, smoothly bypassing the trees in the rainforest, and making several “puff puff puff” sounds in the mist with incredible precision.

A suppressed groan of pain came from the white mist.

The black and white whip swirled and dispersed the mist. Bai Liu stood in the center. He raised his eyes to look at the Reverse God opposite him. His face had a calm expression, and in his hand he held Bai Yi, who was struggling in pain.

The egg beater was thrown aside in tatters, and the mixer body had long been beaten to pieces by the whip.

Bai Yi’s neck was lifted up by Bai Liu’s whip, and the whip was getting tighter and tighter. Bai Yi’s face turned purple, and he kept scratching the whip on his neck with his hands, looking weaker and weaker.

There were several scalpels stuck in his body and blood was flowing down. It was obvious that Bai Liu had just used him as a shield.

Bai Jiamu’s pupils shrank: “——Bai Yi!”

He was about to step forward without hesitation, but was stopped by the Reverse God, who just quickly said, “You can’t beat him,” and disappeared on the spot.

The next second, the Reverse God appeared behind Bai Liu with a cold look in his eyes. He raised his hand and made a Tai Chi starting move, then pushed on Bai Liu's shoulder.

[System prompt: Player God-defying Judge uses physical skills (Tai Chi Bagua)]

Bai Liu looked back and dodged sideways which made the Reverse God's push miss Bai Liu's jaw.

The Reverse God changed his palm into a hook and pulled back without hesitation, aiming at the inverted cross pendant on Bai Liu's neck.

Bai Liu immediately released the whip that was trapping Bai Yi, raised his wrist and exerted force, and the whip flew quickly between the two people. The Reverse God withdrew his hand instantly, and it seemed that he wanted to safely fight through this confrontation.

The bone spurs of the whip opened up, leaving a deep bloody mark on the back of the Reverse God's hand.

Under the protection of the Reverse God, Bai Yi panted and crawled out of the attack range of Bai Liu's whip.

Bai Jiamu immediately helped him up. Bai Yi patted his chest in fear, his eyes wide open: "Shit, I thought I was going to die. Couldn't you have waited until you were sure before stabbing me? You stabbed me all over!"

"I just waited until I saw the opportunity before I made my move!" Bai Jiamu cursed, "Who told you not to hide after you were caught?"

The Reverse God and Bai Liu were still fighting over there, and these two men were actually able to fight on equal terms at a speed invisible to the naked eye.

But gradually, the scars on the Reverse God's body continued to increase, and he was obviously at a disadvantage. However, his tone was still calm, and he took the time to instruct Bai Jiamu, "Go and find Spades, Tang Erda, and Liu Jiayi. Bai Liu has rewritten the world line and has just transferred them to other places."

Bai Jiamu was startled. He looked around and realized that he and Bai Yi were the only ones left around.

Tang Erda, Liu Jiayi, and Spades, who had always been in the front, disappeared out of thin air at some point.

The Reverse God stared at Bai Liu opposite him, his hands changing positions rapidly, pushing and pulling at extremely fast and extremely slow speeds, and several times he held the whip and shook it back. His hands were already full of holes caused by bone spurs and were covered in blood, but there was no change in his expression.

He fought Bai Liu at close range using physical skills, and he used Tai Chi, a somewhat rogue and flexible physical skill. This greatly restricted the use of Bai Liu's whip and prevented the group of corpses from continuing to stain Bai Liu's whip.

Bai Liu looked at the Reverse God and said, "Not a bad strategy."

The Reverse God was smiling and was in the mood to chat with Bai Liu: "Right? I figured it out when I was with Spades. Close physical contact is very effective against you whip users, so I specially developed a Tai Chi skill."

"But speaking of it." The Reverse God seemed as if he was just chatting from the tone of voice, and he raised his hand to slap Bai Liu's spine with a palm strike so strong that the wind ran away, "–Are you afraid to face Spades, Tang Erda and Liu Jiayi with this face?"

